No. 9] to seek the Divine mercy and to make restitution to those whom his father had oppressed. "Being," says Theophanes "the genuine inheritor of his father's disposition," but perhaps influenced by the exhaustion of the imperial finances through an unfortunate war, he replied, that he could not spare for restitution more than three talents. "This," says the irate historian, "was but a small part of what he (Nicephorus) had wrongfully taken." The painfulness of his wounds, the suggestions of Theophano, who hoped, like Irene, to grasp the sceptre, and probably the intrigues of the parties themselves, alienated Stauracius from his brother-in-law Michael and several of the great officers of the court, and he is said to have contemplated bequeathing the empire to his wife, or even restoring the ancient forms of the Roman Republic. His courtiers conspired against him, and Stauracius having proposed to put out the eyes of Michael, matters were brought to a crisis; Michael was proclaimed emperor (Oct. 811), and Stauracius having put on the habit of a monk, was deposed, and died soon after his deposition, having reigned only two months and six days after his father's death. His widow Theophano embraced a monastic life, and employed the wealth which the humanity or policy of Michael [MICHAEL I. RHANGABE] allowed her, in converting her palace into a monastery called "Hebraica" (τὰ Ἑβραϊκά) and by corruption Braca (τὰ Βραχᾶ), and at a later period Stauraca (Σταυρακᾶ), because in it the body of Stauracius, and afterwards that of Theophano, were buried. According to some writers his body was deposited in (perhaps transferred to) the monastery of Satyrus. The character of Stauracius is drawn in the most unfavourable colours by Theophanes, Zonaras, and others: but it was the misfortune of Nicephorus and his son to come between the two sovereigns, Irene and Michael Rhangabe, whose services to orthodoxy or profusion to the church made them great favourites with the ecclesiastical annalists of the Byzantine empire; and their evanescent dynasty was founded by the deposition of one and overthrown to make way for the elevation of the other of these favourites of the church. It is reasonable therefore to suppose that their characters have been unfairly represented; and, in the case of Stauracius especially, things harmless or unimportant have been described as evidences of the greatest depravity. STELLA, ARRU'NTIUS. 1. The person to whom Nero entrusted the superintendence of the games which he exhibited in A. D. 55. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 22.)

2. A poet and a friend of Statius, who dedicated to him the first book of his Silvae, the second poem in which celebrates the marriage of Stella and Violantilla. This Stella is also mentioned by Martial (vi. 21).

STE'LLIO, C. AFRA'NIUS. 1. Praetor B. C. 185, and one of the triumviri for founding a colony B. C. 183. (Liv. xxxix. 23, 25).

2. Son of the preceding, served in B. C. 169 against Perseus, king of Macedonia, and was stationed in the Illyrian town of Uscana, which was compelled to surrender to Perseus. (Liv. xliii. 18, 19.)

STE'NIUS or STHE'NIUS, a Campanian and Lucanian name. Stenius was one of the leading men at Capua, who entertained Hannibal in B. C. 216, after the battle of Cannae (Liv. xxiii. 8); and Pliny speaks of a Stenius Statilius as a Lucanian general. [STATILIUS, No. 1.]

STENTOR (Στέντωρ), a herald of the Greeks at Troy, whose voice was as loud as that of fifty other men together. His name has become proverbial for any one who screams or shouts with an unusually loud voice. (Hom. Il. v. 783; Juven. Sat. xiii. 112.) [L. S.]

STENYCLE'RUS (Στενύκληρος), a Messenian hero, from whom the Stenyclarian plain was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. iv. 33. § 5.) [L. S.]

STE'PHANUS (Στέφανος), historical. 1. One of the two sons of Thucydides, whom Plato mentions among the instances of those sons of great men, whom their fathers, though educating them with the utmost care, have been unable to train to excellence (Menon, p. 94, c. d.). He is mentioned by Athenaeus (vi. p. 234, e.) as the scribe of a decree of Alcibiades, engraved on a pillar in the temple of Heracles at Cynosargos.

2. An Athenian orator, son of Menecles of Acharnae, against whom Demosthenes composed two orations, which contain scarcely any particulars of his life deserving notice here. He is also mentioned by Athenaeus (xiii. p. 593, f.).

3. Ἐροιάδης, the husband of Neaera, several times mentioned by Demosthenes in his Oration against Neaera. [P. S.]

STE'PHANUS, emperor of Constantinople. [ROMANUS I.; CONSTANTINUS VII.]

STE'PHANUS (Στέφανος), literary. 1. An Athenian comic poet of the New Comedy, was probably the son of Antiphanes, some of whose plays he is said to have exhibited. (Anon. de Com. p. xxx.; Suid. s. v. Ἀντιφάνης.) The other statement of Suidas (s. v. Ἄλεξις), that he was the son of Alexis, seems to arise merely from a confusion of the names of Alexis and Antiphanes. All that remains of his works is a single fragment, quoted by Athenaeus (xi. p. 469, a.), from his Φιλολάκων, a play which was evidently intended to ridicule the imitators of Lacedaemonian manners. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 496; Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 304, 376, 485, 486, vol. iv. p. 544.)

2. Of Byzantium, the author of the well-known geographical lexicon, entitled Ἐθνικά, of which unfortunately we only possess an epitome. There are few ancient writers of any importance of whom we know so little as of Stephanus. All that can be affirmed of him with certainty is that he was a grammarian at Constantinople, and lived after the time of Arcadius and Honorius, and before that of Justinian II. The ancient writers, often as they quote the Ἐθνικά, give us absolutely no information about its author, except his name. We learn from them, however, that the work was reduced to an epitome by a certain Hermolaus, who dedicated his abridgement to the emperor Justinian. [HERMOLAUS.] Hence, in turning to the few incidental pieces of information which the work contains respecting its author, we are met by the question, whether such passages were written by Stephanus himself, or by the epitomator Hermolaus. The most important of these passages is the following, which occurs in the article Ἀνακτόριον· Καὶ Εὐγένιος δὲ, ὁ πρὸ ἡμῶν τὰς ἐν τῇ βασιλίδι σχολὰς διακοσμήσας, which cannot refer to any other Eugenius than the eminent grammarian of Augustopolis in Phrygia, who, as we learn from Suidas, taught at Constantinople, under the emperor Anastasius, at the end of the fifth century or the beginning of the sixth. (Suid. s. v.) This passage was pointed out by Thomas de Pinedo, the translator of Stephanus, as an indication of the author's age; but nearly all the editors of Stephanus, as well as Isaac Vossius and Fabricius, have chosen to regard it as an insertion made by Hermolaus, for the following reason; if Eugenius flourished under Anastasius, who died in A. D. 518, his successor in the presidency of the schools would in all probability be in office under Justinian I., who came to the throne in A. D. 527, which agrees with the statement of Suidas, that Hermolaus dedicated his epitome to Justinian. Plausible as this argument is, it is far from being conclusive. It evidently rests in part, if not chiefly, on the tacit assumption that, when a personal reference is made in an abridged work to the author, without any thing to show whether the writer of the passage is the original author or the epitomator, the presumption is, that it has been inserted by the latter. Now we believe that the presumption is just the other way; both on the general principle that, in an abridged work, whatever cannot be proved to be an interpolation should be referred to the original author, and also on account of the well-known habit of compilers and epitomators of the later period of Greek literature to copy their author almost verbatim, so far as they follow him at all, and to make their abridgement by the simple omission of whole passages, often in such a manner as even to destroy the grammatical coherence of what is left, as is frequently the case in this very epitome of Stephanus. On this presumption, we think, the question mainly turns. It would be rash to regard it as decided; but it may be safely said that the passage should probably be referred to Stephanus, unless some positive and decisive proof be produced that it was inserted by Hermolaus. The chronological argument stated above is not such a proof; for Suidas does not say to which of the two Justinians Hermolaus dedicated his epitome; and, even if it was to Justinian I., there is nothing to prevent our supposing that the work of Stephanus was composed under Justin or in the early part of the reign of Justinian, and that the epitome was made very soon afterwards; but, considering how little Suidas troubles himself about minute distinctions, it is perhaps better to keep to the explanation that the Justinian to whom Hermolaus dedicated his epitome was Justinian II., and that Stephanus himself flourished under Justinian I., in the former part of the sixth century. Westermann argues further, that it is unlikely that a person of so little learning and judgment, as the epitomator of Stephanus appears by his work to have possessed, would have been placed at the head of the imperial schools of Constantinople, or would have written such a work as the Byzantine history quoted in the article Τότθοι, or as the disquisition on the Aethiopians referred to under Αἰθίοψ; but, in these cases also, it appears better to rest on the simple presumption that these passages proceed from the pen of the original author, there being no proof to the contrary. A more important piece of collateral evidence respecting the time of Stephanus, pointed out by Westermann, is his eulogy of Petrus Patricius (s. v. Ἀκόναι), who died soon after A. D. 562, and was therefore a contemporary of Stephanus, supposing that the latter flourished at the time above assigned to him.

The literary history of the work of Stephanus is also involved in much obscurity. Even the title has been a subject of dispute. In the Aldine edition it is entitled περὶ πόλεων, which Dindorf has adopted; in the Juntine περὶ πόλεων καὶ δήμων, which Berkelius also places at the head of the text, while on his title-page he has Στεφάνου Βυζαντίου ἐθνικὰ κατ' ἐπιτομήν; and Salmasius prefers the title Στεφάνου Βυζαντίου περὶ ἐθνικῶν καὶ τοπικῶν. All these variations are supported more or less by the authority of the MSS. The numerous references, however, made to the work by ancient writers, especially by Eustathius, make it clear that the proper title of the original work was Ἐθνικά, and that of the epitome ἐκ τῶν ἐθνικῶν Στεφάνου κατ' ἐπιτόμην. The title prefixed to the important fragment of the original work, which is preserved in the Codex Seguerianus, deserves notice on account of its full explanation of the design of the work, although it has of course been added by a grammarian: — Στεφάνου γραμματικοῦ Κωνσταντινουπόλεως περὶ πόλεων νήσων τε καὶ ἐθνῶν, δήμων τε καὶ τόπων, καὶ ὁμωνυμίας αὐτῶν καὶ μετωνομασίας καὶ τῶν ἐντεῦθεν παρηγμένων ἐθνικῶν τε καὶ τοπικῶν καὶ κτητικῶν τε ὀνομάτων.

According to the title, the chief object of the work was to specify the gentile names derived from the several names of places and countries in the ancient world. But, while this is done in every article, the amount of information given went far beyond this. Nearly every article in the epitome contains a reference to some ancient writer, as an authority for the name of the place; but in the original, as we see from the extant fragments, there were considerable quotations from the ancient authors, besides a number of very interesting particulars, topographical, historical, mythological, and others. Thus the work was not merely what it professed to be, a lexicon of a special branch of technical grammar, but a valuable dictionary of geography. How great would have been its value to us, if it had come down to us unmutilated, may be seen by any one who compares the extant fragments of the original with the corresponding articles in the epitome. These fragments, however, are unfortunately very scanty. They consist of: — (1) The portion of the work from Δύμη to the end of Δ, contained in a MS. of the Seguerian Library; but, unfortunately, there is a large gap even in this portion; (2) The article Ἰβηρίαι δύο, which is preserved by Constantinus Porphyrogennetus (de Admin. Imp. c. 23); (3) An account of Sicily, quoted by the same author from Stephanus (de Them. ii. 10). The first two of these fragments are inserted by Westermann in the text, in place of the corresponding articles of the epitome, which he transfers to his preface; the third differs so thoroughly from the article Σικελία in the epitome, that Westermann does not venture to insert it in the text, but prints it in his preface. There are also some other quotations in the ancient writers, which, from their general, but not exact, resemblance to the articles in the epitome, are presumed to be taken from the original.

They are particularized by Westermann in his preface.

From a careful examination of the references, it appears that the author of the Etymologicum Magnum, Eustathius, and others of the grammarians, possessed the original work of Stephanus. It also seems probable that the work, as it now exists, is not a fair representation of the epitome of Hermolaus, but that it has been still further abridged by successive copyists. The former part of the work is pretty full; the portion from Πάτραι to the middle of Σ is little more than a list of names; the articles in Τ and Υ become fuller again; and those from Χ to Ω appear to be copied, almost without abridgement, from the work of Stephanus.

The work is arranged in alphabetical order; but it was also originally divided into books, the exact number of which cannot be determined; but they were considerably more numerous than the letters of the alphabet.

The following are the chief editions of the Epitome of Stephanus: — (1) the Aldine, Venet. 1502, fol.; (2) the Juntine, Florent. 1521, fol.; (3) the edition of Xylander, with several emendations in the text, and with Indices, Basil. 1568, fol.; (4) that of Thomas de Pinedo, the first with a Latin version, Amst. 1678, fol.; (5) the text corrected by Salmasius, from a collation of MSS.; various readings collected by Gronovius from the Codex Perusinus, with notes; a Latin Version and Commentary by Abr. Berkelius, Lugd. Bat. 1688, fol., reprinted 1694, fol.; (6) that of the Wetsteins, containing the Greek text, the Latin version and notes of Thomas de Pinedo, and the various readings of Gronovius, with Indices, Amst. 1725, fol.; (7) that of Dindorf, with readings from a newly-found MS., and the notes of L. Holstenius, A. Berkelius, and Thomas de Pinedo, Lips. 1825, &c., 4 vols. 8vo.; (8) that of A. Westermann, containing a thoroughly revised text, with a very valuable preface, Lips. 1839, 8vo.: this is by far the most useful edition for ordinary reference. The chief fragment was published separately, by S. Tennulius, Amst. 1669, 4to.; by A. Berkelius, with the Periplus of Hanno and the Monumentum Adulitanum of Ptolemy Euergetes, Lugd. Bat. 1674, 8vo., reprinted in Montfaucon's Catalogus Bibliothecae Coislinianae, pp. 281, &c., Paris. 1715, fol.; by Jac. Gronovius, Lugd. Bat. 1681, 4to., and in the Thesaurus Antiq. Graec. vol. vii. pp. 269, &c.; and it is contained in all the editions, from that of Thomas de Pinedo downwards. There is a German translation of the fragment, with an Essay on Stephanus, by S. Ch. Schirlitz, in the Ephem. Litter. Scholast. Univ. vol. ii. pp. 385—390, 393—399, 1828, 4to.

There are several other Greek writers of this name, but not of sufficient importance to require notice here. (See Fabric. Bibl. Graec. Index.) [P.S.]

STE'PHANUS, artists. 1. A sculptor, who exercised his art at Rome in the first century B. C., was the disciple of Pasiteles and the instructor of Menelaus, as we learn from two inscriptions; the one on the trunk of a naked statue in the Villa Albani, ΣΤΕΦΑΝΟΣ ΠΑΣΙΤΕΛΟΥΣ ΜΑΘΗΤΗΣ ΕΠΟΙΕΙ (Marini, Inscriz. d. Villa Albani, p. 174), and the other on the base of the celebrated group in the Villa Ludovisi, ΜΕΝΕΛΑΟΣ ΣΤΕΦΑΝΟΥ ΜΑΘΗΤΗΣ ΕΠΟΙΕΙ. [MENELAUS.] Stephanus is also mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4. § 10) as the maker of Hippiades in the collection of Asinius Pollio; but what he means by Hippiades is not very clear. From the connection, the word would appear to be a feminine plural. (Thiersch, Epochen, p. 295.)

2. A freedman of Livia, in whose household he practised the art of a worker in gold, as we learn from a Latin inscription, in which he is designated AURIFEX. (Gori, Nos. 114—122; Bianchini, p. 67, No. 220; Welcker, Kunstblatt, 1827, No. 84; Osann, Kunstblatt, 1830, No. 84; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 407, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

STE'PHANUS, was ordained bishop of Rome A. D. 253, in the place of Lucius, and suffered martyrdom four years afterwards. He is known to us solely by the dispute which he maintained with Cyprian upon baptizing heretics, which became so fierce, that Stephanus, not content with refusing audience to the deputies despatched by the African prelate, positively forbad the faithful to exercise towards them the common duties of hospitality. He appears to have published two epistles in connection with this controversy.

1. Ad Cyprianum. 2. Ad Episcopos Orientales contra Helenum et Firmilianum. Neither of these has been preserved, but a short fragment of the former is to be found in the letter of Cyprian Ad Pompeium (lxxiv.), and is printed in the Epistolae Pontificum Romanorum of Constant (fol. Paris, 1721, p. 210). [W. R.]

STE'PHANUS (Στέφανος), the name of several physicians: —

1. Probably a native of Tralles in Lydia, as he was the father of Alexander Trallianus. (Alex. Trall. iv. 1, p. 198.) He had four other sons, Anthemius, Dioscorus, Metrodorus, and Olympius, who were all eminent in their several professions. (Agath. Hist. v. p. 149.) He lived in the latter half of the fifth century after Christ.

2. A native of Edessa, who was one of the most eminent physicians of his age. He was of great service to Kobádh (or Cabades) king of Persia, early in the sixth century after Christ, for which he was richly rewarded. During the siege of Edessa by Cosra (or Chosroës) the son of Kobádh, A. D. 544, Stephanus was sent with some of his fellow-citizens to intercede in behalf of the place; and in his address to the king he claims for himself the credit not only of having brought him up, but also of having persuaded his father to nominate him as his successor to the throne in place of his elder brother. (Procop. de Bello Pers. ii. 26.) His intercession had no effect, but the king was shortly afterwards forced to raise the siege.

3. A native of Alexandria, author of a short Greek treatise on Alchemy, who must have lived in the early part of the seventh century after Christ, as part of his work (p. 243) is addressed to the Emperor Heraclius (A. D. 610—641). It consists of nine πράξεις or Lectures (see Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xii. p. 694, note, ed. vet.), the first of which is entitled Στεφάνου Ἀλεξανδρέως οἰκουμενικοῦ φιλοσόφου καὶ διδασκάλου τῆς μεγάλης καὶ ἱερᾶς τέχνης περὶ Χρυσοποιίας πρᾶξις σὺν Θεῷ πρώτη, where it is not quite clear whether Περὶ Χρυσοποιίας, De Chrysopoeia, is meant to be the title of the whole work, or merely of the first section of it. Reinesius (apud Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xii. p. 757) speaks highly of the work, but notices that the author falls into (p. 231) the common error of the Eastern and Greek churches of that age respecting the procession of the Holy Ghost. The writer was evidently a religious man, as appears from the way in which he uses his numerous quotations from the New Testament.* The work was first published in a Latin translation by Dominic Pizimentus, Patav. 1573. 8vo. together with Democritus, Synesius, and other writers on the same subject. The Greek text is to be found in the second volume of Ideler's Physici et Medici Graeci Minores, Berol. 8vo. 1842. Fabricius (l. c. p. 693) and others think that this Stephanus was the same person as the commentator on Hippocrates and Galen, who may have been called (say they) Atheniensis from being born at Athens, and Alexandrinus from having settled at Alexandria; but this conjecture seems improbable. (See Fabric. l. c.; Lambec. Biblioth. Vindob. vol. vi. p. 380, ed. Kollar.)

4. A native of Athens, and a commentator on Hippocrates and Galen, who is said in the titles of some MSS. at Vienna to have been a pupil of Theophilus Protospatharius (Lambec. Biblioth. Vindob. vol. vi. p. 198, vol. vii. p. 352). Nothing more is known of his personal history, and his date is somewhat uncertain. Some persons confound him with the chemist of Alexandria, and say that he lived in the seventh century after Christ; but this is probably an error, as Dietz appears to be correct in stating that some of the Greek words to be found in his writings (e. g. Ψυχία ἀφράτα, Comment. in Hippocr. "Prognost." p. 87, τζιμβλοί, ibid. p. 89, λαγωδάτον κοιμᾶσθαι, p. 94, μάγκυπες, p. 146, ἀκατίδες, p. 154, κλοκίον, p. 159, &c.) indicate a later date. If it is true that Theophilus was his tutor, this does not help to determine the century in which he lived, as the date of the master is as uncertain as that of the pupil. If, however, we suppose Theophilus to have lived in the ninth century [THEOPHILUS PROTOSPATHARIUS], Stephanus may be safely placed in the same. However this may be, he is certainly, in the opinion of Dietz (Schol. in Hippocr. et Gal. vol. i. p. xvi.) and M. Littré (Oeuvres d' Hippocr. tome i. p. 128), the most important of all the ancient commentators on Hippocrates after Galen, as his notes form a useful supplement to those of that writer, and contain quotations and explanations not to be found elsewhere. His Scholia on the "Prognosticon" of Hippocrates are to be found in the first volume of Dietz's "Scholia in Hippocratem et Galenum," Regim. Pruss. 8vo. 1834. There is also a commentary on the "Aphorisms" of Hippocrates, which in some MSS. bears the name of Stephanus, but in others it is attributed to Meletius or Theophilus; some extracts are inserted in the second volume of Dietz's collection mentioned above. His commentary on Galen's "Ad Glauconem de Methodo Medendi" is said by Fabricius, and others who have repeated the assertion on his authority, to have been published in Greek, Venet. ap. Aldum, 1536, 8vo., but this edition is not mentioned by Renouard (Annales des Aldes), and its existence is very doubtful. It was first published in a Latin translation by Augustus Gadaldinus, 1554, 8vo. Venet., which was several times reprinted. The Greek text is inserted in the first volume of Dietz's Schol. in Hippocr. et Gal. There is a short Greek work in MS., entitled Βίβλος Διοσκορίδου καὶ Στεφάνου Ἀθηναίου τοῦ φιλοσόφου περιέχουσα φαρμάκων ἐμπειρίας κατὰ ἀλφαβήτον σαφῶς ἐκτεθεῖσα (Lambec. Biblioth. Vindob. vol. vi. p. 228), which has been published by Caspar Wolphius, in a Latin translation, 1581, 8vo. [Tiguri], with the title—"Alphabetum Empiricum, sive, Dioscoridis et Stephani Atheniensis Philosophorum et Medicorum, de Remediis Expertis Liber, juxta Alphabeti Ordinem digestus." The treatise on Fevers, which is in some MSS. attributed to Stephanus Atheniensis, is in fact by Palladius. (Penny Cyclop.)

5. Besides the above-mentioned physicians the Arabic writers mention at least two persons of the name of اصطفن Estefan (or Stephanus), who translated various Greek works into Arabic. The most eminent of these was the son of a person named Basil; he lived at Bagdad in the reign of the Chalif Motawakkel, A. H. 232—247 (A. D. 847—861), and translated Dioscorides and several treatises of Galen, some of which are still extant in MS. in different European libraries. It is, perhaps, his translation of Dioscorides which is quoted by Ibn Baitár (vol. i. p. 265); where Sontheimer, the translator, calls him Isthafan Ebn Nasl, by misplacing a single point, and thus confounding نسيل Nasil with بسيل Basil. (See Nicoll and Pusey, Catal. MSS. Arab. Biblioth. Bodl. p. 587; De Sacy's Translation of 'Abdallatif, p. 495; Wenrich, De Auctor. Graecor. Version. et Comment. Syriac. Arab. Armen. et Pers. Lips. 1842, pp. xxxvi. 216, &c.) [W. A. G.]

STERCU'LIUS, STERCU'TIUS, or STERQUILI'NUS, a surname of Saturnus, derived from Stercus, manure, because he had promoted agriculture by teaching the people the use of manure. This seems to have been the original meaning, though some Romans state that Sterculius was a surname of Picumnus, the son of Faunus, to whom likewise improvements in agriculture are ascribed. (Macrob. Sat. i. 7; Serv. ad Aen. ix. 4, x. 76; Lactant. i. 20; Plin. H. N. xvii. 9; August. De Civ. Dei, xviii. 15.) [L. S.]

STE'ROPE (Στερόπη). 1. A Pleiad, the wife of Oenomaus (Apollod. iii. 10. § 1), and according to Pausanias (v. 10. § 5), a daughter of Atlas.

2. A daughter of Pleuron and Xanthippe (Apollod. i. 7. § 7.)

3. A daughter of Cepheus of Tegea. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 3.)

4. A daughter of Acastus. (Apollod. iii. 13. § 3.)

5. A daughter of Porthaon, and mother of the Seirens. (Apollod. i. 7. § 10.) [L. S.]

STE'ROPES (Στερόπης), a son of Uranus and Gaea, was one of the Cyclopes. (Hes. Theog. 140; Apollod. i. 1. § 2.) [L. S.]

STERTI'NIUS. 1. L. STERTINIUS, was sent as proconsul into further Spain in B. C. 199, and on his return to Rome three years afterwards (B. C. 196), brought into the public treasury fifty thousand pounds weight of silver, and from the spoils

* He quotes (p. 225) a mystic enigma in six verses from the Sibylline oracles (lib. ii. p. 115, ed. Amstel. 1689), which is wrongly printed as prose, and of which several solutions have been attempted (but with doubtful success) in modern times. See Fabr l. c. p. 696 dedicated two fornices or arches in the forum Boarium, and one in the Circus Maximus, and placed upon them gilded statues. In the same year that he returned, he was appointed one of the ten commissioners, who were sent into Greece to settle the affairs of the country, in conjunction with T. Quintius Flamininus. (Liv. xxxi. 50, xxxiii. 27, 35; Polyb. xviii. 31.)

2. C. STERTINIUS, was praetor B. C. 188, and obtained Sardinia as his province. (Liv. xxxviii. 35.)

3. L. STERTINIUS, quaestor B. C. 168. (Liv. xlv. 14.)

4. STERTINIUS, a Stoic philosopher, whom Horace calls in fun the eighth of the wise men. (Hor. Sat. ii. 3. 33, 296, Epist. i. 12. 20.)

5. L. STERTINIUS, the legatus of Germanicus, defeated the Bructeri in A. D. 15, and found among their booty the eagle of the nineteenth legion, which had been lost in the defeat of Varus. In the course of the same year he was sent by Germanicus to receive the surrender of Segimerus, the brother of Segestes; and in the next year he was despatched against the Angrivarii, a people dwelling on the banks of the river Visurgis, whom he defeated, and compelled to acknowledge the supremacy of Rome. (Tac. Ann. i. 60, 71, ii. 8, 22.)

6. STERTINIUS MAXIMUS, a rhetorician mentioned by the elder Seneca. (Controv. 9.)

7. STERTINIUS AVITUS, a person celebrated by Martial at the beginning of the ninth book of his Epigrams. He is apparently the same person as the L. Stertinius Avitus, who was consul suffectus under Domitian in A. D. 92. (Fasti.)

Q. STERTI'NIUS, a physician at Rome in the first century after Christ, who, according to Pliny (H. N. xxix. 5), made it a favour that he was content to receive from the emperor five hundred thousand sesterces per annum (or rather more than four thousand four hundred pounds), as he might have made six hundred thousand sesterces (or rather more than five thousand three hundred pounds), by his private practice. He and his brother, who received the same annual income from the emperor Claudius, left between them at their death, notwithstanding large sums that they had spent in beautifying the city of Naples, the sum of thirty millions of sesterces, or rather more than two hundred and sixty-five thousand six hundred pounds. As these sums are considered by Pliny to be very large, they may serve to give us some idea of the fortunes made at Rome by the chief physicians about the beginning of the empire. STESA'GORAS (Στησαγόρας.) 1. An Athenian, father of Cimon [No. 1.], and grandfather of the great Miltiades. (Herod. vi. 34, 103.)

2. Son of Cimon [No. 1], and grandson of the above. He succeeded his uncle Miltiades I. in the tyranny of the Thracian Chersonese, and continued the war with the people of Lampsacus, which his predecessor had begun. Not long, however, after his accession, he was assassinated by a pretended deserter from the enemy, and, as he died childless, was succeeded by his brother, the great Miltiades. (Herod. vi. 38, 39.) [E. E.]

STESANDER (Στήσανδρος), a musician of Samos, was the first who sang Homeric hymns to the cithara at the Pythian games. (Ath. xiv. p. 638, a.; comp. Sext. Empir. adv. Math. vi. 16.) [P. S.]

STESI'CHORUS (Στησίχορος), of Himera in Sicily, a celebrated Greek poet, contemporary with Sappho, Alcaeus, Pittacus, and Phalaris, later than Alcman, and earlier than Simonides, is said to have been born in Ol. 37, B. C. 632, to have flourished about Ol. 43, B. C. 608, and to have died in Ol. 55. 1, B. C. 560, or Ol. 56, B. C. 556—552, at the age of eighty or, according to Lucian, eighty-five. (Suid. s. vv. Στησίχορος, Σιμωνίδης, Σαπφώ; Euseb. Chron. Ol. 43. 1; Aristot. Rhet. ii. 20. § 5; Cyrill. Julian. i. p. 12, d.; Lucian. Macrob. 26; Clinton, F. H. vol. i. s. a. 611, vol. ii. s. aa. 556, 553.) Various attempts have been made to remove the slight discrepancies in the above numbers; but it appears better to be content with the general result, which they clearly establish, that Stesichorus flourished at the beginning and during the first part of the sixth century B. C.

There appears, at first sight, to be a discrepancy between these testimonies and the statement of the Parian Marble (Ep. 51), that Stesichorus the poet came into Greece at the same time at which Aeschylus gained his first tragic victory, in the archonship of Philocrates, Ol. 73. 3, B. C. 475. But this statement refers, no doubt, to a later poet of the same name and family. That it cannot refer to the Stesichorus now under notice is proved, not only by the above testimonies, but also, as Bentley has shown, by the way in which Simonides mentions Stesichorus, in connection with Homer, as an ancient poet (Ath. iv. p. 172, e. f.); whereas, if the statement of the Marble applied to him, he must have been contemporary with Simonides. Still further light is thrown on this matter by another clause of the Parian inscription (Ep. 74), which states that "Stesichorus the second, of Himera, conquered at Athens in Ol. 102. 3," B. C. 369. The clear and satisfactory explanation of these statements is, that the poetic art was, as usual, hereditary in the family of Stesichorus, and that two of his descendants, at different times, went to Athens to take part in the dithyrambic contests.

There are different statements respecting the country of Stesichorus. The prevailing account was that he was born at Himera, and he is sometimes called simply "the poet of Himera;" but others made him a native of Mataurus, or Metaurus, in the south of Italy (or, as some say, in Sicily), which was a Locrian colony. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ματαυρός; Suid.) Now, as Himera was only founded just before the poet's birth, it is probable that his parents migrated thither from Mataurus; and here we have, as Kleine and Müller have observed, the explanation of the strange tradition which made Stesichorus a son of Hesiod; for there existed among the Ozolian Locrians, at Oeneon and Naupactus, a race of epic poets, who claimed to be of the lineage of Hesiod; and from this race we may suppose the family of Stesichorus to have descended. The actual connection of the poetry of Stesichorus with the old epic poetry will be explained presently. Besides this mythical statement respecting Hesiod, the following names are mentioned as that of the father of Stesichorus,—Euphorbus, Euphemus, Eucleides, and Hyetes. (Suid. s. v.; Eudoc.; Steph. Byz. l. c.; Epig. Anon. ap. Brunck, Anal. vol. iii. p. 24, No. 33.)

According to Suidas, the poet had two brothers, a geometrician named Mamertinus, and a legislator named Halianax. Other statements concerning his family, which rest upon very doubtful authority will be found in Kleine, pp. 15, 16.

His own name is said to have been at first Tisias, which was changed to Stesichorus, because he first established a chorus for singing to the harp. (Suid. s. v. Ἐκλήθη δὲ Στησιχόρος, ὅτι πρῶτος κιθαρῳδίᾳ χορὸν ἔστησεν, ἐπεί τοι πρότερον Τισίας ἐκαλεῖτο.) The meaning of this statement will be examined presently. Of the events of his life we have only a few obscure accounts. Like other great poets, his birth is fabled to have been attended by an omen; a nightingale sat upon the babe's lips, and sung a sweet strain. (Christod. Ecphr. ap. Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. i. p. 42; Plin H. N. x. 29.) He is said to have been carefully educated at Catana, and afterwards to have enjoyed the friendship of Phalaris, the tyrant of Agrigentum. The latter statement rests on no better authority than the spurious letters of Phalaris; but there is nothing to prevent its being true, since it is clear that Phalaris and Stesichorus were contemporaries. Many writers relate the fable of his being miraculously struck with blindness after writing an attack upon Helen, and recovering his sight when he had composed a Palinodia. (Paus. iii. 19. 11, &c.; Kleine, Dissert. sect. vii.) The statement that he travelled in Greece appears to be supported by some passages in the fragments of his poems, by the known usage of the early Grecian poets, and by the confused tradition preserved by Suidas, that he came to Catana as an exile from Pallantium in Arcadia. For his connection with Catana, and his burial there, we have several testimonies. Suidas says that he was buried by a gate of the city, which was called after him the Stesichoreian gate, and that a splendid octagonal monument was erected over his tomb, having eight pillars and eight sets of steps and eight angles; whence, according to some was derived the name Στησίχορος ἀριθμος, applied to the throw "all eight" in gaming. (Suid. s. v. πάντα ὀκτώ; Pollux, ix. 7; Eustath. ad Hom. pp. 1229, 1397.)

There are extant two ancient epitaphs on Stesichorus, the one in Greek, by Antipater (Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. i. p. 328), the other in Latin (Ferrett. Mus. Lapidar. v. 36, p. 354). The people of Thermae, the town which succeeded Himera, had a bronze statue of the poet, which Cicero describes as statua senilis, incurva, cum libro, summo ut putant artificio facta (Verr. ii. 35). This or another statue formed afterwards one of the treasures of the gymnasium of Zeuxippus at Byzantium. (Christod. Ecphr. l. c.) There is also a bronze medal of Himera, bearing on the reverse a man standing, holding a crown in his right hand and a lyre in his left, which some suppose to have been struck in honour of Stesichorus.

Among the ancient writers who celebrated his praises were Cicero (l. c.), Aristeides (Orat. vol. i. p. 152, ed. Steph.), Dionysius (de Comp. Verb. vol. ii. p. 28, ed. Sylb.), Longinus (xiii. 3), Dio Chrysostom (p. 559, d. ed. Morell.), and Synesius (Insom. p. 158, b. ed. Paris. 1612), nearly all of whom compare him to Homer in character and style. Quintilian's testimony is, in general, to the same effect, but he blames the language of Stesichorus as diffuse (x. i. 62). Hermogenes, on the contrary, says that his numerous epithets add sweetness to his style (de Form. Orat. ii. p. 409, ed. Laurent.). For other testimonies see Kleine, sect. ix.

Stesichorus was one of the nine chiefs of lyric poetry recognized by the ancients He stands, with Alcman, at the head of one branch of the lyric art, the choral poetry of the Dorians; for, although he lived fifty years later than Alcman, yet the improvements made by the Himeraean poet on the chorus were so distinct from, and so far in advance of, those introduced by the Spartan, that he well deserves to share the honour, which some indeed, as we have seen, ascribed to him exclusively, of being the inventor of choral poetry. He was the first to break the monotony of the strophe and antistrophe by the introduction of the epode, and his metres were much more varied, and the structure of his strophes more elaborate, than those of Alcman. His odes contained all the essential elements of the perfect choral poetry of Pindar and the tragedians. For an analysis of his metres, see Kleine, sect. xi.

The subjects of his poems were chiefly heroic; he transferred the subjects of the old epic poetry to the lyric form, dropping, of course, the continuous narrative, and dwelling on isolated adventures of his heroes. He also composed poems on other subjects. His extant remains are classified by Kleine under the following heads. 1. Mythical Poems, of which we have the following titles: Ἆθλα, Γηρυονίς, Κέρβερος, Κύκνος, Σκύλλα, Συοθῆραι, Εὐρώπεια, Ἰλίου πέρσις, Νόστοι, Ὀρεστεία. 2. Hymns, Encomia, Epithalamia, Paeans: among which were, Παλινῳδία εἰς Ἑλέναν, and Ἐπιθαλάμιον Ἑλένας. 3. Erotic Poems, and Scolia: titles, Καλύκα, Ῥαδινά. 4. A pastoral poem, entitled Δάφνις. 5. Fables: Ἵππος καὶ ἔλαφος, Γεωργὸς καὶ ἀετός, Εἰς Λόκρους παραίνεσις. 6. Elegies.

The dialect of Stesichorus was Dorian, with an intermixture of the epic. His nomes were mostly in the Dorian, but sometimes also in the Phrygian mode.

The fragments of Stesichorus have been printed with the editions of Pindar published in 1560, 1566, 1567, 1586, 1598, 1620, and in the collections of the Greek poets published in 1568 and 1569, and recently in the collections of Schneidewin and Bergk. They have also been edited by Suchfort, Götting. 1771, 4to.; by Blomfield, in the Museum Criticum, vol. ii. pp. 256—272, 340—358, 504, 607, and in Gaisford's Poetae Minores Graeci; and by Fr. Kleine, Berol. 1828, 8vo. The last mentioned is by far the most useful edition of the fragments, and the authorities respecting the life and writings of the poet are collected and discussed in a dissertation prefixed to the fragments. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 151—157; Müller, Hist. of Lit. of Anc. Greece, pp. 197—203; Bernhardy, Grundriss d. Griech. Litt. vol. ii. pp. 471—477; Kleine, as above quoted.) [P. S.]

STESICLEIDES (Στησικλείδης), an Athenian, wrote a catalogue of the archons and victors in the Olympic games. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 56.)

STE'SICLES (Στησικλῆς), an Athenian, was sent in B. C. 373 with a force of some 600 targeteers to aid the democratic party at Corcyra against the Lacedaemonians under Mnasippus. A more effective armament of 60 ships, with Timotheus for commander, was to follow as soon as it could be got ready. Meanwhile, Stesicles, with the assistance of Alcetas I., king of Epeirus, effected an entrance into the town under cover of night. Here he reconciled the dissensions of the democratic party, united them against the common enemy, and conducted that series of successful operations, which ended in the defeat and death of Mnasippus, and the withdrawal of the Lacedaemonian fleet even before the arrival of Iphicrates, who had superseded Timotheus [MNASIPPUS]. There can be no question as to the identity of the Stesicles of Xenophon with the Ctesicles of Diodorus. But the latter writer tells us that Ctesicles had been sent some time before to Zacynthus, to take the command against the Spartans of the Zacynthian exiles, whom Timotheus had restored. Schneider would reconcile the two authors by supposing that he was ordered to proceed from Zacynthus to Corcyra; nor does this seem so inconsistent with the language of Xenophon as Thirlwall and Rehdantz represent it. (Xen. Hell. vi. 2. §§ 10—26; Diod. xv. 46, 47; Schneider, ad Xen. Hell. vi. 2. § 10; Wesseling, ad Diod. xv. 47; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. v. p. 60, note; Rehdantz, Vitae Iph. Chabr. Timoth. iv. § 3.) [E. E.]

STESI'MBROTUS (Στησίμβροτος), of Thasos, a rhapsodist and historian in the time of Cimon and Pericles, who is mentioned with praise by Plato and Xenophon, and who wrote a work upon Homer, the title of which is not known. He also wrote some historical works, for he is frequently quoted by Plutarch as an authority. There is also a quotation in the Etymologicum Magnum (s. v. Ἰδαῖοι) from a work of his on the mysteries, περὶ τελετῶν. (Plat. Ion, p. 550, c.; Xen. Mem. iv. 2. § 10, Sympos. iii. 5; Plut. Them. 2, 24, Cim. 4, 14, 16, Per. 8, 10, 13, 26, 36; Strab. x. p. 472; Ath. xiii. p. 598, e.; Tatian. adv. Graec. 48; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 524, 358, 512; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. pp. 43, 44, ed. Westermann.) [P. S.]

STHEINO or STHENO (Σθεινώ or Σθενώ), one of the Gorgons. (Hes. Theog. 276; Apollod. ii. 4. § 2.) [L. S.]

STHENEBOEA (Σθενέβοια), a daughter of Jobates, or Amphianax or Apheidas, was the wife of Proetus. From love of Bellerophon she made away with herself, whence Bellerophon is called heros Sthenebo̊eius. (Apollod. ii. 2. § 1, iii. 9. § 1; comp. PROETUS and HIPPONOUS.) [L. S.]

STHENELA'IDAS (Σθενελαΐδας), a Spartan, who held the office of ephor in B. C. 432, and, in the congress of the Lacedaemonians and their allies at Sparta in that year, vehemently and successfully urged the assembly to decree war with Athens. The speech which Thucydides puts into his mouth on this occasion is strongly marked by the characteristics of Spartan eloquence, — brevity and simplicity. (Thuc. i. 85, 86, viii. 5; Paus. iii. 7.) [E. E.]

STHE'NELAS (Σθενέλας), a son of Crotopus, father of Gelanor and king of Argos. (Paus. ii. 16. § 1, 19. § 2.) [L. S.]

STHE'NELE (Σθενέλη), the name of two mythical personages, one a daughter of Danaus (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5), and the other a daughter of Acastus and mother of Patroclus. (iii. 12. § 8.) [L. S.]

STHE'NELUS (Σθένελος). 1. One of the sons of Aegyptus and husband of Sthenele. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5.)

2. A son of Melas, who was killed by Tydeus. (Apollod. i. 8. § 5; comp. OENEUS.)

3. A son of Perseus and Andromeda, and husband of Nicippe, by whom he became the father of Alcinoë, Medusa, and Eurystheus. (Hom. Il. xix. 116; Ov. Her. ix. 25, Met. ix. 273; Apollod. ii. 4. § 5, &c.) He was slain by Hyllus, the son of Heracles. (Hygin. Fab. 244.)

4. A son of Androgeos and grandson of Minos; he accompanied Heracles from Paros on his expedition against the Amazons, and together with his brother Alcaeus he was appointed by Heracles ruler of Thasos. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 9; comp. Apollon. Rhod. ii. 911, who confounds him with No. 5.)

5. A son of Actor, likewise a companion of Heracles in his expedition against the Amazons; but he died and was buried in Paphlagonia, where he afterwards appeared to the Argonauts. (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 911.)

6. A son of Capaneus and Evadne, belonged to the family of the Anaxagoridae in Argos, and was the father of Cylarabes (Hom. Il. v. 109; Paus. ii. 18. § 4, 22. § 8, 30. in fin.); but, according to others, his son's name was Cometes. (Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 603, 1093; Serv. ad Aen. xi. 269.) He was one of the Epigoni, by whom Thebes was taken (Hom. Il. iv. 405; Apollod. iii. 7. § 2), and commanded the Argives under Diomedes, in the Trojan war, being the faithful friend and companion of Diomedes. (Hom. Il. ii. 564, iv. 367, xxiii. 511; Philostr. Her. 4; Hygin. Fab. 175.) He was one of the Greeks concealed in the wooden horse (Hygin. Fab. 108), and at the distribution of the booty, he was said to have received an image of a three-eyed Zeus, which was in after-times shown at Argos. (Paus. ii. 45. § 5, viii. 46. § 2.) His own statue and tomb also were believed to exist at Argos. (ii. 20. § 4, 22. in fin.; comp. Horat. Carm. i. 15. 23, iv. 9. 20; Stat. Achill. i. 469.)

7. The father of Cycnus, was metamorphosed into a swan. (Ov. Met. ii. 368.) [L. S.]

STHE'NELUS (Σθένελος), a tragic poet, contemporary with Aristophanes, who attacked him in the Gerytades and the Wasps. (Aristoph. Vesp. 1312, and the Schol.) The scholiast here speaks of him as a tragic actor*, which is evidently a mistake, for Harpocration (s. v.) expressly tells us that he was mentioned in the Didascaliae as a tragic poet, and there are several references to him as such. He is mentioned by Aristotle (Poet. 22) with Cleophon, as an example of those poets whose words are well chosen, but whose diction is not at all elevated. The insipidity of his style is happily ridiculed by Aristophanes in the question, "How shall I eat the words of Sthenelus, dipping them in vinegar or in dry salt?" (Geryt. ap. Schol. ad Vesp. l. c.; Ath. ix. p. 367.) The comic poet Plato also, in his Lacones, attacked him for plagiarism. (Harpocr. and Phot. s. v.) There are no fragments of Sthenelus, except a single verse quoted by Athenaeus (x. p. 428, a.), which, being an hexameter, can hardly belong to a tragedy. Perhaps Sthenelus composed elegies. How long he lived is not known: from his not being mentioned in the Frogs, Kayser supposes that he had died before the exhibition of that play in B. C. 406. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 323; Welcker, die Griech. Tragöd. p. 1033; Kayser, Hist. Crit. Trag. Graec. pp. 323—325; Wagner, Frag. Trag. Graec. in Didot's Bibliotheca, p. 91.) [P. S.]

STHENIS or STHENNIS (Σθένις, Σθέννις, the former is the form used by the ancient writers, the latter in extant inscriptions), a statuary of Olynthus, is mentioned by Pliny as contemporary with Lysippus and others, at the 114th Olympiad, B. C. 323. (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. The false reading of this passage, in the common editions, makes

* That is, in the common editions. In the best manuscripts the word ὑποκρίτης is omitted.

Sthenis a brother of Lysistratus; whereas Lysistratus was the brother, not of Sthenis, but of Lysippus: the true reading is given in Sillig's edition.) His works, as enumerated by the same writer, were the following: the statues of Ceres, Jupiter, and Minerva, which stood in the Temple of Concord at Rome, and also flentes matronas, et adorantes, sacrificantesque. (Ibid. § 33.) Other writers mention, as one of the best of his works, the statue of Autolycus, which was carried to Rome by Lucullus, after the taking of Sinope. (Strab. xii. p. 546, a.; Plut. Lucull. 23, Pomp. 10; Appian. Mithr. 83.) He also made two statues of Olympic victors, Pyttalus and Choerilus. (Paus. vi. 16. § 7, 17. § 3.)

In addition to these notices of the artist, important information may be derived from two extant inscriptions. From one of these we learn that he made a statue of the philosopher Bion, the base of which still exists, bearing the words, ΣΘΕΝΝΙΣ ΕΠΟΙΕΙ. (Spon, Miscell. p. 126.) The other, which is of far more consequence, is on one of the fragments of a base discovered at Athens, in 1840, on the plateau in front of the western portico of the Parthenon. This base appears to have been a massive structure of masonry, faced with marble plates, and supporting a group of at least five statues. Several of the marble plates were found, bearing the names of the persons whose statues, dedicated by themselves, the base originally supported, and of the artists who made them, or at least some of them. One of these inscriptions is ΣΘΕΝΝΙΣ ΕΠΟΗΣΕΝ, and another ΛΕΩΧΑΡΗΣ ΕΠΟΗΣΕΝ. Hence we learn, not only the true form of the artist's name, but also the important facts, that he exercised his art at Athens, in connection with the most distinguished artists of the later Attic school, and that he was contemporary with Leochares, who flourished about Ol. 102—111, B. C. 370—335. This furnishes another striking example of the looseness with which Pliny groups artists together under certain fixed dates. A curious phenomenon is presented by inscriptions on the other sides of this base, bearing the names of Augustus, Drusus, Germanicus, and Trajan, and showing how ancient statues were appropriated. (Ross, Kunstblatt, 1840, No. 32; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 407, 408; Nagler, Künstler-Lexicon, s. v.) [P. S.]

STHE'NIUS (Σθένιος), i. e. "the powerful," or "the strengthening," a surname of Zeus, under which he had an altar in a rock near Hermione, where Aegeus concealed his sword and his shoes, which were found there by Theseus after he had lifted up the rock. (Paus. ii. 32. § 7, 34. § 6.) One of the horses of Poseidon also bore the name Sthenius. (Schol. ad Hom. Il. xiii. 23.) [L. S.]

STHE'NIUS. [STENIUS.]

STHE'NIUS, of Thermae (Himerenses) in Sicily, was a friend of C. Marius, and was therefore accused before Cn. Pompey, when the latter was sent to Sicily by Sulla (Cic. Verr. ii. 46; comp. Plut. Pomp. 10). The unjust proceedings of Verres against this Sthenius are related at length by Cicero. (Verr. ii. 34—46, comp. iii. 7, v. 42, 49.)

STHENNIS. [STHENIS].

STI'CHIUS (Στιχίος), a commander of the Athenians in the Trojan war, was slain by Hector. (Hom. Il. xiii. 195, xv. 329.) [L. S.]

STILBE (Στίλβη), a daughter of Peneius and Creusa, became by Apollo the mother of Lapithus and Centaurus. (Diod. iv. 69; Schol. ad. Apollon. Rhod. i. 40.) [L. S.]

STI'LICHO (Στιλίχων or Στελίχων), the military ruler of the western empire under Honorius, was the son of a Vandal captain of the barbarian auxiliaries of the emperor Valens. Stilicho rose through prowess and great military skill, combined with many other eminent qualities, which made him dear to the army and invaluable to the emperor Theodosius. In A. D. 384, when magister equitum, he was sent as ambassador to Persia, and through his various accomplishments and agreeable manner of transacting business, so pleased the Persian king, that peace was concluded on terms very advantageous for Rome. On his return, he was made comes domesticus and commander-in-chief of the army; but his greatest reward was the hand of Serena, the niece of Theodosius, whom he married about the same time, from which we may infer the great esteem he enjoyed with his master, and the influence he exercised in the empire. Jealousy soon arose between him and Rufinus, the nefarious minister of Theodosius, which increased after the murder of his friend, the gallant Promotus, who in reward for his victories over the East Goths, was first exiled, and then put out of the way by Rufinus. Jealousy soon waxed to implacable hatred, and a struggle took place between the two rivals, which eventually ended in the destruction of Rufinus.

During the period from Stilicho's return from Persia to the year 394, he distinguished himself by several victories over the barbarians, especially the Bastarnae, and took a prominent part in the government; but the events are not important enough to be mentioned in detail. His influence increased not a little when Theodosius confided to Serena the education of his infant son Honorius, after the death of the empress Flaccilla, and it rose to its acme in 394. In that year Theodosius proclaimed Honorius Augustus and emperor of the West, Stilicho and Serena being appointed his guardians; and after a touching private speech, with which Theodosius concluded the ceremony, they set out for Rome, where Stilicho took the reins of government. He, as well as Serena, were active in abolishing paganism, which had still a strong root in Rome; but it seems that their zeal was not over pure, since several temples were stripped, by their command, of their silver and gold ornaments, which found their way into the governor's treasury, if at least the report is true, for generally speaking Stilicho was a man of remarkable integrity. The Roman emperor had now five heads — one emperor-in-chief, Theodosius, two sub-emperors, Honorius and Arcadius, and two powerful ministers, Stilicho and Rufinus, both animated by boundless ambition and divided by mortal hatred; so that evils of every description would have sprung up, had not Theodosius been the man fit to govern such heterogeneous elements, and make them all conform to his own will. No sooner, however, did his death take place (394), than the struggle for the mastery broke out between Stilicho and Rufinus. The fall of the latter could be foretold. Rufinus, although possessed of eminent qualities, was a downright scoundrel; while with still higher natural gifts, great military experience, and an eminently better character, Stilicho combined a twofold imperial alliance through his wife Serena and his daughter Maria, who had been betrothed to Honorius in the lifetime of Theodosius, and was married to him soon afterwards. Stilicho began his reign by dividing the imperial treasury in equal shares between Honorius and Arcadius; prevailed upon Honorius to grant the amnesty promised by the late Theodosius to the partisans of the rebel Eugenius; quelled a military outbreak at Milan; and finally set out to make his and the emperor's authority respected in Gaul and Germany, where the barbarians pursued an audacious course of invasions. His march up the Rhine was triumphant, and his force was increased by an alliance with the Suevi and Alemanni. Marcomir, the principal chief of the Franks, fell into his hands, and was sent to Italy, where he ended his days in captivity; the Saxon pirates, the scourge of the northern coast, were severely chastised, and shrunk back into their own seas; and such was the terror caused by the rapid and crushing advance of Stilicho, that the Picts made a sudden retreat from Britain into their native mountains, from mere fear that Stilicho would effect a landing on the British coast, although he never did so. All this was achieved in the course of one summer; and Stilicho had no sooner returned to Milan than he set out again for the purpose of ruining Rufinus in Constantinople. One pretext for this expedition was the invasion of Greece by Alaric; another the conducting back of the eastern legions, which were stationed in Italy, and proved a heavy burden to the country. His success in this bold undertaking, and the death of Rufinus, are related in the life of the latter. [RUFINUS.]

The downfal of his rival enabled Stilicho to turn the full weight of his power against Alaric, who, in 396, had penetrated into the Peloponnesus. With a powerful army raised in Italy, Stilicho hastened to Greece, and Alaric soon found himself blocked up within that peninsula, whence no escape by land was possible but across the isthmus of Corinth, which was guarded by a strong Roman force. Owing to the presumption of Stilicho, however, who seems to have thought he had caught his enemy as if in a trap, or perhaps to the negligence of his lieutenants, who might have indulged in similar hopes, Alaric extricated himself from his dangerous position by a rapid march towards the gulf of Corinth; which he crossed at its narrowest point near Rhium, with his whole army, captives and booty, and was soon safely encamped in Epeirus. Thence he carried on negotiations with the ministers of Arcadius, who were afraid that if Alaric were undone, Stilicho would make himself master of the East also, and ere long (398) Alaric was appointed master general of Eastern Illyricum, which was one of the most important posts in the empire of Arcadius. The presence of Stilicho in Greece was now no longer required, and he returned to Italy with rage and thoughts of revenge against Alaric. A war between the two rivals broke out soon afterwards, for which Stilicho made the most active preparations. Nor was he negligent in increasing his authority in Italy, and the people felt his sway, or worshipped his power so much, that in 398 they caused a splendid statue to be erected to him in Rome; in the same year the marriage between his daughter Maria and Honorius was celebrated at Milan. In 400, Stilicho was consul together with Aurelianus, and the honorary titles of pater and dominus were given to him. The war with Alaric had meanwhile taken its course, and in 402 became extremely dangerous to Italy, where the Gothic chief had already more than once made his appearance. In 403 Alaric made an irresistible push as far as Milan, whence the emperor Honorius fled to Ravenna, after abandoning, at the persuasion of Stilicho, the cowardly plan of transferring the seat of the empire into Gaul. In this crisis Stilicho acted with surprising boldness, energy, and military wisdom. At the approach of the Goths he hastened to Rhaetia, where the main force of the Italian troops was employed against the natives, and after giving the latter a severe chastisement, and compelling them to accept peace, he returned to Milan with the whole of the Rhaetian corps. At the same time most of the Roman troops were withdrawn from Gaul and Germany, and even the Caledonian legion was recalled from the frontiers of Britain. With his army thus augmented, he occupied Milan, where he was besieged, or, as it seems, rather blockaded by Alaric. However, at the close of March (403), he suddenly sallied out, and at Pollentia (not far from Turin) obtained a decisive victory over the Goths. The dispersion of the barbarians, an immense booty, the rich spoil of Greece and Illyricum, and thousands of captives among whom was the wife of Alaric, were the fruit of this great victory. Soon afterwards Alaric suffered another defeat under the walls of Verona, in consequence of which he withdrew from Italy. Stilicho was rewarded with the honour of a triumph on his return to Rome (in 404).

These victories and the subsequent increase of influence and power raised the ambition of Stilicho to so high a pitch, that he aspired to make himself master of the whole Roman empire, Eastern and Western. Honorius had no children, and Arcadius only one son, after whose death or removal both the empires would become the inheritance of Placidia, the daughter of Theodosius and Galla, to whom Stilicho accordingly undertook to marry his own son, Eucherius. This plan, however, could not be executed without the assistance of his mortal foe Alaric; but as ambition prevailed over hatred in both the rivals, Stilicho did not hesitate to make proposals to that effect to the Gothic chief, and Alaric gladly entered into the plan. The concert of their action was for some time interrupted by the invasion of Radagaisus, one of the most dangerous and destructive by which Italy was ever visited, but from which it was delivered by the valour of Stilicho in 406. [RADAGAISUS.] In the following year (407), Gaul was inundated and laid waste by that innumerable host of Suevi, Vandals, Alani, and Burgundians, who caused the downfal of the Roman authority beyond the Alps, and in the same year the legions in Britain proclaimed Constantine emperor in that province and in Gaul. This torrent Stilicho had either no means, or, more probably, no inclination to check, his whole activity being absorbed by his schemes upon Constantinople and his intrigues with Alaric. Already had he thrown the gauntlet to the ministers of Arcadius, by annexing all Illyricum to the Western Empire, whither he sent Jovinus as prefect, and his lofty plans became manifest after Alaric had openly renounced his allegiance to the Eastern court, and entered into that of the Western, upon which Stilicho compelled the subservient senate of Rome to elect Alaric a member of their body. Fortune, however, began to turn her back upon the ever successful master of Italy. Maria, the wife of Honorius, having died, Serena proposed her second daughter Thermantia (Aemilia Materna) to him, when Stilicho opposed the project, as any issue arising out of this new marriage would thwart his plan of obtaining both the empires for his son Eucherius. Serena, however, carried her point, and the marriage took place accordingly. Soon afterwards Arcadius died, and was succeeded by his son Theodosius the younger, for whom his excellent mother Pulcheria reigned with sovereign power. The influence of these events was sensibly felt at the court of Honorius, where dangerous court intrigues sprang up, in which the arbitrary rule of Stilicho found an unforeseen check. It was evident that the emperor secretly followed the advice of other counsellors than his father-in-law, and among those the crafty Olympius soon became conspicuous. Stilicho was not the man to be taken by surprise by such intrigues; and since he was as crafty as he was bold, he coolly informed the emperor that he would at last settle the business in Illyricum, where Jovinus was only nominal prefect, if he was there at all, and go thither with the legions to annex it finally to the Western Empire. For the first time in his life, Honorius firmly opposed the will of Stilicho, on the pretext that he would not rob his nephew of his paternal inheritance. At the same time he declared that he would leave Rome, whither he had been compelled to accompany his father-in-law, and take up his former residence at Ravenna. His eyes had been opened by Olympius, who had seen through the plan of Stilicho's going to Illyricum, and could not but consider it as a means of making war upon both the emperors at once, and of seizing by force of arms what he could not obtain by intrigues and negotiations. Honorius consequently set out for Ravenna. He was received with shouts of acclamation by the troops assembled in the camp of Pavia, who were preparing for a campaign in Gaul, and had been secretly worked upon by Olympius. Honorius addressed the troops in a long and artful speech. Suddenly they rose in uproar against the partizans of Stilicho, and a terrible bloodshed ensued: the prefecti praetorio of Gaul and Italy, a magister equitum, a magister militum, the quaestor Salvius, and his namesake Salvius, the comes domesticus, besides many other high functionaries, fell victims to the fury of the army. Stilicho, full of sinister forebodings, assembled round him his remaining partizans in the camp of Bologna, where he was then staying, but to their surprise and indignation he declined to follow their plan of immediately hastening to Pavia, and putting down Olympius and the whole rebellion. His hesitation in adopting energetic means in such an alternative caused his ruin. His own most faithful friends now turned against him. Sarus was the first to act. [SARUS.] He surprised the camp of Stilicho, and cut his body-guard to pieces in the conflict. Stilicho fled to Ravenna, where he shut himself up after summoning the principal cities of Italy to declare against the barbarian mercenaries of the emperor. The confusion increasing, Stilicho took sanctuary in a church. Heraclianus Comes soon arrived with a chosen body of troops, and a warrant to seize the person of the fallen minister, to whom safety of life was promised. Stilicho trusted to the promise and left the church, but was immediately seized and massacred. He suffered death with the calm stoicism of an ancient Roman. His property was confiscated, and cruel persecutions were instituted against his family; his son Eucherius took to flight, but was seized, dragged from one place to another, and finally put to death. The marriage of Honorius and Thermantia was dissolved, but she was allowed to lead an obscure life with her mother Serena, and died seven years afterwards. The friends of Stilicho were persecuted with cruel rigour, their blood flowed in torrents, and their families were disgraced and robbed of their estates: Olympius had become the successor of Stilicho. STILO, L. AE'LIUS PRAECONI'NUS, a Roman eques, was one of the earliest grammarians at Rome, and also one of the most celebrated. Cicero describes him as most learned in Greek and Roman literature, and especially well acquainted with ancient Latin works. Aelius gave instruction in grammar to Varro, who speaks of him with the greatest respect, and frequently quotes him; and he was also one of Cicero's teachers in rhetoric. He received the surname of Praeconinus, because his father had been a praeco, and that of Stilo on account of his compositions. He belonged to the aristocratical party in the state, and accompanied Q. Metellus Numidicus into exile in B. C. 100, and, no doubt, returned with him to Rome in the following year. Aelius, however, did not aspire himself to any of the offices of state, and did not speak in public; but he wrote orations for many of his friends, such as Q. Metellus, Q. Caepio, Q. Pompeius Rufus and Cotta, upon which Cicero does not bestow much commendation. It was by his grammatical works that he acquired the most celebrity. He wrote Commentaries on the Songs of the Salii and on the Twelve Tables, a work De Proloquiis, &c. He and his son-in-law, Ser. Claudius, may be regarded as the founders of the study of grammar at Rome. Some modern writers suppose that the work on Rhetoric ad C. Herennium, which is printed in the editions of Cicero, is the work of this Aelius, but this is mere conjecture. [Comp. Vol. I. pp. 726, 727.] (Cic. Brut. 56, 46, Acad. i. 2, de Leg. ii. 23, de Orat. i. 43; Suet. de Ill. Gramm. 2, 3; Quintil. x. 1. § 99; Gell. i. 18, x. 21, xvi. 8; Varr. *L. STILPO (Στίλπων), the Greek philosopher, was a native of Megara, the son of Eucleides, or as is more in accordance with the chronological notices to be presently adduced, of Pasicles of Thebes, a disciple of Eucleides. Other authorities mention Thrasymachus of Corinth as his father. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 113, comp. vi. 89, and Suid. s. v.) According to one account, he engaged in dialectic encounters with Diodorus Cronus at the court of Ptolemaeus Soter; according to another, he did not comply with the invitation of the king to go to Alexandria. We are further told that Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, honoured him no less, spared his house at the capture of Megara (Ol. 121, 3), and offered him indemnity for the injury which it had received, which, however, Stilpo declined. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 115. Plut. Demetr. c. 9, &c.) Uniting elevated sentiment (φρόνημα) with gentleness and patience (μετριοπαθεία), he, as Plutarch says (adv. Colot. c. 22), was an ornament to his country and friends, and had his acquaintance sought by kings. His original propensity to wine and voluptuousness he is said to have entirely overcome (Cic. de Fato, c. 5); in inventive power and dialectic art (σοφιστεία) to have surpassed his contemporaries, and to have inspired almost all Hellas with a devotion to the Megarian philosophy. A number of distinguished men too are named, whom he is said to have drawn away from Aristotle, Theophrastus, and others, and attached to himself (Diog. Laërt. ii. 113, comp. 119, 120); among others Crates the Cynic, and Zeno, the founder of the Stoic school. (ib. 114.) Not less commendation is bestowed upon his political wisdom, his simple, straightforward disposition, and the equanimity with which he endured the fate of being the father of a degenerate daughter (ib. 114, comp. Plut. de tranqu. animi, c. 6). Of the nine dialogues, which were ascribed to him, and which are described as being of a somewhat frigid kind, we learn only the titles, two of which seem to point to a polemical disquisition on Aristippus and Aristotle. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 120.) In like manner, we obtain exceedingly scanty disclosures respecting his doctrines in the few propositions and sayings of his which are quoted, torn as they are from their connection. Only we can scarcely fail to recognize in them the direction which the Megaric philosophy took, to demonstrate that the phenomenal world is unapproachable to true knowledge. For it is probably in this sense that we are to understand the assertion, that one thing cannot be predicated of another, that is, the essence of things cannot be reached by means of predicates (Plut. adv. Colot. 22, 23; comp. Simpl. in Phys. Ausc. f. 26); and that the genus, the universal, is not contained in the individual and concrete. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 119.) He seems, however, especially to have made the idea of virtue the object of his consideration (Crates, ap. Diog. Laërt. 118), and to have placed in a prominent point of view the self-sufficiency of it. He maintained that the wise man ought not only to overcome every evil, but not even to be affected by any, not even to feel it. (Seneca, Epist. 9, comp. Plut. de Tranqu. animi, 6, Diog. Laërt. ii. 114), and in that way outbids not only the Stoics, but even the Cynics. Thence too, probably, his collisions with Crates, referred to in the verses of the latter (ap. Diog. Laërt. ii. 118), and in the otherwise very tasteless anecdote repeated by Diogenes Laertius. (ii. 117, &c.) Whether he was in earnest in his antagonism to the popular polytheistic faith, and whether and how the Areiopagus in Athens stepped in, cannot be gathered from the childish statements of such a silly writer as Diogenes. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 116, &c.) [CH. A. B.]

STI'MULA, the name of Semele, according to the pronunciation of the Romans. (Liv. xxxix. 12; Augustin. De Civ. Dei, iv. 11, 16; Ov. Fast. vi. 503.) Augustin is wrong in deriving the name from stimulus. (Müller, Etrusk. ii. p. 77.) [L. S.]

STIPAX. [STYPAX].

STOBAEUS, JOANNES (Ἰωάννης ὁ Στοβαῖος), derived his surname apparently from being a native of Stobi in Macedonia. Of his personal history we know nothing. Even the age in which he lived cannot be fixed with accuracy. He lived, at all events, later than Hierocles, whom he quotes. Probably he did not live very long after him, as he quotes no writer of a later date. His studious avoidance of all Christian writers seems to render it probable that Stobaeus was a heathen, though his name would rather indicate a Christian, or at least the son of Christian parents. Though Stobaeus is to us little more than a name, we are indebted to him for a very valuable collection of extracts from earlier Greek writers. Stobaeus was a man of extensive reading, in the course of which he noted down the most interesting passages. The materials which he had collected in this way he arranged, in the order of subjects, as a repertory of valuable and instructive sayings, for the use of his son Septimius. This collection of extracts he divided into four books, and published under the title Ἰωάννου Στοβαίου ἐκλογῶν, ἀποφθεγμάτων, ὑποθηκῶν βιβλία τέσσαρα. This, however, is not exactly the form in which the work has come down to us. In most of the manuscripts there is a division into three books, forming two distinct works; the first and second books forming one work under the title Ἐκλογαὶ φυσικαὶ διαλεκτικαὶ καὶ ἠθικαί, the third book forming another work, called Ἀνθολόγιον (Florilegium or Sermones). Some have supposed in consequence that the fourth book is lost. This, however, is not the case. Photius (Cod. 167) has preserved a detailed table of contents of all four books; and on comparing the contents of the Florilegium with the table of the contents of the third and fourth books of the original arrangement, it is perfectly evident that the Florilegium consists of both those books combined in one. It is true that according to Photius the third and fourth books together contained 100 chapters, while the Florilegium contains 126 (ed. Gaisford). This, however, may easily have arisen from a subdivision of some of the longer chapters by the copyists. There seems no sufficient reason for supposing that Stobaeus originally arranged his extracts in two separate works. The table of contents in Photius is sufficiently full to allow of the restoration of the original subdivision of the Florilegium or Sermones into two books, answering precisely to those which were in the edition of Stobaeus used by Photius. The two books of Eclogues consist for the most part of extracts conveying the views of earlier poets and prose writers on points of physics, dialectics, and ethics. The Florilegium, or Sermones, is devoted to subjects of a moral, political, and economical kind, and maxims of practical wisdom. We learn from Photius that the first book of the Eclogues was preceded by a dissertation on the advantages of philosophy, an account of the different schools of philosophy, and a collection of the opinions of ancient writers on geometry, music, and arithmetic. The greater part of this introduction is lost. The close of it only, where arithmetic is spoken of, is still extant. The first book was divided into sixty chapters, the second into forty-six, of which we only possess the first nine. The third book originally consisted of forty-two chapters, and the fourth of fifty-eight. Each chapter of the Eclogne and Sermones is headed by a title describing its matter. The extracts quoted in illustration begin usually with passages from the poets, after whom come historians, orators, philosophers and physicians. Photius has given an alphabetical list of above 500 Greek writers from whom Stobaeus has taken extracts, arranged according to their different classes, as philosophers, poets, &c. The works of the greater part of these have perished. To Stobaeus we are indebted for a large proportion of the fragments that remain of the lost works of poets. Euripides seems to have been an especial favourite with him. He has quoted above 500 passages from him in the Sermones, 150 from Sophocles, and above 200 from Menander. In extracting from prose writers, Stobaeus sometimes quotes verbatim, sometimes gives only an epitome of the passage. The latter mode is more common in the Eclogae than in the Sermones. With regard to such passages the question has been raised, whether Stobaeus quoted at first hand, or from some collection similar to his own. It is at least clear that he had Plutarch's collection of the opinions of philosophers before him, and that in its complete form. A detailed account of the contents of so miscellaneous a collection as that of Stobaeus would be foreign to the purpose of the present work. For tables of contents the reader may consult Photius (l. c.) and Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. ix. p. 574, &c.).

The first portion of the work of Stobaeus that was published was the Sermones, edited by Franc. Trincavelli (Venice, 4to. 1536) under the title Ἰωάννου τοῦ Στοβαίου ἐκλογαὶ ἀποφθεγμάτων. Three editions of the same portion were published by Conrad Gesner, with the title Κέρας Ἀμαλθαίας. Ἰωάννου τοῦ Στοβαίου ἐκλογαὶ ἀποφθεγμάτων (or ἐκλ. ἀποφθ. καὶ ὑποθηκῶν), at Zürich in 1543, at Basle in 1549, and at Zürich in 1559, fol. The best edition of the Sermones or Florilegium is that by Gaisford (Oxford, 1822, 4 vols. 8vo.).

The first edition of the Eclogae was that by Canter (Antwerp, 1575, fol.). The best edition is that by A. H. L. Heeren (Gotting. 1792—1801, in 4 vols. 8vo.). The only edition of the whole of Stobaeus together is one published at Geneva in 1609, fol. (Schöll, Gesch. der griech. Litteratur. vol. iii. p. 395, &c.) [C. P. M.]

STOLO, C. LICI'NIUS CALVUS. [CALVUS, No. 4.]

STO'MIUS (Στόμιος), a statuary, who made the statue of Hieronymus of Andros, to celebrate his victory at Olympia over Tisamenus of Elis, the seer who was afterwards present at the battle of Plataeae. (Paus. vi. 14. § 5.) If the statue was made soon after the victory, the artist's age would of course fall at or just before the beginning of the Persian Wars, B. C. 500 or 490. (Thiersch, Epochen, p. 202.) [P. S.]

STRABAX, a sculptor, known by an inscription on a pedestal found on the Acropolis, in front of the western portico of the Parthenon. This pedestal bears two inscriptions; the one is on the front, from which we learn that it supported an honorific statue erected by the Areiopagus; the other is on the top, by the side of the print of two bronze feet, and runs thus: ΣΤΡΑΒΑΞΕΓΟΗΣΕΝ. From the form of the letters, Ross supposes that the artist lived in the middle of the 4th century B. C., that is, in the time of Praxiteles. (Ross, in Gerhard's Archäologische Zeitung for 1844, p. 243; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 408, 409 2d. ed.) [P. S.]

STRABO, a cognomen in many Roman gentes, was indicative, like many other Roman surnames, of a bodily defect or peculiarity; such as Capito, Fronto, Naso, Varus, &c. It signified a person who squinted, and is accordingly classed with Paetus, though the latter word did not indicate such a complete distortion of vision as Strabo. (Plin. H. N. xi. 37. s. 55; Hor. Sat. i. 3. 45; Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 29.)

STRABO, the geographer. Little is known of Strabo's personal history, and that which is known is collected from short notices in his own work. Strabo was a native of Amasia or Amasea, a town on the Iris, now the Jekil Irmak, and in the kingdom of Pontus: in his geography he has given a description of his native place (lib. xii. p. 561, ed. Casaub.). Of his parentage on his father's side he says nothing. On his mother's side he was descended from a distinguished Greek family, which was closely connected with the Pontic kings, Mithridates, Euergetes, and Mithridates Eupator; and the fortunes of this family of course followed that of all these kings of Pontus. Dorylaeus, a distinguished general (τακτικός) and a friend of Mithridates Euergetes, was the great-grandfather of Strabo's mother (pp. 477, 557). Mithridates Euergetes was murdered in Sinope, while his friend Dorylaeus was in Crete looking for mercenary troops, upon which Dorylaeus gave up all thoughts of returning home, and went to Cnossus, where he was employed as commander in a war against the people of Gortyna, which he quickly brought to a close. This success brought him distinction: he married a Macedonian woman, Sterope, who bore him a daughter and two sons, Lagetas and Stratarchas. Dorylaeus died in Crete. Dorylaeus, the friend of Euergetes, had a brother Philetaerus, who remained in Pontus; and Philetaerus had also a son named Dorylaeus, who rose to high military rank under Mithridates the Great, and served against the Romans. He was also for a time chief-priest at Comana Pontica. At the wish of Mithridates the Great, Lagetas and Stratarchas with their sister returned to Pontus. Strabo saw Stratarchas in his extreme old age. Lagetas had a daughter, who was, says Strabo, "the mother of my mother." The relations of Strabo on his father's side, and on the side of his mother's father, may not have been pure Greek: indeed, there is little doubt that the Greeks of Amasia were intermingled with Cappadocians. The family of Strabo lost its importance with the death of Mithridates the Great; and though some of the members of it had joined the Roman party, as in the case of the father of Strabo's mother, yet he did not even obtain what Lucullus had promised him for his services. The jealousy of Cn. Pompeius, the successor of Lucullus, made him refuse every thing to the friends of Lucullus. Moaphernes, the uncle of Strabo's mother, and probably her father's brother, was governor of Colchis under Mithridates the Great, and his fortunes were ruined with those of the king.

The period of Strabo is generally well known from his own work. He lived during the reign of Augustus, and at least during the first five years of the reign of Tiberius, for he speaks of the great earthquake of Sardis, which happened in the time of Tiberius (p. 626; Tacit. Ann. ii. 47). The year of his birth is not ascertained; but it has been fixed by some writers by a conjecture founded on several passages in the geography, about B. C. 66. In B. C. 29 Strabo was at Gyaros, and on his voyage to Corinth. Octavianus Caesar was then at Corinth, and on his road to Italy to celebrate the triumph of his victory at Actium (p. 485). Strabo was probably on his way to Italy and Rome, where he spent several years. In B. C. 24, Strabo was with his friend Aelius Gallus in Egypt, and travelled as far as Syene (p. 816). It is assumed that he must have been a man of mature years when he first visited Rome, but there is nothing which justifies the conjecture of making him eight and thirty at the time of this visit, in order to establish B. C. 66 as the year of his birth. A passage in which Strabo says (p. 568) that he saw P. Servilius Isauricus, has given rise to some discussion. This Servilius defeated the Isauri, whence he got the name Isauricus, between B. C. 77 and 75; and he died at Rome in B. C. 44, at the age of ninety. If Strabo saw this Isauricus, when did he see him? As the question cannot be satisfactorily answered, it has been assumed that Strabo confounded Isauricus with some other distinguished Roman whom he saw in Asia in his youth, or that he has confounded him with the son P. Servilius Casca, who was also called Isauricus. But it is clear that Strabo means to say that he saw the Isauricus who got his name from the conquest of the Isaurians. The assumed date, B. C. 66, for the birth of Strabo, is too early. He was certainly writing as late as A. D. 18; and perhaps we may with Clinton place his birth not later than B. C. 54. But Strabo was a pupil of Tyrannio the grammarian (p. 548), and Tyrannio was made prisoner by Lucullus in B. C. 71, and carried to Rome, probably not later than B. C. 66, and perhaps earlier. Strabo therefore was a hearer of Tyrannio at Rome.

The name Strabo (squint-eyed) is originally Greek, though it was also used by the Romans, and applied as a cognomen, among others, to the father of Pompeius Magnus. How the geographer got this name we are not informed.

Groskurd infers that Strabo died about A. D 24. Strabo (lib. xii. p. 576) says that Cyzicus was still a free state; but in A. D. 25, Cyzicus lost its privilege as a Libera Civitas (amisere libertatem; Tacit. Ann. iv. 36; Dion Cass. liv. 7). Accordingly, Groskurd concludes that Strabo was dead in A. D. 25; but this is not a necessary conclusion. We can only conclude that the passage about Cyzicus was written before A. D. 25. In the seventeenth and last book (p. 828, &c.) he mentions the death of Juba II. as a recent occurrence, and he also mentions the fact of Juba being succeeded by his son Ptolemaeus. Juba died in A. D. 21. The conclusion that Strabo died in A. D. 24 is unsupported by any evidence. We only know that he died after A. D. 21. Groskurd's reckoning makes Strabo attain the age of near ninety. In fact he may have lived after A. D. 25, and may have been more than ninety when he died; but as the year of his birth is unknown, we cannot fix the limit of his age.

As to the time at which he wrote his work, we know nothing more than can be collected from particular passages, and we cannot with certainty infer from a particular passage in a book being written after a given time, that the whole book was written after such time; but Groskurd does make such inferences. At the close of the sixth book (p. 288) Strabo speaks of Caesar Germanicus as still living. Germanicus died in Syria in A. D. 20 (19); and Groskurd concludes that the sixth book was written in A. D. 19. The true conclusion is that this passage was written before A. D. 19. It has been shown that Strabo was writing after A. D. 19, and yet the passage at the end of the sixth book stands as he wrote it, though Germanicus was dead when he wrote the passage about Juba II. in the seventeenth book. This shows that the inference from particular passages should be the strict logical inference and no more. A passage in the fourth book (p. 206) certainly was written in A. D. 19, for Strabo there states that the Carni and Taurisci had quietly paid tribute for thirty-three years; and both these tribes were reduced to subjection by Tiberius and Drusus in B. C. 14. Groskurd concludes thus: "if Strabo wrote his fourth book in his eighty-fifth year, and if we allow him two years for the composition of the first three books, he will have commenced his work in the eighty-third year of his age; and since he finished it in his eighty-eighth or ninth year, we may allow for the composition of the whole work six or seven years." This conclusion as to the age when Strabo began his work depends on the date of his birth, which is unknown; and the conclusion as to the times at which he wrote particular books is not certain.

Strabo had a good education. Tyrannio of Amisus in Pontus, a professor of grammatic, is mentioned by Strabo as his teacher (p. 548); but if Tyannio went to Rome soon after the capture of Amisus, Strabo must have heard him at Rome; and if he did not hear him at Rome as a youth, he must have heard him when he was of mature years. This question about Tyrannio is not clear. See Clinton, Fast. Hellen. B. C. 58. Strabo also received instruction in grammatic and rhetoric from Aristodemus, at Nysa in Caria (p. 650); and he afterwards studied philosophy under Xenarchus of Seleucia in Cilicia (p. 670), but Strabo does not say that he heard him in Cilicia. Xenarchus finally taught at Rome, where he died. Boethus of Sidon, afterwards a Stoical philosopher, was the companion of Strabo in his Aristotelian studies (p. 757). Strabo seems to have had only moderate mathematical and astronomical knowledge, and certainly he did not possess all the knowledge of his times. He was well acquainted with history and the mythological traditions of his nation; and also with the Greek poets, and particularly with Homer. He must have had competent means to obtain a good education, and as he travelled a great deal and apparently had no professional or other occupation, we may conclude that his father left him some property. It does not appear where he was living while he wrote his work, but wherever it was, he had opportunities of being acquainted with the chief public events that took place in the Roman empire.

The philosophical sect to which Strabo belonged was the Stoical, as appears plainly enough from many passages in his Geography. He wrote an historical work, intitled Ἱστορικὰ Ὑπομνήματα, which he mentions himself, and it is also cited by Plutarch (Lucullus, 28, Sulla, 26), who calls him Strabo the philosopher. This work, in forty-three books, began where the history of Polybius ended, and was probably continued to the battle of Actium (Groskurd, Transl. of Strabo, i. p. 21).

Strabo was a great traveller, and much of his geographical information is the result of his own observation. In a passage in the second book of his Geography (p. 117) he says, "I shall accordingly describe partly the lands and seas which I have travelled through myself, partly what I have found credible in those who have given me information orally or by writing. Westwards I have travelled from Armenia to the parts of Tyrrhenia adjacent to Sardinia; towards the south from the Euxine to the borders of Ethiopia. And perhaps there is not one among those who have written geographies who has visited more places than I have between these limits; for those who have gone further to the west have not gone so far to the east; and others who have gone further towards the east, have not advanced so far to the west: and the case is the same with the regions between the northern and the southern limits." He expressly mentions in his work having seen the following countries and places: Egypt, Corinth, the island Gyarus; Populonium, near Elba; Comana in Cappadocia; Ephesus; Mylasa, Amasia, Nysa, and Hierapolis in Phrygia. It follows, from this enumeration, that he must have seen a great number of other places. The meagre and incorrect description which he gives of many districts and towns may perhaps be taken as evidence that he derived his knowledge of them only from books; whereas on the contrary, the fulness and accuracy of his description, in other cases, may be good evidence that he had visited them.

It is certain that he saw very little of Greece: he visited Corinth, Argos, Athens, Megara, and the neighbourhood of those places, but this was all. He saw no more of the Peloponnesus than he would see in going to Argos, and he did not know that the remains of Mycenae still existed (p. 372). It seems probable that he merely passed through Greece on his way to Brundusium, by which route he probably reached Rome. Populonium and Luna were the limit of his travels to the north in Italy. It was probably in Rome that he obtained his information about the countries which lie north of the Alps, Gallia, Germany, and also Britain, and Spain. During his visit to Egypt he staid some time in Alexandria, and he went up the river to Syene and Philae, the southern limits of Egypt. That he did not remain in Egypt, we may safely assume; but it is not clear by what route he left it, and the conjectures upon this matter are merely guesses.

The oldest writings of the Greeks, the Homeric poems, contain geographical description blended with history and fable. In the early period of Greek literature, geography was nothing more than local description, and the description was made for other purposes than geography: it was subservient to poetry. The Ionian school may be considered as having made a step towards geographical science by the attention which they paid to celestial phaenomena, but they did nothing directly for geography. The history of Herodotus is the earliest extant work in which geographical description is blended with an historical subject. But Herodotus still retains marks of the characteristic early literature of Greece: his history is an epic poem; his general geography still bears the mythical stamp. That which gives so much real value to his work is his own personal observation, and the truthfulness of his description. He is the first extant writer who has treated on physical geography, and on the causes now in operation by which the earth's surface is continually undergoing change. The connection of geography and history henceforth subsisted, as we see in the extant Greek and Roman historians, and in the Anabasis of Arrian, which is founded on works that are now lost. The first systematic writer on geography was Eratosthenes, who preceded Strabo by about three centuries. The work of Eratosthenes was not confined to political and topographical description: of the three books, into which the work was distributed, it is said that the third only contained particular description, and the first two contained a history of geography, a criticism of the sources of which the author availed himself, and matters pertaining to physical and mathematical geography: the whole was accompanied by a new map of the world. Though this work was severely criticised by Hipparchus, it does not appear that the Greeks had any other systematic treatise on geography before that of Strabo. But the materials for a geographical writer had been greatly increased between the time of Eratosthenes and Strabo, and those materials were partly furnished by historical writers, and adventurers by sea and land: the conquests of the Romans also had opened countries which were almost unknown to the contemporaries of Eratosthenes.

There is no ground for viewing the Geography of Strabo as a new edition of that of Eratosthenes, though it is clear from his own work that the treatise of Eratosthenes furnished the foundation for his new undertaking, and also furnished him with many materials, which however he had to examine, to correct, and to add to. Strabo's work, according to his own expression, was not intended for the use of all persons; and indeed no complete geographical work can be adapted to those who have not the necessary elementary knowledge. His work was intended for all who had a good education, and particularly for those who were engaged in the higher departments of administration; it was designed to be a work which would give such persons that geographical and historical information about each country which a person engaged in matters political cannot do without. Consistently with this view, his plan does not comprehend minute description, except when the place or the object is of great interest or importance; nor is his description limited to the physical characteristics of each country; it comprehends the important political events of which each country has been the theatre, a notice of the chief cities and the great men who have illustrated them; in short, whatever was most characteristic and interesting in every country. His work forms a striking contrast with the geography of Ptolemaeus, and the dry list of names, occasionally relieved by something added to them, in the geographical portion of the Natural History of Plinius. It is in short a book intended for reading, and it may be read; a kind of historical geography.

Strabo's work has a particular value to us of the present day, owing to his method of handling the subject: he has preserved a great number of historical facts for which we have no other evidence than his work. His language is generally clear, except in those passages where the text has been corrupted; it is appropriate to the matter, simple and without affectation.

It is objected to Strabo that he has undervalued Herodotus, and puts him on the same footing as Ctesias. The work of Herodotus was perhaps hardly appreciated, as it deserved to be, by any writer of antiquity; and it is a well grounded complaint against Strabo that he could not or did not choose to discriminate between the stories which Herodotus tells simply as stories which he heard, and that which is the result of the personal observation of Herodotus. There are many parts of the geography of Strabo, particularly his description of Greece, for which he could have derived excellent materials from Herodotus. Strabo has maintained the notion, which had prevailed from the time of Alexander the Great, that the Caspian sea was connected with the northern ocean. Herodotus states it to be a lake, without expressing any doubt on the matter; but how he got this information, it is impossible to conjecture. Strabo did not consider such a fable worth mentioning. We might reasonably expect him to give some evidence, such as he had, of its supposed connection with the northern ocean. He rejects the evidence of Pytheas of Marseille, as to the northern regions of Europe, and treats him as no better than a liar, a circumstance in some measure due to Strabo's attachment to his own system; but an unprejudiced critic should have discovered truth even when it is mixed with fable. Strabo's authorities are nearly exclusively Greek. He had a contempt for the Roman writers generally; and certainly simply as geographers there was not one among them who could be called by that name. But the campaigns of the Romans and their historical writings and memoirs would have furnished him with many valuable geographical facts both for his Asiatic and European Geography. He made some use of Caesar's writings for his description of Gallia, the Alps, and Britain, and he used other materials also, as we see from his brief notice of the voyage of Publius Crassus to the Cassiterides (p. 176). But with this exception, and the writings of Asinius Pollio, Fabius Pictor, and an anonymous chorographer, he drew little from Roman sources. The conjecture that he was imperfectly acquainted with the Latin language, will not sufficiently account for this, even if we suppose that he did not learn it till he visited Rome; for he might easily have learned Latin enough during his residence in Italy to read a Roman author, and if he did choose to do that, he could have found plenty of Greeks and Romans to help him. That he could not have wanted the means of procuring information, we may safely assume, for Strabo could not have travelled so much if he were a poor man. He certainly did not take pains to make the most of the Roman materials which he might have found in Rome.

The imperfect descriptions in many parts of Strabo's work are probably to be attributed more to system than to want of information. He purposely omitted many things and many places as not being comprehended within his notion of what would be useful for the class of persons for whom he wrote. It was probably also his object to bring his work within a certain compass, so as not to damage its circulation by its magnitude, for as books were to be copied, and as a man wrote in order to have readers, an object which Strabo clearly admits, the reduction of works within reasonable limits was at that time, even more than now, necessary, in order to ensure their circulation.

The use that Strabo has made of Homer, is another objection to his work. Like many other Greeks, Strabo viewed the old national poet as the representative of all knowledge; and considered with respect to his own time, the Homeric poems are the representation of all that was then known, at least of history and geography. But the way in which Strabo, particularly in his first book, labours to give a meaning to what the poet has said, is highly uncritical. That which Homer darkly knew or half guessed, has no value except as an index of the state of geographical knowledge at that time, and was entirely useless in the age of Strabo. Though the Homeric poems show a great acquaintance with the topography of Greece and the islands of the Archipelago, they could not with any propriety be made the basis of a geographical description of those parts, as Strabo has made them; and there were many materials, though scattered and incomplete, which Strabo should have used in preference to the Homeric poems, and which he either did not look for or purposely neglected. Thus his description sometimes becomes rather a commentary on Homer than an independent description, based on the actual state of knowledge. In fact he did not conceive his object with that clearness, which is necessary to give to a work a distinctive character; and though his work is doubtless much more entertaining than that of Eratosthenes was, and more nearly approaches to the character of a true geographical system than the meagre determinations of Ptolemaeus, it does not fulfil all the conditions of a general systematic geography.

It is another defect in Strabo's work that the science of astronomy was not properly applied by him. The determination of the earth's figure, and the determination of position by the measures of latitude and longitude are the essential foundations of geographical description. The physical description of the earth's surface, which is the proper object of geography, requires the determination of position, in order to give it precision. Though Strabo had some mathematical and astronomical knowledge, he undervalued these sciences as helps to geography, and he did not consider the exact division of the earth into climates, in the sense in which Hipparchus used the term, and the statement of the latitudes and longitudes of places, which in many cases were pretty well determined, as essential to his geographical description. He is also frequently very incomplete and unsatisfactory in his notice of the physical character and the natural phaenomena of the countries which he describes, which defects and others in his work are probably in a great measure due to the circumstance that the notion of a geographical description was by no means well settled then; and indeed the same remark applies in some degree to the works of the present day. The true medium between a pure description of the earth's surface as a natural phaenomenon and the earth's surface as the scene of human activity, both past and present, cannot be determined by any general rule, but must be left to the tact and judgment of a writer who is thoroughly master of his matter, and who sees by a kind of intuition what must be admitted within his work and what may be properly omitted.

The first two books of Strabo are an introduction to his Geography, and much the most difficult part of the work. A good commentary upon them would in fact be a criticism on all ancient geography up to Strabo's time. He began the first book with showing the importance of geographical knowledge and its uses. He then passes to Homer, whom he considers the earliest of geographers, and defends against many of the objections of Eratosthenes. In this book he points out some errors of Eratosthenes, and makes various remarks on the causes which operate to change the earth's surface. He concludes with some corrections of the errors of Eratosthenes, as to the extent and division of the inhabited part of the earth.

The second book is mainly occupied with mathematical geography. It contains a criticism of the map of the world by Eratosthenes, and of his division of the habitable earth into portions (σφραγῖδες); an examination of the doctrines of Posidonius, particularly the division into six zones adopted by him and by Polybius; with remarks on the supposed circumnavigation of Libya by Eudoxus, and on some errors of Polybius. He also gives his own views on the form and magnitude of the earth, and of the extent of the habitable part of it; and remarks upon the delineation of the earth, on spheres and surfaces, and on a map of the world. He also gives a general sketch of the earth's habitable surface, with reference to seas, countries, and nations; and concludes with explaining the doctrine of climates and of the shadows projected by objects in consequence of the sun's varying position with respect to them.

In the third book he begins his description: he devotes eight books to Europe; six to Asia; and the seventeenth and last to Egypt and Libya. The third book comprises the description of Iberia, and Spain and Portugal, for which his principal authorities are Artemidorus, Polybius, and Posidonius, all of whom had visited Iberia. Artemidorus was also an authority for his knowledge of the sea-coast in general, both that of the Mediterranean, and that of the Ocean. At the end of this book he speaks of the Cassiterides.

The fourth book treats of Gallia according to its four-fold division under Augustus, of Britain, the description of which is meagre, of Ierne or Ireland, of Thule, and of the Alps. His principal authorities are the same as for the third book, with the addition of C. Julius Caesar, who is his only authority for Britain, with the exception of some little matter from Pytheas. Polybius is his authority for the description of the Alps. But it is plain that he also obtained matter for his fourth book from oral communications during his residence in Italy.

In the fifth and sixth books Strabo describes Italy and the adjacent islands; and his description begins with North Italy, or Gallia Cisalpina, and the country of the Ligures, for which Polybius is his chief authority, though with respect to this and other parts of Italy he derived much information from his own personal observation. Eratosthenes, Artemidorus, Ephorus, Fabius Pictor, Caecilius, the Sicilian, and an anonymous chorographer are his main written authorities for the description of Italy. The anonymous chorographer is supposed to be a Roman, because he gives distances in Roman miles and not in Greek stadia. Some critics have conjectured that this chorographer is M. Vipsanius Agrippa, but this work of Agrippa, says Groskurd, was not completed and published until after his death, and in B. C. 12, and consequently much too late for Strabo to have made use of it between B. C. 29 and 26, at Rome. The translator here assumes that he has fixed Strabo's residence at Rome during this period, whereas it cannot be proved, and if it could, the argument would not even then be conclusive. It is a better objection to the supposition of this chorographer being Agrippa, "that Strabo made use of this work only for Italy, perhaps also southern Gaul, and for no other country, and yet it extended over the whole Roman empire." The fifth book concludes with a description of Campania, partly from his own knowledge and partly from Antiochus of Syracusae and others.

In the sixth book he describes Southern Italy and Sicily, with the adjacent islands; and adds at the end a short sketch of the extent and actual condition of the Roman Empire.

In the seventh book he treats of the nations of northern and eastern Europe, including those north of the Ister, and, south of the Ister, Illyricum, Pannonia, Dalmatia, the coast of Thrace on the Pontus, and Epirus, with some notices of Macedonia and Thrace. That part of the book which treated of Macedonia and Thrace is lost; and all that we have in place of it is a meagre epitome. Strabo does not state his authorities for what he says of the Germans; but for the other northern nations he had the work of Posidonius. For the tracts south of the Ister he had the lost work of Aristotle on the constitution of states, Polybius, Posidonius, Theopompus, and Ephorus.

The eighth, ninth, and tenth books comprehend the description of Hellas and the Islands, and, as already observed, Homer is the basis of his description. The treatment of the subject in these three books differs considerably from that in the rest of the work: it is chiefly antiquarian and mythological. Heeren maintains that Strabo visited all Hellas and the islands of the Archipelago, but it is not easy to prove this from his work, and the defects of his description are better evidence for the opinion that he saw very little of the Peloponnesus and of Greece north of the Isthmus.

The eleventh book begins with the description of Asia, which is considered as separated from Europe by the Tanais or Don. Strabo follows Eratosthenes in dividing Asia into two large masses, a northern and a southern mass; a natural division determined by the direction of the mountain range of Taurus from west to east. The first or northern division, that on this side Taurus, comprehends four parts, of which the first comprises the country between the Tanais, the Maeotis, the Pontus, and the Caspian; the second comprises the tracts east of the Caspian, and Taurus itself; the third comprises the countries south of the Caucasus, Media, Armenia, and Cappadocia; and the fourth Asia Minor, from the Halys. The first three parts are described in the eleventh book, and the fourth, with Cappadocia and Pontus, in the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth books. For the first part, comprised in the eleventh book, Strabo might, and probably did obtain much oral information in his native country; some little he derived from Herodotus, and still more from Artemidorus, Eratosthenes, and the historians of the Mithridatic wars, among whom was Theophanes, the friend of Pom-peius Magnus. (Plutarch, Pompeius, c. 37, 42.) Metrodorus of Scepsis, Hypsicrates of Amisus, and Clitarchus, were also his authorities. For the second part he had Patrocles, and Aristobulus, who described the campaigns of Alexander, Eratosthenes, Herodotus, and Posidonius; and for the third the historians of the Mithridatic War.

With the twelfth book begins the description of Asia Minor, and treats of the northern part. Strabo had not seen all this tract himself, and the chief part of his knowledge was derived from oral information and the Greek historians. The description of Asia Minor is continued in the thirteenth book, but is confined to some districts of the north-western coast and the island of Lesbus. He devotes, as we might expect, a large space to the Troad, which he had doubtless visited, and he avails himself of Homer and the researches of Demetrius of Scepsis. This book contains much mythological and historical matter for which there were ample materials in Ephorus, Hellanicus, Charon, Menecrates, and many other Greek writers. His dissertation on the Leleges, Cilicians, and Pelasgi, who once inhabited the coast of Aeolis and of Ionia, is chiefly from Menecrates and Demetrius of Scepsis.

The fourteenth book contains the description of the other parts of Asia Minor, Ionia, Caria, the islands Samos, Chios, Rhodos, the countries Lycia, Pamphylia, and Cilicia, and the island Cyprus. In addition to the authorities which he had for the thirteenth book, he adds for this book also Pherecydes of Syros, for the Milesian colonies Anaximenes of Lampsacus, and Herodotus, Thucydides, Ephorus, Artemidorus, Eratosthenes, and Posidonius.

The fifteenth and sixteenth books contain the description of the second great division of Asia, the southern, or the part on that side of Taurus. The fifteenth book contains the description of India and Persia, which Strabo never visited. His description of India is very imperfect as a geographical description, but it contains much valuable matter, particularly about the people, which he derived from the historians of Alexander and of the campaigns of Seleucus in India. Patrocles, Aristobulus, and Nearchus, the two last of whom we know how to estimate by the aid of Arrian, he judiciously made his chief authorities. He also used Megasthenes, Onesicritus, Deimachus, and Clitarchus, but he did not put confidence in them. For East Persia, or Ariana, Eratosthenes is his chief authority; for West Persia, or Persia Proper, he had Aristobulus and Polycletus of Larissa, who wrote a history of Alexander; and he derived something from Herodotus.

In the sixteenth book he treats of Assyria, with Babylonia and Mesopotamia, Syria with Phoenicia and Palestine, the Persian Gulf, the Red Sea, and the coast of Ethiopia, and Arabia. His chief authorities for Assyria, Babylonia, and Mesopotamia, were some of the historians of Alexander, and Eratosthenes, Posidonius, and Herodotus: for the other parts, Eratosthenes, Posidonius, and Artemidorus. His description of Arabia and the adjacent coast of Libya is founded on Eratosthenes and Artemidorus, but Artemidorus derived materials for his description of the Red Sea from Agatharchides of Cnidos. Strabo also obtained oral information about Arabia from his friends Aelius Gallus and the Stoic Athenodorus.

In the seventeenth and last book Strabo describes Egypt, Ethiopia, and the north coast of Libya. He had seen all Egypt as far as the first cataracts, and his description of this country and of its ancient monuments is one of the most complete parts of his work. Besides the information that he could collect in Alexandria, he had Eratosthenes, Eudorus, Aristo, Polybius, and Posidonius. For the Ammonium he had the historians of Alexander, whom Arrian afterwards used; and for Ethiopia the authority of Petronius, who had carried on war there, and also Agatharchides and Herodotus. As to the country of the Libyans and the tribes Strabo says little that is new; but he made use of Eratosthenes, Artemidorus, Posidonius, and Iphicrates, who wrote a work on the plants and animals of Libya.

Strabo's historical work is mentioned by Josephus (Jewish Antiq. xiv. 7) and by Plutarch. His geographical work is only mentioned by Marcianus of Heraclea, at the commencement of his Periplus, Athenaeus, and by Harpocration, in his Lexicon of the Ten Orators (Λέχαιον, Λευκάς). It was largely used by Stephanus of Byzantium, in the fifth century. It is not quoted by Pausanias, which is not surprising; but it is somewhat singular that Plinius does not refer to it in his Natural History, a circumstance which justifies the conclusion that he was not acquainted with the work. Copies of the geography were probably dear, which will explain its not being much in circulation, though the expense alone would not have prevented Plinius from getting it. "How much happier are we," exclaims Groskurd, with true Philhellenic enthusiasm, "to whom the old Greek authors are now offered in unlimited abundance and in three-silver-groschen-little-volumes (dreisilbergroschen-bändchen)."

If, then, there were few copies of Strabo, it is something of an accident that the work exists at all; and it seems probable that the extant MSS. may all owe their origin to some one that existed in the middle ages. This inference appears to follow from the fact of the great corruption of Strabo's text, and the general agreement of all MSS. which have hitherto been collated in their lacunae and errors, for slight discrepancies in MSS. naturally result from copying, especially when the copyist is not a critic. The great lacuna at the end of the seventh book is found in all the MSS.; but there must have been some MSS. on which was framed the Epitome which occupies the place of the original text, now deficient. The valuable MS. now at Paris (Cod. Par. 1393; in Falconer's edition, Par. 3) was brought from Asia in 1732, by the Abbé Sevin.

An Epitome or Chrestomatheia of Strabo was made by an unknown author, probably about A. D. 980. It is printed in the second volume of Hudson's Minor Geographers, and in the editions of Falconer and Koray. This epitome, which has all the faults inherent in an epitome, and some that are not unavoidable, extends to the whole work, and is of some use, as it has been made from a MS. different from any that exist. Another epitome, still in MS., was made by the monk Maximus Planudes about 1350; and excerpts from the first ten books made by Pletho, the teacher of Cardinal Bessarion, are still in MS. The excerpts were collated by Siebenkees, and used in the Siebenkees-Tzschucke edition.

The first edition of Strabo was by Aldus, Venice, 1516; and this text was followed in the editions of Hopper and Heresbach, Basle, 1549, and of Xylander (Holzmann), Basle, 1571, with a new Latin version. The next edition of the text was by Casaubon, who used several MSS., but it is uncertain if they exist. There are two editions of the text by Casaubon, Geneva, 1587, and Paris, 1620, fol., accompanied by a Latin translation and a commentary. Casaubon, who was only twenty-eight years of age when he edited this work, did a great deal for Strabo, though he could have done more, if he had taken more time about it. His commentary is pretty complete for the first books, but it gradually becomes more meagre as he approached the end of his labours. The edition of 1620 does not differ materially from that of 1587, and it is that which is generally referred to by the page. No new edition of Strabo appeared for a long time, and the critics were contented with making occasional corrections of certain passages and incidental remarks. The conjectures of Thomas Tyrwhitt, London, 1783, are valuable.

The reprint of Casaubon's edition by Almeloveen, Amsterdam, 1707, is useful for the collection of the notes of various critics. A new edition of Strabo was commenced by Brequigny, but only three books appeared, Paris, 1763. He left behind him a French translation with notes in Latin, which was used by the French translators of Strabo.

The seventh edition of Strabo, that of Falconer, Oxford, 1807, 2 vols. fol., was begun after the edition of Siebenkees, but finished before it. It is a reprint from Almeloveen, and contains no improvement of the text, though there were means for doing this, in the collection of five MSS. by Villebrune, and in other resources. This edition contains the collation of the Eton MS., that of the Escurial, and two Medicean MSS.; also the conjectures of Tyrwhitt, and some remarks of Villebrune and Falconer. There are seventeen maps intended for the illustration of Strabo.

The eighth edition of Strabo was commenced by Professor J. P. Siebenkees, Leipzig, 1811. He only lived to complete the first six books in 2 vols. 8vo.; and the work was finished by Professor Tzschucke in 1811. Siebenkees did his part very ill; but the edition improved greatly after Tzschucke commenced his labours. He made, however, few corrections, having a religious respect for the readings of the MS., and his text differs little from that of the edition of Casaubon. Friedemann added as a continuation and seventh part of this work the commentary of Casaubon, and a very complete critical apparatus.

The ninth edition of Strabo was by the learned Greek of Chios, Adamantios Koray, which appeared at Paris, 1815—1818, 4 vols. 8vo. This was really the first critical edition of Strabo that was worthy of the name, though he is perhaps justly blamed for being sometimes too bold in substituting the conjectures of others or his own for MSS. readings which ought not to be rejected. The first volume contains a map to illustrate the geographical system of Strabo, by Gosselin.

The tenth edition, which is not yet completed, is by Gustavus Kramer, and is by far the most valuable that has yet appeared. The two volumes which have been published (Berlin, 1844 and 1847) contain books i.—xii. The text of this edition is founded on a new collation of MSS., and is furnished with a critical commentary.

The first Latin translation of Strabo appeared forty-five years before the Greek text of Aldus. Guarini of Verona translated the first ten books, and Gregorio of Tiferno the remainder. The next version, that of Xylander, is much superior, and is printed in both editions of Casaubon, in that of Almeloveen, and in the Siebenkees-Tzschucke edition, with some corrections. Strabo was well translated into Italian from a MS. by Bonaccioli, Venice, 1552 or 1562. A German translation by A. J. Penzel appeared at Lemgo, 1775, &c., 4 vols.; but it is said to have little merit.

A French translation of Strabo appeared at Paris, 1805—1819, in five quarto volumes, with the title "Géographie de Strabon, traduite du Grec en Français," and accompanied by copious critical and other notes. It was translated by La Porte du Theil and Koray, with the exception of Du Theil's share, which was left unfinished by his death in 1815, and which was completed by Letronne, who translated the sixteenth and seventeenth books. Gosselin added the geographical explanations, and five maps to illustrate the systems of Eratosthenes, Hipparchus, Polybius, and Strabo, with respect to the inhabited portion of the earth. The notes of Du Theil are sometimes exceedingly diffuse.

An Italian translation by Ambrosoli was published at Milan, 1828, 4 vols. 8vo. and 4to.

The best translation of Strabo is the new German version by C. J. Groskurd, 3 vols. 8vo., Berlin and Stettin, 1831—1833. The fourth volume, Berlin, 1834, contains a very complete Index, which is adapted to the second edition of Casaubon and all subsequent editions, except the small Tauchnitz edition, the only one that has not the paging of Casaubon's edition in the margin. The translation of Groskurd is made from the corrected text of Strabo, and he has availed himself of the labours of all his predecessors. In addition to this he has bestowed great pains on his version, which is a most valuable addition to the literature of his country: those who occupy themselves with the history of geography, and with ancient geography in particular, may now ascertain the meaning of Strabo, so far as it is possible to ascertain it. The author has added many valuable notes at the bottom of the page. To say that such a work cannot be free from error, is not to disparage it. A comparison of many parts with the original has convinced the writer of this article of the fidelity, diligence, and sound knowledge of the learned translator. The translation is not dedicated to a king or any great person, for we presume that the author had not imperial or royal patronage, like the French translators of Strabo. It is dedicated to nobody, — to the Manes of Strabo. The preface and introduction contain a dissertation on Strabo, his life and writings, which, with Heeren's Essay, "De Fontibus Geographicorum Strabonis," Göttingen 1823, and the Geography of Strabo, is the chief authority for this article. [G. L.]

STRABO, ACI'LIUS, accused by the inhabitants of Cyrene in A. D. 59 (Tac. Ann. xiv. 18).

STRABO, FA'NNIUS. 1. C. FANNIUS STRABO, was consul B. C. 161 with M. Valerius Messalla. In their consulship the rhetoricians were expelled from Rome (Gell. xv. 11; Suet. de Rhet. 1). Fan-nius also proposed a lex sumtuaria (Gell. ii. 24; Macrob. Sat. ii. 13; Plin. H. N. x. 50. s. 71).

2. C. Fannius C. f. Strabo, the son of the preceding, was consul B. C. 122 with Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus. In his tribuneship of the plebs he had followed the guidance and advice of Scipio Africanus senior. Fannius owed his election to the consulship chiefly to the influence of C. Gracchus, who canvassed the people on his behalf, as he was anxious to prevent his enemy Opimius from obtaining the office. But as soon as Fannius entered upon the consulship, he supported the aristocracy, and took an active part in opposing the measures of Gracchus. He published a proclamation commanding all the Italian allies to leave Rome, and he spoke against the proposal of Gracchus, who wished to give the Roman franchise to the Latins. This speech was preserved and was regarded as a master-piece in the time of Cicero. Many persons questioned whether it had been composed by Fannius himself, as he had the reputation of being only a middling orator; but Cicero assigns it to him. It continued to be read by the grammarians (Cic. Brut. 26; Plin. H. N. ii. 32; Plut. C. Gracch. 8, 11, 12; Cic. de Orat. iii. 47; Jul. Vict. de Art. Rhet. p. 224, ed. Orelli; Meyer, Orat. Rom. Fragm. p. 191, &c., 2d ed.)

3. C. Fannius M. f. Strabo, the son-in-law of Laelius, is frequently confounded with C. Fannius C. f. [No. 2.] In his youth he served in Africa, under Scipio Africanus, in B. C. 146, and along with Tib. Gracchus, was the first to mount the walls of Carthage on the capture of the city. He afterwards served in Spain with distinction, in B. C. 142, under Fabius Maximus Servilianus. (Plut. Tib. Gracch. 4; Appian, Hisp. 67.) Fannius is introduced by Cicero as one of the speakers both in his work De Republica, and in his treatise De Amicitia. At the advice of his father-in-law Laelius, Fannius had attended the lectures of the Stoic philosopher, Panaetius. His style of speaking was harsher than that of his namesake, C. Fannius C. f., and none of his orations are mentioned by Cicero. He owed his celebrity in literature to his History, which was written in Latin, and the style of which is described by Cicero as "neque nimis infans neque perfecte diserta." We have no information respecting the extent of this History; we only know that it treated of contemporary events; and that it possessed some merit appears from the fact of Brutus making an abridgment of it. Sallust likewise praises its truth. (Cic. de Rep. i. 12, Lael. 1, Brut. 26, 31, comp. 21, de Leg. i. 2, ad Att. xii. 5; Sall. ap. Victorin. p. 57, ed. Orelli; Krause, Vitae et Fragm. Hist. Rom. p. 171, &c.; Orelli, Onom. Tull. pp. 249, 250.)

One of the difficulties respecting this C. Fannius M. f. arises from a letter of Cicero, in which he writes to Atticus to ask him under what consuls C. Fannius M. f. was tribune of the plebs, adding that he believed that it was during the censorship of P. Africanus and L. Mummius, that is, in B. C. 142 (Cic. ad Att. xvi. 13, c.). Pighius therefore concluded from this passage, that the C. Fannius M. f. who was tribune of the plebs in B. C. 142, must have been a different person from the son-in-law of Laelius, who was serving that year in Spain, as we have already seen; and he accordingly supposes that there were three contemporaries of the name of C. Fannius, namely, 1. C. Fannius, C. f. consul B. C. 122; 2. C. Fannius, M. f. tribune B. C. 142, and 3. C. Fannius, M. f., the son-in-law of Laelius and the historian. But the creation of another person of the same name in order to get out of a chronological difficulty, is always suspicious; and if there were three C. Fannii, who were contemporaries, Cicero would hardly have omitted to mention them, especially since he speaks of the two C. Fannii in such close connection. Orelli supposes (Onom. Tull. l. c.) that C. Fannius, the son-in-law of Laelius, was tribune of the soldiers in Spain in B. C. 142, and that Cicero confounded this tribuneship with the tribuneship of the plebs. But this supposition of Orelli cannot be correct, if Cicero (de Rep. i. 12) is right in his statement that the son-in-law of Laelius was only of quaestorian age in B. C. 129, that is, not more than thirty, since in that case he would not have been old enough to have been tribune of the soldiers in B. C. 142. It is much more probable that Cicero confounded C. Fannius, M. f., the son-in-law of Laelius, with C. Fannius, C. f., and that the latter was tribune of the plebs in B. C. 142. It is, however, quite impossible to reconcile all the statements of ancient writers respecting this C. Fannius. According to his own statement, as preserved by Plutarch (Tib. Gracch. 4), he was one of the first to mount the walls of Carthage in B. C. 146, but if he was thirty in B. C. 129, he could only have been thirteen in the former year!

STRABO, C. JU'LIUS CAESAR. [Caesar, No. 10.]

STRABO, M. LAE'NIUS, of Brundisium, a Roman eques and a friend of Varro, was the first person who introduced the use of the aviaries, in which birds of various kinds were kept. (Varr. R. R. iii 5. § 8; Plin. H. N. x. 50, s. 72, where he is erroneously called M. Laelius Strabo.)

STRABO, CN. POMPEIUS. [Pompeius, No. 21.]

STRABO, SEIUS, a Roman eques, was commander of the praetorian troops at the latter end of the reign of Augustus and the commencement of that of Tiberius. He was subsequently sent by the latter emperor to govern Egypt, and was then succeeded in the sole command of the praetorian troops by his son, the notorious Sejanus, who had shared with him the command from the first year of the reign of Tiberius. (Tac. Ann. i. 7, 24, iv. 1; Dion Cass. lvii. 19.) [Sejanus.]

STRABO, TI'TIUS. 1. C., belonged to the republican party on the death of Caesar. (Cic. ad Fam. xii. 6.)

2. L., a Roman eques, whom Cicero introduced to M. Brutus (ad Fam. xiii. 14).

COIN OF L. VOLTEIUS STRABO.

STRABO, C. PAETILIUS, C. L., the name of a freedman, which appears, with the epithet CAELATOR, on an inscription, respecting the genuineness of which there are strong doubts. There is no other mention of this artist. (Muratori, Thes. vol. i. p. lxx. n. 6; Maffei, Art. Cr. Lapid. p. 214; Orelli, Inscr. Lat. Sel. n. 1614; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 409.) [P. S.]

STRATEGOPU'LUS, GREGO'RIUS. [MAMMAS.]

STRA'TIUS (Στράτιος.) 1. A son of Nestor and Anaxibia. (Hom. Od. iii. 413.)

2. A son of Clymenus. (Paus. ix. 37. § 1.)

3. Stratios, i. e. the warlike, occurs also as a surname of Zeus and Ares. (Strab. xiv. p. 659; Herod. v. 119.) [L. S.]

STRA'TIUS (Στράτιος). 1. An Achaean of Tritaea, was one of the deputies who met to deliberate concerning the course to be pursued at the breaking out of the war between Perseus and the Romans (B. C. 169). Though his sentiments were hostile to Rome, he dissuaded his countrymen from taking any active part against the republic (Polyb. xxviii. 6). He was one of the Achaeans afterwards carried to Rome in B. C. 167, to await the judgment of the senate, and an embassy sent thither by his countrymen in B. C. 160, had for its chief object to obtain the liberation of him and Polybius (Id. xxxii. 7). He was not, however, set free till long after, when he returned to his native country, where we find him thenceforth taking a strong part in support of the Roman influence, and opposing the destructive counsels of Critolaus and Diaeus. (Id. xxxviii. 5, xl. 4.)

2. A physician and friend of Eumenes II., king of Pergamus, who was sent by him to Rome in B. C. 167, to restrain as well as observe the ambitious designs of his brother Attalus. By his prudent admonitions he succeeded in recalling that prince to a sense of duty. (Polyb. xxx. 2; Liv. xlv. 19.) [E. H. B.]

STRATOCLES (Στρατοκλῆς). 1. An Athenian orator, the son of Euthydemus. He was a contemporary of Demosthenes, and a friend of the orator Lycurgus. It was on his motion that a decree was passed investing Lycurgus with the office of manager of the public revenue (Plut. Vit. x. Orat. p. 852. a.). Stratocles was a virulent opponent of Demosthenes, whom he charged with having accepted bribes from Harpalus (Deinarch. in Demosth. pp. 175, a. 177, a. Compare DEMOSTHENES, vol. i. p. 986). He was himself a man of very disreputable character, though a persuasive speaker (Demosth. adv. Pantaen. p. 944. c.; Plut. Demetr. c. 11. p. 893, e.). Plutarch compares him to Cleon, whom he seems even to have surpassed in impudence. On the occasion of the defeat of Amorgus (B. C. 322) Stratocles, having himself received intelligence some time before the news became generally known, crowned himself with a chaplet, and went through the Cerameicus, proclaiming that the Athenians had been victorious, and bidding the people celebrate a festival of thanksgiving. When the real state of the case became known, and the people indignantly charged him with having deceived them, he asked, with consummate effrontery, what harm he had done, for it was owing to him that they had had three days' enjoyment. Stratocles especially distinguished himself by his extravagant flattery of Demetrius, in whose honour he brought forward in the assembly the most preposterous decrees (Plut. Demetr. 11, 12). When on one occasion, he proposed a vote that whatever Demetrius ordered was pious towards the gods and just towards men, a satirical remark of Demochares in reply to some who said that Stratocles must be mad to propose such decrees, led to a quarrel between Demochares and the partizans of Stratocles, and ultimately to the banishment of the former (Plut. Demetr. c. 24. Compare DEMOCHARES, vol. i. p. 973). It was to accommodate the celebration of the Eleusinian mysteries to the convenience or caprice of Demetrius, who demanded to be initiated, that Stratocles proposed the outrageously absurd decree, that the people should call the month Munychion Anthesterion, and celebrate the smaller mysteries, and then forthwith change the name again to Boedromion and celebrate the greater mysteries (Plut. Demetr. 26). This was in B. C. 302. A fragment of a speech of Stratocles is quoted by Photius (Cod. ccl. 4. p. 447, a. ed. Bekker.) from Agatharchides (Ruhnken. Hist. Crit. Orat. Graec. Opusc. p. 362, &c.).

We find a Stratocles mentioned as one of the Athenian generals at the battle of Chaeroneia, in B. C. 338. (Polyaen. Strateg. iv. 2; comp. Aesch. adv. Ctes. c. 45. p. 74.) Droysen (Gesch. der Nachfolger Alexanders, p. 498) considers the general and the orator to be identical.

Cicero (Brutus, 11) mentions a Stratocles in a connection which seems to point him out as a rhetorician who was the author of some historical work. Ruhnken, however (l. c. p. 364) identifies him with the Athenian orator.

2. A celebrated actor at Rome, mentioned by Quintilian (Inst. Orat. xi. 3, § 178) and Juvenal (iii. 99).

3. Some others of the same name are met with, the notices of whom are not worth inserting here. [C. P. M.]

STRA'TOLAS (Στρατόλας), a citizen of Elis, and one of the leaders of the oligarchical party there. In B. C. 364 we find him in command of what Xenophon calls the Three Hundred, — perhaps a body organised by the oligarchs out of their own class, in imitation of the Sacred Band of Thebes (see Thirlwall's Greece, vol. v. p. 136). Acting in this capacity, he fell in battle at Olympia against the Arcadians, who had invaded Elis, and were attempting to celebrate the Olympic games under the presidency of Pisa. (Xen. Hell. vii. 4. §§ 15, 31; comp. Diod. xv. 77, 82.) [E. E.]

STRATON (Στράτων), historical. 1. A Tyrian, who was preserved by the gratitude of his slave, upon occasion of a general servile insurrection, and was subsequently elected by general consent to be king of Tyre, a dignity which he transmitted to his descendants. No clue is given us to the date of this story, which is recorded only by Justin (xviii. 3), and wears a very fabulous aspect.

2. Son of Gerostratus, the king or dynast of Aradus in Phoenicia at the time of its conquest by Alexander. Gerostratus himself was absent with the Persian fleet, but Straton hastened after the battle of Issus (B. C. 333) to meet the conqueror on his advance into Phoenicia with the offering of a crown of gold, and bearing the submission of Aradus and its dependent cities. (Arrian. Anab. ii. 13; Curt. iv. 1. § 6.)

3. King or dynast of Sidon, at the same period, was distinguished for his luxury and voluptuousness, in which he sought to vie with his contemporary Nicocles, king of Salamis (Athen. xii. p. 531). After the conquest of Phoenicia, he was deposed by Alexander on account of the support he had given to Dareius, and his throne conferred upon Abdalonimus, a man in humble circumstances. (Curt. iv. 1. § 16; Diod. xvii. 47, erroneously represents him as king of Tyre.)

4. A Greek rhetorician, a friend of M. Brutus, who was present with him at the fatal battle of Philippi (B. C. 42), and having fled with him from the field, was induced to render him a last service by dispatching him with his own sword. He was subsequently reconciled with Octavian, who treated him with distinction, and to whom he rendered good service at the battle of Actium. (Plut. Brut. 52, 53.) [E. H. B.]

STRATON (Στράτων), literary. 1. An Athenian comic poet of the Middle Comedy, according to Suidas (s. v.), who mentions his play entitled Φοῖνιξ, which is, no doubt, the same as the Φοινικίδης, from which a considerable fragment is quoted by Athenaeus (ix. p. 382, e.). From the frequency with which the name of the comic poet Strattis occurs corrupted into Straton, some distinguished scholars have supposed that the fragment in Athenaeus should be ascribed to Strattis, and that the comic poet Straton owes his existence solely to the errors of transcribers, followed by Suidas. It has, however, been shown by Meineke, from the internal evidence of the fragment itself, that it could hardly have been written by Strattis, or by any other poet of the Old Comedy; and therefore there is no reason to reject the testimony of Suidas, although it may be doubted whether he is strictly correct in ascribing Straton to the Middle Comedy. If the Philetas mentioned in the fragment be, as seems very probable, the celebrated poet of Cos, who flourished about Ol. 120, Straton ought rather to be referred to the New than to the Middle Comedy. The first three verses of the fragment and the beginning of the fourth were appropriated by Philemon. (Ath. xiv. p. 659, b.)

Another comic poet of this name is mentioned by Plutarch (Symp. v. 1), as a contemporary. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 496, 497; Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 426—428, vol. iv. pp. 545—548, Editio Minor, pp. 1156—1158.)

2. The son of Arcesilaus, of Lampsacus, was a distinguished peripatetic philosopher, and the tutor of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He succeeded Theophrastus as head of the school in Ol. 123, B. C. 288, and, after presiding over it eighteen years, was succeeded by Lycon. (Diog. Laërt. v. 58.) He devoted himself especially to the study of natural science, whence he obtained, or, as it appears from Cicero, himself assumed the appellation of Physicus (φυσικός). Cicero, while speaking highly of his talents, blames him for neglecting the most necessary part of philosophy, that which has respect to virtue and morals, and giving himself up to the investigation of nature. (Acad. Quaest. i. 9, de Fin. v. 5.) In the long list of his works, given by Diogenes, several of the titles are upon subjects of moral philosophy, but the great majority belong to the department of physical science.

The opinions of Straton have given rise to much interesting controversy; but unfortunately the result has been very unsatisfactory on account of the want of positive information. From the few notices of his tenets, which we find in the ancient writers, he appears to have held a pantheistic system, the specific character of which cannot however, be determined. He seems to have denied the existence of any god out of the material universe, and to have held that every particle of matter has a plastic and seminal power, but without sensation or intelligence; and that life, sensation, and intellect, are but forms, accidents, and affections of matter. Some modern writers have regarded Straton as a forerunner of Spinoza, while others see in his system an anticipation of the hypothesis of monads. He has been charged with atheism by Cudworth, Leibnitz, Bayle, and other distinguished writers, and warmly defended by Schlosser, in his Spicilegium historico-philosophicum de Stratone Lampsaceno, cognomine Physico, et atheismo vulgo ei tributo, Vitemberg. 1728, 4to. A good account of the controversy, with references to the writers who have noticed Straton, is given by Harless, in his edition of Fabricius. (Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. pp. 506—508; C. Nauwerck, de Strat. Lamps. Phil. Disquis. Berol. 1836, 8vo.)

3. Another Peripatetic philosopher of Alexandria. (Diog. Laërt. v. 61.)

4. An historian, who wrote the exploits of Philip and Perseus in their wars with the Romans, and may therefore be supposed to have lived about B. C. 160. (Diog. Laërt. v. 61.)

5. Of Sardis, an epigrammatic poet, and the compiler of an Anthology, which was entitled, from the subject common to all the poems of which it consisted, Μοῦσα παιδική. It is so called in the preface of Constantinus Cephalas to this section of his Anthology. It was composed partly of epigrams compiled from the earlier anthologies of Meleager and Philip, and from other sources, and partly of poems written by Straton himself. Of the poets comprised in the Garland of Meleager, Straton received thirteen into his collection, namely, Meleager, Dioscorides, Polystratus, Antipater, Aratus, Mnasalcas, Evenus, Alcaeus of Messene, Phanias, Asclepiades, Rhianus, Callimachus, and Poseidippus: of those in the Anthology of Philip, he only took two, namely, Tullius Laureas and Automedon; and to these he added ten others namely, Flaccus, Alpheius of Mytilene, Julius Leonidas, Scythinus, Numenius, Dionysius, Fronto, Thymocles, Glaucus, and Diocles. The whole number of poems in the collection is 258, of which 98 are by Straton himself. The work formed the last section of the Anthology of Constantine [PLANUDES], and is printed in Jacobs's edition of the Palatine Anthology, c. xii.

The time of Straton has been disputed, but it is evident that he lived in the second century of our era; since, on the one hand, he compiled from the Anthology of Philip, who flourished at the end of the first century, and, on the other hand, he is mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (v. 61), who wrote most probably at the beginning of the third century. A further indication of his date is derived by Schneider from his mention of the physician Capito, who flourished under Hadrian.

Some of the epigrams of Straton are elegant and clever; but nothing can redeem the disgrace attaching to the moral character of his compilation. (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. pp. 359, foll.; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. pp. 68, foll., vol. vi. Proleg. pp. xlvi.—xlix., vol. xiii. pp. 955, 956.) [P. S.]

totle, who lived probably in the sixth or fifth century B. C., as he is called ἰατρὸς ἀρχαῖος (Diog. Laërt. v. 3. § 61).

2. A native of Berytus in Phoenicia, one of whose medical formulae is quoted by Galen (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Loc. iv. 8. vol. xii. p. 749). He is probably the same person who appears to be quoted by Andromachus the Younger (ap. Galen. ibid. ix. 5. vol. xiii. p. 290) and Asclepiades Pharmacion (ibid. p. 303), simply as ὁ Βηρύτιος, and who must have lived some time in or before the first century after Christ. Sprengel and others suppose Straton of Berytus to have been the same person as the follower of Erasistratus, which may possibly be true, but cannot be proved; while, on the other hand, it may be plausibly argued that this physician is called ὁ Βηρύτιος, in order to distinguish him from his more celebrated namesake.

3. A pupil of Erasistratus in the third century B. C., who appears to have lived on very intimate terms with his tutor. (Diog. Laërt. v. 3. § 61; Galen. De Ven. Sect. adv. Erasistr. Rom. Deg. c. 2, vol. xi. p. 197; Oribas. Coll. Medic. xlv. 23, p. 60, ed. Mai.) He wrote a work to explain the difficult words found in the writings of Hippocrates, which is mentioned by Erotianus (Gloss. Hippocr. s. v. ἄμβην). Like the rest of the followers of Erasistratus, he was averse to blood-letting (Galen. De Ven. Sect. adv. Erasistr. c. 2, vol. xi. p. 151), but could not give any very good reasons for his opinion. He is probably the physician quoted by Alexander Trallianus (i. 15, pp. 156, 157), and Aëtius (i. 2, 3, iv. 1, 7, 46, pp. 64, 616, 628). He was tutor to Apollonius of Memphis (Galen. De Diff. Puls. iv. 17, vol. viii. p. 759), and not his father, as some have supposed. [APOLLONIUS*, p. 246.] See Sprengel's Gesch. der Arzneik. vol. i. pp. 559, 561, ed. 1846.

4. A slave at Rome in the former half of the first century B. C., who was bought by Sassia, the mother of Cluentius, to prepare poisons for her; and who was afterwards crucified for murder and robbery. (Cic. pro Cluent. cc. 63—66). [W. A. G.]

STRATON, a sculptor, who, with Xenophilus, made, for the temple of Asclepius at Argos, the white marble statues of the god, and of his attendant Hygieia; near which were placed the statues of the artists themselves. (Paus. ii. 23. § 4.) [P. S.]

STRATONI'CE (Στρατονίκη). 1. One of the daughters of Thespius, and by Heracles the mother of Atromus. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 3.)

2. A daughter of Pleuron and Xanthippe. (Apollod. i. 7. § 7.)

3. The wife of Melaneus and the mother of Eurytus. (Hes. Fragm. 48.) [L. S.]

STRATONI'CE (Στρατονίκη). 1. A sister of Perdiccas II., king of Macedonia, who was given by him in marriage to the Thracian prince SEUTHES, the nephew of Sitalces, as a reward for the service rendered him by the former in persuading Sitalces to withdraw from Macedonia. (Thuc. ii. 101.)

2. Daughter of Corrhaeus (a Macedonian otherwise unknown), and wife of Antigonus, king of Asia, by whom she became the mother of two sons, Demetrius Poliorcetes and Philippus, who died in B. C. 306 (Plut. Demetr. 2). In B. C. 320 she is mentioned as entering into negotiations with Docimus, when that general was shut up with the other adherents of Perdiccas, in a fortress of Phrygia: but having induced him to quit his stronghold, she caused him to be seized and detained as a prisoner (Diod. xix. 16). After the battle of Ipsus she fled from Cilicia (where she had awaited the issue of the campaign) with her son Demetrius to Salamis in Cyprus, B. C. 301. (Id. xxi. Exc. Hoeschel. p. 480.) Here she probably died, as we hear nothing of her when the island fell into the power of Ptolemy some years afterwards.

3. Daughter of Demetrius Poliorcetes and Phila, the daughter of Antipater. In B. C. 300, at which time she could not have been more than seventeen years of age, her hand was solicited by Seleucus, king of Syria, and she was conducted by her father Demetrius to Rhosus, on the Pierian coast, where her nuptials were celebrated with the utmost magnificence (Plut. Demetr. 31, 32). Notwithstanding the disparity of their ages, she appears to have lived in perfect harmony with the old king for some years, and had already borne him one child, when it was discovered that her step-son Antiochus was deeply enamoured of her, and Seleucus, in order to save the life of his son, which was endangered by the violence of his passion, gave up Stratonice in marriage to the young prince, whom he at the same time constituted king of the provinces of Upper Asia. (Plut. Dem. 38; Appian. Syr. 59; and the other authorities cited under ERASISTRATUS, where the well-known circumstances of this story are more fully related.) The union commenced under such strange auspices seems to have been a prosperous one, but we find little subsequent mention of Stratonice. She bore three children to Antiochus: 1. Antiochus II., surnamed Theos; 2. Apama, married to Magas, king of Cyrene; and 3. Stratonice [No. 4.]. The city of Stratoniceia in Caria was named after her, but whether it was founded in her honour by Seleucus or by Antiochus, is uncertain. (Strab. xiv. p. 660; Steph. Byz. s. v. Στρατονίκεια.)

4. Daughter of the preceding and of Antiochus I., was married to Demetrius II., king of Macedonia. (Euseb. Arm. i. p. 164.) The period of their marriage is unknown; but she appears to have remained in Macedonia till about B. C. 239, when she quitted Demetrius in disgust, on account of his second marriage with Phthia, the daughter of Olympias, and retired to Syria. Here she in vain incited her nephew Seleucus II. to avenge the insult offered her by declaring war against the Macedonian king. According to another account, she was in hopes to induce Seleucus himself to marry her; but that monarch was wholly occupied with the recovery of Babylonia and the upper provinces of the empire. While he was thus engaged, Stratonice took advantage of his absence to raise a revolt against him at Antioch; but she was easily expelled from that city on the return of Seleucus, and took refuge in Seleucia, where she was besieged, taken prisoner, and put to death. (Justin. xxviii. 1; Agatharchides, ap. Joseph. c. Apion. i. 22; Niebuhr, Kl. Schriften, p. 254; Droysen, Hellenism. vol. ii. p. 414.)

5. A daughter of Antiochus II., king of Syria, married to Ariarathes III., king of Cappadocia.

* Straton is here too positively said to have been the native of Berytus; he ought to have been called the follower of Erasistratus, who may possibly have been "the native of Berytus," but cannot be proved to have been so.

(Diod. xxxi. Exc. Phot. p. 518; Euseb. Arm. i. p. 164.)

6. One of the numerous wives of Mithridates the Great, was originally a woman of mean birth, the daughter of a harper, but obtained such influence over the king as to become one of his favourite wives; and when he was compelled to undertake his perilous retreat round the Euxine sea, she was left by him in charge of a strong fortress, in which he had deposited a large amount of treasure. She was, however, induced to betray both the fortress and treasures into the hands of Pompey, on condition that he should spare the life of her son Xiphares; but Mithridates, in order to punish her for this treason, put Xiphares to death before her eyes. (Appian, Mithr. 107; Plut. Pomp. 36; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 7.) [E. H. B.]

STRATONI'CUS (Στρατόνικος), of Athens, a distinguished musician of the time of Alexander the Great, of whom scarcely any thing is recorded, except the sharp and witty rebuke which he administered to Philotas, when the latter boasted of a victory which he had gained over Timotheus. (Strab. xiii. p. 610; Aelian. N. A. xiv. 14; Ath. viii. p. 352, b.) [P. S.]

STRATONI'CUS (Στρατόνικος), a physician at Pergamus in Mysia, a pupil of Sabinus, and one of Galen's tutors, about A. D. 148. (Galen. De Atra Bile, c. 4, vol. v. p. 119.) It is not certain whether he is the same person whose opinion respecting the generation of male and female children is mentioned by Galen (De Sem. ii. 5, vol. iv. p. 629), and who is called by him ὁ φυσικὸς Στρατόνικος. [W. A. G.]

STRATONI'CUS, a statuary and silver-chaser, was one of the artists who made bronze statues representing the battles of Attalus and Eumenes against the Gauls. He therefore flourished about B. C. 240 (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 24; PYROMACHUS). He is also mentioned by Pliny, in his list of distinguished silver-chasers (xxxiii. 55) as the engraver of a cup, on which a Satyr, overpowered with wine, was represented so naturally, that the figure appeared to be rather placed upon the vessel than engraved on it. (Comp. Anth. Pal. vi. 56; Ath. xi. p. 782, b.) [P. S.]

STRATTIS (Στράττις), tyrant of Chios in the time of Dareius Hystaspis and Xerxes, was one of those whom Dareius, in his Scythian expedition, left in charge of the bridge of boats over the Danube. At the period of the invasion of Greece by Xerxes, seven citizens of Chios conspired against Strattis, but the plot was revealed by one of their number, and the remaining six were obliged to seek safety in flight. They first applied for aid to Sparta, whence they proceeded to the Greek fleet, under the command of Leotychides, at Aegina, B. C. 479, and entreated their countrymen, but for the time without success, to strike a blow for the restoration of independence to Ionia. (Herod. iv. 138, viii. 132.) [E. E.]

STRATTIS (Στράττις or Στράτις, but the former is the more correct orthography), an Athenian comic poet of the Old Comedy, flourished, according to Suidas, a little later than Callias. He must therefore have begun to exhibit about Ol. 92, B. C. 412. He was in part contemporary with Sannyrion and Philyllius, both of whom are attacked in extant quotations from his works (Schol. Aristoph. Plut. 1195; Ath. xii. p. 551, c.; Poll. x. 189.) The drama of Strattis in which Philyllius was attacked was the Ποτάμιοι, which, the Scholiast says, was brought out before the Ecclesiazusae of Aristophanes, and therefore not later than B. C. 394 or 393 (see Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. s. a. 394). Again, in his 'Ανθρωποῤῥαίστης he attacked Hegelochus, the actor of the Orestes of Euripides; so that this play must have been brought out later than B. C. 408, the year in which the Orestes was exhibited (Schol. Eurip. Orest. 278; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. s. a. 407). Strattis was still exhibiting at the end of the 99th Olympiad, B. C. 380, for we cannot well refer to an earlier period his attack on Isocrates on account of his fondness for Lagisca when he was far advanced in years (Ath. xiii. p. 592, d.; Harpocr. s. v. Λαγίσκα). We have little opportunity of forming a judgment on the poetical character of Strattis. His intense admiration of the Orestes of Euripides does not say much for his taste (Schol. Eurip. Orest. 278). From the epithet φορτικόν, applied to one of his plays, it may be inferred that he indulged in that low and insipid buffoonery, with which Aristophanes frequently charges his rivals (Hesych. s. v. κολεκάνοι; comp. Aristoph. Nub. 524, Vesp. 66; Aristot. Eth. Nicom. iv. 8; Plut. Op. Mor. p. 348, c.)

According to an anonymous writer on Comedy (p. xxxiv.) Strattis composed sixteen dramas. Suidas mentions the following titles of his plays: 'Ανθρωπορέστης, or, as it should be, 'Ανθρωποῤῥαίστης, 'Αταλάντη, 'Αγαθοὶ ἤτοι 'Αργυρίου ἀφανισμός, 'Ιφιγέρων, Καλλιππίδης, Κινησίας, Λιμνομέδων, Μακεδόνες, Μήδεια, Τρωΐλος, Φοίνισσαι, Φιλοκτήτης, Χρύσιππος, Παυσανίας, Ψυχασταί, in addition to which, four titles are mentioned by other writers, namely, Ζώπυρος περικαιόμενος, Μυρμιδόνες, Ποτάμιοι, Πότισος. His name sometimes appears in the corrupted form Στράτων, and some scholars have supposed the comic poets Strattis and Straton to be one and the same person; but this opinion is undoubtedly erroneous. (Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 221—236, 427, vol. ii. pp. 763, foll., Editio Minor, pp. 428, foll.; Bergk, Reliq. Com. Att. Ant. pp. 284, 285; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. Introd. p. xliv. note r.) [P. S.]

STROMBI'CHIDES (Στρομβιχίδης), an Athenian, son of Diotimus, was appointed to command the eight ships which the Athenians sent to the coast of Asia, on the news of the revolt of Chios, in B. C. 412. On his arrival at Samos he added a Samian trireme to his squadron, and sailed to Teos to check the spirit of rebellion there. But soon after he was compelled to flee to Samos from a superior Peloponnesian fleet, under Chalcideus and Alcibiades, and Teos forthwith revolted. Not long after this Strombichides seems to have returned to Athens, and later in the same year he was one of three commanders who were sent to the Athenians at Samos with a reinforcement of thirty-five ships, which increased their whole force to 104. This they now divided, retaining the greater part of it at Samos to command the sea, and to carry on the war against Miletus, while Strombichides and two others were despatched to Chios with thirty triremes. On their way they lost three of their vessels in a storm; but with the rest they proceeded to Lesbos, and made preparations for the siege of Chios, to which island they then crossed over, fortified a strong post named Delphinium, and reduced the Chians for a time to great extremities. In B. C. 411, on the revolt of Abydos and Lampsacus, Strombichides sailed from Chios with twenty-four ships, and recovered Lampsacus, but was unable either to persuade or compel Abydos to return to its allegiance; and accordingly he crossed over to Sestos, and there established a garrison to command the whole of the Hellespont. Hence he was soon after summoned to reinforce the Athenians at Samos, who were unable, before his arrival, to make head against the superior force of the Peloponnesians under Astyochus. In Lysias we read that Strombichides was one of those friends of democracy, who expressed their indignation at the terms of peace with which Theramenes and his fellow-ambassadors returned to Athens from Lacedaemon in B. C. 404. Having thus rendered himself obnoxious to the oligarchs, he was involved with the other prominent men of his party in the accusation brought against them by Agoratus before the council, of a conspiracy to oppose the peace. They were all accordingly thrown into prison, and not long after were put to death with the mockery of a trial under the government of the Thirty (Thuc. viii. 15, 16, 17, 30, 34, 38, 40, 55, 60, 61, 62, 79; Lys. c. Agor. pp. 130—133). We may perhaps identify the subject of the present article with the father of Autocles. (Xen. Hell. vi. 3. § 2.) [E. E.]

STRONGY'LION (Στρογγυλίων), a distinguished Greek statuary, mentioned by Pausanias and Pliny, and in an important extant inscription. The inscription furnishes sufficient evidence for the true date of the artist, which had previously been determined wrongly on the supposed testimony of the writers referred to.

The inscription referred to was discovered, in 1840, near the entrance of the Acropolis at Athens, between the Propylaea and the Parthenon. It is engraved on two plates of Pentelic marble, and runs thus:—

ΧΑΙΡΕΔΕΜΟϚΕΤΑΛΛΕVΟ ΕΚΚΟΙVΕϚΑΝΕΘΕΚΕΝ

that is, Χαιρέδημος Εὐαγγέλου ἐ: Κοίλης ἀνέθηκεν Στρογγυλίων ἐποίησεν.

Now, we read in the Scholia on Aristophanes (Av. 1128), that there stood in the Acropolis a representation of the Trojan horse (δούριος ἵππος) in bronze, bearing the inscription. Χαιρέδημος Εὐαγγέλου ἐκ Κοίλης ἀνέθηκε, and Pausanias describes this statue as standing at the exact part of the Acropolis where the inscription was found (i. 23. § 10): and though Pausanias does not mention the name of the artist, he does tell us elsewhere that Strongylion excelled in the representation of oxen and horses (ix. 30. § 1). But this is not all. The passage of Aristophanes, which gives occasion for the information furnished by the Scholiast, describes the walls of the city of the Birds as being so broad, that two chariots might race upon them "having horses as large as the Durian (ὁ δούριος)." Now, considering how constantly the comic poets appeal to the senses rather than the imagination of their audience, and how generally their illustrations are drawn from objects, especially novel objects, present before the eyes of the people, there can be little doubt of the soundness of the remark of the Scholiast, that "It is not credible that the poet says this merely in a general sense, but with reference to the bronze statue in the Acropolis." If this reasoning be admitted, the date of Strongylion's colossal bronze horse in the Acropolis will be fixed at a period shortly before the exhibition of the Birds in B. C. 414. This date is confirmed by the characters of the inscription, which belong to the style in use before the archonship of Eucleides. For the publication of this inscription and the inferences drawn from it, we are indebted to Ross. (Journal des Savants, 1841, pp. 245—247.)

Pausanias (i. 40. § 2) tells us that Strongylion made the bronze statue of Artemis Soteira, in her temple at Megara. Sillig makes Pausanias say that this statue of Artemis was one of the statues of the Twelve Gods, which were ascribed to Praxiteles; and hence he infers, though by what process of reasoning is not very evident, that Strongylion was contemporary with Praxiteles. The fact is, however, that Pausanias expressly distinguishes "the statues of the Twelve Gods, said to be the works of Praxiteles," from that of "Artemis herself," that is, the chief statue of the temple, which, he distinctly affirms, was made by Strongylion; and, so far is the passage from furnishing any evidence that Strongylion was contemporary with Praxiteles, that it affords two arguments to prove that he lived before him; for, in the first place, the statue of the deity, to whom the temple was dedicated, would of course be made earlier than any others that might be placed in it, and, moreover, Pausanias tells us that the temple was built to commemorate a victory gained by the Megarians over a detachment of the army of Mardonius, who had been struck by Artemis with a panic in the night; so that the only sound inference to be drawn from this passage, respecting the artist's date, is that he should be placed as soon after the Persian wars as the other evidence will permit.

In another passage of Pausanias (ix. 30. § 1) we are informed that of the statues composing one of the two groups of the Muses on Mount Helicon, three were made by Cephisodotus, three by Strongylion, and the remaining three by Olympiosthenes; whence it has been inferred that these three artists were contemporaries. This inference is by no means necessarily true, but, on the contrary, while it is quite possible that the three artists may have worked at the same time on the different portions of the group, it is an equally probable conjecture, that the group was left unfinished by one of them, and completed by the others. If so, the order in which the names of the artists stand in Pausanias is not to be taken as the order of time in which they lived; for the preceding clause furnishes an obvious reason for his mentioning the name of Cephisodotus first. Even if we suppose the parts of the group to have been executed at the same time, it is quite possible, as Ross has argued, to bring back the date of Cephisodotus I. high enough to admit of his having been in part contemporary with Strongylion, about the beginning of the fourth century B.C. At all events, it is clear that these passages do not warrant Sillig in placing Strongylion with Cephisodotus I. and Praxiteles at Ol. 103, B.C. 368, but that he flourished about B.C. 415, and probably for some time both before and after that date. Perhaps we might safely assign as his period the last thirty or forty years of the fifth century B.C.

Pliny mentions two other bronze statues by Strongylion (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 21); the one of an Amazon, the beauty of whose legs obtained for it the epithet Eucnemos, and excited the admiration of Nero to such a degree that he had it carried about with him in his travels; the other of a boy, of which Brutus was so fond that it was named after him. (Sillig, Cat. Art. s. v.; Ross, as above quoted; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 409—411, 2d. ed.; Nagler, Künstler-Lexicon, s. v.) [P. S.]

STRO'PHIUS (Στρόφιος.) 1. The father of Scamandrius. (Hom. Il. v. 49.)

2. A son of Crissus and Antiphateia, and husband of Cydragora, Anaxibia or Astyocheia, by whom he became the father of Astydameia and Pylades. (Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 33; Paus. ii. 29. § 4; Pind. Pyth. xi. 35.)

3. A son of Pylades and Electra. Paus. ii. 16. in fin.) [L. S.]

STRUCTUS, a cognomen in the Servilia gens, almost always occurs in connection with those of AHALA or of PRISCUS, under which the Structi are given. The only Structus who is mentioned with this cognomen alone, is Sp. Servilus Structus, who was consular tribune in B. C. 368.

STRUTHAS (Στρούθας), a Persian, was sent by Artaxerxes II. (Mnemon), in B. C. 392, to supersede Tiribazus in the satrapy of Western Asia. Recollecting the successful Asiatic campaigns of Agesilaus, Struthas had a strong conviction of the formidable power of the Spartans, and therefore on his arrival took part warmly with the Athenians. The Lacedaemonian government sent out Thibron to act against him; but this officer suffered himself to be surprised by Struthas, and was slain in an engagement in which his army was defeated by the Persians. Diphridas was then despatched to take the command of the Spartan forces, and was more successful in his operations against Struthas. [DIPHRIDAS.] (Xen. Hell. iv. 8. §§ 17—21.) By the year 388 B. C. we find Tiribazus again in possession of his satrapy. (Xen. Hell. v. 1. § 6.) [E. E.]

STRYMON (Στρυμών), a son of Oceanus and Tethys, was a river god of Thrace, and is called a king of Thrace. (Hes. Theog. 339; Conon, Narr. 4; Anton. Lib. 21.) By Euterpe or Calliope, he became the father of Rhesus (Apollod. i. 3. § 4; Eurip. Rhes. 347), and by Neaera of Euadne. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 2.) [L. S.]

STUDITA (JOSEPHUS). Under the article JOSEPHUS we gave references to this article from the following Josephi: — No. 5, CONFESSOR; No. 14, of SICILY; No. 15, STUDITA; and No. 16, of THESSALONICA. We were led to do this by the authority of Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 79), who has confounded Josephus, the brother of Theodorus Studita, with Josephus Siculus. On further examination we have found that they were distinct persons, and therefore give them here distinctly.

1. JOSEPHUS STUDITA (i. e. monk of the convent of Studium, τῶν Στουδίου, at Constantinople), brother of Theodore Studita is further known by the titles of Joseph the CONFESSOR (ὁ ὁμολογητὴς Ἰωσήφ) and Joseph of THESSALONICA. His parents, Photinus and Theoctista, appear to have been resident at or near Constantinople: and Joseph and his brother Theodore were monks in the convent of Studium (Anonym. De Monasterio Studii, apud Pagi, Critice in Baronii Annales, ad ann. 814, c. xvi.), of which Theodore was afterwards abbot, and which was then eminent for the reputed sanctity of its inmates In a eulogistic notice of Joseph in the Menologium Basilianum (pars iii. p. 167, fol. Urbin. 1727), Joseph is said to have lived in the time of the emperor Theophilus, and to have been elected archbishop of Thessalonica with unanimous approval, on account of his recognised excellence of character. It appears, however, that his appointment was long antecedent to the reign of Theophilus; and that it was by no means unexceptionable; for when his quarrel with the patriarch Nicephorus had brought him into trouble, he had to defend himself against the charge of having improperly thrust himself into his see; and his defence seems to admit that the objection was not altogether groundless (Baron. Annales Eccles. ad ann. 808, xvii. &c.). In what year he became archbishop is not clear; but in A. D. 809, if we adopt the chronology of Baronius who follows Theophanes, he was deposed, exiled, and imprisoned (ibid. ad ann. 809, viii. xlvi.; Theophan. Chronog. p. 409, ed. Paris, p. 325, ed. Venice, p. 752, ed. Bonn; Cedren. Compend. p. 478, ed. Paris, vol. ii. p. 36, ed. Bonn). The occasion of this severe treatment was his refusal to communicate with the patriarch Nicephorus of Constantinople, because the latter had restored to the office of oeconomus or steward of the great church at Constantinople, the presbyter Joseph, who had officiated at the marriage of the emperor Constantine VI. with the harlot Theodote or Theodata, in A. D. 795 [CONSTANTINUS VI.]; but it is probable that the quarrel was embittered by the iconoclastic controversy, and that the ejected prelate was regarded as a confessor for the truth rather than a sufferer in a squabble about an individual.

Soon after the accession of the emperor Michael I. Rhangabe, Joseph recovered his liberty and his see (Theophan. Chronog. p. 419, ed. Paris, p. 333, ed. Venice, p. 770, ed. Bonn; Zonaras, Annales, lib. xv. c. 17). When the iconoclastic party, under the patronage of Leo V. the Armenian, regained the ascendancy, Joseph was among the champions and sufferers in the cause of images. He was confined in an island, apparently one of those in the Propontis, in one of which he had been before confined in A. D. 809 (Theodor. Studit. Epistola, apud Baron. Annales, ad ann. 815. xi. 816. xliv. &c.). It is mentioned in the life of St. Nicetas, the Bithynian confessor, that Joseph attended at his funeral, which may be fixed in A. D. 824 (Acta Sanctor. April, vol. i. pp. 253, 265, and Appendix, p. xxxii.). Nothing seems to be known of him after this, unless we accept as true the statement of the Menologium Basilianum (l. c.), that he was imprisoned by the emperor Theophilus for refusing to renounce the adoration of images, and died in prison. But the statement is rendered doubtful by the addition that, at the time when he was put in prison, his brother Theodore was banished: for Theodore died in A. D. 826, three years before the accession of Theophilus; so that the account is, at any rate, inaccurate; and whether there is any truth in it can hardly be now ascertained. It is not certain that Joseph lived to the accession of the emperor. He was dead before, and apparently long before 844, in which year the relics of Theodore Studita were transferred with great pomp to the church of the Precursor (sc. John the Baptist), in the monastery of Studium, where those of Joseph were already reposing (Vita S. Nicolai Studitae, apud Acta Sanctorum Februar. vol. i. p. 547). There are some writings of Joseph extant. Baronius has given (Annal. ad ann 808, xviii. xix.) a Latin version of an Epistola ad Simeonem Monachum, or probably of a part of it; and Gretserus, in his collection De Cruce, has given, with a Latin version and notes, Λόγος εἰς τὸν τίμιον καὶ ζωοποιὸν σταυρὸν τοῦ ὁμολογητοῦ Ἰωσὴφ ἀρχιεπισκόπου Θεσσαλονίκης, Oratio in venerandam et vivificam Crucem Confessoris Josephi Archiepiscopi Thessalonicensis (Gretser. Opera, vol. ii. p. 85, &c., fol. Ratisbon, 1734). Joseph of Thessalonica appears to have written several Canones or hymns, but it is not easy to distinguish these from the Canones of the other Joseph mentioned below (No. 2). (Acta Sanctorum, Aprilis, vol. i. p. 268, Julii, vol. iii. p. 710; Lambec. Commentarius de Biblioth. Caesaraea, vol. v. col. 564, 576, 721, ed. Kollar; Oudin, De Scriptoribus Eccles. vol. ii. col. 24, &c.; Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, vol. ii. col. 43, &c.; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 808, vol. ii. p. 6, ed. Oxford, 1740—1743; Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. x. p. 248, vol. xi. p. 79.)

2. JOSEPHUS HYMNOGRAPHUS (ὁ Ὑμναγράφος), or MELODUS, or CANONUM SCRIPTOR (ὁ ποιητὴς τῶν κανόνων), or of SICILY. This Josephus lived a little later than the preceding. He was a Sicilian by birth, the son of Plotinus or Plutinus (Πλουτῖνος), and Agatha, persons apparently of some property, and of eminent piety. They were compelled, in consequence of the ravages of the Saracens in Sicily, to flee into the Peloponnesus; and Joseph, fearing lest their altered circumstances would interfere with his desire of leading a monastic life, left them, and, while yet a lad, repaired to Thessalonica, and became an inmate of the convent of Latomus, where he became eminent for his ascetic practices and for the fluency and gracefulness of his utterance; "so that he easily," says his biographer, "threw the fabled sirens into the shade." Having been ordained presbyter, he accompanied to Constantinople Gregory of Decapolis, who there became one of the leaders of the "orthodox" party, in their struggle with the iconoclastic emperor, Leo the Armenian, which began in A. D. 814. From Constantinople Joseph repaired, at the desire of this Gregory, to Rome, to solicit the support of the pope; but falling into the hands of pirates, was by them carried away to Crete. Here he remained till the death of Leo the Armenian (A. D. 820), when he was, as his biographer asserts, miraculously delivered, and conveyed to Constantinople. On his return he found his friend and leader, Gregory, dead, and attached himself to another leader, John, on whose death he procured that his body and that of Gregory should be transferred to the deserted church of St. John Chrysostom, in connection with which he established a monastery, that was soon, by the attractiveness of his eloquence, filled with inmates. After this he was, for his strenuous defence of image worship, banished to Chersonae, apparently by the emperor Theophilus, who reigned from A. D. 829 to 842: but, on the death of the emperor, was recalled from exile by the empress Theodora, and obtained, through the favour of the patriarch Ignatius, the office of sceuophylax, or keeper of the sacred vessels in the great church of Constantinople. Joseph was equally acceptable to Ignatius and to his competitor and successor Photius [IGNATIUS, No. 3; PHOTIUS, No. 3]. He died at an advanced age, in A. D. 883. The chronology of his life has been much perplexed by the interpolation of the notices of him in some MS. of the Greek Synaxaria, by which interpolations the emperor Leo the Armenian [LEO V.], in whose reign Joseph attempted to go to Rome, has been confounded with Leo the Isaurian [LEO III.], who reigned nearly a century before. Joseph is chiefly celebrated as a writer of Canones or Hymni, of which several are extant in MS.; but there is some difficulty in distinguishing his compositions from those of Joseph of Thessalonica [No. 1]. His Canones in omnia Beatae Virginis Mariae festa, and his Theotocia, hymns in honour of the Virgin, scattered through the ecclesiastical books of the Greeks, were published, with a learned commentary, and a life of Joseph, translated from the Greek of Joannes or John the Deacon, by Ippolito Maracci, under the title of Mariale S. Josephi Hymnographi, 8vo. Rome, 1661. The version of the life of Joseph was by Luigi Maracci of Lucca, the brother of Ippolito. Another Latin version of the same life but less exact, by the Jesuit Floritus, was published among the Vitae Sanctorum Siculorum of Octavius Cajetanus (Ottavio Gaetano), vol. ii. p. 43, fol. Palermo 1657, and reprinted in the Acta Sanctorum (vid. infra).

Some writers have supposed that there was a third Joseph, a writer of hymns, mentioned in the title of a MS. Typicon at Rome, as of the Monastery of St. Nicolaus Casularum (τῶν κασούλων); but there seems reason to think that this Joseph was the subject of the present article; and that the Monastery of St. Nicolaus was the one built by him, adjacent to the deserted Church of St. John Chrysostom. (Vita S. Josephi Hymnographi, in the Acta Sanctorum, Aprilis, a. d. iii. vol. i. p. 269, &c., with the Commentarius Praevius of Papebroche, and Appendix, p. xxxiv.; Fabricius, Biblioth. Graec. vol. xi. p. 79, Menologium Graecorum, jussu Basilii Imperatoris editum, a. d. iii. Aprilis, fol. Urbino, 1727. [J. C. M.]

STYMPHA'LIDES (Στυμφαλίδες), the celebrated rapacious birds near the Stymphalian lake in Arcadia, whence they were driven by Heracles and compelled to take refuge in the island of Aretias in the Euxine, where they were afterwards found by the Argonauts. They are described in different ways, but most commonly as voracious birds of prey, which attacked even men, and which were armed with brazen wings, from which they could shoot out their feathers like arrows. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 2; Paus. viii. 22. § 4; Hygin. Fab. 30; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1053.) They are said to have been brought up by Ares. (Serv. ad Aen. viii. 300.) According to Mnaseas (ap. Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1054), they were not birds, but women and daughters of Stymphalus and Ornis, and were killed by Heracles because they did not receive him hospitably. In the temple of the Stymphalian Artemis, however, they were represented as birds, and behind the temple there were white marble statues of maidens with birds' feet. (Paus. viii. 22. § 5.) [L. S.]

ST'YMPHALUS (Στύμφαλος). 1. A son of Lycaon. (Apollod. iii. 8. § 1.)

2. A son of Elatus and Laodice, a grandson of Arcas, and father of Parthenope, Agamedes, and Gortys. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8, iii. 9. § 1; Paus. viii. 4. § 3, 22. § 1.) Pelops, who was unable to conquer him in war, murdered him by stratagem, and cut his body in pieces. For this crime Greece was visited with a famine, which however was averted by the prayer of Aeacus. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 6.) [L. S.]

STYPAX or STIPAX, of Cyprus, a statuary, to whom Pliny ascribes the execution of a celebrated statue called Splanchnoptes, because it represented a person roasting the entrails of the victim at a sacrifice, and blowing the fire with his breath. (H. N. xxxiv. 8. 19. s. 21.) According to Pliny, the person represented was a slave of Pericles, evidently the same as the one of whom he elsewhere relates the story, that he fell from the summit of the Parthenon, but was healed by the virtue of a herb which Minerva showed to Pericles in a dream (H. N. xxii. 17. s. 20), a story which Plutarch tells of the architect MNESICLES. Among the recent discoveries on the Acropolis, fragments have been found which Ross supposes to have belonged to the base of the Splanchnoptes, and he has put forth the conjecture that the name Stipax in Pliny is only a corruption of STRABAX; but these matters are too doubtful and intricate to be discussed here. (Ross, in the Kunstblatt, 1840, No. 37, and in Gerhard's Archäol. Zeitung, 1844, p. 243.) [P. S.]

STYX (Στύξ), connected with the verb στυγέω, to hate or abhor, is the name of the principal river in the nether world, around which it flows seven times. (Hom. Il. ii. 755, viii. 369, xiv. 271; Virg. Georg. iv. 480, Aen. vi. 439.) Styx is described as a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys (Hes. Theog. 361; Apollod. i. 2. § 2; Callim. Hymn. in Jov. 36), and as a nymph she dwelt at the entrance of Hades, in a lofty grotto which was supported by silver columns. (Hes. Theog. 778.) As a river Styx is described as a branch of Oceanus, flowing from its tenth source (789), and the river Cocytus again is a branch of the Styx. (Hom. Od. x. 511.) By Pallas Styx became the mother of Zelus (zeal), Nice (victory), Bia (strength), and Cratos (power). She was the first of all the immortals that took her children to Zeus, to assist him against the Titans; and, in return for this, her children were allowed for ever to live with Zeus, and Styx herself became the divinity by whom the most solemn oaths were sworn. (Hes. Theog. 383; Hom. Od. v. 185, xv. 37; Apollod. i. 2. § 5; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 191; Virg. Aen. vi. 324, xii. 816; Ov. Met. iii. 290; Sil. Ital. xiii. 568.) When one of the gods was to take an oath by Styx, Iris fetched a cup full of water from the Styx, and the god, while taking the oath, poured out the water. (Hes. Theog 775.) Zeus became by her the father of Persephone (Apollod. i. 3. § 1), and Peiras the father of Echidna. (Paus. viii. 18. § 1.) [L. S.]

SUADA, the Roman personification of persuasion, the Greek Peitho (Πειθώ). She is also called by the diminutive Suadela. (Horat. Epist. i. 6. 38; Cic. Brut. 15, Cat. Maj. 11.) [L. S.]

SU'BRIUS FLA'VIUS or FLAVUS. [FLAVUS.]

SU'BULO, P. DE'CIUS, was one of the triumvirs for settling new colonists at Aquileia, in B. C. 169; and he is probably the same as the P. Decius, who was sent to Rome in the following year by the praetor L. Anicius, to announce his victory over the Illyrians and his capture of king Gentius. (Liv. xliii. 17, xlv. 3.)

SUE'DIUS CLEMENS, was with two others placed by Otho over the troops who were to attack Gallia Narbonensis. (Tac. Hist. i. 87, ii. 12.)

L. SUE'TIUS, one of the witnesses against Verres, when he was accused by Cicero. (Cic. Verr. i. 5, ii. 12, v. 47.)

SUETO'NIUS LENIS. [SUETONIUS TRANQUILLUS]

SUETO'NIUS OPTATIA'NUS, wrote the life of the emperor Tacitus. (Vopisc. Tac. 11.)

SUETO'NIUS PAULI'NUS. [PAULINUS.]

C. SUETO'NIUS TRANQUILLUS. The little that is known of Suetonius is derived from his lives of the Caesars and the letters of his friend, the younger Plinius.

He states that he was a young man (adolescens) twenty years after the death of Nero (Nero, c. 57.), and Nero died A. D. 68. Accordingly he may have been born a few years after Nero's death. In his life of Domitian (c. 12) he speaks of being present at a certain affair, as adolescentulus. It appears from various passages in his work that he might have received oral information about the emperors who lived before he was born, at least Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero. His father Suetonius Lenis (Otho, c. 10), a tribune of the thirteenth legion, was in the battle of Bebriacum or Bedriacum, in which Otho was defeated by Vitellius. The words Lenis and Tranquillus have the same meaning; but there may be some doubt about the reading Lenis, in the passage in the life of Otho. In the collection of the letters of the younger Plinius there are several to Suetonius Tranquillus, from one of which (i. 18) it appears that Suetonius was then a young man and entering on the career of an advocate. In another letter (i. 24) he speaks of his friend Tranquillus wishing to buy a small estate, such as suited a man of studious habits, enough to amuse him, without occupying him too much. Suetonius does not appear to have been desirous of public employment, for he requested Plinius to transfer to a relation, Caesennius Silvanus, a tribuneship, which Plinius had obtained for Suetonius (iii. 8). In a letter of uncertain date (v. 11) Plinius urges Suetonius to publish his works (scripta), but without giving any intimation what the works were; Plinius says that he had already recommended the works of Suetonius in some hendecasyllabic verses, and jocularly expresses his danger of being called on to produce them by legal process (ne cogantur ad exhibendum formulam accipere). In a letter to Trajanus (x. 95) Plinius commends to the emperor the integrity and learning of Suetonius, who had become his intimate friend, and he says that he liked him the better, the more he knew him: he requested the emperor to grant Suetonius the jus trium liberorum, for though Suetonius was married he had no children, or at least had not the number of three, which was necessary to relieve him from various legal disabilities. The emperor granted the privilege to Suetonius.

Suetonius became Magister Epistolarum to Hadrianus, a situation which would give him the opportunity of seeing many important documents relating to the emperors. In a passage in the life of Augustus (c. 7) Suetonius makes mention of his having given to the Princeps a bronze bust which represented Augustus when a boy. The critics generally assume that the Princeps was Hadrianus; but it is immaterial whether it was Hadrianus or Trajanus, so far as concerns the biography of Suetonius. Hadrianus, who was apparently of a jealous disposition, deprived of their offices at the same time, Septicius Clarus, who was Praefectus Praetorio, Suetonius Tranquillus, and many others, on the ground of associating with Sabina the emperor's wife, without his permission, and apparently during the emperor's absence in Britain, on terms of more familiarity than was consistent with respect to the imperial household. (Spartian. Hadrian. c. 11).

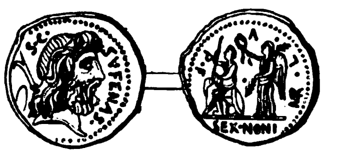
Suetonius wrote many works, a list of which is given in Suidas (s. v. Τράγκυλλος), De Ludis Graecorum, lib. i.; De Spectaculis et Certaminibus Romanorum, libri ii.; De Anno Romano, lib. i.; De Notis, on the notae or marks used in writing, which may have been a treatise on the Roman short hand; De Ciceronis Republica; De Nominibus propriis et de Generibus Vestium; De Vocibus mali ominis; De Roma ejusque Institutis et Moribus, libri ii.; Historiae Caesarum, libri Octo; Stemma illustrium Romanorum. He also wrote some other works of which fragments have been discovered: De Regibus, libri iii.; De Institutione Officiorum; De Rebus Variis; and others. There are still extant, and attributed to Suetonius, Vitae Duodecim Caesarum, or the twelve Imperators, of whom the first is C. Julius Caesar and the last is Domitian; Liber de illustribus Grammaticis; and Liber de claris Rhetoribus; neither of which is contained in the list of Suidas; Vita Terentii, Horatii, Persii, Lucani, Juvenalis, Plinii Majoris, which also are not included in the catalogue of Suidas.

The chief work of Suetonius is his lives of the Caesars which, as it appears, were sometimes distributed in eight books, as they are in some manuscripts. The authorities which he followed for the several lives have been diligently examined by Augustus Krause (De Suetonii Tranquilli Fontibus et Auctoritate, Berlin, 1841). Krause gives some reasons for supposing that Suetonius consulted the historical writings of Tacitus, and he argues, that as Tacitus did not write his annals before A. D. 117, in which year Hadrian succeeded Trajan, Suetonius did not write the lives of the Caesars before A. D. 120. This is not very satisfactory, though it must be admitted that there are many expressions in Suetonius, which closely resemble the expressions in Tacitus; and Suetonius, a grammarian (grammaticus), was likely enough to copy particular phrases. Indeed Suetonius often quotes Senatusconsulta and other documentary evidence in the very words, which Tacitus as a general rule did not. These lives of Suetonius are not and do not affect to be historical: they are rather anecdotical, and in the nature of Mémoires pour servir. His authorities are the writings of the Roman emperors themselves and those of their freedmen, Epistolae, Orationes, Testaments, and other documents of that kind; public documents, as Senatusconsulta, Fasti, inscriptions, and the Acta of the Senate and the people; also the Greek and Roman writers on Roman history. He also learned much from conversation with those who were older than himself, and he would know something of Titus and Domitian at least, as he was a young man during their reign. Suetonius does not follow the chronological order in his Lives, but he groups together many things of the same kind, as he says himself (Augustus, c. 9). His language is very brief and precise, sometimes obscure, without any affectation of ornament. He certainly tells a prodigious number of scandalous anecdotes about the Caesars, but there was plenty to tell about them; and if he did not choose to suppress those anecdotes which he believed to be true, that is no imputation on his veracity. As a great collection of facts of all kinds, the work on the Caesars is invaluable for the historian of this period. His judgment and his honesty have both been attacked by some modern critics; but we are of the same opinion as Krause that on both grounds a careful study of his work will justify him. The friendship of the younger Plinius is evidence in favour of the integrity of Suetonius, and Vopiscus, no great authority, it is true, calls him a most accurate and impartial writer (Flav. Vopisc. Firmus, c. 1; compare the Life of Probus, c. 2). Those who attack the credit of Suetonius must conduct the assault with more ability and judgment than H. Heisen in his absurd essay, entitled "Dissertatio de Imperatoria majestate a primis Historiae Augustae conditoribus indignissime habita." (Symbol. Litt. Bremen. tom. ii. iii.)

The treatise De Illustribus Grammaticis and that De Claris Rhetoribus are probably only parts of a larger work, for Hieronymus says in a letter to Desiderius, "I have written a treatise on illustrious men from the time of the Apostles to our own age, imitating therein Tranquillus and the Greek Apollonius." (Casaubon's note on the title of the work De Illustribus Grammaticis.) These two treatises contain a few biographical and other notices, that are occasionally useful. It has been conjectured that the few scanty lives of the Latin poets, already enumerated, belonged to a larger work De Poetis. If this conjecture be true, the short notice of the elder Plinius may not be by Suetonius, and Casaubon will not allow it to be his. But the opinion as to the book De Poetis is merely a conjecture. A work entitled De Viris Illustribus, which has been attributed both to Suetonius and the younger Plinius, is now unanimously assigned to Aurelius Victor.

The editions of Suetonius are very numerous. Before A. D. 1500, fifteen editions had appeared, a proof that the Lives of the Caesars were favourite reading. The oldest edition with a date is that of Rome, 1470, folio. The best of the early editions is that of I. Casaubon, Geneva, 1595, and Paris, 1610. A small edition by J. Schild, Leiden, 1647, contains a selection of useful notes. One of the most useful editions is that by P. Burmann, Amsterdam, 1736, 2 vols. 4to., with a selection of notes from the principal commentators, the fragments of Suetonius, inscriptions relating to the Caesars, tables of the coins of the Caesars, and a copious index. One of the latest editions is that of Baumgarten-Crusius, Leipzig, 1816, 3 vols. 8vo., which was again edited by C. B. Hase, Paris, 1828, 2 vols. 8vo.



There is an English translation of the Twelve Caesars by the industrious translator, Philemon Holland, London, 1606, folio. Besides these there are four other English translations, the last of which is by A. Thomson, London, 1796, 8vo., "with annotations and a review of the government and literature of the different periods." There are translations in Italian, French, Spanish, Dutch, German, and Danish.

SUFE'NAS, M. NO'NIUS, was tribune of the plebs in B. C. 56, and in conjunction with his colleagues C. Cato and Procilius, prevented the consular comitia from being held, in consequence of which an interregnum ensued and thus Pompey and Crassus were elected consuls. On account of their violent conduct in their tribunate Sufenas and his colleagues were brought to trial in B. C. 54; Procilius was condemned, but Sufenas and Cato were acquitted through the influence of Pompey. Sufenas was propraetor in B. C. 51, in one of the provinces in the neighbourhood of Cilicia, and on the breaking out of the civil war two years afterwards, he is mentioned as one of Pompey's generals. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 15. § 4, vi. 1. § 13, viii. 15. § 3.) He appears to be the same as the Nonius, who was present at the battle of Pharsalia, and who sought to encourage his party after their defeat by remarking that seven eagles were left in the camp of Pompey; when Cicero replied, "It would be very well if we were fighting with jack-daws." (Plut. Cic. 38.)

There are coins of one Sex. Nonius Sufenas, a specimen of which is subjoined. On the obverse is the head of Saturn and on the reverse a woman seated whom Victory is in the act of crowning. On the reverse we read SEX. NONI. PR. L. V. P. F; the latter letters are interpreted either praetor or primus ludos votivos publicos fecit. (Eckhel, vol. v. pp. 261, 262.)

SUIDAS (Σουΐδας). A Greek Lexicon is extant under the name of Suidas, but nothing is known of the compiler. A Suidas is mentioned by Strabo (p. 329, ed. Casaub.) as the author of a history of Thessaly, and this work is also cited by the scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius, and by Stephanus of Byzantium (s. vv. Ἄμυρος, Δωδώνη, Frag. Steph.). It is not likely that this Suidas is the author of the Lexicon; but no certain conclusion as to the age of the compiler can be derived from passages in the work, which undoubtedly were written long after the time of Stephanus of Byzantium, for the work may have received numerous interpolations and additions. Eustathius, who lived about the end of the twelfth century A. D., quotes the Lexicon of Suidas. The article Adam (Ἀδάμ) contains a chronological epitome, which ends with the emperor Joannes Zimisces, who died A. D. 974; and in the article Constantinople (Κωνσταντινούπολις) are mentioned Basilius the second, and Constantius, who succeeded Joannes Zimisces. A remark under the article Polyeuctus (Πολύευκτος) shows that the writer of that remark was contemporaneous with the Patriarch Polyeuctus (ἐγένετο καὶ καθ' ἡμᾶς πολύευκτος, &c.) who succeeded Theophylactus, A. D. 956 (note of Reinesius); but the date 936 is given by other authorities. This passage which Reinesius assumes to prove the period of the author of the Lexicon, merely proves the period of the writer who made the remark; and he may be either the author of the Lexicon or an interpolator. But there are passages in the Lexicon which refer even to a later date (s. vv. Γηώρος; Δέρτρου; Ἡγήτορες), for Michael Psellus is quoted, and Psellus lived at the close of the eleventh century A. D. (See the notes on these words in Gaisford's edition.)

The Lexicon of Suidas is a dictionary of words arranged in alphabetical order, with some few peculiarities of arrangement; but it contains both words which are found in dictionaries of languages, and also names of persons and places, with extracts from ancient Greek writers, grammarians, scholiasts, and lexicographers, and some extracts from later Greek writers. The names of persons comprehend both persons who are mentioned in sacred and in profane history, which shows that if the work is by one hand, it is by a Christian; but there is no inconsistency in supposing that the original of the Lexicon which now goes under the name of Suidas, is a work of earlier date even than the time of Stephanus of Byzantium, and that it received large accessions from some various hands. No well conceived plan has been the basis of this work: it is incomplete as to the number of articles, and exceedingly irregular and unequal in the execution. Some articles are pretty complete, others contain no information at all. As to the biographical notices it has been conjectured that Suidas or the compiler got them all from one source, which, it is further supposed, may be the Onomatologos or Pinax of Hesychius of Miletus; for it is said in Suidas (s. v. Ἡσύχιος), "of which this book is an epitome;" but it is an incorrect interpretation to conclude that Suidas means to say that his work is an epitome of the Onomatologos (or πίναξ τῶν ἐν παιδείᾳ ὀνομαστῶν), which would be manifestly false: he means to say that the work in use at the time when he wrote was an epitome of the Onomatologos.

The scholiast on Aristophanes has been freely used in the compilation of this Lexicon. The extracts from ancient Greek writers are very numerous, but the names of the writers are frequently omitted. These extracts have sometimes no reference to the title of the article, and have no application to it; a circumstance probably owing to numerous interpolations made in the manuscript copies of the Lexicon. A want of criticism pervades the whole work, or rather excessive carelessness, as in the case of the name Severus (Σεβῆρος, and Küster's note). The article Alyattes (Ἀλυάττης) is another instance, and there are others of a like kind.

There is prefixed to the editions of Suidas the following notice: —Τὸ μὲν παρὸν βιβλίον Σουΐδα, οἱ δὲ συνταξάμενοι τοῦτο ἄνδρες σόφοι, which is followed by a list of twelve names. As to this title, see the remarks of Harles.

The Lexicon of Suidas, though without merit as to its execution, is valuable both for the literary history of antiquity, for the explanation of words, and for the citations from many ancient writers; and a prodigious amount of critical labour has been bestowed upon it. Many emendations have been made on the text by Toup and others.

The first edition of Suidas was by Demetrius Chalcondylas, Milan, 1499, fol., without a Latin version. The second, by the elder Aldus, Venice, 1514, fol., is also without a Latin version: this edition was reprinted by Froben, Bâle, 1544, fol., with some corrections. The first Latin translation of Suidas was made by Hieron. Wolf, Bâle, 1564, 1581, fol. The first edition, which contained both the Greek text and a Latin version, was by Aemilius Portus, Geneva, 1619, 2 vols. fol., and 1630, with a new title. The Latin version is said to be better than Wolf's.

The edition of L. Küster appeared at Cambridge, 1705, 3 vols. folio. The basis of this edition is not the Editio Princeps, but that of Portus. Küster corrected the text with the aid of the MSS., added numerous good notes, and improved the version of Portus. But he dealt with the Greek text rather in an arbitrary way, and rejected all that he considered to be interpolated. J. Gronovius made an attack on Küster's edition, to which Küster replied. The preface of Küster contains a dissertation on Suidas.

The edition of Suidas by T. Gaisford, in three handsome volumes folio, appeared at Oxford in 1834. The first two volumes contain the text without a Latin version, and the notes, which are chiefly selected from Küster and others. The third volume contains "Index Kusterianus Rerum et Nominum Propriorum quae extra seriem suam in Suidae Lexico occurrunt;" "Index Glossarum Personarum Verborumque notatu digniorum;" and "Index Scriptorum a Suida citatorum." In his preface Gaisford states, that he used nearly the same MSS. as Küster, but that Küster was careless in noting the readings of the MSS. Gaisford has given the various readings of the best MS., and those of the edition of Chalcondylas. Küster adopted many of the emendations of Portus without acknowledgment, and he is accused generally of borrowing without owning where he got his matter from.

The edition of G. Bernhardy, 4to. Halle, 1834, contains a Latin version. It is founded on the edition of Gaisford, as appears from the title — "Gr. & Lat. ad fidem optimorum librorum exactum, post Th. Gaisford recens. et adnot. critic. instruxit Gdf. Bernhardy."

There are said to be two unpublished extracts from an epitome of Suidas, by Thomas of Crete, and by Macarius Hieromonachus, the brother of Nicephorus Gregoras. As to the Latin translation of Suidas, said to have been made by Robert Grosstete, bishop of Lincoln, who died in 1253, see Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 402. [G. L.]

SUI'LLIUS CAESONI'NUS. [CAESONINUS.]

SUI'LLIUS NERULI'NUS. [NERULINUS.]

SUI'LLIUS RUFUS. [RUFUS.]

SULCA, Q. BAE'BIUS, one of the Roman ambassadors, sent to Ptolemy in Egypt, in B. C. 173. (Liv. xlii. 6.)

SULLA, the name of a patrician family of the Cornelia gens. This family was originally called Rufinus [RUFINUS], and the first member of it who obtained the name of Sulla was P. Cornelius Sulla, who was flamen dialis and praetor in the second Punic war. [See below, No. 1.] This was stated by the dictator Sulla, in the second book of his Commentaries (Gell. i. 12), and is corroborated by Livy and other authorities. Plutarch therefore has made a mistake in saying that the dictator Sulla had this name given to him from a personal peculiarity. (Plut. Sull. 2.) The origin of the name is uncertain. Drumann, and most modern writers, suppose that it is a word of the same signification as Rufus or Rufinus, and refers simply to the red colour of the hair or the complexion; and Plutarch appears to have understood the word to have this meaning, since he relates (l. c.) that the dictator received the name of Sulla in consequence of his face being spotted with rough red blotches interspersed with the white. Macrobius (Sat. i. 17) gives quite a different explanation, and derives the word from Sibylla, which he says was given to P. Cornelius Rufinus, because he was the first to introduce the celebration of the Ludi Apollinares in accordance with the commands of the Sibylline books, and that this surname Sibylla was afterwards shortened into Sylla. This explanation of the word is repeated by Charisius (Inst. Gram. i. 20); but, independent of other objections, it must be rejected on the authority of Quintilian (i. 4. § 25), who classes Sulla with other cognomens, which owed their origin to certain bodily peculiarities. Some modern writers, such as Cortius (ad Sall. Catil. 5), regard Sulla as a diminutive of Sura, which was a cognomen in several Roman gentes [SURA], and we are disposed to accept this as the most probable explanation of the word. It would be formed from Sura on the same analogy as puella from puera, and tenellus from tener (comp. Schneider, Elementarlehre der lateinischen Sprache, vol. i. p. 47, &c.). There is no authority for writing the word Sylla, as is done by many modern writers. On coins and inscriptions we always find Sula or Sulla, never Sylla.

1. P. CORNELIUS (RUFINUS) SULLA, the great-grandfather of the dictator Sulla, and the grandson of P. Cornelius Rufinus, who was twice consul in the Samnite wars. [RUFINUS, CORNELIUS, No. 2.] His father is not mentioned. He was, as has been already mentioned, the first of the family who bore the surname of Sulla. He was flamen dialis, and likewise praetor urbanus and peregrinus in B. C. 212. The praetor of the preceding year, M. Attilius, had handed over to him certain sacred verses of the seer Marcius, partly referring to the past and partly to the future, and which commanded the Romans, among other things, to institute an annual festival in honour of Apollo. Upon this the senate ordered the decemviri to consult the Sibylline books, and as these gave the same command, Sulla presided over the first Ludi Apollinares, which were celebrated this year in the circus maximus. (Liv. xxv. 2, 3, 12, 15, 32, 41.)

2. P. CORNELIUS SULLA, the son of No. 1, and the grandfather of the dictator Sulla, was praetor in B. C. 186, when he obtained Sicily as his province. (Liv. xxxix. 6, 8.)

3. SER. CORNELIUS SULLA, the brother of No. 2, was one of the ten commissioners, who was sent by the senate into Macedonia, in B. C. 167, after the conquest of Perseus, in order to arrange the affairs of that country, in conjunction with L. Aemilius Paulus. (Liv. xlv. 17.)

4. L. CORNELIUS SULLA, the son of No. 2, and the father of the dictator Sulla, lived in obscurity, and left his son only a slender fortune. (Plut. Sull. 1.)

5. L. CORNELIUS SULLA FELIX, the dictator, was born in B. C. 138. Like most other great men, he was the architect of his own fortunes. He possessed neither of the two great advantages which secured for the Roman nobles easy access to the honours of the commonwealth, an illustrious ancestry and hereditary wealth. His father had left him so small a property that he paid for his lodgings very little more than a freedman who lived in the same house with him. But still his means were sufficient to secure for him a good education. He studied the Greek and Roman literature with diligence and success, and appears early to have imbibed that love for literature and art by which he was distinguished throughout his life. At the same time that he was cultivating his mind, he was also indulging his senses. He passed a great part of his time in the company of actors and actresses; he was fond of wine and women; and he continued to pursue his pleasures with as much eagerness as his ambitious schemes down to the time of his death. He possessed all the accomplishments and all the vices which the old Cato had been most accustomed to denounce, and he was one of those patterns of Greek literature and of Greek profligacy who had begun to make their appearance at Rome in Cato's time, and had since become more and more common among the Roman nobles. But Sulla's love of pleasure did not absorb all his time, nor did it emasculate his mind; for no Roman during the latter days of the republic, with the exception of Julius Caesar, had a clearer judgment, a keener discrimination of character, or a firmer will. The truth of this the following history will abundantly prove.

The slender property of Sulla was increased by the liberality of his step-mother and of a courtezan named Nicopolis, both of whom left him all their fortune. His means, though still scanty for a Roman noble, now enabled him to aspire to the honours of the state, and he accordingly became a candidate for the quaestorship, to which he was elected for the year B. C. 107. He was ordered to carry over the cavalry to the consul C. Marius, who had just taken the command of the Jugurthine war in Africa. Marius was not well pleased that a quaestor had been assigned to him, who was only known for his profligacy, and who had had no experience in war; but the zeal and energy with which Sulla attended to his new duties soon rendered him a useful and skilful officer, and gained for him the unqualified approbation of his commander, notwithstanding his previous prejudices against him. He was equally successful in winning the affections of the soldiers. He always addressed them with the greatest kindness, seized every opportunity of conferring favours upon them, was ever ready to take part in all the jests of the camp, and at the same time never shrunk from sharing in all their labours and dangers. Sulla, doubtless, had already the consulship before his eyes, and thus early did he show that he possessed the great secret of a man's success in a free state, the art of winning the affections of his fellow-men. He distinguished himself at the battle of Cirta, in which Jugurtha and Bocchus were defeated; and when the latter entered into negotiations with Marius, for the purpose of delivering the Numidian king into the hands of the Romans, the consul sent Sulla to Bocchus to bring the matter to a conclusion. It was chiefly owing to the influence which Sulla had acquired over the mind of Bocchus, that the latter, after much hesitation, was eventually persuaded to sacrifice his ally. Sulla carried Jugurtha in chains to the camp of Marius. [JUGURTHA.] The quaestor shared with the consul the glory of bringing this war to a conclusion; and Sulla himself was so proud of his share in the success, that he had a seal ring engraved, representing the surrender of Jugurtha, which he continued to wear till the day of his death.

Italy was now threatened with an invasion by the vast hordes of the Cimbri and Teutones, who had already destroyed several Roman armies. Marius was accordingly again raised to the consulship, which he held for four years in succession, B. C. 104—101. In the first of these years Sulla served under Marius as legate, and in the second as tribunus militum, and in each year gained great distinction by his military services. But towards the end of B. C. 103, or the beginning of B. C. 102, the good understanding which had hitherto prevailed between Marius and Sulla was interrupted, the former being jealous, says Plutarch, of the rising fame of his officer. Sulla accordingly left Marius in B. C. 102, in order to serve under his colleague Q. Catulus, with whom he had still greater opportunities of gaining distinction, as Catulus was not much of a general, and was therefore willing to entrust the chief management of the war to Sulla. The latter reduced several Alpine tribes to subjection, and took such good care to keep his troops supplied with provisions, that on one occasion he was able to relieve the army of Marius as well as his own, a circumstance which, as Sulla said in his memoirs, greatly annoyed Marius. Sulla fought in the decisive battle, by which the barbarians were destroyed in B. C. 101. [CATULUS, No. 3; MARIUS, p. 956.]

Sulla now returned to Rome, and appears to have lived quietly for some years without taking any part in public affairs. He became a candidate for the praetorship for the year B. C. 94, but failed. According to his own statement he lost his election because the people were disappointed at his not having previously offered himself for the aedileship, since they had been looking forward to a splendid exhibition of African wild beasts in the aedilician games of the friend of Bocchus. In the following year, however, he was more successful. He distributed money among the people with a liberal hand, and thus gained the praetorship for B. C. 93. In this office he gratified the wishes of the people by exhibiting in the Ludi Apollinares a hundred African lions, who were put to death in the circus by archers whom Bocchus had sent for the purpose.

In the following year, B. C. 92, Sulla was sent as propraetor into Cilicia, and was especially commissioned by the senate to restore Ariobarzanes to his kingdom of Cappadocia, from which he had been expelled by Mithridates. Although Sulla had not the command of a large force, he met with complete success. He defeated Gordius, the general of Mithridates in Cappadocia, and placed Ariobarzanes again on the throne. His success attracted the attention of Arsaces, king of Parthia, who accordingly sent an embassy to him to solicit the alliance of the Roman people. Sulla was the first Roman general who had any official intercourse with the Parthians, and he received the ambassadors with the same pride and arrogance as the Roman generals were accustomed to exhibit to the representatives of all foreign powers. Soon after this interview Sulla returned to Rome, where he was threatened in B. C. 91 by C. Censorinus with an impeachment for malversation, but the accusation was dropped.

The enmity between Marius and Sulla now assumed a more deadly form. Sulla's ability and increasing reputation had already led the aristocratical party to look up to him as one of their leaders, and thus political animosity was added to private hatred. In addition to this Marius and Sulla were both anxious to obtain the command of the impending war against Mithridates; and the success which attended Sulla's recent operations in the East had increased his popularity, and pointed him out as the most suitable person for this important command. About this time Bocchus erected in the Capitol gilded figures, representing the surrender of Jugurtha to Sulla, at which Marius was so enraged that he could scarcely be prevented from removing them by force. The exasperation of both parties became so violent that they nearly had recourse to arms against each other; but the breaking out of the Social War, and the immediate danger to which Rome was now exposed, hushed all private quarrels, and made all parties fight alike for their own preservation and that of the republic. Never had Rome greater need of the services of all her generals, and Marius and Sulla both took an active part in the war against the common foe. But Marius was now advanced in years, and did not possess the same activity either of mind or body as his younger rival. He had therefore the deep mortification of finding that his achievements were thrown into the shade by the superior energy of his former quaestor, and that his fortune paled more and more before the rising sun. In B. C. 90 Sulla served as legate under the consul L. Caesar, but his most brilliant exploits were performed in the following year, when he was legate of the consul L. Cato. In this year he destroyed the Campanian town of Stabiae, defeated L. Cluentius near Pompeii, and reduced the Hirpini to submission. He next penetrated into the very heart of Samnium, defeated Papius Mutilus, the leader of the Samnites, and followed up his victory by the capture of Bovianum, the chief town of this people. While he thus earned glory by his enterprises against the enemy, he was equally successful in gaining the affections of his troops. He pardoned their excesses, and connived at their crimes; and even when they put to death Albinus, one of his legates and a man of praetorian rank, he passed over the offence with the remark that his soldiers would fight all the better, and atone for their fault by their courage. As the time for the consular comitia approached Sulla hastened to Rome, where he was elected, almost unanimously, consul for the year B. C. 88, with Q. Pompeius Rufus as his colleague.

The war against Mithridates had now become inevitable, and the Social War was not yet brought to a conclusion. The senate assigned to Sulla the command of the former, and to his colleague Pompeius the conduct of the latter. Marius, however, would not resign without a struggle to his hated rival the distinction which he had so long coveted; but before he could venture to wrest from Sulla the authority with which he had been entrusted by the senate, he felt it necessary to strengthen the popular party. This he resolved to effect by identifying his interests with those of the Italian allies, who had lately obtained the franchise. He found a ready instrument for his purpose in the tribune P. Sulpicius Rufus, a man of ability and energy, but overwhelmed with debt, and who hoped that the spoils of the Mithridatic war, of which Marius promised him a liberal share, would relieve him from his embarrassments. This tribune accordingly brought forward two rogations, one to recal from exile those persons who had been banished in accordance with the Lex Varia, on account of their having been accessory to the Marsic war, and another, by which the Italians, who had just obtained the franchise, were to be distributed among the thirty-five tribes. The Italians, when they were admitted to the citizenship, were formed into eight or ten new tribes, which were to vote after the thirty-five old ones, and by this arrangement they would rarely be called upon to exercise their newly-acquired rights. On the other hand, the proposal of Sulpicius would place the whole political power in their hands, as they far outnumbered the old Roman citizens, and would thus have an overwhelming majority in each tribe. If this proposition passed into a lex, it was evident that the new citizens out of gratitude would confer upon Marius the command of the Mithridatic war. To prevent the tribune from putting these rogations to the vote, the consuls declared a justitium, during which no business could be legally transacted. But Sulpicius was resolved to carry his point; with an armed band of followers he entered the forum and called upon the consuls to withdraw the justitium; and upon their refusal to comply with his demand, he ordered his satellites to draw their swords and fall upon the consuls. Pompeius escaped, but his son Quintus, who was also the son-in-law of Sulla, was killed. Sulla himself only escaped by taking refuge in the house of Marius, which was close to the forum, and in order to save his life he was obliged to remove the justitium.

Sulla quitted Rome and hastened to his army, which was besieging Nola. The city was now in the hands of Sulpicius and Marius, and the two rogations passed into laws without opposition, as well as a third, conferring upon Marius the command of the Mithridatic war. Marius lost no time in sending some tribunes to assume on his behalf the command of the army at Nola; but the soldiers, who loved Sulla, and who feared that Marius might lead another army to Asia, and thus deprive them of their anticipated plunder, stoned his deputies to death. Sulla found his soldiers ready to respond to his wishes; they called upon him to lead them to Rome, and deliver the city from the tyrants. He was moreover encouraged by favourable omens and dreams, to which he always attached great importance. He therefore hesitated no longer, but at the head of six legions broke up from his encampment at Nola, and marched towards the city. His officers, however, refused to serve against their country, and all quitted him with the exception of one quaestor. This was the first time that a Roman had ever marched at the head of Roman troops against the city. Marius was taken by surprise. Such was the reverence that the Romans entertained for law, that it seems never to have occurred to him or to his party that Sulla would venture to draw his sword against the state. Marius attempted to gain time for preparations by forbidding Sulla in the name of the state to advance any further. But the praetors who carried this command narrowly escaped being murdered by the soldiers; and Marius as a last resort offered liberty to the slaves who would join him. But it was all in vain. Sulla entered the city without much difficulty, and Marius took to flight with his son and a few followers. Sulla used his victory with moderation. He protected the city from plunder, and in order to restrain his troops he passed the night in the streets along with his colleague. Only Marius, Sulpicius, and ten others of his bitterest enemies were declared public enemies by the senate at his command, on the ground of their having disturbed the public peace, taken up arms against the consuls, and excited the slaves to freedom. Sulpicius was betrayed by one of his slaves and put to death; Marius and his son succeeded in escaping to Africa. [Marius, p. 957, b.]

Although Sulla had conquered Rome, he had neither the time, nor perhaps the power, to carry into execution any great organic changes in the constitution. His soldiers were impatient for the plunder of Asia; and he probably thought it advisable to attach them still more strongly to his person before he ventured to deprive the people of their power in the commonwealth. He therefore contented himself with repealing the Sulpician laws, and enacting that no matter should in future be brought before the people without the previous sanction of a senatusconsultum; for the statement of Appian (B. C. i. 59) that he now abolished the Comitia tributa, and filled up the members of the senate, is evidently erroneous, and refers to a later time. It appears, however, that he attempted at this time to give some relief to debtors by a lex unciaria, but the nature of which relief is uncertain from the mutilated condition of the passage in Festus (s. v.) who is the only writer that makes mention of this lex. Sulla sent forward his legions to Capua, that they might be ready to embark for Greece, but he himself remained in Rome till the consuls were elected for the following year. He recommended to the people Nonius, his sister's son, and Serv. Sulpicius. His candidates, however, were rejected, and the choice fell on Cn. Octavius, who belonged to the aristocratical party, but was a weak and irresolute man, and on L. Cinna, who was a professed champion of the popular side. Sulla did not attempt to oppose their election; to have recalled his legions to Rome would have been a dangerous experiment when the soldiers were so eager for the spoils of the East; and he therefore professed to be pleased that the people made use of the liberty he had granted them. He, however, took the vain precaution of making Cinna promise that he would make no attempt to disturb the existing order of things; but one of Cinna's first acts was to induce the tribune M. Virgilius to bring an accusation against Sulla as soon as his year of office had expired. Sulla, without paying any attention to this accusation, quitted Rome at the beginning of B. C. 87, and hastened to his troops at Capua, where he embarked for Greece, in order to carry on the war against Mithridates.

For the next four years Sulla was engaged in the prosecution of this war, the history of which is given under MITHRIDATES VI. and his general ARCHELAUS, and may therefore be dismissed here with a few words. Sulla landed at Dyrrhachium, and forthwith marched against Athens, which had become the head-quarters of the Mithridatic cause in Greece. After a long and obstinate siege, Athens was taken by storm on the 1st of March in the following year, B. C. 86; and in consequence of the insults which Sulla and his wife Metella had received from the tyrant Aristion, the city was given up to rapine and plunder. He next obtained possession of the Peiraeeus, which had been defended by Archelaus. Meantime Mithridates had sent fresh reinforcements to Archelaus, who concentrated all his troops in Boeotia. Sulla advanced against him, and defeated him in the neighbourhood of Chaeroneia with such enormous loss, that out of the 120,000 men with whom Archelaus had opened the campaign, he is said to have assembled only 10,000 at Chalcis in Euboea, where he had taken refuge. But while Sulla was carrying on the war with such success in Greece, his enemies had obtained the upper hand in Italy. The consul Cinna, who had been driven out of Rome by his colleague Octavius, soon after Sulla's departure from Italy, had entered it again with Marius at the close of the year. Both Cinna and Marius were appointed consuls B. C. 86, all the regulations of Sulla were swept away, his friends and adherents murdered, his property confiscated, and he himself declared a public enemy. It has frequently been made a subject of panegyric upon Sulla that he still continued to prosecute the war with Mithridates under these circumstances, and preferred the subjugation of the enemies of Rome to the gratification of his own revenge. But it must be recollected that an immediate peace with Mithridates would have discontented his soldiers; while by bringing the war to an honourable conclusion, he gratified his troops by plunder, attached them more and more to his person, and at the same time collected from the conquered cities vast sums of money for the prosecution of the war against his enemies in Italy. At the same time it is an undoubted proof of his sagacity and forethought that he knew how to bide his time. Most other men in his circumstances would have hurried back to Italy at once to crush their enemies, and thus have ruined themselves. Marius died seventeen days after he had entered upon his consulship, and was succeeded in the office by L. Valerius Flaccus, who was sent into Asia that he might prosecute the war at the same time against Mithridates and Sulla. Flaccus was murdered by his troops at the instigation of Fimbria, who now assumed the command, and who gained several victories over the generals of Mithridates in Asia, in B. C. 85. About the same time the new army, which Mithridates had again sent to Archelaus in Greece, was again defeated by Sulla in the neighbourhood of Orchomenus. These repeated disasters made Mithridates anxious for peace, but it was not granted by Sulla till the following year, B. C. 84, when he had crossed the Hellespont in order to carry on the war in that country. Sulla was now at liberty to turn his arms against Fimbria, who was with his army at Thyateira. The name of Sulla carried victory with it. The troops of Fimbria deserted their general, who put an end to his own life. Sulla now prepared to return to Italy. After exacting enormous sums from the wealthy cities of Asia, he left his legate, L. Licinius Murena, in command of the province of Asia, with two legions, and set sail with his own army to Athens. While preparing for his deadly struggle in Italy, he did not lose his interest in literature. He carried with him from Athens to Rome the valuable library of Apellicon of Teos, which contained most of the works of Aristotle and Theophrastus. [APELLICON.] During his stay at Athens, Sulla had an attack of gout, of which he was cured by the use of the warm springs of Aedepsus in Euboea. As soon as he recovered, he led his army to Dyrrhachium, and from thence crossed over to Brundusium in Italy.

Sulla landed at Brundusium in the spring of B. C. 83, in the consulship of L. Scipio and C. Norbanus. During the preceding year he had written to the senate, recounting the services he had rendered to the commonwealth from the time of the Jugurthine war down to the conquest of Mithridates, complaining of the ingratitude with which he had been treated, announcing his speedy return to Italy, and threatening to take vengeance upon his enemies and those of the republic. The senate, in alarm, sent an embassy to Sulla to endeavour to bring about a reconciliation between him and his enemies, and meantime ordered the consuls Cinna and Carbo to desist from levying troops, and making further preparations for war. Cinna and Carbo gave no heed to this command; they knew that a reconciliation was impossible, and resolved to carry over an army to Dalmatia, in order to oppose Sulla in Greece; but after one detachment of their troops had embarked, the remaining soldiers rose in mutiny, and murdered Cinna. The Marian party had thus lost their leader, but continued nevertheless to make every preparation to oppose Sulla, for they were well aware that he would never forgive them, and that their only choice lay between victory and destruction. Besides this the Italians were ready to support them, as these new citizens feared that Sulla would deprive them of the rights which they had lately obtained after so much bloodshed. The Marian party had every prospect of victory, for their troops far exceeded those of Sulla. According to Velleius Paterculus, they had 200,000 men in arms, while Sulla landed at Brundusium with only 30,000, or at the most 40,000 men. (Vell. Pat. ii. 24; Appian, B. C. i. 79.) But on the other hand, the popular party had no one of sufficient influence and military reputation to take the supreme command in the war; their vast forces were scattered about Italy, in different armies, under different generals; the soldiers had no confidence in their commanders, and no enthusiasm in their cause; and the consequence was, that whole hosts of them deserted to Sulla on the first opportunity. Sulla's soldiers, on the contrary, were veterans, who had frequently fought by each other's side, and had acquired that confidence in themselves and in their general which frequent victories always give to soldiers. Still if the Italians had remained faithful to the cause of the Marian party, Sulla would hardly have conquered, and therefore one of his first cares after landing at Brundusium was to detach them from his enemies. For this purpose he would not allow his troops to do any injury to the towns or fields of the Italians in his march from Brundusium through Calabria and Apulia, and he formed separate treaties with many of the Italian towns, by which he secured to them all the rights and privileges of Roman citizens which they then enjoyed. Among the Italians the Samnites continued to be the most formidable enemies of Sulla. They had not yet received the Roman franchise, because they had continued in arms down to this time, and they now joined the Marian party, not simply with the design of securing the supremacy for the latter, but with the hope of conquering Rome by their means, and then destroying for ever their hated oppressor. Thus this civil war became merely another phase of the Marsic war, and the struggle between Rome and Samnium for the supremacy of the peninsula was renewed after the subjection of the latter for more than two hundred years.

Sulla marched from Apulia into Campania without meeting with any resistance. It was in the latter country that he gained his first victory over the consul Norbanus, who was defeated with great loss, and obliged to take refuge in Capua. His colleague Scipio, who was at no great distance, willingly accepted a truce which Sulla offered him, although Sertorius warned him against entering into any negotiations, and his caution was justified by the event. By means of his emissaries Sulla seduced the troops of Scipio, who at length found himself deserted by all his soldiers, and was taken prisoner in his tent. Sulla, however, dismissed him uninjured. On hearing of this Carbo is said to have observed "that he had to contend in Sulla both with a lion and a fox, but that the fox gave him more trouble." Many distinguished Romans meantime had taken up arms on behalf of Sulla. Cn. Pompey had levied three legions for him in Picenum and the surrounding districts; and Q. Metellus Pius, M. Crassus, M. Lucullus, and several others offered their services as legates. It was not, however, till the following year, B. C. 82, that the struggle was brought to a decisive issue. The consuls of this year were Cn. Papirius Carbo and the younger Marius; the former of whom was entrusted with the protection of Etruria and Umbria, while the latter had to guard Rome and Latium. Sulla appears to have passed the winter at Campania. At the commencement of spring he advanced against the younger Marius, who had concentrated all his forces at Sacriportus, and defeated him with great loss. Marius took refuge in Praeneste, where he had previously deposited his military stores, and a great quantity of gold and silver which he had brought from the Capitol and other temples at Rome. Sulla followed him to Praeneste, and after leaving Q. Lucretius Ofella with a large force to blockade the town and compel it to a surrender by famine, he marched with the main body of his army to Rome. Marius was resolved not to perish unavenged, and accordingly before Sulla could reach Rome, he sent orders to L. Damasippus, the praetor, to put to death all his leading opponents. His orders were faithfully obeyed. Q. Mucius Scaevola, the pontifex maximus and jurist, P. Antistius, L. Domitius, and many other distingished men were butchered and their corpses thrown into the Tiber. Sulla entered the city without opposition; Damasippus and his adherents had previously withdrawn, and repaired to Carbo in Etruria. Sulla marched against Carbo, who had been previously opposed by Pompeius and Metellus. The history of this part of the war is involved in great obscurity. Carbo made two efforts to relieve Praeneste, but failed in each; and after fighting with various fortune against Pompey, Metellus, and Sulla, he at length embarked for Africa, despairing of further success in Italy. [For details see CARBO, No. 7.] Meantime Rome had nearly fallen into the hands of the enemy. The Samnites and Lucanians under Pontius Telesinus and L. Lamponius, after attempting to relieve Praeneste, resolved to march straight upon Rome, which had been left without any army for its protection. Sulla barely arrived in time to save the city. The battle was fought before the Colline gate; it was long and obstinately contested; the contest was not simply for the supremacy of a party; the very existence of Rome was at stake, for Telesinus had declared that he would raze the city to the ground. The left wing where Sulla commanded in person was driven off the field by the vehemence of the enemy's charge; but the success of the right wing, which was commanded by Crassus, enabled Sulla to restore the battle, and at length gain a complete victory. Fifty thousand men are said to have fallen on each side (Appian, B. C. i. 93). All the most distinguished leaders of the enemy either perished in the engagement or were taken prisoners and put to death. Among these was the brave Samnite Pontius Telesinus, whose head was cut off and carried under the walls of Praeneste, thereby announcing to the younger Marius that his last hope of succour was gone. To the Samnite prisoners Sulla showed no mercy. He was resolved to root out of the peninsula those heroic enemies of Rome. On the third day after the battle he collected all the Samnite and Lucanian prisoners in the Campus Martius, and ordered his soldiers to cut them down. The dying shrieks of so many victims frightened the senators, who had been assembled at the same time by Sulla in the temple of Bellona; but he bade them attend to what he was saying and not mind what was taking place outside, as he was only chastising some rebels, and he then quietly proceeded to finish his discourse. Praeneste surrendered soon afterwards. The Romans in the town were pardoned; but all the Samnites and Praenestines were massacred without mercy. The younger Marius put an end to his own life [MARIUS, No. 2]. The war in Italy was now virtually at an end, for the few towns which still held out had no prospect of offering any effectual opposition, and were reduced soon afterwards. In other parts of the Roman world the war continued still longer, and Sulla did not live to see its completion. The armies of the Marian party in Sicily and Africa were subdued by Pompey in the course of B. C. 82; but Sertorius in Spain continued to defy all the attempts of the senate to crush him, till his cowardly assassination by Perperna in B. C. 72. [SERTORIUS.]

Sulla was now master of Rome. He had not commenced the civil war, but had been driven to it by the mad ambition of Marius. His enemies had attempted to deprive him of the command in the Mithridatic war which had been legally conferred upon him by the senate; and while he was fighting the battles of the republic they had declared him a public enemy, confiscated his property, and murdered the most distinguished of his friends and adherents. For all these wrongs, Sulla had threatened to take the most ample vengeance; and he more than redeemed his word.

He resolved to extirpate root and branch the popular party. One of his first acts was to draw up a list of his enemies who were to be put to death, which list was exhibited in the forum to public inspection, and called a Proscriptio. It was the first instance of the kind in Roman history. All persons in this list were outlaws who might be killed by any one with impunity, even by slaves; their property was confiscated to the state, and was to be sold by public auction; their children and grandchildren lost their votes in the comitia, and were excluded from all public offices. Further, all who killed a proscribed person, or indicated the place of his concealment, received two talents as a reward, and whoever sheltered such a person was punished with death. Terror now reigned, not only at Rome, but throughout Italy. Fresh lists of the proscribed constantly appeared. No one was safe; for Sulla gratified his friends by placing in the fatal lists their personal enemies, or persons whose property was coveted by his adherents. An estate, a house, or even a piece of plate was to many a man, who belonged to no political party, his death warrant; for although the confiscated property belonged to the state, and had to be sold by public auction, the friends and dependents of Sulla purchased it at a nominal price, as no one dared to bid against them. Oftentimes Sulla did not require the purchase-money to be paid at all, and in many cases he gave such property to his favourites without even the formality of a sale. Metella, the wife of the dictator, and Chrysogonus his freedman, P. Sulla, M. Crassus, Vettius, and Sex. Naevius are especially mentioned among those who received such presents; and handsome Roman matrons, as likewise actors and actresses, were favoured in the same manner. The number of persons who perished by the proscriptions is stated differently, but it appears to have amounted to many thousands. At the commencement of these horrors Sulla had been appointed dictator. As both the consuls had perished, he caused the senate to elect Valerius Flaccus interrex, and the latter brought before the people a rogatio, conferring the dictatorship upon Sulla, for the purpose of restoring order to the republic, and for as long a time as he judged to be necessary. Thus the dictatorship was revived after being in abeyance for more than 120 years, and Sulla obtained absolute power over the lives and fortunes of all the citizens. This was towards the close of B. C. 81. Sulla's great object in being invested with the dictatorship was to carry into execution in a legal manner the great reforms which he meditated in the constitution and the administration of justice, by which he hoped to place the government of the republic on a firm and secure basis. He had no intention of abolishing the republic, and consequently he caused consuls to be elected for the following year, B. C. 81, and was elected to the office himself in B. C. 80, while he continued to hold the dictatorship.

At the beginning of the following year, B. C. 81, Sulla celebrated a splendid triumph on account of his victory over Mithridates. In a speech which he delivered to the people at the close of the gorgeous ceremony, he claimed for himself the surname of Felix, as he attributed his success in life to the favour of the gods. He believed himself to have been in particular under the protection of Venus, who had granted him victory in battle as well as in love. Hence, in writing to Greeks, he called himself Epaphroditus. All ranks in Rome bowed in awe before their master; and among other marks of distinction which were voted to him by the obsequious senate, a gilt equestrian statue was erected to his honour before the Rostra, bearing the inscription "Cornelio Sullae Imperatori Felici."

During the years B. C. 80 and 79, Sulla carried into execution his various reforms in the constitution, of which an account is given at the close of his life. But at the same time he adopted measures in order to crush his enemies more completely, and to consolidate the power of his party These measures require a few words of explanation, as they did not form a part of his constitutional reforms, though they were intended for the support of the latter. The first of these measures has been already mentioned, namely the destruction of his enemies by the proscription. He appears to have published his list of victims immediately after the defeat of the Samnites and Lucanians at the Colline gate, without communicating, as Plutarch says (Sull. 31), with any magistrate; but when he was dictator he proposed a law in the comitia centuriata, which ratified his proscriptions, and which is usually called Lex Cornelia de Proscriptione or De Proscriptis. By this law it was enacted that all proscriptions should cease on the 1st of June, B. C. 81. The lex Valeria, which conferred the dictatorship upon Sulla, gave him absolute power over the lives of Roman citizens, and hence Cicero says he does not know whether to call the proscription law a lex Valeria or lex Cornelia. (Cic. pro Rosc. Am. 43, 44, de Leg. Agr. iii. 2.)

Another of Sulla's measures, and one of still more importance for the support of his power, was the establishment of military colonies throughout Italy. The inhabitants of the Italian towns, which had fought against Sulla, were deprived of the full Roman franchise which had been lately conferred upon them, and were only allowed to retain the commercium: their land was confiscated and given to the soldiers who had fought under him. Twenty-three legions (Appian, B. C. i. 100), or, according to another statement (Liv. Epit. 89), forty-seven legions received grants of land in various parts of Italy. A great number of these colonies was settled in Etruria, the population of which was thus almost entirely changed. These colonies had the strongest interest in upholding the institutions of Sulla, since any attempt to invalidate the latter would have endangered their newly-acquired possessions. But though they were a support to the power of Sulla, they hastened the fall of the commonwealth; an idle and licentious soldiery supplanted an industrious and agricultural population; and Catiline found nowhere more adherents than among the military colonies of Sulla. While Sulla thus established throughout Italy a population devoted to his interests, he created at Rome a kind of bodyguard for his protection by giving the citizenship to a great number of slaves belonging to those who had been proscribed by him. The slaves thus rewarded are said to have been as many as 10,000, and were called Cornelii after him as their patron.

Sulla had completed his reforms by the beginning of B. C. 79, and as he longed for the undisturbed enjoyment of his pleasures, he resolved to resign his dictatorship. Accordingly, to the general surprise he summoned the people, resigned his dictatorship, and declared himself ready to render an account of his conduct while in office. This voluntary abdication by Sulla of the sovereignty of the Roman world has excited the astonishment and admiration of both ancient and modern writers. But it is evident, as has been already remarked, that Sulla never contemplated, like Julius Caesar, the establishment of a monarchical form of government; and it must be recollected that he could retire into a private station without any fear that attempts would be made against his life or his institutions. The ten thousand Cornelii at Rome and his veterans stationed throughout Italy, as well as the whole strength of the aristocratical party, secured him against all danger. Even in his retirement his will was law, and shortly before his death, he ordered his slaves to strangle a magistrate of one of the towns in Italy, because he was a public defaulter.

After resigning his dictatorship, Sulla retired to his estate at Puteoli, and there surrounded by the beauties of nature and art he passed the remainder of his life in those literary and sensual enjoyments in which he had always taken so much pleasure. His dissolute mode of life hastened his death. A dream warned him of his approaching end. Thereupon he made his testament, in which he left L. Lucullus the guardian of his son. Only two days before his death, he finished the twenty-second book of his memoirs, in which, foreseeing his end, he was able to boast of the prediction of the Chaldaeans, that it was his fate to die after a happy life in the very height of his prosperity. He died in B. C. 78, in the sixtieth year of his age. The immediate cause of his death was the rupture of a blood-vessel, but some time before he had been suffering from the disgusting disease, which is known in modern times by the name of Morbus Pediculosus or Phthiriasis. Appian (B. C. i. 105) simply relates that he died of a fever. Zachariae, in his life of Sulla, considers the story of his suffering from phthiriasis as a fabrication of his enemies, and probably of the Athenians whom he had handled so severely; but Appian's statement does not contradict the common account, which is attested by too many ancient writers to be rejected on the slender reasons that Zachariae alleges (Plut. Sull. 36; Plin. H. N. vii. 43. s. 44, xi. 33. s. 39, xxvi. 13. s. 86; Paus. i. 20. § 7; Aurel. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 75). The senate, faithful to Sulla to the last, resolved to give him the honour of a public funeral. This was however opposed by the consul Lepidus, who had resolved to attempt the repeal of Sulla's laws; but Sulla's power continued unshaken even after his death. The veterans were summoned from their colonies, and Q. Catulus, L. Lucullus, and Cn. Pompey, placed themselves at their head. Lepidus was obliged to give way and allowed the funeral to take place without interruption. It was a gorgeous pageant. The magistrates, the senate, the equites, the priests, and the Vestal virgins, as well as the veterans, accompanied the funeral procession to the Campus Martius, where the corpse was burnt according to Sulla's own wish, who feared that his enemies might insult his remains, as he had done those of Marius, which had been taken out of the grave and thrown into the Anio at his command. It had been previously the custom of the Cornelia gens to bury and not burn their dead. A monument was erected to Sulla in the Campus Martius, the inscription on which he is said to have composed himself. It stated that none of his friends ever did him a kindness, and none of his enemies a wrong, without being fully repaid.

Sulla was married five times: — 1. To Ilia, for which name we ought perhaps to read Julia (Plut. Sull. 6). She bore Sulla a daughter, who was married to Q. Pompeius Rufus, the son of Sulla's colleague in the consulship in B. C. 88. [POMPEIUS, No. 8.] 2. To Aelia. 3. To Coelia, whom he divorced on the pretext of barrenness, but in reality in order to marry Caecilia Metella. 4. To Caecilia Metella, who bore him a son, who died before Sulla [see below, No. 6], and likewise twins, a son and a daughter. [No. 7.] 5. Valeria, who bore him a daughter after his death. [VALERIA.]

Sulla's love of literature has been repeatedly mentioned in the preceding sketch of his life. He wrote a history of his own life and times, which is called Ὑπομνήματα or Memoirs by Plutarch, who has made great use of it in his life of Sulla, as well as in his biographies of Marius, Sertorius, and Lucullus. It was dedicated to L. Lucullus, and extended to twenty-two books, the last of which was finished by Sulla a few days before his death, as has been already related. This did not however complete the work, which was brought to a conclusion by his freedman Cornelius Epicadus, probably at the request of his son Faustus. (Plut. Sull. 6, 37, Lucull. 1; Suet. de Ill. Gramm. 12.) From the quotations in A. Gellius (i. 12, xx. 6) it appears that Sulla's work was written in Latin, and not in Greek, as Heeren maintains (Heeren, De Fontibus Plutarchi, p. 151, &c.; Krause, Vitae et Fragmenta Hist. Roman. p. 290, &c.) Sulla also wrote Fabulae Atellanae (Athen. vi. p. 261, c.), and the Greek Anthology contains a short epigram which is ascribed to him. (Brunck, Lect. p. 267; Jacobs, Anth. Gr. vol. ii. p. 66, Anth. Pal. App. 91, vol. ii. p. 788.)

The chief ancient authority for Sulla's life is Plutarch's biography, which has been translated by G. Long, with some useful notes, London, 1844, where the reader will find references to most of the passages in Appian and other ancient writers who speak of Sulla. The passages in Sallust and Cicero, in which Sulla is mentioned, are given by Orelli in his Onomasticon Tullianum, pt. ii. p. 192. The two modern writers, who have written Sulla's life with most accuracy, are Zachariae, in his work entitled L. Cornelius Sulla, genannt der Glückliche, als Ordner des Römischen Freystaates, Heidelberg, 1834, and Drumann, in his Geschichte Roms, vol. ii. p. 429, &c. The latter writer gives the more impartial account of Sulla's life and character; the former falls into the common fault of biographers in attempting to apologise for the vices and crimes of the subject of his biography.

THE LEGISLATION OF SULLA.

All the reforms of Sulla were effected by means of Leges, which were proposed by him in the comitia centuriata and enacted by the votes of the people. It is true that the votes of the people were a mere form, but it was a form essential to the preservation of his work, and was maintained by Augustus in his legislation. The laws proposed by Sulla are called by the general name of Leges Corneliae, and particular laws are designated by the name of the particular subject to which they relate, as Lex Cornelia de Falsis, Lex Cornelia de Sicariis, &c.

These laws were all passed during the time that Sulla was dictator, that is, from the end of B. C. 82 to B. C. 79, and most of them in all probability during the years B. C. 81 and 80. It is impossible to determine in what order they were proposed, nor is it material to do so. They may be divided into four classes, laws relating to the constitution, to the ecclesiastical corporations, to the administration of justice, and to the improvement of public morals. Their general object and design was to restore, as far as possible, the ancient Roman constitution, and to give again to the senate and the aristocracy that power of which they had been gradually deprived by the leaders of the popular party. It did not escape the penetration of Sulla that many of the evils under which the Roman state was suffering, arose from the corruption of the morals of the people; and he therefore attempted in his legislation to check the increase of crime and luxury by stringent enactments. The attempt was a hopeless one, for vice and immorality pervaded alike all classes of Roman citizens, and no laws can restore to a people the moral feelings which they have lost. Sulla has been much blamed by modern writers for giving to the Roman state such an aristocratical constitution; but under the circumstances in which he was placed he could not well have done otherwise. To have vested the government in the mob of which the Roman people consisted, would have been perfect madness; and as he was not prepared to establish a monarchy, he had no alternative but giving the power to the senate. His constitution did not last, because the aristocracy were thoroughly selfish and corrupt, and exercised the power which Sulla had entrusted to them only for their own aggrandisement and not for the good of their country. Their shameless conduct soon disgusted the provinces as well as the capital; the people again regained their power, but the consequence was an anarchy and not a government; and as neither class was fit to rule, they were obliged to submit to the dominion of a single man. Thus the empire became a necessity as well as a blessing to the exhausted Roman world. Sulla's laws respecting criminal jurisprudence were the most lasting and bear the strongest testimony to his greatness as a legislator. He was the first to reduce the criminal law of Rome to a system; and his laws, together with the Julian laws, formed the basis of the criminal Roman jurisprudence till the downfal of the empire.

In treating of Sulla's laws we shall follow the fourfold division which has been given above.

I. Laws relating to the Constitution.—The changes which Sulla introduced in the comitia and the senate, first call for our attention. The Comitia Tributa, or assemblies of the tribes, which originally possessed only the power to make regulations respecting the local affairs of the tribes, had gradually become a sovereign assembly with legislative and judicial authority. Sulla deprived them of their legislative and judicial powers, as well as of their right of electing the priests, which they had also acquired. He did not however do away with them entirely, as might be inferred from the words of Appian (B. C. i. 59); but he allowed them to exist with the power of electing the tribunes, aediles, quaestors, and other inferior magistrates. This seems to have been the only purpose for which they were called together; and all conciones of the tribes, by means of which the tribunes had exercised a powerful influence in the state, were strictly forbidden by Sulla. (Cic. pro Cluent. 40.)

The Comitia Centuriata, on the other hand, were allowed to retain their right of legislation unimpaired. He restored however the ancient regulation, which had fallen into desuetude, that no matter should be brought before them without the previous sanction of a senatusconsultum (Appian, B. C. i. 59); but he did not require the confirmation of the curiae, as the latter had long ceased to have any practical existence. Göttling supposes that the right of provocatio or appeal to the comitia centuriata was done away with by Sulla, but the passage of Cicero (Cic. Verr. Act. i. 13), which he quotes in support of this opinion, is not sufficient to prove it.

The Senate had been so much reduced in numbers by the proscriptions of Sulla, that he was obliged to fill up the vacancies by the election of three hundred new members. These however were not appointed by the censors from the persons who had filled the magistracies of the state, but were elected by the people. Appian says (B. C. i. 100) that they were elected by the tribes. Most modern writers think that we are not to understand by this the comitia tributa, but the comitia centuriata, which voted also according to tribes at this time; but Göttling observes that as the senators were regarded by Sulla as public officers, there is no difficulty in supposing that they were elected by the comitia tributa as the inferior magistrates were. However this may be, we know that these three hundred were taken from the equestrian order. (Appian, l. c.; Liv. Epit. 89.) This election was an extraordinary one, and was not intended to be the regular way of filling up the vacancies in the senate; for we are expressly told that Sulla increased the number of quaestors to twenty, that there might be a sufficient number for this purpose (Tac. Ann. xi. 32.) It was not necessary for Sulla to make any alteration respecting the duties and functions of the senate, as the whole administration of the state was in their hands; and he gave them the initiative in legislation by requiring a previous senatusconsultum respecting all measures that were to be submitted to the comitia, as is stated above. One of the most important of the senate's duties was the appointment of the governors of the provinces. By the Lex Sempronia of C. Gracchus, the senate had to determine every year before the election of the consuls the two provinces which the consuls should have (Cic. de Prov. Cons. 2, 7; Sall. Jug. 27); but as the imperium was conferred only for a year, the governor had to leave the province at the end of that time, unless his imperium was renewed. Sulla in his law respecting the provinces (de Provinciis ordinandis) did not make any change in the Sempronian law respecting the distribution of the provinces by the senate; but he allowed the governor of a province to continue to hold the government till a successor was appointed by the senate, and enacted that he should continue to possess the imperium till he entered the city, without the necessity of its being renewed annually (comp. Cic. ad Fam. i. 9. § 12). The time during which the government of a province was to be held, thus depended entirely upon the will of the senate. It was further enacted that as soon as a successor arrived in the province, the former governor must quit it within thirty days (Cic. ad Fam. iii. 6); and the law also limited the expenses to which the provincials were put in sending embassies to Rome to praise the administration of their governors. (Cic. ad Fam. iii. 8, 10.)

With respect to the magistrates, Sulla renewed the old law, that no one should hold the praetorship before he had been quaestor, nor the consulship before he had been praetor (Appian, B. C. i. 100; Cic. Phil. xi. 5); nor did he allow of any deviation from this law in favour of his own party, for when Q. Lucretius Ofella, who had taken Praeneste, presuming upon his services, offered himself as a candidate for the consulship, without having previously held the offices of quaestor and praetor, he was assassinated in the forum by the order of the dictator. Sulla also re-established the ancient law, that no one should be elected to the same magistracy till after the expiration of ten years. (Appian, B. C. i. 101; comp. Liv. vii. 42, x. 31.)

Sulla increased the number of Quaestors from eight to twenty (Tac. Ann. xi. 22), and that of the Praetors from six to eight. Pomponius says (De Orig. Juris, Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. 32) that Sulla added four new praetors, but this appears to be a mistake, since Julius Caesar was the first who increased their number to ten. (Suet. Caes. 41; Dion Cass. xlii. 51.) This increase in the number of the praetors was necessary on account of the new quaestiones, established by Sulla, of which we shall speak below.

One of the most important of Sulla's reforms related to the tribunate. It is stated in general by the ancient writers, that Sulla deprived the tribunes of the plebs of all real power (Vell. Pat. ii. 30; Appian, B. C. i. 100; Cic. de Leg. iii. 9; Liv. Epit. 89); but the exact nature of his alterations is not accurately stated. It appears certain, however, that he deprived the tribunes of the right of proposing a rogation of any kind whatsoever to the tribes (Liv. Epit. 89), or of impeaching any person before them, inasmuch as he abolished altogether the legislative and judicial functions of the tribes, as has been previously stated. The tribunes also lost the right of holding conciones (Cic. pro Cluent. 40), as has likewise been shown, and thus could not influence the tribes by any speeches. The only right left to them was the Intercessio. It is, however, uncertain to what extent the right of Intercessio extended. It is hardly conceivable that Sulla would have left the tribunes to exercise this the most formidable of all their powers without any limitation; and that he did not do so is clear from the case of Q. Opimius, who was brought to trial, because, when tribune of the plebs, he had used his intercessio in violation of the Lex Cornelia (Cic. Verr. i. 60). Cicero says (de Leg. iii. 9) that Sulla left the tribunes only the potestas auxilii ferendi; and from this we may infer, in connection with the case of Opimius, that the Intercessio was confined to giving their protection to private persons against the unjust decisions of magistrates, as, for instance, in the enlisting of soldiers. Caesar, it is true, states, in general, that Sulla left to the tribunes the right of intercessio, and he leaves it to be inferred in particular that Sulla allowed them to use their intercessio in reference to senatusconsulta (Caes. B. C. i. 5, 7); but it is not impossible, as Becker has suggested, that Caesar may have given a false interpretation of the right of intercessio granted by Sulla, in order to justify the course he was himself adopting. (Becker, Handbuch der Röm. Alterthümer, vol. .. pt. ii. p. 290). To degrade the tribunate still lower, Sulla enacted, that whoever had held this office forfeited thereby all right to become a candidate for any of the higher curule offices, in order that all persons of rank, talent, and wealth, might be deterred from holding an office which would be a fatal impediment to rising any higher in the state. (Appian, B. C. i. 100; Ascon. in Cornel. p. 78, ed. Orelli.) The statement that Sulla required persons to be senators before they could become tribunes (Appian, l. c.), is explained by the circumstance that the quaestorship and the aedileship, which usually preceded the tribunate gave admission to the senate; and it would therefore appear that Sulla required all persons to hold the quaestorship before the tribunate.

II. Laws relating to the Ecclesiastical Corporations. — Sulla repealed the Lex Domitia, which gave to the comitia tributa the right of electing the members of the great ecclesiastical corporations, and restored to the latter the right of co-optatio or self-election. At the same time he increased the number of pontiffs and augurs to fifteen respectively (Dion Cass. xxxvii. 37; Liv. Epit. 89). It is commonly said that Sulla also increased the number of the keepers of the Sibylline books from ten to fifteen; and though we have no express authority for this statement (for the passage of Servius, ad Virg. Aen. vi. 73, does not prove it), it is probable that he did, as we read of Quindecemviri in the time of Cicero (ad Fam. viii. 4) instead of decemviri as previously.

III. Laws relating to the Administration of Justice. — Sulla established permanent courts for the trial of particular offences, in each of which a praetor presided. A precedent for this had been given by the Lex Calpurnia of the tribune L. Calpurnius Piso, in B. C. 149, by which it was enacted that a praetor should preside at all trials for repetundae during his year of office. This was called a Quaestio Perpetua, and nine such Quaestiones Perpetuae were established by Sulla, namely, De Repetundis, Majestatis, De Sicariis et Veneficis, De Parricidio, Peculatus, Ambitus, De Nummis Adulterinis, De Falsis or Testamentaria, and De Vi Publica. Jurisdiction in civil cases was left to the praetor peregrinus and the praetor urbanus as before, and the other six praetors presided in the Quaestiones; but as the latter were more in number than the praetors, some of the praetors took more than one quaestio, or a judex quaestionis was appointed. The praetors, after their election, had to draw lots for their several jurisdictions. Sulla enacted that the judices should be taken exclusively from the senators, and not from the equites, the latter of whom had possessed this privilege, with a few interruptions, from the law of C. Gracchus, in B. C. 123. This was a great gain for the aristocracy; since the offences for which they were usually brought to trial, such as bribery, malversation, and the like, were so commonly practised by the whole order, that they were, in most cases, nearly certain of acquittal from men who required similar indulgence themselves. (Tac. Ann. xi. 22; Vell. Pat. ii. 32; Cic. Verr. Act. i. 13, 16; comp. Dictionary of Antiquities, art. Judex.)

Sulla's reform in the criminal law, the greatest and most enduring part of his legislation, belongs to a history of Roman law, and cannot be given here. For further information on this subject the reader is referred to the Dict. of Antiq. art. Leges Corneliae.

IV. Laws relating to the Improvement of public Morals.—Of these we have very little information. One of them was a Lex Sumtuaria, which enacted that not more than a certain sum of money should be spent upon entertainments, and also restrained extravagance in funerals. (Gell. ii. 24; Macrob. Sat. ii. 13; Plut. Sull. 35). There was likewise a law of Sulla respecting marriage (Plut. l. c.; comp. Lyc. c. Sull. 3), the provisions of which are quite unknown, as it was probably abrogated by the Julian law.

There are several coins of the dictator Sulla, a few specimens of which are annexed. The first coin contains on the obverse the head of the dictator, and on the reverse that of his colleague in his first consulship, Q. Pompeius Rufus. The coin was probably struck by the son of Q. Pompeius Rufus, who was tribune of the plebs in B. C. 52 [POMPEIUS, No. 9], in honour of his grandfather and father. The second coin was also probably struck by the tribune of B. C. 52. The third and fourth coins were struck in the lifetime of the dictator. The third has on the obverse the head of Pallas, with MANLI. PROQ., and on the reverse Sulla in a quadriga, with L. SULLA IMP., probably with reference to his splendid triumph over Mithridates. The fourth coin has on the obverse the head of Venus, before which Cupid stands holding in his hand the branch of a palm tree, and on the reverse a guttus and a lituus between two trophies, with IMPER. ITERV(M). The head of Venus is placed on the obverse, because Sulla attributed much of his success to the protection of this goddess. Thus we are told by Plutarch (Sull. 34) that when he wrote to Greeks he called himself Epaphroditus, or the favourite of Aphrodite or Venus, and also that he inscribed on his trophies the names of Mars and Victory, and Venus (Sull. 19). (Comp. Eckhel, vol. v. pp. 190, 191.)

COINS OF THE DICTATOR SULLA.

6. CORNELIUS SULLA, a son of the dictator by his fourth wife Caecilia Metella, died in the lifetime of his father. (Senec. Cons. ad Marc. 12; Plut. Sull. 37.)

7. FAUSTUS CORNELIUS SULLA, a son of the dictator by his fourth wife Caecilia Metella, and a twin brother of Fausta, was born not long before B. C. 88, the year in which his father obtained his first consulship. He and his sister received the names of Faustus and Fausta respectively on account of the good fortune of their father. (Plut. Sull. 22, 34, 37.) At the death of his father in B. C. 78, Faustus and his sister were left under the guardianship of L. Lucullus. The enemies of Sulla's constitution constantly threatened Faustus with a prosecution to compel him to restore the public money which his father had received or taken out of the treasury; but the senate always offered a strong opposition to such an investigation. When the attempt was renewed in B. C. 66 by one of the tribunes, Cicero, who was then praetor, spoke against the proposal. (Ascon. in Cornel. p. 72, ed Orelli; Cic. pro Cluent. 34, de Leg. Agr. i. 4.) Soon after this Faustus accompanied Pompey into Asia, and was the first who mounted the walls of the temple of Jerusalem in B. C. 63, for which exploit he was richly rewarded. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 4. § 4, B. J. i. 7. § 4.) In B. C. 60 he exhibited the gladiatorial games which his father in his last will had enjoined upon him, and at the same time he treated the people in the most sumptuous manner. In B. C. 54 he was quaestor, having been elected augur a few years before. In B. C. 52 he received from the senate the commission to rebuild the Curia Hostilia, which had been burnt down in the tumults following the murder of Clodius, and which was henceforward to be called the Curia Cornelia, in honour of Faustus and his father. The breaking out of the civil war prevented him from obtaining any of the higher dignities of the state. As the son of the dictator Sulla, and the son-in-law of Pompey, whose daughter he had married, he joined the aristocratical party. At the beginning of B. C. 49, Pompey wished to send him to Mauritania with the title of propraetor, but was prevented by Philippus, tribune of the plebs. He crossed over to Greece with Pompey, was present at the battle of Pharsalia, and subsequently joined the leaders of his party in Africa. After the battle of Thapsus, in B. C. 46, he attempted to escape into Mauritania, with the intention of sailing to Spain, but he was intercepted in his journey by P. Sittius, taken prisoner, and carried to Caesar [SITTIUS]. He was accompanied in his flight by his wife Pompeia and his children, as well as by Afranius, and they were all captured along with him. Upon their arrival in Caesar's camp, Faustus and Afranius were murdered by the soldiers in a tumult, probably not without Caesar's connivance; but Pompeia and her children were dismissed uninjured by Caesar. Faustus seems only to have resembled his father in his extravagance. We know from Cicero (ad Att. ix. 11) that he was overwhelmed with debt at the breaking out of the civil war. (Dion Cass. xxxvii. 51, xxxix. 17, xl. 50, xlii. 13; Cic. pro Sull. 19; Caes. B. C. i. 6; Hirt. B. Afr. 87, 95; Appian, B. C. ii. 100; Flor. iv. 2. § 90; Oros. vi. 16.)

8. SERV. CORNELIUS SULLA, known only as the brother of the dictator, and the father of the two following persons. (Sall. Cat. 17; Dion Cass. xxxvi. 27.)

9. P. CORNELIUS SULLA, a son of No. 8, and a nephew of the dictator. He was grown up in the lifetime of his uncle, from whom he received as presents several estates of those who had been proscribed. In the consular comitia of B. C. 66 he was elected consul along with P. Autronius Paetus, but neither he nor his colleague entered upon the office, as they were accused of bribery by L. Torquatus the younger, and were condemned. L. Cotta and L. Torquatus, the father of their accuser, received the consulship in their stead. It was currently believed that Sulla was privy to both of Catiline's conspiracies, and he was accordingly accused of this crime by his former accuser, L. Torquatus, and by C. Cornelius. He was defended by Hortensius and Cicero, and the speech of the latter on his behalf is still extant. He was acquitted; but, independent of the testimony of Sallust (Cat. 17), his guilt may almost be inferred from the embarrassment of his advocate. According to A. Gellius (xii. 12) Cicero had borrowed a sum of money from Sulla for the purchase of his house on the Palatine. Cicero afterwards quarrelled with Sulla, because the latter had taken part in the proceedings of Clodius against him during his banishment. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 3.) In the civil war Sulla espoused Caesar's cause. He served under him as legate in Greece, and commanded along with Caesar himself the right wing at the battle of Pharsalia, B. C. 48. In the following year he was ordered by Caesar to carry over from Italy to Sicily the legions which were destined for the African war; but the soldiers of the twelfth legion rose in mutiny, and drove him away with a shower of stones, demanding to receive, before they quitted Italy, the rewards which they had been promised in Greece. At the conclusion of the civil war Sulla purchased at a small sum some of the confiscated estates of the Pompeian party, and appears in consequence to have incurred no small degree of obloquy. He died during a journey in B. C. 45; and, according to Cicero (ad Fam. ix. 10, xv. 17), people were too glad to hear of his death to trouble themselves about the inquiry whether he had perished by the hands of robbers, or had fallen a victim to excessive indulgence in the pleasures of the table. (Cic. pro Sulla, passim; Sall. Cat. 17, 18; Dion Cass. xxxvi. 27; Cic. de Fin. ii. 19; Caes. B. C. iii. 51, 89; Appian, B. C. ii. 76; Cic. ad Att. xi. 21, 22, de Off. ii. 8.) Sulla left behind him a son P. Sulla [No. 11], and also a step-son Memmius. (Cic. ad Q. Fr. iii. 3.)

10. SERV. CORNELIUS SULLA, also a son of No. 8, took part in both of Catiline's conspiracies. His guilt was so evident, that no one was willing to defend him; but we do not read that he was put to death along with the other conspirators. (Sall. Cat. 17, 47; Cic. pro Sull. 2.)

11. P. CORNELIUS SULLA, the son of No. 9. Nothing is recorded respecting him. He was alive at the time of his father's death in B. C. 45. ("P. Sullam patrem mortuum habebamus," Cic. ad Fam. xv. 17, pro Sulla, 31.) Respecting the preceding Sullae see Drumann, Geschichte Roms, vol. ii. pp. 425—524.

12. L. CORNELIUS P. F. P. N. SULLA, the son of No. 11, was consul B. C. 5 with Augustus. (Plin. H. N. vii. 11. s. 13; Dion Cass. index, lib. lv.)

13. L. CORNELIUS (L. F. P. N.) SULLA FELIX, son of No. 12, was consul in the reign of Tiberius, A. D. 33, with Serv. Sulpicius Galba. (Dion Cass. lviii. 20; Tac. Ann. vi. 15.) He is probably the same as the "L. Sulla, nobilis juvenis," mentioned by Tacitus, in A. D. 21 (Ann. iii. 31), and as the L. Sulla, whose advanced age in the reign of Claudius is spoken of by Dion Cassius (lx. 12).

14. L. CORNELIUS SULLA, probably son of No. 13, was consul suffectus under Claudius in A. D. 52. (Fasti.)

15. FAUSTUS CORNELIUS SULLA, consul under Claudius, in A. D. 52, with L. Salvius Otho Titianus. He was the son-in-law of Claudius, having married his daughter Antonia. Soon after the accession of Nero, Paetus accused Pallas and Burrus of the design of placing Sulla upon the throne; and although the accusation was declared to be false, Nero became jealous of Sulla. One of the emperor's freedmen accordingly invented a plot which was falsely ascribed to Sulla, who was thereupon ordered by Nero to go into exile to Massilia, A. D. 59. But as Nero feared that Sulla from his proximity to the German legions might induce them to revolt, he was put to death by order of the emperor in A. D. 63. (Suet. Claud. 27; Tac. Ann. xii. 52, xiii. 23, 47, xiv. 57.)

16. CORNELIUS SULLA, governor of Cappadocia, was put to death by Elagabalus. (Dion Cass. lxxix. 4.)

SULPI'CIA. 1. The mother-in-law (socrus) of Sp. Postumius Albinus, by whose instrumentality the latter, in his consulship, B. C. 168, became acquainted with the crimes perpetrated in connection with the worship of Bacchus. (Liv. xxxix. 11—13.)

2. The daughter of Ser. Sulpicius Paterculus, and the wife of Q. Fulvius Flaccus. She was declared to be the chastest woman in Rome, and was therefore selected, in B. C. 113, to dedicate the statue of Venus Verticordia, who was believed to turn the minds of women from vice to virtue. (Val. Max. viii. 15. § 12; Plin. H. N. vii. 35.)

3. The wife of Lentulus Cruscellio. Her husband was proscribed by the triumvirs in B. C. 43, and fled to Sex. Pompeius in Sicily, whither Sulpicia followed him, against the wish of her mother Julia. (Val. Max. vi. 7. § 3; Appian, B. C. iv. 39.)

4. SULPICIA PRAETEXTATA, the wife of Crassus, is mentioned at the commencement of the reign of Vespasian, A. D. 70. (Tac. Hist. iv. 42.)

SULPI'CIA. [TIBULLUS.]

SULPI'CIA, a Roman poetess who flourished towards the close of the first century, celebrated for sundry gay amatory effusions, addressed to her husband Calenus. Their general character may be gathered from the expressions of Martial, Ausonius, and Sidonius Apollinaris, by all of whom they are noticed. Two lines from one of these productions have been preserved by the scholiast upon Juvenal, Sat. vi. 536. (Martial. Ep. x. 35—38; Auson. Epilog. Cent. Nupt.; Sidon. Apollin. Carm. ix. 260; Anthol. Lat. iii. 251, ed. Burmann, or No. 198, ed. Meyer.)

We find in the collected works of Ausonius, as first published by Ugoletus (4to. Parm. 1499, Venet. 1501), a satirical poem, in seventy hexameters, on the edict of Domitian, by which philosophers were banished from Rome and from Italy (Suet. Dom. 10; Gell. xv. 11). It has been frequently reprinted, and generally bears the title Satyricon Carmen s. Ecloga de edicto Domitiani, or Satyra de corrupto reipublicae statu temporibus Domitiani. When closely examined it soon appeared manifest that it could not belong to the rhetorician of Bordeaux, but that it must have been written by some one who lived at the period to which the theme refers, that the author was a female (v. 8), and that she had previously composed a multitude of sportive pieces in a great variety of measures. Hence many critics, struck by these coincidences, have not hesitated to ascribe the lines in question to the Sulpicia mentioned above, the contemporary of Martial, and in almost all the more recent collections of the minor Latin poets they bear her name. In a literary point of view they possess little interest, being weak, pointless, and destitute of spirit. (Wernsdorf, Poet. Lat. Min. vol. iii. p. lx. and p. 83.) The satire is generally appended to editions of Juvenal and Persius. [W. R.]

SULPI'CIA GENS, originally patrician, and afterwards plebeian likewise. It was one of the most ancient Roman gentes, and produced a succession of distinguished men, from the foundation of the republic to the imperial period. The first member of it who obtained the consulship was Ser. Sulpicius Camerinus Cornutus, in B. C. 500, only nine years after the expulsion of the Tarquins, and the last of the name who appears on the consular Fasti was Sex. Sulpicius Tertullus in A. D. 158. The family names of the Sulpicii during the republican period are — CAMERINUS CORNUTUS, GALBA, GALLUS, LONGUS, PATERCULUS, PETICUS, PRAETEXTATUS, QUIRINUS, RUFUS (given below), SAVERRIO. Besides these cognomens, we meet with some other surnames belonging to freedmen and to other persons under the empire, which are given below. On coins we find the surnames Galba, Platorinus, Proclus, Rufus.

SULPICIA'NUS, FLA'VIUS, the father-in-law of the emperor Pertinax, was appointed upon the death of Commodus praefectus urbi. After the murder of his son he became one of the candidates for the vacant throne, when it was exposed for sale by the praetorians. He was outbid by Didius Julianus, who stripped him of his office but spared his life at the request of the soldiers. He was subsequently put to death by Septimius Severus, on the charge of having favoured the pretensions of Clodius Albinus. (Dion Cass. lxxiii. 7, 11, lxxv. 8.) [W. R.]

SULPI'CIUS APOLLINA'RIS, a contemporary of A. Gellius, was a learned grammarian, whom Gellius frequently cites with the greatest respect. He calls him, on one occasion "vir praestanti literarum scientia," and on another, "homo memoriae nostrae doctissimus." (Gell. ii. 16, iv. 17, xiii. 17, xv. 5.) There are two poems in the Latin Anthology, purporting to be written by Sulpicius of Carthage, whom some writers identify with the above-named Sulpicius Apollinaris. One of these poems consists of seventy-two lines, giving the argument of the twelve books of Virgil's Aeneid, six lines being devoted to each book (Anthol. Lat. Nos. 222, 223, ed. Meyer; Donatus, Vita Virgilii). The contemporary of Gellius is probably the same person as the Sulpicius Apollinaris who taught the emperor Pertinax in his youth. (Capitol. Pertin. 1.)

SULPI'CIUS ASPER. [ASPER.]

SULPI'CIUS FLAVUS. [FLAVUS.]

SULPI'CIUS LUPERCUS SERVASTUS, a Latin poet, of whom two poems are extant; an elegy, De Cupiditate, in forty-two lines, and a sapphic ode, De Vetustate, in twelve lines. Both poems are printed in Wernsdorf's Poetae Latini Minores, vol. iii. pp. 235, &c. 408. Nothing is known of the author.

SULPI'CIUS RUFUS. 1. SER. SULPICIUS RUFUS, was consular tribune three times, namely in B. C. 388, 384, and 383. (Liv. vi. 4, 18, 21.)

2. P. SULPICIUS RUFUS, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 88. He was born in B. C. 124, as he was ten years older than Hortensius. (Cic. Brut. 88.) He was one of the most distinguished orators of his time. Cicero, who had heard him, frequently speaks of him in terms of the highest admiration. He says that Sulpicius and Cotta were, beyond comparison, the greatest orators of their age. "Sulpicius," he states, "was, of all the orators I ever heard, the most dignified, and, so to speak, the most tragic. His voice was powerful, and at the same time sweet and clear; the gestures and movements of his body were graceful; but he appeared, nevertheless, to have been trained for the forum and not for the stage; his language was rapid and flowing, and yet not redundant or diffuse." (Brut. 55.) He commenced public life as a supporter of the aristocratical party, and soon acquired great influence in the state by his splendid talents, while he was still young. He was an intimate friend of M. Livius Drusus, the celebrated tribune of the plebs, and the aristocracy placed great hopes in him. (Cic. de Orat. i. 7.) In B. C. 94, he accused of majestas C. Norbanus, the turbulent tribune of the plebs, who was defended by M. Antonius and was acquitted. [NORBANUS, No. 1.] In B. C. 93 he was quaestor, and in B. C. 89 he served as legate of the consul Cn. Pompeius Strabo in the Marsic war. In the following year, B. C. 88, he was elected to the tribunate through the influence of the aristocratical party. The consuls of the year were L. Cornelius Sulla and Q. Pompeius Rufus, the latter of whom was a personal friend of Sulpicius. (Cic. Lael. 1.) At first Sulpicius did not disappoint the expectations of his party. In conjunction with his colleague, P. Antistius, he resisted the attempt of C. Julius Caesar to become a candidate for the consulship before he had filled the office of praetor, and he also opposed the return from exile of those who had been banished. (Cic. Brut. 63, de Harusp. Resp. 20; Ascon. in Scaur. p. 20, ed. Orelli; Cic. ad Herenn. ii. 28.) But Sulpicius shortly afterwards joined Marius, and placed himself at the head of the popular party. The causes of this sudden change are not expressly stated by the ancient writers; but we are told that he was overwhelmed with debt; and there can be little doubt that he was bought by Marius, and that the latter promised him great wealth as soon as he obtained the command of the war against Mithridates. The history of the rogations which Sulpicius brought forward in favour of Marius and his party, and against Sulla, is fully related in the lives of those persons. [MARIUS, p. 957; SULLA, p. 936.] It is only necessary to state here, that when the law was passed which conferred upon Marius the command of the Mithridatic war, Sulla, who was then at Nola, marched upon Rome at the head of his army. Marius and Sulpicius had no means of resisting him, and were obliged to fly from the city. They were both declared public enemies by the senate, at the command of Sulla, along with ten others of their party.

Marius succeeded in making his escape to Africa, but Sulpicius was discovered in a villa, and put to death. The slave who betrayed him was rewarded with his freedom, and then hurled down from the Tarpeian rock. (Appian, B. C. i. 58, 60; Plut. Sull. 10; Cic. de Orat. iii. 3, Brut. 63; Liv. Epit. 77; Vell. Pat. ii. 18.)

Although Sulpicius was such a distinguished orator, he left no orations behind him. Cicero says that he had often heard Sulpicius declare that he was not accustomed, and was unable, to write. It is true there were some speeches extant under his name, but they were written after his death by P. Canutius. (Cic. Brut. 56.) [CANUTIUS.] Sulpicius is one of the speakers in Cicero's dialogue, De Oratore. (Ahrens, Die Drei Volkstribunen, Tib. Gracchus, M. Drusus, und P. Sulpicius, Leipzig, 1836; Meyer, Oratorum Romanorum Fragmenta, pp. 343—347, 2d ed.; Drumann, Geschichte Roms, vol. ii. pp. 435, 436.)

3. P. SULPICIUS RUFUS, probably a son or grandson of No. 2, was one of Caesar's legates in Gaul. He also served under Caesar as one of his legates in the campaign in Spain against Afranius and Petreius, in B. C. 49; and in the following year, B. C. 48, he was rewarded for his services by the praetorship. In the latter year he commanded Caesar's fleet at Vibo, when it was attacked by C. Cassius. Cicero addresses him in B. C. 45 as imperator. It appears that he was at that time in Illyricum, along with Vatinius. (Caes. B. G. iv. 22, B. C. i. 74, iii. 101; Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 77.)

5. SER. SULPICIUS RUFUS, the son of No. 4, was one of the subscriptores of his father's accusation against Murena in B. C. 63. (Cic. pro Mur. 26, 27.) On the breaking out of the civil war, in B. C. 49, he joined his father in espousing Caesar's side, and is frequently mentioned at that time in Cicero's correspondence. He survived his father, who died in B. C. 43. (Cic. ad Att. ix. 18, 19, x. 14, ad Fam. iv. 2, Philipp. ix. 5.)

6. SULPICIUS RUFUS, who was ludi procurator, that is, the person who had the charge of the public games, was slain by the emperor Claudius because he was privy to the marriage of Silius and Messalina. (Tac. Ann. xi. 35.)

SER. SULPI'CIUS LEMO'NIA RUFUS, the son of Quintus, was a contemporary and friend of Cicero, and of about the same age (Cic. Brut. 40): Cicero was born B. C. 106. The name Lemonia is the ablative case, and indicates the tribe to which Servius belonged. (Cic. Philipp. ix. 7.) According to Cicero, the father of Servius was of the equestrian order. (Cic. pro Mur. 7.) Servius first devoted himself to oratory, and he studied his art with Cicero in his youth, and also at Rhodus B. C. 78, for he accompanied Cicero there (Brut. 41). It is said that he was induced to study law by a reproof of Q. Mucius Scaevola, the pontifex, whose opinion Servius had asked on a legal question, and as the pontifex saw that Servius did not understand his answer, he said that "it was disgraceful for a patrician and a noble, and one who pleaded causes, to be ignorant of the law with which he had to be engaged." (Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. 2. § 43.) Henceforth jurisprudence became his study, in which he surpassed his teachers, L. Balbus and Aquillius Gallus, and obtained a reputation in no respect inferior to that of the pontifex who reproved him. As an orator he had hardly a superior, unless it were Cicero himself.

Servius was successively quaestor of the district or provincia of Ostia, in B. C. 74 (Cic. pro Mur. 8); aedilis curulis, B. C. 69; and during his praetorship, B. C. 65, he had the quaestio peculatus (pro Mur. 20). In his first candidateship for the consulship, B. C. 63, Servius was rejected, and Servius and Cato joined in prosecuting L. Murena, who was elected. Murena was defended by Cicero, Hortensius, and M. Crassus (Oratio pro Murena). In B. C. 52, as interrex, he named Pompeius Magnus sole consul. In B. C. 51, he was elected consul with M. Claudius Marcellus; and on this occasion Cato was an unsuccessful candidate. (Plut. Cato, 49.) There is no mention of any decided part that Servius took in the war between Caesar and Pompeius, but he appears to have been a partizan of Caesar, who, after the battle of Pharsalia, made him proconsul of Achaea, B. C. 46 or 45; and Sulpicius held this office at the time when Cicero addressed to him a letter, which is still extant (ad Fam. iv. 3). Marcellus, the former colleague of Servius in the consulship, was murdered at Peiraeeus during the government of Servius, who buried him in the gymnasium of the Academia, where a marble monument to his memory was raised. The death of Marcellus is told in a letter of Servius to Cicero.

In B. C. 43 he was sent by the senate, with L. Philippus and L. Calpurnius Piso, on a mission to M. Antonius, who was besieging Decimus Brutus, in Mutina. Servius, who was in bad health, died in the camp of Antonius. Cicero, in the senate, pronounced a panegyric on his distinguished friend, and on his motion a public funeral was decreed, and a bronze statue was erected to the memory of Servius, and appropriately placed in front of the rostra. The statue was still there when Pomponius wrote. (Cic. Philipp. ix. 7; Pomponius, Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. 2. § 43.)

Servius had a wife named Postumia, and he left a son, Servius.

Our chief information about Servius is derived from Cicero, who attributes his great superiority as a lawyer to his study of philosophy, not that philosophy itself made him a distinguished lawyer, but the discipline, to which his mind had been subjected, developed and sharpened his natural talents. In a passage in his Brutus (c. 41) Cicero has, in few words and in a masterly manner, shown in what the excellence of Servius consisted. His speeches and his responsa were free from all obscurity; and this clearness was the result of a careful separation of a thing into all its parts, an exact definition of all that was by implication contained in it, and the removal of all obscurity by just interpretation. As to what was ambiguous, his first care was to ascertain the ambiguity, and then to separate it from every thing else; he applied a correct judgment to the estimate of truth and falsehood, and he deduced his conclusions from his premises with logical precision. To these qualities were added a profound knowledge of the Jus Civile, a perfect apprehension of the universal principles of the Jus Naturale, and a power of expression in which no man surpassed him. Perhaps of all the men of his age, or of any age, he was, as an orator, a jurist, and an advocate, without an equal or a rival. His friend Cicero has recorded the excellence of his moral character. Servius left about one hundred and eighty treatises, or parts or sections of treatises (libri), among which were criticisms on the responsa of Scaevola the pontifex. (Gell. iv. 1; Dig. 17. tit. 2. s. 30.) Several of these treatises were extant in the time of Pomponius, and Servius is often cited by the jurists whose writings are excerpted in the Digest; but there is no excerpt directly from Servius in the Digest. Servius had numerous pupils, the most distinguished of whom were A. Ofilius and Alfenus Varus. From the writings of eight of the pupils of Servius, Aufidius Namusa, who was one of them, compiled a large treatise in 140 parts; and it is to this work that later jurists refer, when they cite "Servii auditores" as a collective term. He was probably the author of a commentary on the Twelve Tables; and he wrote also Ad Edictum, and Notae ad Mucium, which have been already referred to. He was also the author of a treatise De Dotibus (Gell. iv. 3; Dig. 12. tit. 4. s. 8), and of several books De Sacris Detestandis (Gell. vi. 121); and there are fragments or short notices of various other works of his (Cic. Top. 8; Macrob. Saturn. 3), and of his orations. Quintilian speaks of three Orationes of Servius as being extant in his time (Inst. Or. x. 1 and 7); one of these was his speech against L. Licinius Murena, who was accused of ambitus, B. C. 63; and the other was a speech Pro Aufidia, or Contra Aufidiam, it is doubtful which, delivered probably in B. C. 44 or 43. (Meyer, Oratorum Romanorum Frag. p. 398, 2d ed.)

There are extant in the collection of Cicero's Epistles (ad Fam. iv.), two letters from Sulpicius to Cicero, one of which is the well-known letter of consolation on the death of Tullia, the daughter of the orator. The same book contains several letters from Cicero to Sulpicius. He is also said to have written some erotic poetry. (Ovid, Trist. ii. l. 141; Plin. Epist. v. 3.) [G. L.]

SULPI'CIUS SEVE'RUS. [SEVERUS.]

SULPI'CIUS TERTULLUS. [TERTULLUS.]

SULPI'CIUS VICTOR. [VICTOR.]

SUMMA'NUS, a derivative form from summus, the highest, an ancient Roman or Etruscan divinity, who was equal or even of higher rank than Jupiter; in fact, it would seem that as Jupiter was the god of heaven in the bright day, so Summanus was the god of the nocturnal heaven, and lightnings plying in the night were regarded as the work of Summanus (Augustin, De Civ. Dei, iv. 23; Plin. H. N. ii. 53; Paul Diac. s. v. Dium, p. 75; Fest. s. v. provorsum, p. 229, ed. Müller.) Varro (De Ling. Lat. v. 74) describes the god as of Sabine origin; but the ancients themselves on this as on many other points connected with their earliest religion, were in great uncertainty both in regard to the nature and the origin of Summanus; and some connecting the name with sub and manes regarded him as a deity of the lower world, an opinion which is totally at variance with the attributes given him by most writers, and there is ample reason for regarding him as the Jupiter of night. He had a temple at Rome near the Circus Maximus (Plin. H. N. xxix. 14; Liv. xxxii. 29; Ov. Fast. vi. 731). There was a representation of Summanus in the pediment of the Capitoline temple (Cic. de Div. i. 10; comp. Müller, Etrusk. vol. ii. pp. 60, 167; Hartung, Die Relig. der Röm. vol. ii. p. 59, &c.) [L. S.]

SU'PERA, CORNE'LIA. A few medals, both Roman and Greek, are extant bearing the above name, with the addition of Augusta or CEBACTH. Antiquarians differ in opinion as to the reign to which they belong, but from the date upon a coin of Aegae in Cilicia, which bears her name, it seems almost certain that she must have been the wife either of Trebonianus Gallus, or of Aemilianus, while other circumstances make it highly probable that the latter was her husband. (Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 374.) [W. R.]

COIN OF CORNELIA SUPERA.

SUPERBUS, TARQUI'NIUS. [TARQUINIUS.]

SUPERIA'NUS (Σουπεριανός), a sophist at Athens, of whom an account is preserved by Suidas (s. v.).

SURA, a cognomen in many Roman gentes, signifies "the calf of the leg," and is one of the many cognomens which took their origin from some bodily peculiarity in the person to whom it was first given.

SURA, A'CCIUS, for whom the younger Pliny begs the praetorship from the emperor Trajan. (Plin. Ep. x. 7. s. 9.)

SURA, AEMI'LIUS, the author of a work De Annis Populi Romani, an extract from which is inserted in the present text of Velleius Paterculus (i. 6), but evidently not by Paterculus himself.

SURA, BRU'TTIUS, legatus of C. Sentius Saturninus, praetor in Macedonia in B. C. 88, was sent against Metrophanes, the general of Mithridates, whom he defeated in a naval engagement, and compelled to take to flight. He followed up his victory by taking the island of Sciathus, where the enemy had deposited their plunder. He next advanced into Boeotia, to oppose Archelaus, with whom he fought for three days in succession. Plutarch relates that he gained a brilliant victory, but Appian says that the two armies parted on equal terms. On the approach of Sulla, who had been appointed to the command of the Mithridatic war, Sura quitted Boeotia, and returned to his commander in Macedonia. (Appian, Mithr. 29; Plut. Sull. 11.)

SURA, L. LICI'NIUS, was three times consul under Trajan, first suffectus in A. D. 98, in which year Trajan succeeded to the empire, and twice ordinary consul in A. D. 102 and 107. He was one of the most intimate friends of Trajan, and by his strong recommendation of the latter to Nerva, had a great share in gaining for him the empire. He likewise employed his influence with Trajan to gain for Hadrian more of the emperor's favour, and he may be said thus to have placed two emperors on the throne. Trajan continued to cherish an undiminished regard for Sura as long as he lived. He frequently employed Sura to write his orations; and on the death of the latter he honoured him with a public funeral, and erected baths to perpetuate his memory. Dion Cassius relates that Sura was sent as ambassador to Decebalus in the Dacian war. Two of Pliny's letters are addressed to him. (Dion Cass. lxviii. 9, 15; Aurel. Vict. Caes. 13. § 8, Epit. 13. § 6; Spartian. Hadr. 2, 3; Julian, Caes. p. 846, Sylb.; Plin. Ep. iv. 30, vii. 27.)

SURA, PALFU'RIUS. [PALFURIUS.]

SURDI'NIUS GALLUS. [GALLUS.]

SURDI'NUS. 1. A person spoken of in the consulship of Mam. Aemilius Lepidus, B. C. 77. (Val. Max. vii. 7. § 6.)

2. A rhetorician and a contemporary of the elder Seneca, elegantly translated some Greek plays into the Latin language. (Senec. Suas. 8, Controv. 20, 21.)

SURDI'NUS, L. NAE'VIUS, a triumvir of the mint under Augustus, whose name occurs on coins, of which a specimen is annexed. The head of Augustus is on the obverse.

SURE'NAS, the general of the Parthians, who defeated Crassus in B. C. 54. [CRASSUS, p. 878.]

SUSA'RION (Σουσαρίων), to whom the origin of the Attic Comedy is ascribed, is said to have been the son of Philinus, and a native of Tripodiscus, a village in the Megaric territory, whence he removed into Attica, to the village of Icaria, a place celebrated as a seat of the worship of Dionysus. (Ath. ii. p. 40, b.; Schol. Il. xxii. 29.) This account agrees with the claim which the Megarians asserted to the invention of comedy, and which was generally admitted. (Aristot. Poet. iii. 5; Aspasius, ad Aristot. Eth. Nic. iv. 2; Dict. of Antiq. art. Comoedia, p. 342, 2d ed.) Before the time of Susarion there was, no doubt, practised, at Icaria and the other Attic villages, that extempore jesting and buffoonery which formed a marked feature of the festivals of Dionysus; but Susarion was the first who so regulated this species of amusement, as to lay the foundation of Comedy, properly so called. The time at which this important step was taken can be determined within pretty close limits. The Megaric comedy appears to have flourished, in its full developement, about Ol. 45 or 46, B. C. 600 and onwards; and it was introduced by Susarion into Attica between Ol 50 and 54, B. C. 580—564. (Plut. Sol. 10; Marm. Par. Ep. 39; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. pp. 19, 20.)

The Megaric comedy appears to have consisted chiefly in coarse and bitter personal jests, and broad buffoonery, and this character it retained long after its offspring, the Attic comedy, had become more refined. (Meineke, pp. 20—24.) That the comedy of Susarion partook of a like rudeness and buffoonery might reasonably be supposed, even if it were not expressly asserted by ancient writers (Anon. de Com. p. xxxii.; Diomed. Grammat. iii. p. 486); but there can be no doubt that, in his hands, a great and decided advance was made in the character of the composition, which now in fact, for the first time, deserved that name. One change, which he introduced, is alone sufficient to mark the difference between an unregulated exercise of wit and an orderly composition; he was the first who adopted the metrical form of language for comedy (τῆς ἐμμέτρου κωμῳδίας ἀρχηγὸς ἐγένετο, Schol. Dion. Thrac. p. 748; Tzetzes, ap. Cramer. Anecd. vol. iii. p. 336; Schol. Hermog. ap. Reisk. Orat. Graec. vol. viii. p. 959; Bentley, Phal.) It is not, however, to be inferred that the comedies of Susarion were written; Bentley has shown that the contrary is probably true. They were brought forward solely through the medium of the chorus, which Susarion, doubtless, subjected to certain rules. (Marm. Par. vv. 54, 55, as restored by Böckh, Corp. Inscr. vol ii. p. 301.) It seems most probable that his plays were not acted upon waggons. (Meineke, p. 25.) Of the nature of his subjects we know nothing for certain; but it can hardly be conceived that his comedies were made up entirely of the mere jests which formed the staple of the Megaric comedy; although there could only have been a very imperfect approach to anything like connected argument or plots, for Aristotle expressly tells us that Crates was the first who made λόγους ἢ μύθους. (Poët. v. 6; CRATES.) The improvements of Susarion, then, on the Megaric comedy, which he introduced into Attica, may be said to have consisted in the substitution of premeditated metrical compositions for irregular extemporaneous effusions, and the regulation of the chorus to some extent. It was long before this new species of composition took firm root in Attica; for we hear nothing more of it until eighty years after the time of Susarion, where the art revived in the hands of Euetes, Euxenides, and Myllus, at the very time when the Dorian comedy was developed by Epicharmus in Sicily. (Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. pp. 18—26.) [P. S.]

SYADRAS. [CHARTAS.]

SYAGER (Σύαγρος), a Lacedaemonian, was the deputy from his state in the embassy which the Greeks sent to Gelon, to ask his assistance against Xerxes. [GELON.] Syager indignantly rejected, on behalf of Sparta, the condition insisted on by the tyrant, that he should have the supreme command of the allied armament (Herod. vii. 153, 159.) [E. E.]

SYAGER (Σύαγρος), one of the alleged ante-Homeric poets, is said to have flourished after Orpheus and Musaeus, and to have been the first who sang the Trojan War. (Ael. V. H. xiv. 21; Eustath. ad Il. vol. i. p. 3.) He is perhaps the same as the Sagaris whom Aristotle mentioned, according to Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 46), as contemporary with Homer. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 6, 291, 562; Bode, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. i. p. 247.) [P. S.]

SYCHAEUS or SICHAEUS, a wealthy Phoenician and husband of Dido, whose brother Pygmalion, anxious to secure his treasures, treacherously murdered him. (Virg. Aen. i. 347, &c., iv. 20, 502, 532, 632, vi. 474; Justin, xviii. 4, calls him Acerbas, and represents the matter somewhat differently from the account in Virgil.) [L. S.]

SYE'NNESIS (Συέννεσις), appears to have been a common name of the kings of Cilicia. We find the following mentioned in history.

1. A king of Cilicia, who joined with Labynetus (Nebuchadnezzar) in mediating between Cyaxares and Alyattes, the kings respectively of Media and Lydia, probably in B. C. 610. (Herod. i. 74; comp. Grote's Greece, vol. iii. pp. 311, 312.)

2. Another, contemporary with Dareius Hystaspis, to whom he was tributary. His daughter was married to Pixodarus. [PIXODARUS, No. 1.] (Herod. iii. 90, v. 118.) He was perhaps the same prince whom Herodotus mentions (vii. 98) as one of the most distinguished of the subordinate commanders in the fleet of Xerxes. (Comp. Aesch. Pers. 318, &c.)

3. Contemporary with Artaxerxes II. (Mnemon). When Cyrus the younger, marching against Artaxerxes, in B. C. 401, arrived at the borders of Cilicia, he found the passes guarded by Syennesis, who, however, withdrew his troops, on receiving intelligence that the force sent forward by Cyrus under Menon had already entered Cilicia, and that the combined fleet of the Lacedaemonians and the prince, under Samius and Tamos, was sailing round from Ionia. When Cyrus reached Tarsus, the Cilician capital, he found that Menon's soldiers had sacked the city, and that Syennesis had fled for refuge to a stronghold among the mountains. He was induced, however, by his wife Epyaxa to obey the summons of Cyrus, and to present himself before him at Tarsus. Here he received gifts of honour from the young prince, whom he supplied in his turn with a large sum of money and a considerable body of troops under the command of one of his sons. At the same time, however, he took care to send his other son to Artaxerxes, to represent this step as having been taken on compulsion, while his heart all the time was with the king. From the narrative of Xenophon it appears that Syennesis at this time, though really a vassal of Persia, affected the tone of an independent sovereign. (Xen. Hell. iii. 1. § 1, Anab. i. 2. §§ 12, 21—27, 4. § 4, vii. 8. § 25; Diod. xiv. 20; Wess. ad loc.) [E. E.]

SYE'NNESIS (Συέννεσις), a physician of Cyprus, who must have lived in or before the fourth century B. C., as he is mentioned by Aristotle (Hist. Anim. iii. 2. § 3), who quotes from his writings a passage on the origin of the veins. This fragment also forms part of the treatise "De Ossium Natura" in the Hippocratic Collection (vol. i. p. 507), which is in fact composed entirely of passages taken from different ancient writers. (See Littré's Oeuvres d'Hippocr. vol. i. p. 419.) [W. A. G.]

SYLOSON (Συλοσῶν), the son of Aeaces, assisted his brother Polycrates in making himself master of their native island Samos. For a time Polycrates shared the supreme power with Syloson and his other brother Pantagnotus; but shortly afterwards he put the latter to death, and banished the former. Syloson therefore repaired to Egypt, where Cambyses was at that time with his Persian army. As he was one day walking in Memphis, a scarlet cloak which he wore attracted the notice of Dareius, son of Hystaspes, who was then serving among the guards of the Persian monarch. Dareius offered to buy the cloak; but a divine inspiration, as Herodotus says, prompted Syloson to reply that he would not sell it, but would give it him, if he must have it. Dareius accepted the present, and there the matter ended for the time. But at length Syloson heard, with surprise, that the unknown Persian to whom he had given the cloak, was now the great king. He accordingly hastened to Susa, and found Dareius willing to remunerate him in a manner worthy of the king of Persia. Syloson refused the gold and silver which were offered him, and prayed that the island of Samos might be handed over to him. His request was complied with, and Otanes was sent with an army to place the island in the power of Syloson. Since the death of Polycrates, the supreme power had been in the hands of Maeandrius. The latter was in no condition to resist the Persians, and he capitulated to quit the island with his treasures; but immediately after he had sailed away, his crazy brother Charilaus, whom he had left in command of the Acropolis, fell upon the unsuspecting Persians, and killed many of their officers. [POLYCRATES; MAEANDRIUS; CHARILAUS.] The consequence of this treacherous conduct was a wholesale massacre of the inhabitants by Otanes; and the island was handed over to Syloson, stripped of its male inhabitants. Otanes afterwards repeopled the island, but we are not told from what quarter the new population came. Strabo represents Syloson as a cruel tyrant, who depopulated the island, but continued to rule Samos, as a tributary of Persia, till his death, when he was succeeded in the supreme power by his son Aeaces. (Herod. iii. 39, 139—149, vi. 13; Strab. xiv. p. 638; Grote, Hist. of Greece, vol. iv. pp. 332—337.)

SY'LVIUS. [SILVIUS.]

SYME (Σύμη), a daughter of Ialysus and Dotis, was carried off by Glaucus to an island near Rhodes, off the coast of Caria, which received its name from her. (Athen. vii. p. 296; Steph. Byz. s. v.) [L. S.]

SY'MEON or SI'MEON or SYMEO'NES (Συμεών sometimes Συμεώνης), literary and ecclesiastical. 1. ABBAS [No. 16].

2. ACOEMITENSIS MONACHUS. Symeones, a monk of one of the monasteries of the Acoemitenses at Constantinople, was sent by Cyril, his hegumenus or abbot, to Pope Felix II. or III. at Rome, to stir him up to the more active support of orthodoxy, then seriously threatened in the East by the strength of the Monophysite party and the temporising policy of the Emperor Anastasius, and the patriarch of Constantinople, Acacius. The mission of Symeon determined the Pope to act more decisively and to refuse to recognize Peter the Fuller, who had regained the see of Antioch for the last time, about A. D. 485 [PETRUS, No. 17]; it led also to the deposition, for unfaithfulness and undue favour to the Monophysite party, of the presbyters Misenus and Vitalis, who had been sent by the Pope to Constantinople. (Evagrius, H. E. iii. 21.)

3. Of ANTIOCH. [No. 27.]

4. Of CONSTANTINOPLE. [No. 16.]

5. Of CTESIPHON. [No. 26.]

6. Metropolitan of EUCHAITA in Pontus, a writer whose date is not exactly ascertained, but who probably lived towards the end of the ninth century. There are extant in MS. two of his letters, Epistolae duae ad Joannem Monachum, from which Allatius has given two or three very brief citations. (Allatius, De Symeon. Scriptis, p. 179; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. pp. 296, 712; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. Dissert. prima, p. 18. folio, Oxford, 1740—43; Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, vol. i. col. 545.)

7. GRAMMATICUS. Daniel de Nessel in his Catalogus Bibliothecae Caesaraeae, pars iv. p. 77, fol. Vienna, 1690, describes a Greek MS. in that library as containing Simeonis Grammatici Etymologicon: the work is arranged in alphabetical order and has never been published. The MS. which was torn and imperfect, is not noticed, so far as we have been able to trace, by Kollar, in his edition of the Commentarius of Lambecius. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. pp. 379, 604.)

8. HAERESIARCHA s. MASSALIANUS. In an appendix to the Panoplia of Euthymius Zigabenus [EUTHYMIUS ZIGABENUS] described by Lambecius, who printed some portions of it (Commentarius de Biblioth. Caesaraea, lib. s. vol. iii. col. 424, &c.), and published, with a Latin version, by Tollius (Insignia Itinerarii Italici, p. 106, &c.), are a string of anathemas against various Massalians or Bogomilans, among whom are given in one group Dadoes, Sabas, Adelpheios, Hermas, and Symeon. These do not belong to the age of Alexius Comnenus, to which Euthymius belonged, and in which the anathemas appear to have been uttered, but to a much earlier period, for in an account of the Council of Side in Pamphylia, held in or about A. D. 381, and which account is preserved by Photius, (Biblioth. Cod. 52), Dadoes, Sabas, Adelpheios, and Symeon are mentioned as contemporaries of the council and founders of the Massalian or Euchite sect. Theodoret also (Haeret. Fabul. Compend. iv. 11) mentions them. In the older editions of Photius the name of Symeon was written Σημεσώνης, "Semesones," but Bekker in his edition gives it (on the authority of a manuscript in the library of Cardinal Bessarion, now of St. Mark, at Venice) Συμεωνης, Symeones, which is the form used by Theodoret (l. c.). Lambecius and Tollius give it as Συμεών, Symeon. The sect of which he was one of the leaders had its rise in the reign of the Emperor Constantius II., apparently in the parts of Mesopotamia and Asia Minor adjacent to the Euphrates. They were a very enthusiastic sect, who placed the whole business of life in prayer and religious exercises, in which they gave themselves up to unwonted and uncontrolled excesses. Their names, Massaliani or Messaliani or Mesaliani (Μασσαλιανοὶ or Μεσσαλιανοί, or Μεσαλιανοί), and Euchitae (Εὐχῖται), derived the first from the Syriac, the second from the Greek language, were significant of their characteristic practice; they meant "praying people."

There was another Symeon, an haeresiarch, who was burnt to death with many of his followers for heresy in the time of Justinian II. Photius gives to him the vague and often misapplied epithet of a Manichaean. (Phot. Narratio in epitome de Manichaeis repullulantibus, apud Montfauc. Biblioth. Coislin. pp. 360, 361.)

9. HIEROMONACHUS. [Nos. 23, 25.]

10. HIEROSOLYMITANUS, or of JERUSALEM (1). Symeon or Simon, son of Cleophas, and, according to general belief, kinsman of Jesus Christ, was, according to the ecclesiastical historians, the second bishop of the Church of Jerusalem, the Apostle James, son of Alpheius, having been the first. Some of the later Greeks represent Symeon as the son of Joseph (husband of the Virgin Mary) by a former wife. The tradition of his appointment is given by Eusebius (H. E. iii. 11). After holding his bishopric for many years Symeon was put to death for his faith as a Christian, and because he was descended from David. He was a hundred and twenty years old at the time of his martyrdom, which took place during the persecution in the reign of Trajan, and while Atticus, the consular, was governor of Syria. Eusebius, in his Chronicon, places the martyrdom of Symeon in the tenth year of Trajan, the third year of Olympiad 221, in the fourth consulship of Sosius and third of Sura, A. D. 107. Some critics, including Bishop Lloyd of St. Asaph, Dodwell, and Pagi, bring down his death to A. D. 116. Symeon is worshipped as a Saint both by the Latin and Greek Churches, by the former on the 18th of February, by the latter on the 27th of April. He was succeeded in his bishopric by Justus. (Euseb. H. E. iii. 11, 32; Hegesippus, apud Euseb. ll. cc.; Euseb. Chronicon; Chronicon Paschale; Acta Sanctorum Februar. ad diem xviii. vol. iii. p. 53; Le Quien, Oriens Christian. vol. iii. col. 140.)

11. HIEROSOLYMITANUS (2). Toward the close of the eleventh century, the patriarchate of Jerusalem was held by Symeon or Simon II. In the Latin catalogues of the bishops of Jerusalem he is called Simon; but the Latin historians of the crusades generally write his name Symeon or Simeon. He succeeded Euthymius, but in what year is not known: he was already patriarch in A. D. 1094, when he had many conversations with Peter the Hermit, then on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, on the deplorable state of the Christians in the East; and these conversations were among the means of exciting the compassion and zeal of Peter, and eventually of producing the crusades. On the arrival of the crusaders in Syria, and the formation of the siege of Antioch by them, in A. D. 1098, Symeon, terrified by the threats of the Turks of Jerusalem, fled to the island of Cyprus. From this island he maintained a friendly intercourse with the leaders of the crusaders, sending them presents of fruits, wine, poultry, and such things as he could. He died just about the time of the capture of Jerusalem, and the vacancy caused by his death being filled up by the crusaders with a patriarch of the Latin Church, and by the native Christians with one of the Greek Church, gave occasion to a long continued schism and a succession of rival claimants of the two Churches. An extant treatise De Azymis adversus Latinos, from which Allatius (De Symeon. Scriptis, p. 180) gives a passage, is ascribed, and apparently with good reason, to our Symeon. Le Quien, indeed, doubts whether it is correctly ascribed to him, because the author appears "not to have been hostile to the Latins;" but the very courtesy of tone which occasioned Le Quien's doubts, while sufficiently at variance with the usual style of mediaeval polemics, is just such as a man in Symeon's circumstances would be likely to use. (Willermus s. Guillelmus Tyrensis, lib. i. c. 11; Albertus Aquensis, Historia Hieros. lib. vi. c. 39; Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, vol. iii. col. 498; Allatius, l. c.; Montfaucon, Biblioth. Coislin. p. 105; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 1090, vol. ii. p. 159.)

12. Humilis. [No. 16.]

13. Logotheta. [No. 22.]

14. Logotheta Junior. In the Bibliotheca Juris Canonici of Justellus and Voellus (vol. ii. p. 710) is given the Ἐπιτομὴ κανόνων, Epitome Canonum s. Synopsis Canonica of Symeon Magister and Logotheta. Cave and Oudin distinguish this Symeon from Symeon Metaphrastes [No. 22], who also bore the titles of Magister and Logotheta, by the epithet Junior. The work itself is more ancient than the period (A. D. 1170) in which Cave places this Symeon junior, who could only have selected and arranged it, and possibly (as Beveridge conjectured) made annotations upon it. Christopher Justellus in the Praefatio to the second volume of the Bibliotheca Juris Canonici supposes the Symeon Logotheta who compiled the Epitome, to have been somewhat later than Alexius Aristinus or Aristenus [Alexius Aristenus], who belonged to the middle of the twelfth century, and this appears to have led Cave and Oudin to distinguish him from Metaphrastes, who belongs to a much earlier period. But as, according to Cave's own acknowledgment, the Canones are really of earlier date, and as in the title the compiler is no otherwise distinguished than by the titles Magister and Logotheta, which were borne by Metaphrastes, we agree with Fabricius in assigning the Epitome to Metaphrastes, and regard "Symeon Logotheta Junior" as an imaginary person. In that case the other works which Oudin and Cave ascribe to him must belong to some other Symeon. (Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 1170, vol. ii. p. 241; Oudin, De Scriptoribus Eccles. vol. ii. col. 1366, &c.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 297.)

15. Magister. [No. 22.]

16. S. Mamantis, styled in the MSS. of his works, νέος θεολόγος, ἡγούμενος μόνης τοῦ ἁγίου Μάμαντος τοῦ ξηροκέρκου, Novus Theologus (or Theologus Junior) et Hegumenus (s. Abbas) Monasterii S. Mamantis in Xerocerco, or, as some correct it, τοῦ ξυλοκέρκου, in Xylocerco. His title "Theologus" indicates his eminence as a writer on divinity; and the epithet "Novus" or "Junior" was evidently added to distinguish him from some other ecclesiastic, perhaps from Gregory Nazianzen, to whom at a much earlier period the title "Theologus" was given; or more probably to distinguish him from some other Symeon, either Symeon Metaphrastes [No. 22] or Symeon the Pious [No. 24]. The time at which this writer flourished has been much disputed; but the facts of his history enable us to assign him to the latter half of the tenth and the beginning of the eleventh century. He was born about the middle of the tenth century, of wealthy and noble parents, named Basil and Theophano, at a place called Galate in Paphlagonia; and was sent at an early age, for his education, to Constantinople, where his relatives held high stations at the Byzantine court. His precocious attainments inspired the highest hopes of his family, and he was introduced by an uncle to the notice of the imperial brothers Basil II. and Constantine IX., apparently at the time when they were yet in their boyhood, and were emperors in name only, the reins of empire being really held successively by Nicephorus Phocas (A. D. 963—969) and John Tzimisces (A. D. 969—975). After the sudden death of the uncle by whom he had been introduced at court, Symeon determined, though only fourteen years of age, to embrace a monastic life; but the monk Symeon the Pious (Συμεὼν ὁ εὐλαβής), or as Combéfis styles him, "Venerabilis," the Venerable [No. 24], whom he had chosen for his spiritual guide and father, having advised him to defer his purpose, he returned for a time to the house of his deceased uncle. At a somewhat later period he commenced his noviciate in the Monastery of Studium at Constantinople; but was induced by the envy of the abbot and some of the monks, excited by his pre-eminence in monastic practices, to remove to the Monastery of St. Mamas, where he completed his noviciate, and, in course of time, became abbot and was ordained presbyter. This was some time in the patriarchate of Nicolaus Chrysoberges, who was patriarch of Constantinople from A. D. 982 to 996. After some years Symeon, who had experienced trouble and danger from the turbulence of some recusant monks, resigned the abbacy, and devoted himself to the composition of works of piety. His literary labours attracted the approving notice of Sergius II., who held the patriarchate from A. D. 999 to 1019 or 1020: but this must have been quite in the early part of the patriarchate of Sergius, who was soon alienated from Symeon by the instrumentality of his syncellus, Stephanus, archbishop of Nicomedeia, a man of learning and eloquence, who was jealous of Symeon. The charge against Symeon was, that he paid unauthorized honour to the memory of his spiritual father, Symeon the Pious, who was now dead; and to whom our Symeon paid the honours due to a canonized saint. In consequence of this difference Symeon, after six years of persecution, was banished from his monastery, and from Constantinople, by the patriarch and synod. This punishment was remitted, and high honours in the Church offered him, if he would comply with the wishes of the patriarch, but he would not purchase them by sacrificing the memory of his friend. He was enabled by the liberality of his friends to found a monastery in the place where he had taken up his abode during his exile, a deserted chapel of St. Marina, on the Asiatic side of the Propontis; and there he remained till his death. His life has been written at length by one of his disciples, Nicetas Stethatus, who has embellished the narrative with the usual appendages of celestial gifts, divine visions, and miraculous incidents: and from a summary of this given by Combéfis, in his Auctarium Novissimum, pars ii. p. 119, &c., and from an abridged translation of it in Romaic or modern Greek, we are indebted for the above particulars. Allatius considers Symeon to have been the precursor of the fanatic quietists, who some centuries after gave occasion to the controversy that so agitated the Greek Church, respecting the uncreated light of Mount Tabor. [Palamas.]

The works of Symeon of St. Mamas are numerous, and are divisible into the following classes: —1. Λόγοι, Orationes. Allatius (De Symeon. Scriptis) gives a catalogue of the subjects and opening sentences of seventy-eight of these, extant in various MSS. in the original Greek; and the list is transcribed by Fabricius (Biblioth. Graec. vol. xi. p. 304, &c.). Several of these, and some others of which the original Greek was not known by Allatius to be extant, thirty-three in all, were published in a Latin version by Jac. Pontanus, with a preface and notes by Jac. Gretserus, 4to. Ingolstadt, 1603. The original of these thirty-three, in the order in which Pontanus gave them, together with twenty others, were in a MS. in the Coislin Library. (Montfaucon, Biblioth. Coislin. p. 407.) To this version Pontanus subjoined a Lation version of several pieces by different authors. A modern (Romaic) Greek version of the works of Symeon contains ninety-two of these Λόγοι. 2. Κεφάλαια πρακτικὰ καὶ θεολογικά, Capita Moralia. The number of these varies in different copies, either from some copies being imperfect, or from a difference of arrangement: in some MSS. they are arranged in three divisions, and amount in all to two hundred and twenty-eight (comp. Allat. de Symeon. p. 166); and this is the number in the version of Pontanus published with the Orationes. The modern Greek version contains only one hundred and eighty-one; but it contains also other Κεφάλαια, to the number of forty, by Symeon designated "the Pious" (Συμεῶνος τοῦ εὐλαβοῦς). [No. 24.] 3. Θεῖοι ὕμνοι, Divini Hymni, or, as Pontanus entitled them in his Latin version, Sacrae Commentationes. These are in verse of various kinds, iambic, anacreontic, and of the kind called "versus politici." (This last kind of verses is described in a note to the article PHILIPPUS, literary and ecclesiastical, No. 27, p. 291.) Allatius (p. 161, &c.) and, after him, Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 314, &c.). give the titles of fifty-eight of these Hymni, thirty-eight of which, according to Allatius, were translated into Latin, and published by Pontanus: but either by the subdivision or alteration of these, or by the addition of others, of which the original is not known, Pontanus, who has destroyed the poetical form of the original, and arranged them in one Sacrarum Commentationum Liber, gives forty "capita." The modern Greek version is in verse, and comprehends fifty-one Λόγοι, Orationes s. Libri. The dissertation Περὶ ἀλλοιώσεων ψυχῆς καὶ σώματος τῶν ἐξ ἀέρων, τῶν ἐκ στοιχείων, τῶν ἐκ βρωμάτων καὶ τῶν ἐκ δαιμόνων ἐπιγενομένων ἡμῖν λόγος, De Alterationibus Animae et Corporis quae ex Varietate Coeli aut Aeris quaeque ex Elementis, ex Cibis, interdum etiam ex Daemonibus existere in nobis solent Dissertatio, published, with a Latin version by the Jesuit Possinus, in the notes to his edition of the S. Nili Epistolae, 4to. Paris, 1657, is one of the Orationes translated by Pontanus. These are all the works of Symeon which have been published, and chiefly in Latin or modern Greek versions. The Latin versions of Pontanus and Possinus are contained in the Maxima Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. xxii. ad init. fol. Lyon. 1677. The modern or Romaic Greek version was made by Dionysius Zagoraeus (Διονύσιος Ζαγοραῖος), a hermit of the desert islet of Piperi, off the promontory of Athos, and was published 4to., Venice, 1790, with the abridged Romaic version of Nicetas Stethatus's life of Symeon prefixed. Allatius, Oudin, and Harless, in his edition of Fabricius, give the titles of various works of Symeon, extant in MS. in various libraries; but many of them appear to be only duplicates or extracts of those already mentioned, with titles more or less varied. Combéfis ascribes to him a discourse in honour of Symeon the Just, who is mentioned in the New Testament as taking the infant Christ in his arms. The author of this discourse styles himself Συμεὼν ὁ ταπεινός, Symeon Humilis. Symeon was held in the highest esteem in his own and following generations, and Allatius has quoted several laudatory poetical effusions in his honour. (Allatius, De Symeon. Scriptis, p. 151, &c.; Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. x. p. 323, note h., vol. xi. p. 302, &c.; Oudin, De Scriptoribus Eccles. vol. ii. col. 587, &c.; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 1051, vol. ii. p. 138, ed. Oxford, 1740—1743.)

17. MANDRITA. [No. 31.]

18. MANICHAEUS. [No. 8.]

19. MARTYR. [No. 26.]

20. MASSALIANUS. [No. 8.]

21. Of MESOPOTAMIA. A discourse of which a Latin version under the title of Sermo de morte semper meditando, or Sermo de mente semper complectendo suum cuique discessum, is given in the Bibliotheca Patrum (Appendix ad edit. primam. Paris, 1579; vol. ii. ed. secunda, Paris, 1589; vol. v. pt. ii. ed. Cologne, 1618; vol. ii. col. 73—76, ed. Paris, 1654; vol. vii. p. 1227, ed. Lyon. 1677), where it is ascribed to the elder Symeon the Stylite [No. 31], is in a MS. of the original, in the Imperial Library at Vienna, ascribed to a Symeon of Mesopotamia. Τοῦ ἁγίου καὶ ὁσίου Συμεῶνος Μεσοποταμίας περὶ τοῦ ἀεὶ ἐν νῷ ἔχειν τὴν ἡμέραν τῆς ἐξόδου τοῦ βίου. Sancti Symeonis Mesopotamitae sermo de eo quod semper in animo habere debeamus diem exitus vitae. Lambecius shows, by quotations from the Vitae Patrum of Rosweydus, and the Menaea of the Greeks, that there was a particular monastery, in some locality not defined, apparently in the Syrian or Roman part of Mesopotamia, which was usually described by the name of the country, not of any particular adjacent spot: —"monasterium quod est in Mesopotamia Syriae," μονὴ τοῦ ἁγίου Ἀσκληπιοῦ τοῦ ἐν τῇ Μεσοποταμίᾳ τῆς Συρίας; and thinks it likely that Symeon, the author of the discourse, was abbot of this monastery. The Greek text, from which Lambecius cites some passages, differs materially in parts from the Latin version in the Bibliotheca Patrum. (Allat. De Symeon. Scriptis, p. 24; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 298; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. Dissertat. prima, p. 18; Lambec. Comment. de Biblioth. Caesaraea, vol. s. lib. v. col. 198, &c. ed. Kollar.)

22. METAPHRASTES (ὁ Μεταφραστής), known also by the titles of MAGISTER (ὁ Μάγιστρος) and LOGOTHETA (it is doubtful if he was LOGOTHETA CURSUS, ὁ Λογοθέτης τοῦ δρόμου, or MAGNUS LOGOTHETA, ὁ μέγας Λογοθέτης), a celebrated Byzantine writer of the end of the ninth and beginning and middle of the tenth centuries, as Allatius has shown, but about whose date writers have differed very widely, some placing him in the beginning of the third century, and others as late as the fourteenth (see Allatius and Cave, ubi infrà). Our chief authority for the life of Symeon is the Ἐγκώμιον εἰς τὸν Μεταφραστὴν κύριον Συμεῶνα. Encomium in Metaphrastem Dominum Symeonem of the younger Psellus [PSELLUS, No. 3], and an Ἀκολουθία, Officium, composed by the same author for the day (28th Nov.) on which Symeon is commemorated as a saint in the Greek Church; to which we may add some incidental notices from the writings of Symeon himself.

Symeon was a native of Constantinople, belonged to an illustrious family, possessed great wealth, and was remarkable even from childhood for "the flowers of the understanding," to quote the words of Psellus, which "blossomed in him." He studied rhetoric, and especially philosophy, and became eminent in both. The reputation he acquired recommended him to the notice of the government, and he was employed under the emperors Leo VI. the Philosopher, and Constantine VII. Porphyrogenitus, in public affairs. We should gather from the bombastic expressions of Psellus, that his first office was that of Proto-a-secretis, or chief secretary; but it is unlikely that so important an office should be the first entrusted to him: and the statement of Cedrenus, noticed below, seems more probable. His versatile talents were adapted both to counsel and to action; and he appears to have been engaged in repressing, both by arms and negotiations, the assaults of some enemies on the frontier of the empire, and in reducing others to subjection. He was characterised by magnificence in dress and stateliness of gait, yet tempered by a captivating address and easiness of access. He possessed also a liberal disposition, which his wealth afforded him ample opportunity of indulging. The declamation of Psellus contains neither particulars nor dates. A passage, however, in Symeon's account of St. Theoctista (apud Allat. De Symeon. Scriptis, p. 49), informs us that he was engaged in the expedition, under Himerius, against the Saracens of Crete, with whom he was commissioned to negotiate. This expedition, on Symeon's own authority in another place (Chronog. s. Annales. De Leone Basilii Fil. c. 21. Comp. Theophan. Continuat. lib. vi. De Leone Basilii Fil. c. 26), we may fix in the twenty-third year of the reign of Leo VI., A. D. 908. Allatius fixes the date, we believe erroneously, in A. D. 902. This, however, was not the first occasion in which Symeon appears as a prominent person: he was apparently the Symeon, Proto-a-secretis, who negotiated an exchange of prisoners with Leo the renegade, who commanded the Saracen fleet, which in A. D. 904 took Thessalonica (Theoph. Continuat. c. 21; Symeon. c. 14; Cameniata de Excidio Thessalonicensi, c. 62, 63; Zonaras, Annal. lib. xvi. c. 14; Cedren. Compend. p. 600, ed. Paris, vol. ii. p. 263, ed. Bonn.) According to Cedrenus, Symeon received the dignity of Proto-a-secretis as a reward for his service in this business, having previously held a subordinate office. It was when serving under Himerius, in A. D. 908, that Symeon first engaged in composing the lives of the Saints; and he pleaded as an excuse, when urged to undertake this task, the multitude of his engagements, and the cares of his wife and family. (Symeon. Vitae S. Theoctistae apud Allatium, p. 55.) The life of St. Theoctista, the first of his religious biographies, was not, however, written till after the death of the emperor Leo.

Symeon is mentioned by Liutprand, ambassador from the western emperor Otho to the Byzantine emperor Nicephorus Phocas, as still Proto-a-secretis in A. D. 968. (Baronii Annal. ad ann. 968, c. xxix.; comp. Pagi, Critice in Baron. ad ann. eundem, c. xii.; Liutprandi Legatio, apud Muratori, Rerum Italicarum Scriptores, vol. ii. p. 482.) Symeon is mentioned by Leo Diaconus (Historia, x. 7, p. 169, ed. Bonn) as still living when the comet appeared which shortly preceded the death of the emperor Joannes Tzimisces (comp. Cedrenus, p. 683, ed. Paris, vol. ii. p. 414, ed. Bonn), and which may be fixed in the year 975, so that he must have lived very nearly a century, and perhaps more. His death is described by Psellus as joyful and triumphant. (Comp. Allatius, Vossius, Cave, Oudin, Cellier, Saxius, ubi infra, and Pagi, Critice in Baronii Annales, ad ann. 902, i—xi.; ad ann. 975, c. ix. x.; Bollandus, Praefat. ad Acta Sanctor. cap. i. § 3, Januar. vol. i.)

The works of Metaphrastes are numerous and of varied character. They may be thus classified:— 1. Ἁγίων Βίοι s. Μεταφράσεις, Sanctorum Vitae s. Metaphrases. These constitute the largest and most important class of his writings. A few of them were probably original, but by far the greater part were paraphrases (μεταφράσεις) or recastings of more ancient legends, of which the language was too rude, or the narrative too meagre, to suit the vicious taste and boundless credulity of the age in which Symeon lived, and which he seems to have altered ad libitum. As many, if not most, of the saints whom he commemorated lived before the rupture between the Eastern and Western Churches, some of the more zealous Roman Catholics, as Aloysius Lipomannus, Gretser, and especially Allatius, contend earnestly for the credit of Metaphrastes. Protestant writers have generally set him down as an author unworthy of credit, with the exception, perhaps, of Cave, who seems to think that he only corrected the arrangement and style of those of the ancient legends which needed such revision, and left those which were better written altogether intact. The more critical Roman Catholics unite with the Protestants in depreciating the authority of Symeon. The number of the lives ascribed to Symeon in the MSS. amounts to between six and seven hundred. Lists of these and other Sanctorum Vitae are given by Allatius, ubi infra, and Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 186, seq.). Cave gives a list of a hundred and twenty-two which, after Allatius, he supposes to be correctly ascribed to Metaphrastes. Of those inaccurately assigned to him, Allatius ascribes four hundred and forty-four to other authors; of ninety-five others the authors are unknown. A great number of the Vitae, genuine or spurious, are published in a Latin version by Lipomannus, Surius, and others, in their collections, De Sanctorum Vitis: of these Allatius has given a list (p. 76): a few which Allatius also enumerates (p. 78) have been published in various works in the original Greek, with or without a Latin version. Another list of the published lives is given by Hamberger, Zuverlässige Nachrichten, vol. iv. p. 143, foll. (On these Sanctorum Vitae, the great work of Metaphrastes, see Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 180, &c., besides various incidental notices; and the authors cited at the close of this account.) 2. Συμεὼν μαγίστρου καὶ λογοθέτου χρονογραφία, Symeonis Magistri et Logothetae Annales. These extend from the beginning of the reign of Leo V. the Armenian, A. D. 813, where Theophanes concludes, to the reign of Romanus II. the younger, in the midst of which (A. D. 960 or 961) they somewhat abruptly break off. The work was prepared for the press by Combéfis, and is given among Οἱ μετὰ Θεοφάνην, Scrip- tores post Theophanem, in the Paris (fol. 1685), Venice (fol. 1729), and Bonn (8vo. 1838) editions of the Corpus Historiae Byzantinae. The Paris edition, from which the others are taken, was published after the death of Combéfis, and from that circumstance is without notes. In these Annales, which closely, often verbatim, agree with the anonymous continuator of Theophanes [LEONTIUS, literary, No. 6], and with George the Monk [GEORGIUS, literary and ecclesiastical, No. 33.], Symeon, in the incidental notices of himself already cited, speaks in the third person. 3. Chronicon s. Annales ab orbi condito. This Chronicon has never been published, and seems to be different from the more important work just cited: it was a mere compilation, and was apparently less laboriously prepared than the preceding work; and in many parts agrees with Theophanes. Kollar, however (Supplement ad Lambec. p. 737), speaks of the Annales mentioned above, as a portion of the Chronicon. Different copies of the Chronicon, and there are many MSS. which contain it, terminate at different periods: some end with the accession of Leo the Armenian at the point at which the Annales commence: others terminate with Constantine Porphyrogenitus, and have prefixed the following iambic couplet. A comparison of these last copies would show whether the Annales are an extract from the Chronicon, as Kollar supposes, or not.

> Τὸ Πορφυρογέννητον εὐσεβὲς κράτος.

One MS. at Venice comes down to the reign of Constantine XI. Ducas, who reigned from A. D. 1059 to 1067, a circumstance which shows either that the Chronicon received some additions from a later hand, or that it is incorrectly ascribed to our Symeon, and must have been composed by a later writer. Oudin observes that the Chronicon agrees in several places to the letter with the work of Leo Grammaticus; he says it is borrowed from it, and, as he assigns Leo's work to A. D. 1013, he urges this as one argument for the later date assigned by him to Metaphrastes. But we have elsewhere stated that the date assigned by him to Leo's work is inaccurate; the argument built upon it therefore falls. [LEO, Greek writers, No. 15.] Combéfis suspects that Psellus [PSELLUS, No. 3] was the continuator of the Chronicon. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. pp. 471, &c., p. 684, &c.) 4. Συμεὼν μαγίστρου καὶ λογοθέτου τοῦ δρόμου ἐπιστολαί, Symeonis Magistri et Logothetae Cursus Epistolae. Allatius has given nine of these, with a Latin version, at the end of his De Symeonum Scriptis, 4to. Paris, 1664. 5. Λόγοι, Sermones. One of these is given by Allatius with a Latin version at the end of his De Symeon. Scriptis. Another is given in a Latin version in the Bibliotheca Concionatoria of Combéfis, vol. iii. fol. Paris, 1662. Some others had been seen by Allatius in manuscript. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 183.) 6. Carmina. Some short poems of Symeon have been printed. Τοῦ Μεταφραστοῦ στίχοι εἰς τὴν ἔνσαρκον οἰκονομίαν. κατ' ἐρώτησιν δῆθεν καὶ ἀπόκρισιν, Metaphrastae de Salutis nostrae Mysterio et suscepti Nominis Sacramento: per interrogationem et responsionem, was published by Fed. Morel, with a Latin version, 4to. Paris, 1600. Στίχοι Συμεῶνος τοῦ Μεταφραστοῦ, Simeonis Metaphrastae trimetri iambici, four very short pieces, were given in the Poetae Graeci Christiani, una cum Homericis Cantonibus, 8vo. Paris, 1609, published for the use of the Jesuits schools; and were reprinted in the Ἕλληνες Ποιηταὶ παλαιοί, τραγικοὶ κ. τ. λ., Poetae Graeci veteres, tragici etc., vol. ii. p. 753, fol. Geneva, 1614. Four other short poems, two of them having their lines or alternate lines beginning with the successive letters of the alphabet, and bearing each the title Ἀλφάβετον, Alphabetum; and the other two addressed, one, Εἰς τὴν ἰδίαν ψυχήν, Ad sui ipsius Animam, the other, Εἰς κύριον Στυλιανὸν πρωτασηκρῆτιν, Ad Dominum Stylianum e Secretariis Primum, are given in the De Symeonum Scriptis of Allatius (p. 132, &c.). Some other poems of Symeon are extant in manuscript. 7. Ἐπιτομὴ κανόνων, Synopsis Canonica, already noticed in speaking of the imaginary Symeon Logotheta Junior. [No. 14.] 8. Κεφάλαια τοῦ ἁγίου Μακαρίου μεταφρασθέντα παρὰ Συμεὼν τοῦ Λογοθέτου, S. Macarii Aegyptii s. Scetensis [MACARIUS, No. 1] Capita Ascetica centum septuaginta, metaphrasi illustrata a Symeone Logotheta. Either this work or an Epitome of it is inserted in the Thesaurus Asceticus of Possin. (Comp. the obscure notices in Lambecius, De Biblioth. Caesaraea, vol. v. pp. 151, &c., 214, &c., ed. Kollar.) Besides these Κεφάλαια, selected from the works of Macarius and paraphrased, Symeon wrote some original Κεφάλαια γνωμικὰ ρλά, Gnomicae Sententiae CXXXI., extant in manuscript. (Allatius, p. 132.) 9. Hymni s. Canones et Troparia, also Preces, by Symeon Metaphrastes, were in the time of Allatius, and perhaps are still, in use in the Greek Church (Allatius, p. 131), and are extant in various MSS. 10. Clementinorum Epitome, published by Adrian Turnebus, 4to. Paris, 1555, and in a Latin version by Perionius, 4to. Paris, 1555; the version was reprinted in the edition of the works of Clemens Romanus, fol. Cologne, 1569. We know not on what ground this is ascribed to Symeon. (Comp. Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 31.) 11. Ἐκ τῶν τοῦ ἐν ἁγίοις πατρὸς ἡμῶν Βασιλείου ἀρχιεπισκόπου Καισαρείας τῆς Καππαδοκίας ἠθικοὶ λόγοι κδ' διὰ Συμεὼν τοῦ Μαγίστρου καὶ Λογοθέτου, Ex Libris D. Basilii Archiepiscopi Caesareae Cappodociae Orationes de Moribus XXIV. Simeone Magistro ac Logotheta auctore. These Sermones were made up by Symeon of selections from the works of Basil, and were printed 8vo. Paris, 1556. A Latin version of them by Stanislaus Ilovius had appeared, 8vo. Venice, 1554, and has been reprinted several times. Another Latin version, by Simon Mailleus, archbishop of Tours, was published, 8vo. Paris, 1558, and has been reprinted in the editions of the works of Basil, in which the Orationes are usually given. (Fabric. vol. ix. p. 58, &c., vol. x. p. 183, &c.) 12. An account of the church of St. Sophia, extant in two MSS. at Vienna (Kollar, Supplement. ad Lambecium, comp. pp. 748, 760), is ascribed in one of the MSS. to Symeon Metaphrastes, but with what accuracy is uncertain. The citations from Metaphrastes in the Catena in Lucam of Nicetas, and the mention by Theophanes Cerameus of his Εἰς τὸν ἱερὸν Λουκᾶν ὑπόμνημα, In Lucam Commentarius, do not show that he wrote commentaries on Luke. The work intended is probably his account of Luke in his Sanctorum Vitae. The citations in the Catena in Matthaeum of Macarius Chrysocephalus are possibly from his account of Matthew. A single manuscript ascribes to Symeon Metaphrastes, but with very doubtful correctness, a work called Dioptra whether the work of Philip the Solitary [PHILIPPUS, literary and ecclesiastical, No. 27], or a different work, is not ascertained. (Allatius, p. 136; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 62, note oo.)

The works of Symeon Metaphrastes are still valued by the Greeks. Three small quarto volumes containing selections from the Vitae Sanctorum, translated into the modern Greek tongue by Agapius, a Cretan monk, printed at Venice in the years 1797, 1805, and 1806, and entitled respectively, Παράδεισος, Paradisus, 'Εκλόγιον, Eclogium, and Νέος Παράδεισος, Paradisus Novus, are now before us. (Allatius, De Symeon. Scriptis, pp. 24—151; Cave, who makes three persons of our Symeon, viz. Symeon Metaphrastes, Symeon Logotheta, and Symeon Logotheta Junior, Hist. Litt. ad annos 901, 967, 1170, vol. ii. pp. 88, 104, 241; Oudin, De Scriptoribus Eccl. vol. ii. col. 1300—1383; Vossius, De Historicis Graecis, lib. ii. c. xxv. and lib. iv. pars iii; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. pp. 471, 683, vol. viii. p. 29, vol. x. p. 180, &c. alibi; Ceillier, Auteurs Sacrés, vol. xix. p. 565, &c., 592, &c.; Hankius, De Byzantinarum Rerum Scriptoribus, pars i. c. 24; Hamberger, Zuverlässige Nachrichten, vol. iv. p. 139, &c.; Saxius, Onomasticon, vol. ii. p. 135.)

23. MONACHUS s. HIEROMONACHUS. Various MSS. bear the name of Symeon Hieromonachus or Monachus as their author. (Comp. Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. xi. p. 299; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii.; Dissertat. Prima, p. 18). A Symeonius Monachus et Presbyter is mentioned by Photius (Biblioth. Cod. 231) as flourishing in the reign of Justinian I. (See also Nos. 24, 25.)

24. PIUS, VENERABILIS or STUDITA. Symeon, denominated by his admirers ὁ εὐλαβής, "the Pious," or, as Combéfis renders it, "the Venerable," was a monk of the monastery of Studium at Constantinople, in the latter half of the tenth century. His younger namesake, Symeon of St. Mamas [No. 16], was his disciple, and held him in such reverence as to pay to his memory honours which were deemed unauthorized and excessive, and involved the younger Symeon in difficulties with his ecclesiastical superiors. Symeon the Pious is regarded as the author of a short treatise on the duties of an ascetic life, Λόγος ἀσκητικὸς πολυμερὴς ἠθικὸς κεφαλαιώδης, Oratio de vitae asceticae officiis summatim scripta, of which a version in modern or Romaic Greek, by Dionysius Zagoraeus, is published with his version of the works of Symeon of St. Mamas. 4to. Venice, 1790. See the biographical notices of Symeon of St. Mamas, in the Auctarium Novissimum of Combéfis and in the version of Zagoraeus, already referred to [No. 16].

25. SCHOLARIUS, styled also HIEROMONACHUS, Συμεὼν ἱερομόναχος ὁ σχολάριος; a monk of the Byzantine empire, whose date is not known, except that he lived about or after the close of the eighth century. He composed a work entitled Κανόνες, Syntagma Canonum, extant in MS. at Vienna, containing the Canons ascribed to the Apostles and to the seven general councils. (Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. xi. p. 299; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii., Appendix prima, p. 18; Lambecius, Commentar. de Bibliotheca Caesaraea, vol. iv. col. 435, ed. Kollar.)

26. Of SELEUCEIA and CTESIPHON. The increase of the number of Christians in Persia, and their formation into churches with ecclesiastical officers, had excited the apprehensions of the Magi, and also the jealousy of the Jews: these bodies excited the Persian king to commence a severe persecution against the Christians, and Symeon, archbishop of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, was put to death on a charge of favouring the interests of, and treacherously conveying to, the Roman emperor Constantine the Great, or more probably his son Constantius II., intelligence affecting the interests of Persia. Syriac writers call this Symeon Bar-Sabaï or Bar-saböe, i. e. "Filius Tinctorum" (Assemani. Biblioth. Orient. vol. i. p. 1, 2), and state that he was the disciple of Papas or Phaphas, whom he succeeded in the see of Seleuceia. Papas had been deposed for his arrogance and impiety, and Symeon was appointed in his room (Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, vol. iii. col. 1107, &c.; Assemani, Biblioth. Orient. vol. i. p. 186), which led Papas to utter an imprecation against Symeon that his sins might never be forgiven to him. Symeon was born of respectable and pious parents, who carried on the business of silk dyers, and appear to have supplied the Persian kings with their royal robes. The date of Symeon's accession to his see is undetermined. According to some authorities (Le Quien, col. 1106) Symeon was present at the Council of Nice, A. D. 325, as representative of his predecessor Papas, who was then archbishop of Seleuceia; according to others (Assemani, p. 8, 9) Symeon had already acquired the see, and sent one of his clergy to represent him. The date of his death is also uncertain; but it was probably during the war between the Persians and the Roman emperor Constantius II. Many other Christians perished with Symeon, and in the bloody persecution which followed his death: among these martyrs was his sister Tarbula. He was buried at Susa. (Assemani, p. 4.) Symeon wrote some letters in Syriac, which are mentioned by Ebed-jesu (Assemani, p. 11); but the occasion and subject of them are not stated. Two hymns which are, it would appear, still used by the Christians of the country about Bagdad (in divinis Chaldaeorum officiis) are ascribed to him. (Assemani, Biblioth. Oriental. vol. i. p. 1—12; Le Quien, l. c.; Sozomen. H. E. ii. 8—15; Hieronym. Chronicon; Theophan. Chronog. p. 19, ed. Paris, p. 15, ed. Venice, p. 36, ed. Bonn; Cedrenus, Compend. p. 298, ed. Paris, vol. i. p. 522, ed. Bonn; Nicephorus Callisti, H. E. viii. 35, 37, 38; Menolog. Basilian. a. d. April. xiv. pars iii. p. 55, fol. Urbino, 1727; Henschen. apud Acta Sanctorum Aprilis, vol. ii. p. 846; Baronius, Annales Eccles. ad ann. 343, xii.—xvii.; Pagi, Critice in Baron. in loc.; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. vii. pp. 76, &c., 662, &c.)

27. SETH or SETHUS, Σὴθ, or SETHI, Σήθι; or perhaps THE SON of SETHUS or SETH, a Byzantine writer of some importance of the eleventh century. He is known also by the titles which he bore of MAGISTER ET PHILOSOPHUS, Μάγιστρος καὶ Φιλόσοφος, and of PROTOVESTIARIUS ANTIOCHI, Πρωτοβεστιάρχης τῶν 'Αντιόχου, i. e. Master of the Robes in the palace of Antiochus (Flavius Antiochus the Eunuch, who was consul, A. D. 431) at Constantinople, in which the imperial jewels or costly articles were kept. (Comp. Ducange, Glossar. Med. et Infim. Graecitat. s. v. πρωτοβεστιάρχης τῶν 'Αντιόχου, inter derivat. voc. Βέστης; and Constantinop. Christiana, lib. ii. sect. xiii. § 5.) By a corruption of his title he has been improperly styled ANTIOCHENUS, 'Αντιοχεύς, and MAGISTER ANTIOCHIAE, Μάγιστρος 'Αντιοχείας, and BESTUS, Βέστος. It is probable that he is the Symeon Protovestiarius (Συμεὼν πρωτοβεστιάριος) mentioned by Cedrenus (Compend. p. 737, ed. Paris, vol. ii. p. 511, ed. Bonn) as having been banished in A. D. 1034, by the Emperor Michael the Paphlagonian [MICHAEL IV. PAPHLAGO] on account of his sympathy with the Patrician Dalassenus. Symeon had been one of the personal attendants of the Emperor Constantine IX. (or VIII. as some reckon, brother and colleague of Basil II.), whose death occurred A. D. 1028. Symeon, on his banishment, retired to a monastery founded by himself near mount Olympus; and appears to have spent the rest of his life in literary pursuits and monastic duties (Cedren. l. c.). As one of his works is dedicated to the Emperor Michael Ducas, he must have survived the accession of that prince in A. D. 1071. Nothing beyond this appears to be known of his personal history.

The principal works of Symeon Seth are as follows: — 1. Σύνταγμα κατὰ στοιχεῖον περὶ τροφῶν δυνάμεων, Syntagma per litterarum ordinem de cibariorum facultate. This is the work dedicated to Michael Ducas. It is a descriptive catalogue, alphabetically arranged, of the chief articles of human food: the materials are for the most part taken from Symeon's contemporary, Michael Psellus [PSELLUS, No. 3.]. It was published, with a Latin version, by Lilius Gregorius Gyraldus of Ferrara, 12mo. Basel, 1538. The arrangement of the text differs from that of the version: the alphabetical order in the one being of the Greek titles to each article, in the other of their Latin equivalents; but in an edition of the version revised by Dominicus Monthesaurus of Verona, 12mo. Basel, 1561, the Greek titles are prefixed to each article, and the original order is restored. An improved edition of the Greek text, with a new version by Martinus Bogdanus, was published 12mo. Paris, 1658. 2. Σύνοψις καὶ ἀπάνθισμα φυσικῶν τε καὶ φιλοσόφων δογμάτων, Compendium et flores naturalium et philosophorum placitorum. Of this work, which is also in great part pillaged from Psellus, Allatius (ubi infrà) has given a short extract, with a Latin version. The first two of the five books of which the work consists are extant in some MSS. under the name of Psellus. They bear the title of Ἐπιλύσεις συντόμοι φυσικῶν ζητημάτων, Solutiones compendiosae naturalium quaestionum. 3. De Medicina (s. De Medicamentis) ex Animalibus. A Latin version of two fragments of this appears at the end of Monthesaurus's revised edition of Gyraldus's version of the Syntagma de cibariorum facultate. 4. Περὶ ὀσφρήσεως, De Odoratu, and 5. Περὶ γεύσεως καὶ ἁφῆς, De Gustatione et Tactu, published by Ideler, in his Physici et Medici Graeci Minores, vol. ii. p. 283, 8vo. Berlin, 1842.

But the work which has given Symeon Seth the greatest claim to remembrance, is his Greek version of the Indian apologues, now known as the Fables of Bidpai or Pilpay. This version is briefly entitled Στεφανίτης καὶ Ἰχνηλάτης, Stephanites et Ichnelates, s. Coronarius et Vestigator, and a Latin version of a considerable part of it was subjoined by Possin to his edition of Georgius Pachymeres, fol. Rome, 1666; but it is omitted in the Bonn reprint of that version. The Greek text, not however in a complete form, was published under the title of Specimen Sapientiae Indorum veterum, by Seb. Godof. Starkius, 12mo. Berlin, 1697. The introductory chapters, which had been prefixed to Bidpai's work, and had been also translated by Seth but omitted by Starkius, were published under the title of Prolegomena ad Librum, Στεφανίτης καὶ Ἰχνηλάτης, by Floderus, Upsala, 1780. From a more prolix title or introduction prefixed to the work we learn that it was brought from India by Περζωὲ, Perzoe, or Barzouyeh, physician to Chosroes or Khosru I. Nushirwan [SASSANIDAE, No. 21], King of Persia, who reigned from A. D. 531 to 579, and that it was presented to that King. It is probable that what Barzouyeh presented to Khosru was a Pehlvi or old Persian version, not the Sanscrit original. It was, according to the title just cited, translated into Arabic, and this Arabic version Symeon Seth translated into Greek. A succinct account of this ancient and curious work is given in the Penny Cyclopaedia, s. v. BIDPAI, where are given numerous references to the authorities used. See also Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. pp. 777—781.

A history of Alexander the Great, replete with fabulous incidents, and falsely bearing the name of Callisthenes [CALLISTHENES, No. 1], which is found in some libraries (comp. Catal. MStorum Biblioth. Regiae, vol. ii. p. 388, Cod. mdclxxxv. fol. Paris, 1740), is said by Fabricius (Biblioth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 36) and Wharton (Hist. of Eng. Poetry, vol. i. p. 129) to have been translated from the Persian by Symeon Seth, but on what authority this assertion rests they do not state: nor does the work seem to bear any internal marks of belonging to Seth. The opening portion of a history of Alexander which some identify with this work, is given by Berckel (in a note to Stephanus Byzant. De Urbibus, ad voc. Βουκεφάλεια) and by Fabricius (Biblioth. Graec. vol. xiv. p. 148, ed. vet.): it bears the title of Βίος Ἀλεξάνδρου τοῦ Μακέδονος καὶ πράξεις, Vita et Gesta Alexandri Macedoniae Regis. A Latin history of Alexander closely resembling this Greek work, and considered by some as a version though it varies much from the original, was printed in black letter, fol. Argentin. 1489 and 1494. These works bear, both of them, considerable resemblance to the work said to have been written in Greek by Aesopus [AESOPUS, p. 48], and translated into Latin by Julius Valerius, whose translation was first published from an imperfect MS. by Angelo Mai, at Milan, 1817, and again more complete in vol. vii. of his Classici Auctores e Vaticanis Codd. editi, 8vo. Rom. 1835. It is also given from Mai's first edition as an appendix to the edition of Quintus Curtius in the Bibliotheca Classica Latina of Lemaire, 8vo. Paris, 1824. Considerable information respecting these works of the Pseudo Callisthenes, Aesopus or Julius Valerius and others, which have much in common with each other and appear to have had a common origin, may be found in the preface of Mai (reprinted by Lemaire); in the Journal des Savans for 1818, pp. 401, &c., 609, &c.; and in the Bibliothèque Universelle for the same year, pp. 218, &c., 322, &c. But of these works neither by Mai nor in the periodicals is any one ascribed to Symeon Seth. Some other works of Symeon are extant in MS. (Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. ll. cc. vol. vii. p. 472, vol. xi. p. 320; Allat. De Symeon. Scriptis, p. 181, &c.; Vossius, De Historicis Graec. lib. iv. c. 21.)

28. STUDITA. [Nos. 16 and 24.]

29. STUDITA. Some Τροπάρια, Cantica, or hymns, by Symeon, a monk of the Convent of Studium at Constantinople, were among the MSS. of the monastery of Cryptae Ferratae at Rome. Allatius, who had read them, says that they were worthy to be preserved and published, and to be used in the services of the church. He has given the initial parts of each, from which it appears that they related to the crucifixion, burial, and resurrection of Christ. Of the time and history of this Symeon nothing is known. A Symeon appears among the correspondents of Theodore Studita, who addresses him as his son; but whether this was the writer of the Cantica or not is unknown. Allatius judges the writer to be a different person from the Symeon Studita mentioned with such high praise by Symeon of St. Mamas, in his oration De Poenitentia et Compunctione, and who is doubtless the Symeon the Pious already mentioned [No. 24]. (Allatius, De Symeon. Scriptis, p. 23; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 444, vol. xi. p. 299; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. Dissert. Prima, p. 18.)

30. Stultus or Salus (ὁ Σαλὸς), a fanatic of the Eastern Church, apparently born about A. D. 522, in the reign of the emperor Justin I. He was a Syrian, but his birth-place appears to be unknown. In the reign of Justinian he visited Jerusalem with a companion, Joannes, with whom he embraced a monastic life, first in a convent, afterwards in a hermitage on the eastern shore of the Dead Sea. He afterwards visited Jerusalem. He then went to Emesa, where he continued till his death. He lived to, if not after, the reign of the emperor Maurice. The life of this Symeon, written by Leontius of Neapolis [Leontius, No. 20], his contemporary, abounds with absurd stories of his miracles. (Leontius, Vita S. Simeonis Sali, apud Acta Sanctor. Julii. vol. i. p. 136, &c.; Nicephorus Callisti. H. E. lib. xvii. c. 22.)

31. Stylites (Συμεώνης ὁ Στυλίτης), the Pillar-saint, a celebrated ascetic of the fifth century, who derived his distinguishing epithet from the pillar on which he passed a considerable part of his life. He was the first of a tolerably numerous class of "Pillar-saints" or "Stylites." He was born at the village of Sisan, on the confines of Syria and Cilicia, about A. D. 388, according to Tillemont, whose dates we follow. After leading an ascetic life for many years in various monasteries and solitary places, he resolved to take his stand on a pillar or pedestal, in order to escape from the honour paid him by men, according to the testimony of Theodoret, though it is not so easy to see how so conspicuous a position consisted with the modesty ascribed to him by that writer. This was in A. D. 423. At first his pillar was only six cubits, or nine feet high; it then rose to twelve cubits, then to twenty-two; and when Theodoret wrote, which was in Symeon's lifetime, it was thirty-six cubits, or fifty-four feet high; "for," adds Theodoret, "he desires to touch heaven, and to be released from all communication with earthly things." The circumference of his column is stated by Evagrius to have been two cubits, or three feet, the height forty, which is, perhaps, only a round number for the thirty-six of Theodoret.

This proceeding of the saint, however admired by some, incurred the reprehension of others, to whom Theodoret thought it necessary to reply by referring to certain symbolical actions of the Old Testament prophets. The saint's proceeding was, however, so far in conformity to Oriental sentiments, and appealed so strongly to Oriental feelings, that it led to the conversion of many hundred heathens, Persians, Armenians, and Iberians, who would probably have resisted a more rational mode of argument. Tribes, apparently of Bedouin Arabs, contended for the blessing of the holy man, and were near coming to blows in their jealous rivalry. The gifts of working miracles and of prophesying are claimed for him by Theodoret, who professes to have been an eye and ear witness of their exercise. In this extraordinary manner he passed the last thirty-seven years of his life, attracting the reverence alike of believers and unbelievers.

Symeon died about A. D. 460 according to Tillemont, Theophanes, and Cedrenus. His body was brought to Antioch. The emperor Leo proposed to remove it to Constantinople, but yielded to the entreaties of the people of Antioch that it should remain among them. His relics were held in high esteem.

The abode of Symeon before and after his ascent of the column, was locally called Mandra (whence he sometimes bore the name of Mandrita), and was distant, according to Evagrius, three hundred stadia, nearly thirty-five miles from Antioch. The piety of his admirers subsequently erected a church or monastery on the spot, in the midst of which was a richly ornamented court, open to the sky, and enclosing the column on which he had passed his days. The Western Church commemorates this saint on January 5th, the Greek Church on September 1st.

The history of this extraordinary man is worthy of attention, whether as showing what the human frame may be brought to endure, or as the most remarkable page in the remarkable history of ascetic observance, or as illustrating the religious views and spirit of his age and country. Most writers who touch on the history of the period speak of Symeon. The fullest account is given by Theodoret (Philotheus s. Religiosa Historia, c. 26), and Evagrius (H. E. i. 13, 14. ii. 9, 10). Something may be gleaned from the fragments of Theodore Lector (H. E. i. 12. ii. 42). The three lives, given in a Latin version by Bollandus (Acta Sanctor. Januar. vol. i. p. 264, &c.), of which the first and second are ascribed, but we think on very uncertain ground, to Symeon's disciple Antonius, and the third to Symeon Metaphrastes, are of little value. (See also Chron. Paschal. p. 321, ed. Paris, p. 256, ed. Venice; vol. i. p. 593, ed. Bonn; Theophan. Chronog. ad A. M. 5952, 53, p. 96, ed. Paris, p. 77, ed. Venice, and vol. i. pp. 173, 174, ed. Bonn; Cedren. Compend. pp. 340, 341, 347, 348, ed. Paris, and vol. i. pp. 596—598, and 609, ed. Bonn; Nicephorus Callisti, H. E. xiv. 51, xv. 13; and, among modern writers, Baronius, Annal. Eccles. ad ann. 420, xxviii., 432, xlii. li. lii., 436, xii., 451, cliii., 455, xix., 458, xviii., 460, xvii. xviii., 465, xxxiv., cum Critice Pagii; Tillemont, Mém. vol. xv. p. 347, &c., and notes, p. 879, &c.; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 448, vol. i. p. 438; Fabricius, Biblioth. Graec. vol. x. p. 522, &c., and Allatius, De Symeon. Scriptis, p. 6, &c.)

It is known that Symeon wrote several pieces: 1. Epistola ad Theodosium Imperatorem, relating to the restitution of the Jewish synagogues; a proof, unhappily, that a clear perception of right and wrong is not to be enumerated among our saint's excellences. (Evag. H. E. i. 13; Nicephor. l. c.) This letter is not extant. 2. Ad Eudociam Imperatricem Epistola, concerning her return to the church. A short extract from this is preserved by Nicephorus Callisti (H. E. xv. 13). 3. Πρὸς Λέοντα τὸν αὐτοκράτορα ἐπιστολή, Ad Leonem Imperatorem Epistola; on the election of Timotheus Aelurus, and the authority of the Council of Chalcedon; mentioned by Evagrius (H. E. ii. 10. Comp. Phot. Biblioth. cod. 229). 4. Πρὸς Βασίλειον ἐπισκοποῦντα τοῦ 'Αντιόχου (sic in Evag.) ἐπιστολή, Ad Basilium Antiochiae Episcopum Epistola, on the same subjects, preserved by Evagrius (ibid.), and Nicephorus Callisti (H. E. xv. 19). 5. Allatius mentions also a Confessio fidei, and refers to Eulogius (apud Phot. l. c.): but Eulogius evidently speaks of the saint's letter to the emperor Leo. (Allatius, Cave, Fabricius, ll. cc.)

The discourse De morte semper meditando, printed in a Latin version in the Bibliotheca Patrum, under the name of our Symeon, is noticed elsewhere as being more correctly ascribed to Symeon of Mesopotamia [No. 21].

32. Stylites Junior, or Thaumastorites, or A Monte Thaumasto (Τοῦ θαυμαστοῦ ὄρους), or De Monte Mirabili. The Greek and other Eastern churches reverence the memory of a younger Symeon Stylites, who has, however, no place in the Latin calendar, and is indeed of far less celebrity than the subject of the preceding article. He was born at Antioch of parents in humble life, about A. D. 521, as Conrad. Janninghus calculates. His mother Martha was a woman of great piety. He embraced a monastic life, when yet a child, in a monastery near Seleuceia, the port of Antioch, in which monastery he found an eminent stylite or pillar saint, Joannes; and Symeon, desiring to imitate his example, had a pillar erected opposite John's, on the top of which, within a wooden enclosure, which may perhaps be compared to a circular pulpit, he took up his abode for eight years, being only seven years old when he ascended it. He then removed to a mountain called 'the Wonderful Mountain' (τὸ θαυμαστὸν ὄρος), from which he derived his epithet Thaumastorites: here he afterwards established a monastery, in which he resided for the rest of his life, having another column erected for his domicile. He was ordained priest by Dionysius, bishop of Seleuceia, but in what year is not known. He died in his seventy-fifth year, and in the forty-fifth of his abode on his second column, probably in or about A. D. 596. The prolix life of him from which we have taken the above particulars, was written by "Nicephorus Magister Antiochiae," a writer of a later but unascertained period, and is full of miracles, visions, and other legendary matters. It is given, with a valuable Commentarius Praevius by Conrad Janninghus, in the Acta Sanctorum Maii, a. d. xxiv. vol. v. p. 298, &c.

Several writings are ascribed to the younger Symeon the Stylite. They are, 1. Περὶ εἰκόνων, De Imaginibus, mentioned by Joannes Damascenus, who cites a passage from it among the passages subjoined to his own third oration on the same subject. It may be doubted, however, whether the title applies to the work from which the citation is made, or merely describes the subject of the cited passage. (Damascenus, Opera, vol. i. p. 386, ed. Le Quien.) 2. 'Επιστολὴ πρὸς τὸν 'Ιουστινιανὸν βασιλέα, Epistola ad Justinianum Imperatorem, cited by Sophronius of Jerusalem in his Συνοδική, Epistola Synodica (apud Phot. Biblioth. cod. 231). This letter of Symeon was directed against the Nestorians and Eutychians, and was much prized by Justinian, who called it "a treasure." (Phot. ibid.) 3. Πρὸς βασιλέα 'Ιουστῖνον τὸν νέον ἐπιστολή, Ad Imperatorem Justinum Juniorem Epistola, of two lines only, given in the life of Symeon by Nicephorus (c. xxiv. § 189). 4. 'Επιστολὴ πέμπτη πρὸς τὸν βασιλέα 'Ιουστῖνον τὸν νέον, Ad Imperatorem Justinum Juniorem Epistola Quinta, exciting him to punish the Samaritans, given at length in the Acta Concilii Nicaeni secundi Oecumenici septimi, Actio V. (see Concil. vol. iv. coll. 289, 663, ed. Hardouin). It is uncertain whether the title indicates that this was the fifth in some general collection of the Epistolae of Symeon, or the fifth which he had written to the emperor. Its genuineness also has been disputed and is vindicated at some length by Allatius (De Symeon. Scriptis, p. 18, &c.). 5. Πρὸς τὸν ἐν τοῖς 'Ιεροσολυμοῖς ὁσιώτατον σταυροφύλακα Θωμᾶν ἐπιστολή, Ad Sanctissimum in Hierosolymis Sanctae Crucis Custodem Thomam Epistola, given at length in the Vita S. Marthae matris Symeonis Junioris, c. vii. § 63, &c. (apud Acta Sanctorum Maii, vol. v. p. 426). 6. A letter to Evagrius the ecclesiastical historian, mentioned by him (H. E. vi. 23). 6. Devotional compositions, as Τροπάρια, Troparia s. Hymni, and Εὐχαί, Preces, mentioned by Allatius (ibid. p. 21) as extant in MS. A short 'Ωδή, Ode s. Hymnus is given in the life of Symeon by Nicephorus, c. xiii. § 109. 7. Sermones Ascetici XXXVI., Responsiones ad Quaesita XXV., and Sententiae XXXVI., are extant in an Arabic version at Rome (Assemani, Biblioth. Oriental. vol. ii. p. 510); and the Sermones at Oxford also. (Catalog. MStorum Angliae et Hiberniae, vol. i. p. 280.)

Beside the life of Symeon, from which our account is chiefly taken, various particulars are recorded by Evagrius (H. E. v. 21, vi. 23), the contemporary and countryman of the Saint; by the biographer of St. Martha, the mother of Symeon, apparently a contemporary; by Joannes Damascenus (l. c. p. 378), who cites a passage from a lost life of Symeon by Arcadius of Cyprus; in the Acta Concilii Nicaeni Secundi, Actio IV. (Concil. vol. iv. col. 217 and 632), where two extracts are given from an anonymous life of Symeon, perhaps that by Arcadius; and by Nicephorus Callisti (H. E. xviii. 24); Allatius (De Symeon. Scriptis, pp. 17—22); Janninghus (apud Acta Sanctorum, l. c.); Cave (Hist. Litt. ad ann. 527, vol. i. p. 508); Fabricius (Biblioth. Graec. vol. x. pp. 325, 524, vol. xi. p. 299); and Baronius (Annales ad ann. 574. §§ vi. viii. ix).

33. Stylites Tertius, Presbyter et Archimandrita. A third pillar Saint of the name of Symeon is reverenced by the Greek and Coptic, or Egyptian Jacobite, Churches, on the 26th or 27th July. He is mentioned here only to prevent his being confounded with either of the preceding. He is perhaps the same with the Symeon Stylites of Aegae in Cilicia, mentioned by Joannes Moschus (Pratum Spirituale, c. 57) as having been killed by lightning; and with "Symeon Monachus Confessor in Sicilia" (perhaps an error for Cilicia), who appears in some ancient Latin Martyrologia on the 27th July. (Acta Sanctorum Julii, a. d. xxvi. vol. vi. p. 310; Allatius, De Symeon. Scriptis, p. 22; Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. x. p. 525.)

34. Thaumaturgus. There is a letter noticed by Allatius as extant in MS., which, after having been translated from the original Greek into Syriac, and from Syriac into Arabic, was, under the mistaken impression that the original was lost, retranslated from Arabic into Greek. This letter was written by Symeon Thaumaturgus to another Symeon designated Enclistus, who derived his lineage from one of the emperors or Caesars: Ἐπιστολὴ τοῦ ἁγίου Συμεὼν τοῦ Θαυματουργοῦ ἣν ἀπεστείλε πρός τινα τὸν ἀπὸ γένους Καίσαρος ἔγκλειστον μὲν γεγενημένον, Epistola S. Symeonis Thaumaturgi quam misit ad quendam Enclistum genus trahentem a Caesare. There is some reason to conjecture that Symeon Thaumaturgus is identical with the younger Symeon the Stylite [No. 32]. (Allatius, De Symeon. Scriptis, p. 179; Fabricius, Biblioth. Graec. vol. xi. p. 299.)

36. Of THESSALONICA. Little is known of the personal history of Symeon, archbishop of Thessalonica, except that he lived in the first half of the fifteenth century, and held his see for between five and six years, dying Sept. A. D. 1429, about six months before Thessalonica was taken by the Turks under Amurath. Joannes Anagnostes, in his De Thessalonicensi Excidio Narratio (c. 3), has noticed the death of Symeon, who was generally lamented; and relates a curious dream, by which his decease and the subsequent ruin of the city were supposed to be portended. Symeon was the author of several theological works much esteemed in the Greek Church. They were published under the care of Dositheus, patriarch of Jerusalem, folio, Jassy, 1683. A Romaic version of the whole was published, 4to. Leipsic, 1791. Some of the works have been also published separately. (Allatius, De Symeon. Scriptis, pp. 185—194; Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. xi. p. 328, &c.; Cave, Hist. Litt. Appendix by Wharton and Gery, ad annos 1410, 1418, vol. ii. pp. 113, 114; Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, vol. ii. col. 58; Oudin, Commentarius de Scriptorib. Eccles. vol. iii. col. 2242, &c.)

37. VENERABILIS. [No. 24.]

38. XYLOCERCINUS. [No. 16.] [J. C. M.]

SY'MMACHUS. 1. SYMMACHUS, proconsul of Achaia, to whom two laws of Constantine the Great were sent in A. D. 319 (Cod. Theod. 2. tit. 4. ss. 1, 15), was probably the father of

2. L. AURELIUS AVIANIUS SYMMACHUS, who flourished about the middle of the fourth century, and is described by Ammianus Marcellinus (xxvii. 3. § 3), as worthy of being ranked among the brightest models of learning and virtue. From an inscription formerly preserved in the Capitol, and now in the vestibule of the Vatican Library, we learn that he enjoyed at various periods the dignities of praefect of the city (A. D. 364), an office in which he was the successor of Apronianus (Amm. Marc. l. c.), of consul (suffect. A. D. 376?), of propraefect of the praetorium at Rome and propraefect of the neighbouring provinces, of praefectus annonae, of pontifex major, and of quindecemvir S. F. In A. D. 360, he was despatched on an embassy to the emperor Constantius, at that time in the East (Amm. Marc. xxi. 12. § 24), and at different periods executed various diplomatic missions, to the entire satisfaction of the nobility. As a tribute to his wisdom, influence, and eloquence, he was usually called upon to deliver his opinion first in deliberations of the senate, and that body, with the consent and approbation of the emperors Valens and Valentinianus, passed a vote that a gilded statue should be erected in honour of him, which was dedicated on the 29th of April A. D. 377 in the consulship of Gratianus Augustus (IV.) and Merobaudes. By his wife, the daughter of Acyndinus, he was the father of

3. Q. AURELIUS SYMMACHUS, who flourished towards the close of the fourth century, and stood foremost among his contemporaries as a scholar, a statesman, and an orator. Educated in Gaul (Symmach. Ep. ix. 83), apparently at Bourdeaux or Toulouse, in that age the most renowned seminaries in the world, in early life he became devoted to the liberal arts. By his example and authority he, at a subsequent period, inspired for a time new life and vigour into the literature of his country, which had long been wasting by gradual decay, and seemed now to be fast approaching the hour of dissolution. Having discharged the functions of quaestor and praetor, he was afterwards appointed (A. D. 365, Cod. Theod. 8. tit. 5. s. 25) Corrector of Lucania and the Bruttii; in A. D. 373 (Cod. Theod. 12. tit. 1. s. 73; comp. Symmach. Ep. viii. 10, x. 3) he was proconsul of Africa, and became, probably about the same time, a member of the pontifical college. His zeal for the ancient faith of Rome, which exercised throughout life a marked influence on his character, checked for a while the prosperous current of his fortunes, and involved him in danger and disgrace. For having been chosen by the senate on account of his surpassing eloquence to remonstrate with Gratian on the removal of the altar of victory (A. D. 382) from their council hall, and on the curtailment of the sums annually allowed for the maintenance of the Vestal Virgins, and for the public celebration of sacred rites, he was ordered by the indignant emperor to quit the presence, and to withdraw himself to a distance of one hundred miles from Rome. Nothing daunted by this repulse, when appointed praefect of the city (A. D. 384) after the death of his persecutor, he addressed an elaborate epistle to Valentinianus again urging the restoration of the pagan deities to their former honours. The application was again unsuccessful, but did not upon this occasion prove personally injurious to the promoter, who was, however, soon exposed to a hazard still more perilous than any which he had previously encountered. In consequence of the hostile feelings which he naturally cherished against Gratian, he had always sympathised with Maximus, by whom that prince had been conquered and slain. When the pretender was threatening (A. D. 387) to invade Italy his cause was openly advocated by Symmachus, who upon the arrival of Theodosius was impeached of treason, and forced to take refuge in a sanctuary. Having been speedily pardoned through the intercession of numerous and powerful friends he expressed his contrition and gratitude in an apologetic address to the conqueror, by whom he was not only freely forgiven, but was received into favour and elevated to the consulship in A. D. 391, and during the remainder of his life he appears to have taken an active part in public affairs. The date of his death is unknown, but one of his letters (vii. 50) was written as late as A. D. 402, and he was certainly alive when the poem of Prudentius, usually assigned to A. D. 404, was published. His personal character seems to have been unimpeachable, as he performed the duties of the high offices which he filled in succession with a degree of mildness, firmness, and integrity, seldom found among statesmen in that corrupt age. The charge vaguely preferred, and unsupported by any distinct evidence, that he abused his power when chief magistrate of Rome, in order to oppress the Christians, seems totally destitute of foundation. That his leisure hours were devoted exclusively to literary pursuits, seems evident from the numerous allusions in his epistles to the studies in which he was engaged, and his friendship with Ausonius and other distinguished authors of that epoch proves that he delighted in associating and corresponding with the learned. His wealth must have been prodigious, for in addition to his town mansion on the Caelian Hill (Ep. iii. 12, 88, vii. 18), and several houses in the city which he lent to his friends, he possessed upwards of a dozen villas in the most delightful parts of Italy, many detached farms, together with estates in Sicily and Mauritania. The following inscription contains a list of his honours and titles as recorded by his son: —

Q. AUR. SYMMACHO. V. C. QUAEST. PRAET. PONTIFICI. MAIORI. CORRECTORI. LUCANIAE. ET. BRITTIORUM. COMITI. ORDINIS TERTII. PROCONS. AFRICAE. PRAEF. URB. COS. ORDINARIO. ORATORI. DISSERTISSIMO. Q. FAB. MEM. SYMMACHUS. V. C. PATRI. OPTIMO.

The extant works of Symmachus consist of letters and fragments of speeches.

I. Epistolarum Libri X., published after his death by his son. The last book contains his official correspondence, and is chiefly composed of the letters presented by him when praefect of the city to the emperors under whom he served. The remaining books comprise a multitude of epistles, many of them notes extending to a few lines only, addressed to a wide circle of relations, friends, and acquaintances. They relate for the most part to matters of little moment, and notwithstanding the praises so liberally lavished by Politian and Laetus, are, taken as a whole, uninteresting and destitute of value. The style is elaborated with great and painful diligence. Pliny was the object proposed for imitation, and we are presented with a stiff copy of a stiff model, in which the degenerate taste and decaying Latinity of the fourth century are engrafted on the solemn pedantry and cold affectation of the original. We must, however, make an exception in favour of the most highly finished and important piece in the collection, the celebrated epistle "DDD. Valentiniano, Theodosio et Arcadio semper Auggg.," entreating them to restore the Altar of Victory to its ancient position in the senate house. This document, whether we consider the judicious choice of the arguments employed, the skilful arrangement according to which they succeed and mutually support each other, the art with which they are developed, the pointed energy with which they are enforced, and at the same time the tone of moderation and liberality which pervades the whole, impresses us with deep admiration of the genius, learning, dialectic acuteness, and eloquence of the author, who seems to have lacked nothing but a good cause for the display of his talents. Notwithstanding the folly and falseness of the doctrines which he advocates, this state paper is infinitely superior as a literary composition and a work of art to the well-known reply of St. Ambrosius, which is verbose, abusive, and not always honest.

II. Novem Orationum Fragmenta. Although we were told by Socrates (H. E. v. 14) and Callixtus (Hist. xii. 21) that Symmachus had published many speeches which were greatly admired (ἀγαν ἀρίστους), not a single remnant of these was known to exist until very recently, when Mai discovered in one of the palimpsests of the Ambrosian library, fragments of eight orations, and subsequently in another portion of the same palimpsest, deposited in the Vatican, some additional fragments of these eight and also a portion of a ninth. The titles are, 1. Laudes in Valentinianum seniorem Augustum I. We have twenty-three short chapters nearly entire; the beginning and the end of the speech are both wanting. 2. Laudes in Valentinianum seniorem Augustum II. Extending to twenty chapters, in which there are several blanks and imperfections; the beginning and the end are wanting. 3. Laudes in Gratianum Augustum. Extending to twelve chapters interrupted by two blanks; the beginning and the end are wanting. 4. Laudes in Patres. Extending to four chapters; the beginning and the end are wanting. 5. Oratio pro Patre, returning thanks for the elevation of his father to the consulship. Ten chapters, interrupted by one blank; the beginning and the end both wanting. 6. Oratio pro Trygetio, recommending the son of his friend Trygetius for the praetorship (see Ep. i. 44). Four chapters; the beginning and the end both wanting. 7. Oratio pro Synesio, recommending the elevation of Synesius, the son of his friend Julianus, to the dignity of a senator (see Ep. v. 43). Seven chapters interrupted by a blank, the portion which follows the third chapter having been obtained from the Vatican MS. We have here the commencement of the speech. 8. Oratio pro Flavio Severo. Four chapters; the beginning and the end both wanting. 9. Oratio pro Valerio Fortunato, on behalf of a high-born but poor individual who was unable to defray the expenses incurred by officers of the state. Five chapters; the beginning and the end are both wanting. It will be seen that the above are all of a panegyrical or complimentary character, and while they exhibit considerable command of language and grace of expression, do not afford an opportunity for the development of oratorical powers of a high order.

We may gather from notices in the epistles and in other writers the arguments of several lost orations, such as Panegyricus Theodosii senioris (Ep. ii. 13.); Panegyricus Maximi tyranni (Socrat. H. E. v. 14, comp. Ep. ii. 31); Oratio de abroganda censura (Ep. iv. 29, 45, v. 9); Oratio de Polybii filio (Ep. iv. 45); Oratio contra Gildonem, (Ep. iv. 4); Gratiarum actio (Ep. vii. 50. This, as Mai suggests, was perhaps not an oration but an epistle, comp. Ep. ii. 22, iii. 81).

Symmachus composed in verse as well as prose, among other productions a poetic history of Bauli. See the lines in Ep. i. 1.

Jornandes (de Rebus Get. 15) quotes a long passage from an historical work by Symmachus, but it is extremely doubtful whether this Symmachus is the same person with the Symmachus we have now been discussing.

The editio princeps of the epistles of Symmachus, which contains but a small number of letters, was printed in 4to., by Bartholomaeus Cyniscus of Ameria, and although without date or name of place, is known to have been published during the pontificate of Pope Julius II., that is, A. D. 1503—1513. The second edition, 4to. Argentorat. 1510, is also very imperfect; but in those printed at Basle, 8vo. 1549, Paris, 4to. 1580, and by Vignon and his heirs, 1587, 1598, and 1601, the collection was gradually enlarged from MSS., until it attained to its present magnitude. No really good edition of these letters has yet appeared, but the most useful for general purposes are those of Juretus, 4to. Paris, 1604, and of Scioppius, 4to. Mogunt. 1608.

The fragments of the eight speeches were first published by Angelo Mai, 8vo. Mediolan. 1815, in a volume which was reprinted, page for page, at Frankfort, 8vo. 1816, and they will be found appended to Niebuhr's edition of Fronto, 8vo. 1816. The extended fragments, comprising the additions to the eight speeches, and the remains of the ninth obtained from the Vatican MS., are contained in the "Scriptorum Veterum Nova Collectio e Vaticanis Codicibus edita ab Angelo Maio," 4to. Rom., 1825, vol. i.; see also Meyer, Orator. Roman. Fragmenta, pp. 627—636, 2d ed.

4. Q. Fabianus Memmius Symmachus, son of the preceding, by his wife Rusticiana, daughter of Orfitus. Like his father he held the offices of quaestor, praetor, and proconsul of Africa; the latter in A. D. 415 (Cod. Theod. 11. tit. 30. s. 65). It is uncertain whether he ever attained to the consulship, but Mai seems to have proved that he was city praefect in A. D. 418.

5. Q. Aurelius Symmachus, who held the consulship along with Aëtius, in A. D. 446, was in all probability the son of the preceding, and therefore the grandson of the orator. He was the father of

6. Q. Aurelius Memmius Symmachus, who was a Christian and the father-in-law of Boëthius.

(For full information regarding the life and writings of Symmachus, of his ancestors and of his descendants, see the "Commentarii Praevii de Symmacho" by Mai, in the first volume of the "Scriptorum Veterum Nova Collectio" noticed above. In this dissertation references will be found to all those passages in the ancient writers which bear upon the subject.) [W. R.]

SY'MMACHUS, a physician at Rome in the first century after Christ, mentioned by Martial (v. 9, vi. 70, vii. 18). [W. A. G.]

SYMPO'SIUS, CAE'LIUS FIRMIA'NUS. [Firmianus.]

SYNCELLUS, an ecclesiastical title borne by several Byzantine writers. The Syncellus was the chosen and confidential companion, commonly the destined successor, of a patriarch. Among the personages who bore this title were Demetrius Syncellus, metropolitan of Cyzicus [Demetrius, literary, No. 17]; Elias Syncellus [Elias, No. 9]; Georgius Syncellus the Chronologist, quoted frequently by his title only, "Syncellus." [Georgius, literary and ecclesiastical, No. 46]; Michael Syncellus of Jerusalem, of whom we subjoin an account, Michael Syncellus of Constantinople, otherwise Michael Monachus [Michael, Byzantine writers, No. 9], and Stephanus Syncellus, Metropolitan of Nicomedia, whose treatise, De triplici Animae Divisione was (perhaps is) extant in MS. in the original Greek text in the King's Library at Paris. Codd. mclxii. No. 2, and mdiv. No. 13. (Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. xi. p. 715; Catalog. Codd. MStorum Biblioth. Regiae, vol. ii. pp. 225, 343. Fol. Paris. 1740.) [J. C. M.]

SYNCELLUS or SYNGELUS (MICHAEL), a Greek writer of the lower empire, several of whose works have been published. From his life of Theodore Studita, and from a letter of Theodore Studita to him (Theodor. Studit. Epistol. lib. ii. Ep. 213, apud Sirmond. Opera Varia, vol. v. p. 733), we learn that he was a contemporary, apparently a disciple in the monastic life of that busy ecclesiastic (who died A. D. 826), that he was Syncellus of the Greek patriarch of Jerusalem, Μιχαὴλ συγκέλλῳ Ἁγιοπολίτῃ, and that he supported the worship of images in the great controversy on that subject in the ninth century. From the title to his Greek version of a letter of Theodore Abucara (Theodorus, literary and ecclesiastical, No. 3) we gather that he was Syncellus to Thomas who held the patriarchate of Jerusalem for about twenty years, from A. D. 801, or, according to other accounts, from 807. Michael, however, must have survived both Theodore Studita and the patriarch Thomas, for he suffered a long imprisonment for his defence of image worship in the reign of the iconoclastic emperor Theophilus, which extended from A. D. 829 to 842. (Theophanes Continuat. De Theophilo, c. 15. p. 66, edit. Paris, p. 106, ed. Bonn.; Cedrenus, Compend. p. 522, ed. Paris, vol. ii. p. 117, ed. Bonn.) Baronius places his imprisonment in A. D. 835. These few facts constitute all that is known of the life of Michael.

His works are, 1. Ἐγκώμιον εἰς τὸν ἅγιον Διονύσιον. Encomium Dionysii Areopagitae. A passage from this is quoted by Suidas (s. v.). This was first printed in the Latin version of Godefridus Tilmannus, a Carthusian monk of Paris, 8vo. Paris, 1546, and was speedily followed by the Greek text, edited by Tilmannus. 4to. Paris, 1547. The Greek text, and a new Latin version by Basilius Millanus, were given by Corderius in his edition of the Opera S. Dionysii Areopagitae, vol. ii. pp. 207, &c. fol. Antwerp, 1634. In all these editions the author's title is given Σύγγελος, Syngelus, as it is also by Suidas. 2. Ἐγκώμιον εἰς τοὺς ἁγίους τοῦ Θεοῦ ἀρχαγγέλους καὶ ἀγγέλους καὶ πάσας τὰς ἐπουρανίους δυνάμεις. Encomium sanctorum Dei archangelorum et angelorum omniumque coelestium potestatum. This is given by Combéfis, with a Latin version, in the second volume of his Auctarium Novum. Fol. Paris, 1648; and the Latin version of Combéfis is given in the Maxima Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. xiv. Fol. Lyon, 1677. 3. A Greek version of the letter of Theodore Abucara, described elsewhere. [Theodorus, literary and ecclesiastical, No. 3.] 4. Μιχαὴλ συγκέλου Ἱεροσολύμων λίβελλος περὶ τοῦ ὀρθοδόξου πίστεως. Michaëlis Synceli Hierosolymorum Libellus de Orthodoxa Fide, s. Professio Fidei. This is given by Montfaucon, with a Latin version, in his Bibliotheca Coislin. p. 90, &c. 5. Μιχαὴλ πρεσβυτέρου καὶ συγκέλλου τοῦ ἀποστολικοῦ θρόνου τῶν Ἱεροσολύμων μέθοδος περὶ τῆς τοῦ λόγου συντάξεως, σχεδιασθεῖσα ἐν Ἐδέσσῃ τῆς Μεσοποταμίας αἰτήσει Λαζάρου διακόνου φιλοσόφου καὶ λογοθέτου. Michaëlis Presbyteri et Syncelli Apostolicae Sedis Hierosolymitanae Methodus de Constructione Orationis, extempore composita Edessae Mesopotamiae rogatu Lazari Diaconi, Philosophi, et Logothetae. We give the title from a MS. in the Medicean library at Florence (Bandini, Catalog. Codd. MStorum Graec. Biblioth. Medic. Laurent. vol. ii. col. 206), which we believe gives the author correctly; but the tract has been repeatedly printed under the name of Georgius Lecapenus [Georgius, literary and ecclesiastical, No. 30], and was printed under the name of the real author, with the grammatical treatise of Alexander Maurocordatos. 8vo. Venice, 1745. 5. Βίος καὶ πολιτεία τοῦ ὁσίου πατρὸς ἡμῶν καὶ ὁμολογητοῦ τοῦ Θεοδώρου τοῦ τῶν Στουδίων ἡγουμένου συγγραφεὶς πρὸς Μιχαήλου μοναχοῦ. Vita et Mores S. Patris nostri et Confessoris Theodori Praepositi Studitarum conscripta a Michaele Monacho. It is with some hesitation that we class this biography, which is given with a Latin version in the fifth volume of the Opera Varia of the Jesuit Sirmond, among the works of Michael Syncellus. It is elsewhere [MICHAEL, Byzantine writers, No. 9] given among the works of Michael, monk and Syncellus of Constantinople, who lived somewhat later than our Michael. The authorship is a question on which critics are divided; the work, however, bears marks of being written by a contemporary of Theodore, which our Michael was, but which the other Michael could hardly be. Several other works of Michael Syncellus, including Carmina varia, are extant in MS. (Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. vi. pp. 133, 298, 333, 345, 382, vol. x. pp. 199, 220, vol. xi. pp. 186, &c. 205; Bandini, Catalog. Codd. MStorum, &c. l. c.; Ittigius, De Biblioth. Patrum; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 830, vol. ii. p. 19, ed. Oxford, 1740—43; Oudin, Comment. de Scriptorib. Eccles. vol. ii. col. 43, &c.) [J. C. M.]

SYNE'SIUS (Συνέσιος), one of the most elegant of the ancient Christian writers, was a native of Cyrene, and traced his descent from the Spartan king Eurysthenes. He devoted himself to the study of all branches of Greek literature, first in his own city, and afterwards at Alexandria, where he heard Hypatia; and became celebrated for his skill in eloquence and poetry, as well as in philosophy, in which he was a follower of Plato. About A. D. 397, he was sent by his fellow-citizens of Cyrene on an embassy to Constantinople, to present the emperor Arcadius with a crown of gold; on which occasion he delivered an oration on the government of a kingdom (περὶ βασιλείας), which is still extant. Soon after this he embraced Christianity, and was baptized by Theophilus, the patriarch of Alexandria, who had such a sense of his merits that, in the year 410, he ordained him as bishop of Ptolemaïs, the chief city of the Libyan Pentapolis, although Synesius was very unwilling to accept the office, and enforced his nolo episcopari by declaring that he would not put away his wife, that he disbelieved the resurrection of the body, and that in other respects his studies and opinions and pursuits were of a nature not quite consistent with the notions of the strictly orthodox. Theophilus, however, overruled these objections: Synesius was permitted to retain his wife; and he very soon made a public profession of his belief in the resurrection of the body. He presided over his diocese with energy and success for about twenty years. Among his most remarkable acts were the conversion to Christianity of the philosopher Evagrius, and the humiliation of Andronicus, the tyrannical president of Libya, whom he brought, by the combined effect of the terrors of excommunication, and a complaint to the emperor, to supplicate the pardon of the church. The time of his death is not stated; but he cannot have lived beyond A. D. 430 or 431, since in the latter year his younger brother and successor Euoptius appeared at the council of Ephesus as bishop of Ptolemaïs. His writings have been objects of admiration both to ancient and modern scholars, and have obtained for him the surname of Philosopher. Those of them still extant are the following:—1. Εἰς τὸν αὐτοκράτορα Ἀρκάδιον περὶ βασιλείας, the oration already referred to. 2. Δίων, ἢ περὶ τῆς καθ' ἑαυτὸν διαγωγῆς, Dio, sive de suo ipsius Instituto, a work in which he professes his intention, after the example of Dio Chrysostom, to devote his life to true philosophy. It appears to have been written about A. D. 404, soon after his marriage. 3. Φαλάκρας ἐγκώμιον, Encomium calvitii, a sort of exercise of wit, in which he defends the condition of baldness in opposition to the κόμης ἐγκώμιον of Dio Chrysostom. (See Tzetz. Chil. xi. 725.) The work of Chrysostom is now lost. 4. Αἰγύπτιος ἢ περὶ προνοίας, Aegyptius sive de Providentia, in two books, in which he gives an allegorical description of the evils of the time, under the guise of the fable of Osiris and Typhon. 5. Περὶ ἐνυπνίων, De Insomniis, on Dreams, a work which Cave and others have supposed, from internal evidence, to have been written before he became a Christian. 6. Ἐπιστολαί, a collection of 156 (not 155) Letters, which form by far the most interesting portion of his extant works. 7. Ὁμιλία, a short discourse on Psalm lxxv. 8. 8. Ὁμιλία, another short discourse on the Eve of the Nativity of Christ. 9. Κατάστασις ῥηθεῖσα ἐπὶ τῇ μεγίστῃ τῶν βαρβάρων ἐφόδῳ, ἡγεμονεύοντος Γενναδίου καὶ Δουκὸς ὄντος Ἰννοκεντίου, an oration describing the calamities suffered by the Pentapolis from the great incursion of the barbarians in A. D. 412. 10. Κατάστασις, an oration in praise of Aysius, the prefect of Libya. 11. Πρὸς Παιόνιον ὑπὲρ τοῦ δώρου λόγος, de dono Astrolabii ad Paeonium dissertatio. 12. Ὕμνοι, ten Hymns; which appear to have been only a small portion of his poetical compositions. The Greek Anthology contains three epigrams ascribed to him, two of which consist each of a single hexameter verse (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 449; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 155, vol. xiii. p. 956), and he himself refers to tragedies and comedies of his own composition. (Dion, p. 62, c.; Welcker, die Griech. Tragöd. p. 1323.)

The Editio Princeps of his whole works is that of Turnebus, Paris, 1553, fol.: the next is that of Cl. Morell, with the Latin version of Petavius, Lutet. (Paris), 1612, fol.; much improved and enlarged, Lutet. (Paris), 1633, fol.; reprinted, 1640, fol. There are also numerous editions of the separate works, and of collections of several of them. (Tillemont, Mém. Eccles. vol. xii. pp. 499, foll.; Cave, Hist. Litt. s. a. 410, vol. i. pp. 389, 390, ed. Basil.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ix. pp. 190, foll.; Hoffmann, Lex. Bibl. Script. Graec.)

A few other writers of this name, none of whom deserve special notice, are mentioned by Fabricius (l. c. p. 204). In the Greek Anthology, besides the epigrams of the celebrated Synesius, there is one, on a statue of Hippocrates, ascribed to a certain Synesius Scholasticus, who appears to have flourished shortly before the destruction of Berytus by an earthquake in A. D. 551. (Brunck, Anal. Graec. vol. iii. p. 11; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 232, vol. xiii. p. 956.) [P. S.]

SYNE'SIUS (Συνέσιος). Under this name a short Greek treatise on Fevers was published in 1749, 8vo. Amstel. et Lugd. Bat., with the title, "Synesius de Febribus, quem nunc primum ex Codice MS. Bibliothecae Lugduno-Batavae edidit, vertit, Notisque illustravit Jo. Steph. Bernard. Accedit Viatici Constantino Africano interprete lib. vii. pars." The medical contents of this little work do not require any particular notice here. It is probably the earliest Greek medical work containing a distinct account of the Small Pox and Measles (c. 9, p. 288, Περὶ τῆς φλυκταινούσης λοιμικῆς, καὶ τῆς ἑτέρας λεπτῆς καὶ πυκνῆς λοιμικῆς), and the author's description of these diseases and his directions respecting their treatment, agree upon the whole very nearly with those given by Rhazes. [RHAZES.] There are several questions respecting the date and authorship of this work which have never hitherto been completely and satisfactorily settled, and which therefore require to be discussed here. Bernard published the work under the name of Synesius, because the author is so called in the Leyden Catalogue (p. 394. § 65), and also at the back of the MS. (Bernard's Pref. p. xviii.); but, as there appears to be no good authority for attributing it to a physician of this name, we must first try to determine who was the author of this Greek fragment,—for the very first lines show that it is not a complete work in itself. There exists in MS. in several European libraries rather a long Greek medical work, divided into seven books, and entitled, Βίβλος λεγομένη Τὰ Ἐφόδια τοῦ Ἀποδημοῦντος, συντεθειμένη παρὰ Ἔπρου Βγζαφὰρ τοῦ Ἔβη Ἐλζηζὰρ, μεταβληθεῖσα εἰς τὴν Ἑλλάδα γλῶσσαν παρὰ Κωνσταντίνου πρωτασηκρήτου τοῦ Ῥηγίνου, a full account of which may be found in Lambecii Catal. Biblioth. Vindob. vi. p. 284 &c. ed. Kollar, and Bandinii Catal. Biblioth. Laurent. vol. iii. p. 142. There is a MS. of this work in the Bodleian Library at Oxford (Laud, Gr. 59), which the Writer has had an opportunity of examining, and he finds that the printed work corresponds to the commencement of the seventh book of the MS. He has collated the printed book partially with the MS. from beginning to end, and finds that two of the chapters are transposed, and that the differences of reading are very numerous; but that the substance, and in general the words also, are so exactly the same that there can be no doubt about the identity of the two works, unless (which is just possible,) they should turn out to be two different (but very literal) translations of the same original treatise. It is therefore tolerably certain that the Pseudo-Synesius is, in fact, the writer commonly known by the designation of Constantinus Africanus, of whom it is necessary to say a few words here, as he is not mentioned in the first volume of this work, because all his published works are written in the Latin language, and he himself lived later than the date fixed on for the admission of Roman writers. He was a native of Carthage in the eleventh century, who spent nearly forty years in travelling in different parts of Asia, where he acquired a knowledge of many useful sciences, and also of several Eastern languages. Upon his return to Africa he was forced, apparently by the jealousy of his countrymen, to leave once more his native land, and settled in Calabria, where he was taken into the service of the Duke Robert Guiscard, and whence he is sometimes called in Greek MSS. Κωνστ. ὁ Ῥηγῖνος. Hence also his title of Πρωτασηκρῆτις or Πρωτασηκρήτης, that is, Protosecretarius, a word whose meaning may be found in the glossaries of Du Cange and Meursius, and which, in the case of Constantinus, has occasioned his being sometimes called (by a curious series of errors) "Asyncritus" and "Asynkitus." (See Lambec. loco cit. p. 295.) At last he became a monk in the Monastery of Cassino, A. D. 1072, where he employed part of his time in writing and translating various medical works, and where he died at a great age, A. D. 1087. It is not necessary to mention here all his numerous works, a list of which may be found in Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 124, ed. vet., and in Choulant's Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Medicin. They were collected and published in 2 vols. fol. Basil. 1536, 1539. The only one of his writings with which we are at present concerned is that which consists of seven books, and is entitled, "De omnium Morborum, qui Homini accidere possunt, Cognitione et Curatione," or in some other editions simply "Viaticum." This work is the same as the Ἐφόδια τοῦ Ἀποδημοῦντος mentioned above, and consequently contains (at the beginning of the seventh book) the Pseudo-Synesius "De Febribus." It appears also that Constantinus is the author of both works, or, in other words, that he translated the original work into both Greek and Latin. The Latin work indeed (at least as we now possess it,) does not profess to be merely a translation, and this circumstance, added to a similar omission in the case of one of his other works, has exposed Constantinus to the charge of plagiarism and dishonesty,—but whether the accusation be altogether well-founded or not, the Writer is unable to decide, as he has never had occasion to examine the other work alluded to with sufficient minuteness to enable him to form an opinion on the subject. (See Russell's Nat. Hist. of Aleppo, Append. p. xii. &c.) It only remains to determine the name and author of the original work; for, even if we had not the title of the Greek MSS. to aid us, it would be sufficiently evident from the inspection of the Pseudo-Synesius that the fragment is translated from the work of some oriental author; the writer not only making constant mention of the natural productions of Eastern countries, but also having preserved two Arabic words in Greek characters.* The name of the writer so strangely metamorphosed in the titles of the Greek MSS. of Constantinus is who is also called ابن الجزار Ibnu-l-Jezzár. Constantinus never gives his author's complete name, but calls him sometimes Abú Ja'far Ibnu-l-Jezzár, sometimes Ahmed Ibn Ibrahím Ibn Abí Cháled; which has led Lambecius and Bandini, in their excellent catalogues, to state that the original work "partim ab Epro filio Zaphar nepote Elgzezar,

* As some difference of opinion has existed respecting one of these words, it may be stated that ἰντεύχε (p. 76) should be written ἴντεχε, that is, انتهاء Intihá, as appears from Avicenna, Canon, i. 2, 2. § 7 (vol. i. p. 38, l. ult. ed. Arab.). The other word, ἐλμούθελ (p. 120), should of course be written ἐλμούθελλεθ, that is, المثلث, Al-muthallath; see Avicenna, ii. 2. 436 (vol. i. p. 200 l. 41, ed. Arab.)

partim autem ab Achmede filio Abrami, nepote Chaletis medici, primum fuit compositum." Ibnu-l-Jezzár was a pupil of Ishak Ibn Soleiman Al-Isráílí (commonly called Isaac Judaeus), and lived at Kairowán in Africa. He died at a great age, A. H. 395 (A. D. 1004½). He was a man of considerable eminence, and wrote several works on medicine, metaphysics, history &c., some of which are extant in MS. in different European libraries. The only one of these with which we are here concerned is entitled زاد المسافر, Zádu-l-Musáfer, "Viaticum Peregrinantium," and consists of seven books. There is an incomplete Arabic MS. of this work in the Bodleian Library at Oxford (Hunt. 302), which the Writer has examined partially throughout, more especially the part corresponding with the Pseudo-Synesius; and he finds (as Reiske had done before him,) that it agrees (upon the whole) very exactly with the Greek and Latin translations mentioned above. A more minute examination of the Arabic, Greek, and Latin texts will probably enable some future editor to give some further information respecting the two translations: the Writer can only say of the conjecture that the Latin version was made from the Greek rather than from the original Arabic, that it appears to him to be wholly without foundation, inasmuch as the Latin translation in some places agrees more closely with the Arabic text than with the Greek. Ibnu-l-Jezzár's work was also translated into Hebrew by Rabbi Moshe Ben Tibbon (Uri, Catal. MSS. Hebr. Bibl. Bodl. § 413), and thus enjoys the singular honour of having been translated into no less than three languages during the middle ages. (For further information see Bernard's Preface to Synesius; Nicoll and Pusey's Catal. MSS. Arab. Bibl. Bodl. p. 587; Wüstenfeld, Gesch. der Arab. Aerzte und Naturforscher, § 120; Choulant, Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Medicin, §§ 46, 70, 90.) [W. A. G.]

SYNNOON (Συννοῶν), statuary. [ARISTOCLES.]

SYNTIPAS, a Persian sage, to whom are attributed two works of which we possess Greek translations, which bear the name of Michael Andreopulus. One of these works is a romance, or collection of stories, very much on the plan of the Thousand and One Nights. By an Arabic author, however, the work is ascribed to one Sendebad, the head of the philosophers of India, who lived somewhere about 100 years before Christ, and wrote a work entitled "The Book of the Seven Counsellors, the Teacher and the Mother of the King." This work was translated into Persian, Arabic, Hebrew, and Syriac, and it is from this last translation that the Greek translation was made. The Greek translation seems to belong to about the eleventh century. It appears not unlikely that this work became known to Europe through the crusades. In the form in which we at present possess it, the work has been accommodated to Christian ideas. The Greek text was published by Boissonade (De Syntipa et Cyri Filio Andreopuli Narratio, Paris, 1828).

The other work attributed to Syntipas, and, like the former, translated into Greek from the Syriac, is a collection of fables (παραδειγματικοὶ λόγοι). An edition of this work was published by F. Matthaei at Leipzig, in 1781. (Schöll, Gesch. der Griech. Litteratur. vol. iii. p. 429, &c.) [C. P. M.]

SYNTROPHUS, P. RUTI'LIUS, is designated Marmorarius in an extant inscription, found at Cadiz, which records the accomplishment of a vow which he had made to erect in the temple of Minerva a Theostasis decorated with marbles, wrought by his own hand (Muratori, Thes. vol. i. p. cxxv. 2; Orelli, Inscrip. Lat. Sel. No. 2507). It is doubtful whether the word Marmorarius signifies a sculptor, or a common worker in marble. Raoul-Rochette quotes a passage from Seneca (Epist. 88), in which it appears to have the former sense; and, of course, if such be its meaning in this inscription, the name of Syntrophus must be added to the lists of ancient artists. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 411, 412, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

SYPHAX (Σύφαξ), a Numidian prince, frequently called king of Numidia, but properly, or at least originally, only king of the Massaesylians, the westernmost tribe of the Numidians. (Polyb. xvi. 23; Liv. xxviii. 17.) The period of his accession is unknown, nor do we learn anything of the relations in which he had stood towards the Carthaginians previous to the year B. C. 213, when we find him engaged in hostilities with that people. This circumstance, together with the successes of the Roman arms in Spain at that juncture, induced the two Scipios to enter into friendly relations with him; they accordingly sent three officers as envoys to him, with promises of assistance from Rome if he persevered in his hostility to their common enemy; and one of these legates, Q. Statorius, even remained in Numidia to instruct him in the art of war. Under his direction Syphax levied a regular army, with which he was able to meet the Carthaginians in the field, and defeat them in a pitched battle. Hereupon they recalled Hasdrubal from Spain to take the command against him, at the same time that they concluded an alliance with Gala, king of the Massylians, who sent his whole forces, under the command of his son Masinissa, to the support of the Carthaginians. Syphax was unable to contend with their united strength; he was totally defeated in a great battle (in which 30,000 men are said to have fallen), and compelled to take refuge in Mauritania. Here he soon gathered a fresh force around him, but was pursued and again defeated by Masinissa. (Liv. xxiv. 48, 49; Appian. Hisp. 15, 16.) Of his subsequent fortunes we know nothing for some time; but he appears to have concluded a treaty of peace with Carthage, by which he apparently regained possession of his dominions. In B. C. 210, we find him renewing his overtures to the Romans, and recounting his successes over the Carthaginians (Liv. xxvii. 4), with whom he appears to have been at that time again at war; but in B. C. 206 he was once more on peaceful, and even friendly terms with the same people. At that time, however, the successes of the young Scipio in Spain led him to cast his eyes towards Africa also, and he sent his friend Laelius on an embassy to Syphax, in the hope of detaching him from the Carthaginian alliance. The Numidian king lent a favourable ear to his overtures, but refused to treat with any one but the Roman general in person. Hereupon Scipio boldly ventured over to Africa, where he was received by Syphax in the most friendly manner, although he accidentally arrived at the same time with the Carthaginian general Hasdrubal, the son of Gisco. The personal influence of Scipio for a time obtained the ascendancy, and Syphax was induced to enter into friendly relations with Rome, though it is doubtful whether (as asserted by Livy) he concluded any definite treaty; at least, he appears to have been shortly after gained over by Hasdrubal to the opposite cause. To this result the charms of Sophonisba, the beautiful daughter of Hasdrubal, whom he offered in marriage to the Numidian king, are said to have powerfully contributed; Syphax accepted the proffered alliance, and became from this time a staunch friend to the Carthaginians. (Liv. xxviii. 17, 18, xxix. 23; Polyb. xiv. 1, 7; Appian. Hisp. 29, 30, Pun. 10; Zonar. ix. 10, 11.)

Meanwhile another opening had presented itself to his ambition. After the death of Gala, the Massylian kingdom had been a prey to civil dissensions, in which, however, Syphax at first took little part; and though he lent some assistance to Lacumaces and his pupil Mezetulus, he did not succeed in preventing his old enemy Masinissa from establishing himself on his father's throne. [MASINISSA.] He was even disposed, we are told, to acquiesce altogether in the elevation of his rival, had not the representations of Hasdrubal warned him of the danger of such a course. But he yielded to the suggestions of the Carthaginian general, and assembled a large army, with which he invaded the territories of Masinissa, defeated him in a pitched battle, and made himself master of his whole kingdom. The Massylian king was thenceforth compelled to restrict himself to a predatory warfare, in the course of which he obtained various advantages, and at one time compelled Syphax himself (in conjunction with his son VERMINA) once more to take the field against him. Though again defeated, he was still able to maintain himself at the head of a small force until the landing of Scipio in Africa, B. C. 204. (Liv. xxix. 29—33; Appian. Pun. 10—12.)

On that event Syphax, who had already sent an embassy to Scipio in Sicily to warn him against taking such a step, did not hesitate to support the Carthaginians, and joined Hasdrubal with an army of 50,000 foot and 10,000 horse. But his desire was not so much for the decided victory of either of the two parties, as to become the means of mediating a peace between them, which he hoped to effect on condition of the Romans withdrawing their troops from Africa, in return for the evacuation of Italy by Hannibal. He in consequence took advantage of the long protracted operations of the siege of Utica, during which his own army and that of Hasdrubal were encamped in the immediate neighbourhood of Scipio, to open negotiations with the Roman general. These were protracted throughout great part of the winter; but Scipio, while he pretended to lend a willing ear to the overtures of the Numidian king, secretly entertained wholly different designs, and early in the spring of B. C. 203, having abruptly broken off the treaty, he suddenly attacked the camp of Syphax in the night, and set fire to the straw huts under which his soldiers were sheltered. The Numidians were taken completely by surprise, and their whole army perished in the conflagration, or was put to the sword in the confusion that ensued. The Carthaginian camp shared the same fate. (Polyb. xiv. 1—5; Liv. xxx. 3—7; Appian. Pun. 13, 14, 17—22; Zonar. ix. 12.) Syphax himself, with a few fugitives, made his escape to Numidia, where he again began to collect troops; but disheartened at this great disaster, he was unwilling again to take the field, and was with difficulty induced, by the united entreaties of Hasdrubal and Sophonisba, to try his fortune once more. Having at length assembled a fresh army, he again joined his forces with those of Hasdrubal, but they were once more totally defeated by Scipio, and Syphax fled for refuge to his hereditary dominions among the Massaesylians, leaving Laelius and Masinissa to recover, without opposition, the kingdom of the latter. But while his enemies were thus employed, he contrived to assemble for the third time a large army, with which he met the invaders on their advance to Cirta. An obstinate contest ensued, but the army of Syphax was at length totally routed, and the king himself fell into the hands of the Romans, who immediately sent him as a prisoner to Scipio. Meanwhile his capital city of Cirta was occupied by Masinissa. (Polyb. xiv. 6—9; Liv. xxx. 7—9, 11, 12; Appian. Pun. 26, 27; Zonar. ix. 13.)

Scipio treated his royal prisoner with distinction, for the purpose of enhancing his own victory, but immediately sent him (together with one of his sons who had been taken prisoner at the same time), under the charge of Laelius, to Rome. Here he was ordered by the senate to be imprisoned at Alba, for safe custody, where he remained until the return of Scipio, after the close of the war. Polybius states expressly that he was one of the captives who adorned the triumph of the conqueror upon that occasion, and that he died in confinement shortly after. Livy, on the contrary, asserts that he was saved from that ignominy by a timely death at Tibur, whither he had been transferred from Alba. (Polyb. xvi. 23; Liv. xxx. 13, 16, 17, 45; App. Pun. 27, 28.) The statement of Polybius, as well as the fact that his death occurred at Tibur, are confirmed by an inscription preserved in the Vatican, the authenticity of which is, however, very doubtful. (See Niebuhr's Lect. on Rom. Hist. vol. i. p. 218, ed. Schmitz; Burton's Description of Rome, vol. ii. p. 312.)

If we may trust the same authority he was 48 years old at the time of his death. [E. H. B.]

SY'RIA DEA (Συρίη θεός), "the Syrian goddess," a name by which the Syrian Astarte or Aphrodite is sometimes designated. This Astarte was a Syrian divinity, resembling in many points the Greek Aphrodite, and it is not improbable that the latter was originally the Syrian Astarte, the opinions concerning whom were modified after her introduction into Greece; for there can be no doubt that the worship of Aphrodite came from the East to Cyprus, and thence was carried into the south of Greece. (Lucian, De Syria Dea; Paus. i. 14. § 6; Aeschyl. Suppl. 562.). [L. S.]

SYRIACUS, VA'LLIUS, a friend of Asinius Gallus, unjustly slain by Tiberius. He is frequently mentioned by the elder Seneca as a distinguished rhetorician. (Dion Cass. lviii. 3; Senec. Controv. i. 9, 14, 21, 27).

SYRIA'NUS (Συριανός), a Greek philosopher of the Neo-Platonic school, was a native of Alexandria, and the son of Philoxenus. We know little of his personal history, but that he came to Athens, and studied with great zeal under Plutarchus, the head of the Neo-Platonic school, who regarded him with great admiration and affection, and appointed him as his successor. The most distinguished of his disciples was Proclus, who regarded him with the greatest veneration, and gave directions that at his death he should be buried in the same tomb with Syrianus. Suidas attributes to Syrianus the following writings: — 1. Εἰς ὅμηρον ὅλον ὑπόμνημα, in 7 books. 2. Εἰς τὴν Πολιτείαν Πλάτωνος, in 4 books. 3. Εἰς τὴν Ὀρφέως Θεολογίαν, in 2 books. 4. Εἰς τὰ Πρόκλου περὶ τῶν παρ' Ὁμήρῳ Θεῶν. 5. Συμφωνίαν Ὀρφέως Πυθαγόρου καὶ Πλάτωνος. 6. Περὶ τὰ λόγια, in 10 books. 7. Various other works of an exegetical character. There is, however, a good deal of difficulty about this list. The very same series of works is assigned by Suidas himself to Proclus (s. v. Πρόκλ.), and we can hardly suppose that Syrianus wrote a commentary on a work of his successor, as Suidas states. On the other hand, Suidas makes no mention of works which we find Syrianus stated by other authorities to have written, or even of works by him which are still extant. No reliance whatever, therefore, can be placed on the list of Suidas. Syrianus wrote commentaries on various parts of Aristotle's writings. 1. On the books De Caelo. (Fabr. Bibl. Gr. iii. p. 230.) 2. On the book De Interpretatione. (Ib. 213.) 3. A Commentary on the Metaphysics is still extant. The Latin translation of the third, thirteenth, and fourteenth books, by Hieron. Bagolini has been published (Venet. 1558), and various portions of the Greek text are printed in the Scholia on Aristotle, edited by Brandis. From various references in the commentary of Proclus on the Timaeus of Plato, we learn that Syrianus also wrote a commentary on the same book, as well as συμφωνίας γράμματα, answering to the work of the same kind mentioned in the list of Suidas.

Theodorus Meliteniotes, in his Prooemium in Astronomiam (printed in Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. vol. x. pp. 401, &c.), mentions commentaries on the Magna Syntaxis of Ptolemaeus, by the philosopher Syrianus (l. c. p. 406). There is also extant a treatise by Syrianus on ideas (Συριανοῦ εἰς τὸ περὶ ἰδεῶν) published by Leonh. Spengel (Συναγωγὴ τεχνῶν, pp. 195—206), and a commentary on the Στάσεις of Hermogenes, published in Greek in 1509 by Aldus (Rhetores, vol. ii.) and in 1833 by Walz (Rhetores, vol. iv.). The most valuable remains that we possess, however, are the commentaries on the Metaphysica of Aristotle. In explaining the propositions of Aristotle, he appends the views held by his school on the subject in hand, and endeavours to establish the latter against the former. One of his fundamental principles is, that it is a proposition of general applicability, that the same cannot be both affirmed and denied at the same time of the same thing; but that in any sense involving the truth of either the affirmation or the denial of a proposition, it applies only to existing things, but not to that which transcends speech and knowledge, for this admits neither of affirmation nor of denial, since every assertion respecting it must be false. (In Met. ii. fol. 13, b.) On the whole, the doctrines laid down in this work are those of the Neo-Platonic school generally. (Fabr. Bibl. Gr. ix. p. 356, &c.; Ritter, Gesch. der Philos. vol. iv. p. 697.) [C. P. M.]

SYRINX, an Arcadian nymph, who being pursued by Pan, fled into the river Ladon, and at her own request was metamorphosed into a reed, of which Pan then made his flute. (Ov. Met. i. 690, &c.; comp. Voss. ad Virg. Ecl. p. 55.) [L. S.]

SYRMUS (Σύρμος), a king of the Triballians, who, as soon as he was aware of the intention of Alexander the Great to invade his territory, in B. C. 335, sent all the women and children of his nation to an island of the Danube, called Peuce, and afterwards, on the nearer approach of the Macedonians, took refuge there himself, with his personal followers. Alexander, having made an unsuccessful attempt to effect a landing on the island, crossed the river and attacked the Getae, whom he defeated; and on his return Syrmus sent ambassadors to sue for peace, which was granted. Plutarch says that Syrmus was conquered by Alexander in a great battle, a statement which would contradict the account of Arrian, as given above, if we were to understand it of a personal defeat (Arr. Anab. i. 2—4; Plut. Alex. 11; Strab. vii. p. 301). [E. E.]

SYRUS, a slave brought to Rome some years before the downfal of the republic, and designated, according to the usual practice, from the country of his birth. He attracted attention while yet a youth, by his accomplishment and wit, was manumitted, in consequence of his pleasing talents, by his master, who probably belonged to the Clodia gens, assumed the name of Publius, from his patron, and soon became highly celebrated as a mimographer. At the splendid games exhibited by Caesar in B. C. 45, he invited all the dramatists of the day to contend with him in extemporaneous effusions upon any given theme, and no one having declined the challenge, the foreign freedman bore away the palm from every competitor, including Laberius himself, who was taunted with this defeat by the dictator:—

"Favente tibi me victus es, Laberi, a Syro."

Publius is frequently mentioned with praise and repeatedly quoted by ancient writers, especially by the Senecas, by A. Gellius, and by Macrobius. Hence we conclude that his mimes must have been committed to writing, and extensively circulated at an early period; and a collection of pithy moral sayings extracted from his works appears to have been used as a school-book in the boyhood of Hieronymus. A compilation of this description, extending to upwards of a thousand lines in Iambic and Trochaic measures, every apophthegm being comprised in a single line, and the whole ranged alphabetically, according to the initial letter of the first word in each, is now extant under the title Publii Syri Sententiae. These proverbs, many of which exhibit much grace, both of thought and expression, have been drawn from various sources, and are evidently the work of many different hands; but a considerable number may with considerable confidence be ascribed to Syrus and his contemporaries. In addition, a fragment upon luxury, extending to ten Iambic verses, has been preserved by Petronius (c. 55).

A portion of the Sententiae was first published by Erasmus, from a Cambridge MS., in a volume containing also the distichs of Cato, and other opuscula of a like character (4to. Argent. 1516); the number was increased by Fabricius in his Syntagma Sententiarum (8vo. Lips. 1550, 1560), and still further extended in the collections of Gruterus (8vo. 1604), of Velserus (8vo. Ingolst. 1608), and of Havercamp (8vo. Lug. Bat. 1708, 1727). The best editions are those of Orellius (8vo. Lips. 1822) and of Bothe, in his Poetarum Latin. Scenicorum Fragmenta, vol. ii. p. 219 (8vo. Lips. 1834), to which we may add a second impression, with improvements, by Orellius, appended to his Phaedrus (8vo. Turic. 1832).

TA'BALUS (Τάβαλος), a Persian, whom Cyrus, after he had taken Sardis, left there in command of the garrison. Here Tabalus was soon after besieged by the rebel Pactyas, but was delivered by Mazares (Herod. i. 153, &c.) [MAZARES; PACTYAS.] [E. E.]

TABUS (Τάβος), a hero in Lydia, from whom the town of Tabae in Lydia was believed to have derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Τάβαι.) [L. S.]

TACFARINAS, a Numidian, who gave some trouble to the Romans in the reign of Tiberius. He had originally served among the auxiliary troops in the Roman army, but he deserted; and, having collected a body of freebooters, among whom he gradually introduced the Roman discipline, he became at length the acknowledged leader of the Musulamii, a powerful people in the interior of Numidia, bordering on Mauritania. Having been joined by the Mauri under the command of Mazippa, he ventured, in A. D. 18, to measure his strength with Furius Camillus, the proconsul of Africa, but was defeated with considerable loss. In A. D. 20 Tacfarinas again attacked the Roman province. He carried his devastations far and wide, and defeated a Roman cohort which was stationed not far from the river Pagyda (perhaps the modern Abeadh), but, after meeting with considerable success, he was defeated in his turn by Apronius, who had succeeded Camillus, and was compelled to retire into the deserts. Nothing daunted by these defeats, Tacfarinas found means to collect a fresh army, and in A. D. 22 had the impudence to send ambassadors to Tiberius, soliciting abodes for himself and his troops, and menacing the emperor, in case of refusal, with perpetual war. Tiberius was indignant at receiving such a message from a deserter and a robber, and gave strict injunctions to Junius Blaesus, who had been appointed governor of Africa, to use every effort to obtain possession of the person of Tacfarinas. In this, however, Blaesus was unable to succeed, for although he defeated Tacfarinas, and took his brother prisoner, Tacfarinas himself succeeded in making his escape. At length, in A. D. 24, the Romans were delivered from this troublesome foe. In this year Tacfarinas, having again collected a large force, attacked the Roman province, but P. Dolabella, more fortunate than his predecessors in the government, not only defeated but slew Tacfarinas in battle. Dolabella was assisted in this campaign by Ptolemaeus, king of Mauritania, the son and successor of Juba II., who was rewarded by Tiberius, after the ancient fashion, with the presents of a toga picta and sceptre, as a sign of the friendship of the Roman people. (Tac. Ann. ii. 52, iii. 20, 21, 73, 74, iv. 23—26.)

TACHOS (Ταχώς), king of Egypt, succeeded Acoris, and maintained the independence of his country for a short time during the latter end of the reign of Artaxerxes II. When the formidable revolt of the western satraps was put down in B. C. 362, by the treachery of Orontes, the satrap of Mysia [ORONTES, No. 3], Tachos feared that he might have to resist the whole power of the Persian empire, and he therefore resolved to obtain the aid of Greek mercenaries. He prevailed upon Chabrias, the Athenian, to take the command of his fleet, and sent an embassy to Sparta, soliciting Agesilaus to undertake the supreme command of all his forces. The Spartan government gave their consent, and Agesilaus readily complied with the request; for, although he was now upwards of eighty, his vigour of mind and body remained unimpaired, and he was anxious to escape from the control to which a Spartan king was subject at home. Upon his arrival in Egypt, Agesilaus was greatly disappointed in having only the command of the mercenaries entrusted to him, Tachos reserving to himself the supreme command of all his forces, both by sea and land. Nevertheless he submitted to this affront, and accompanied the Egyptian monarch into Syria, in B. C. 361, along with Chabrias, and, according to Plutarch, endured for some time in patience the insolence and arrogance of Tachos. Meanwhile Nectanabis, probably the nephew of Tachos, and a certain Mendesian, disputed with Tachos for the crown. Agesilaus forthwith espoused the cause of Nectanabis; and Tachos, thus deserted by his own subjects as well as by his mercenaries, took refuge in Sidon, and from thence fled to the Persian monarch, by whom he was favourably received, and at whose court he died. By the help of Agesilaus, Nectanabis defeated the other competitor, who had collected a large army, and became firmly established on the throne. This is the account of Xenophon and Plutarch, and is in accordance with incidental notices in other writers. The statement of Diodorus, that Tachos returned from Persia, and was again placed upon the throne by Agesilaus, is undoubtedly an error. (Diod. xv. 92, 93; Xen. Ages. ii. §§ 28—31; Plut. Ages. 36—40; Corn. Nep. Chabr. 2, 3, Ages. 8; Polyaen. ii. 1. § 22; Ath. xiv. p. 616, d. e.; Aelian, V. H. v. 1.)

TA'CITA, "the silent," one of the Camenae, whose worship was believed to have been introduced at Rome by Numa. He is, moreover, said to have particularly recommended the worship of Tacita, as the most important among the Camenae. (Plut. Numa, 8.) [L. S.]

TA'CITUS, M. CLAU'DIUS, Roman emperor from the 25th September, A. D. 275, until April, A. D. 276. After the death of Aurelian, the army in Thrace, filled with remorse on account of their fatal mistake [AURELIANUS], and eager to testify their penitence, instead of proclaiming a new emperor with tumultuous haste, despatched a submissive letter to the senate, requesting that assembly to nominate out of their own body a successor to the vacant throne, and pledging themselves to ratify the choice. The senate at first received this most unlooked-for communication with mingled surprise and distrust, and, fearing to take advantage of what might prove a very transient ebullition of feeling, courteously declined to accede to the proposal. At the same time, expressing their full confidence in the discretion of the soldiers, they referred the election to the voice of the legions. The troops, however, again urged the fathers to yield to their wishes; and although again met with the same reply, still persisted in their original solicitation. This extraordinary contest continued for upwards of six months, "an amazing period," says Gibbon, "of tranquil anarchy, during which the Roman world remained without a sovereign, without an usurper, and without sedition."

Such a state of things could not however long endure. The barbarians on the frontiers, who had been quelled and daunted by the skill and daring valour of Aurelian, were not slow to take advantage of the opportunity presented by this strange position of public affairs. The Germans had already crossed the Rhine: Persia, Syria, Africa, Illyria and Egypt were in commotion, when the senate, at length convinced that the soldiers were sincere, joyfully prepared to discharge a duty so unexpectedly devolved upon them. At a meeting convoked on the 25th of September, A. D. 275, by the consul Velius Cornificius Gordianus, all with one voice declared that no one could be found so worthy of the throne as M. Claudius Tacitus, an aged consular, a native of Interamna (Vopisc. Florian. 2), who claimed descent from the great historian whose name he bore, who was celebrated for his devotion to literature, for his vast wealth, for his pure and upright character, and who stood first on the roll. The real or feigned earnestness with which he declined the proffered honour, on account of his advanced age and infirmities, was encountered by the reiterated acclamations of his brethren, who overwhelmed him with arguments and precedents, until at length, yielding to their importunate zeal, he consented to proceed to the Campus Martius, and there received the greetings of the people, and the praetorians assembled to do homage to their new ruler. Quitting the city, he repaired to the great army still quartered in Thrace, by whom, on their being promised the arrears of pay and the customary donative, he was favourably received. One of his first acts was to seek out and put to death all who had been concerned in the murder of his predecessor, whose character he held in high honour, commanding statues of gold and silver to be erected to his memory in the most frequented thoroughfares of the metropolis. He likewise directed his attention to the improvement of public morals by the enactment of various sumptuary laws regulating the amusements, luxurious indulgences, and dress of the citizens, he himself setting an example to all around, by the abstemiousness, simplicity, and frugality of his own habits. His great object was to revive the authority of the senate, which now for a brief period asserted and maintained a semblance of its ancient dignity, and the private letters preserved by Vopiscus (Florian. 6) exhibit an amusing picture of the sacrifices and banquets by which the senators manifested their exultation at the prospect opening up before them of a complete restoration of their ancient privileges.

The only military achievement of this reign was the defeat and expulsion from Asia Minor of a party of Goths, natives of the shores of the sea of Asof, who having been invited by Aurelian to co-operate in his meditated invasion of the East, and having been disappointed of their promised reward by the death of that prince, had turned their arms against the peaceful provinces on the southern coasts of the Euxine, and had carried their devastations across the peninsula to the confines of Cilicia.

But the advanced years and failing strength of Tacitus were unable any longer to support the cares and toils so suddenly imposed upon him, and his anxieties were still farther increased by the mutinous spirit of the army, which soon ceased to respect a leader whose bodily and mental energies were fast hurrying to decay. After a short struggle, he sunk under the attack of a fever, either at Tarsus or at Tyana, about the 9th of April, A. D. 276; according to Victor, exactly two hundred days after his accession. By one account, he fell a victim to the anger of the soldiers; but the weight of evidence tends to prove that they were not the direct instruments, at least, of his destruction.

Our best authority is the biography of Vopiscus, who, if not actually an eyewitness of what he recounts, had an opportunity of consulting the rich collection of state papers stored up in the Ulpian Library; and from these he gives several remarkable extracts. He refers also to a more complete life of Tacitus by a certain Suetonius Optatianus, but of this no fragment remains. See likewise Eutrop. ix. 10; Aurel. Vict. de Caes. xxxvi. Epit. xxxvi.; Zonar. xii. 28, who says that he was seventy-five years old, and in Campania, when proclaimed emperor. [W. R.]

COIN OF M. CLAUDIUS TACITUS.

TA'CITUS, C. CORNE'LIUS, the historian. The time and place of the birth of Tacitus are unknown. He was nearly of the same age as the younger Plinius (Plin. Ep. vii. 20) who was born about A. D. 61 [C. PLINIUS CAECILIUS SECUNDUS], but a little older. His gentile name is not sufficient evidence that he belonged to the Cornelia Gens; nor is there proof of his having been born at Interamna (Terni), as it is sometimes affirmed. Some facts relative to his biography may be collected from his own writings and from the letters of his friend, the younger Plinius.

Cornelius Tacitus, a Roman eques, is mentioned by Plinius (H. N. vii. 16, note, ed. Hardouin) as a procurator in Gallia Belgica. Plinius died A. D. 79, and the procurator cannot have been the historian; but he may have been his father. In an inscription of doubtful authority he is named Cornelius Verus Tacitus. Tacitus was first promoted by the emperor Vespasian (Hist. i. 1), and he received other favours from his sons Titus and Domitian. C. Julius Agricola, who was consul A. D. 77, betrothed his daughter to Tacitus in that year, but the marriage did not take place until the following year. In the reign of Domitian, and in A. D. 88, Tacitus was praetor, and he assisted as one of the quindecemviri at the solemnity of the Ludi Seculares which were celebrated in that year, the fourteenth consulship of Domitian (Annal. xi. 11.)

Agricola died at Rome A. D. 93, but neither Tacitus nor the daughter of Agricola was then with him. It is not known where Tacitus was during the last illness of Agricola, for the assumption that he ever visited either Britain or Germany cannot be proved. He appears to say that he was himself a witness of some of the atrocities of Domitian (Agricola, c. 45). In the reign of Nerva, A. D. 97, Tacitus was appointed consul suffectus, in the place of T. Virginius Rufus, who had died in that year. Tacitus pronounced the funeral oration of Rufus, "and it was," says Plinius, "the completion of the felicity of Rufus to have his panegyric pronounced by so eloquent a man." (Plin. Ep. ii. 1.) Tacitus had attained oratorical distinction when Plinius was commencing his career. He and Tacitus were appointed in the reign of Nerva (A. D. 99) to conduct the prosecution of Marius, proconsul of Africa, who had grossly misconducted himself in his province. Salvius Liberalis, a man of great acuteness and eloquence, was one of the advocates of Marius. Tacitus made a most eloquent and dignified reply to Liberalis.

Tacitus and Plinius were most intimate friends. In the collection of the letters of Plinius, there are eleven letters addressed to Tacitus. In a letter to his friend Maximus (ix. 23), Plinius shows that he considered his friendship with Tacitus a great distinction, and he tells the following anecdote: — On one occasion, when Tacitus was a spectator at the Ludi Circenses, he fell into conversation with a Roman eques, who, after they had discoursed on various literary subjects for some time, asked Tacitus if he was an Italian or a provincial; to which Tacitus replied, "You are acquainted with me, and by my pursuits." "Are you," rejoined the stranger, "Tacitus or Plinius?" The sixteenth letter of the sixth book, in which Plinius describes the great eruption of Vesuvius and the death of his uncle, is addressed to Tacitus; and for the purpose of enabling him to state the facts in his historical writings. Among other contemporaries of Tacitus were Quintilian, Julius Florus, Maternus, M. Aper, and Vipsanius Messala.

The time of the death of Tacitus is unknown, but we may perhaps infer that he survived Trajan, who died A. D. 117. (Hist. i. 1.) Nothing is recorded of any children of his, though the emperor Tacitus claimed a descent from the historian, and ordered his works to be placed in all (public) libraries; and ten copies to be made every year at the public expense, and deposited in the Archeia. (Vopiscus, Tacitus Imp. c. 10.) Sidonius Apollinaris mentions the historian as an ancestor of Polemius, who was a prefect of Gaul in the fifth century.

The extant works of Tacitus are, the Life of Julius Agricola, a treatise on the Germans, Annals, Histories, and a Dialogue on the Causes of the Decline of Eloquence. It is not certain if Tacitus left any orations: no fragments are extant. (Meyer, Oratorum Roman. Fragm. p. 604, 2d ed.)

The life of Agricola was written after the death of Domitian, A. D. 96, as we may probably conclude from the introduction, which was certainly written after Trajan's accession. This life is justly admired as a specimen of biography, though it is sometimes very obscure; but this is partly owing to the corruption of the text. It is a monument to the memory of a good man and an able commander and administrator, by an affectionate son-in law, who has portrayed in his peculiar manner and with many masterly touches, the virtues of one of the most illustrious of the Romans. To Englishmen this life is peculiarly interesting, as Britain was the scene of Agricola's great exploits, who carried the Roman eagles even to the base of the Grampian mountains. It was during his invasion of Caledonia that Britain was first circumnavigated by a Roman fleet. (Agricola, c. 38.) The Agricola is not contained in the earliest edition of Tacitus; and it was first edited by Puteolanus.

The Historiae were written after the death of Nerva, A. D. 98, and before the Annales. They comprehended the period from the second consulship of Galba, A. D. 68, to the death of Domitian, and the author designed to add the reigns of Nerva and Trajan (Hist. i. 1). The first four books alone are extant in a complete form, and they comprehend only the events of about one year. The fifth book is imperfect, and goes no further than the commencement of the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, and the war of Civilis in Germany. It is not known how many books of the Histories there were, but it must have been a large work, if it was all written on the same scale as the first five books.

The Annales commence with the death of Augustus, A. D. 14, and comprise the period to the death of Nero, A. D. 68, a space of four and fifty years. The greater part of the fifth book is lost; and also the seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, the beginning of the eleventh, and the end of the sixteenth, which is the last book. These lost parts comprised the whole of Caligula's reign, the first five years of Claudius, and the two last of Nero. The imperfections of the Annals and the Histories are probably owing to the few copies which were made during the later empire; for the care of the emperor Tacitus to have them copied seems to imply that without it these works might have been forgotten. If they had been as popular as some other works, copies would have been multiplied to satisfy the demand. The first five books of the Annals were found, at the beginning of the sixteenth century, in the Abbey of Corvey in Westphalia, and they were first published at Rome, by Philippus Beroaldus, in 1515.

The treatise entitled De Moribus et Populis Germaniae treats of the Germanic nations, or of those whom Tacitus comprehended under that name, and whose limits he defines by the Rhine and the Danube on the west and south, the Sarmatae and Daci on the east, and on the north-west and north by the sea. It is of no value as a geographical description; the first few chapters contain as much of the geography of Germany as Tacitus knew. The main matter is the description of the political institutions, the religion, and the habits, of the various tribes included under the denomination of Germani. The sources of the author's information are not stated, but as there is no reason to suppose that he had seen Germany, all that he could know must have been derived from the Roman expeditions east of the Rhine and north of the Danube, and from the accounts of traders, who went at least as far as the Roman eagles, and perhaps farther. The value of the information contained in this treatise has often been discussed, and its credibility attacked; but we may estimate its true character by observing the precision of the writer as to those Germans who were best known to the Romans from being near the Rhine. That the hearsay accounts of more remote tribes must partake of the defects of all such evidence, is obvious; and we cannot easily tell whether Tacitus embellished that which he heard obscurely told. But to consider the Germany as a fiction, is one of those absurdities which need only be recorded, not refuted. Much has been written as to the special end that Tacitus had in view in writing this work; but this discussion is merely an offshoot of ill-directed labour; a sample of literary intemperance. [SENECA, p. 782.]

The dialogue entitled De Oratoribus, if it is the work of Tacitus, and it probably is, must be his earliest work, for it was written in the sixth year of Vespasian (c. 17). The style is more easy than that of the Annals, more diffuse, less condensed; but there is no obvious difference between the style of this Dialogue and the Histories, nothing so striking as to make us contend for a different authorship. Besides this, it is nothing unusual for works of the same author which are written at different times to vary greatly in style, especially if they treat of different matters. The old MSS. attribute this Dialogue to Tacitus. One of the speakers in the dialogue attributes the decline of eloquence at Rome to the neglect of the arduous study of the old Roman orators, to which Cicero has left his testimony; but another speaker, Maternus, has assigned a direct and immediate cause, which was the change in the political constitution. Oratory is not the product of any system of government, except one in which the popular element is strong.

The Annals of Tacitus, the work of a mature age, contain the chief events of the period which they embrace, arranged under their several years (Annal. iv. 71). There seems no peculiar propriety in giving the name of Annales to this work, simply because the events are arranged in the order of time. The work of Livy may just as well be called Annals. In the Annals of Tacitus the Princeps or Emperor is the centre about which events are grouped, a mode of treating history which cannot be entirely thrown aside in a monarchical system, but which in feeble hands merges the history of a people in the personality of their ruler. Thus in Tacitus, the personal history of Tiberius, Claudius, and Nero, fill up a large space. Yet the most important public events, both in Italy and the provinces, are not omitted, though every thing is treated as subordinate to the exhibition of imperial power. The Histories which were written before the Annals, are in a more diffuse style, and the treatment of the extant part is different from that of the Annals. Tacitus wrote the Histories as a contemporary; the Annals as not a contemporary. They are two distinct works, not parts of one; which is clearly shown by the very different proportions of the two works: the first four books of the Histories comprise about a year, and the first four books of the Annals comprise fourteen years.

It was his purpose in the Annals to show the general condition of the empire of which Rome was the centre, and the emperor the representative: not only to show the course of events, but also their causes (Hist. i. 4); for this remark, which is made in the Histories, may be applied also to the Annals. But the history of despotism in any form does not convey the political instruction that is derived from the history of a free people. Tacitus claims the merit of impartiality (Annal. i. 1), because he lived after the events that he describes; but a writer who is not a contemporary may have passions or prejudices as well as one who is. In his Histories (i. 1) he states that neither to Galba, nor to Otho, nor to Vitellius, did he owe obligations, nor had he received from them any wrong. From Vespasian and his sons, Titus and Domitian, he had received favours; yet, in the commencement of his life of Agricola, he has recorded the horrors of Domitian's reign; nor can we suppose that in the lost books of the Histories, he allowed the tyrant to escape without merited chastisement.

The history of the empire presents the spectacle of a state without any political organisation, by which the tyranny of a ruler could be checked when it became insupportable. The only means were assassination; and the only power that either the emperor could use to maintain himself, or a conspirator could employ to seize the power or secure it for another, was the soldiery. From this alternate subjection to imperial tyranny and military violence, there were no means of escape, nor does Tacitus ever give even the most distant hint that the restoration of the republic was either possible or desirable; or that there were any means of public security, except in the accident of an able emperor to whom a revolution might give the supreme power. Yet this empire, a prey to the vices of its rulers, and to intestine commotion, had its favourable side. The civilised world obeyed a revolution which was accepted in Rome, and the provinces were at peace with one another under this despotic yoke. France did not invade Italy nor Spain; Greece was not invaded by barbarians from the north; Asia Minor and Syria were protected from the worse than Roman despotism, the despotism of Asia; and Egypt and the north of Africa enjoyed protection against invaders, even though they sometimes felt the rapacity of a governor. The political condition of the Roman empire under the Caesars is a peculiar phase of European history. Tacitus has furnished some materials for it; but his method excluded a large and comprehensive view of the period which is comprised within his Annals. The treatment in the Histories has a wider range. The general review of the condition of the empire at the time of Nero's death is a rapid, but comprehensive sketch (i. 1, &c.).

The moral dignity of Tacitus is impressed upon his works; the consciousness of a love of truth, of the integrity of his purpose. His great power is in the knowledge of the human mind, his insight into the motives of human conduct; and he found materials for this study in the history of the emperors, and particularly Tiberius, the arch-hypocrite, and perhaps half madman. We know men's intellectual powers, because they seek to display them: their moral character is veiled under silence and reserve, which are sometimes diffidence, but more frequently dissimulation. But dissimulation alone is not a sufficient cloke; it merely seeks to hide and cover, and, as the attempt to conceal excites suspicion, it is necessary to divert the vigilance of this active inquisitor. The dissembler, therefore, assumes the garb of goodness; and thus he is hypocrite complete. The hypocrite is a better citizen than the shameless man, because by his hypocrisy he acknowledges the supremacy of goodness, while the shameless man rebels against it. The hypocritical is the common character, or society could not exist. In the Annals of Tacitus we have all characters; but the hypocritical prevails in a despotic government and a state of loose positive morality. There may be great immorality and also great shamelessness, but then society is near its dissolution. Under the empire there was fear, for the government was despotic; but there was not universal shamelessness, at least under Tiberius: there was an outward respect paid to virtue. The reign of Tiberius was the reign of hypocrisy in all its forms, and the emperor himself was the great adept in the science; affectation in Tiberius of unwillingness to exercise power, a lesson that he learned from Augustus, and a show of regard to decency; flattery and servility on the part of the great, sometimes under the form of freedom of speech. To penetrate such a cloud of deception, we must attend even to the most insignificant external signs; for a man's nature will show itself, be he ever so cautious and cunning. In detecting these slight indications of character lies the great power of Tacitus: he penetrates to the hidden thoughts through the smallest avenue. But the possession of such a power implies something of a suspicious temper, and also cherishes it; and thus Tacitus sometimes discovers a hidden cause, where an open one seems to offer a sufficient explanation. Tacitus employed this power in the history of Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero. Suetonius tells us of a man's vices simply and barely; Tacitus discovers what a man tries to conceal. His Annals are filled with dramatic scenes and striking catastrophes. He laboured to produce effect by the exhibition of great personages on the stage; but this is not the business of an historian. The real matter of history is a whole people; and their activity or suffering, mainly as affected by systems of government, is that which the historian has to contemplate. This is not the method of Tacitus in his Annals; his treatment is directly biographical, only indirectly political. His method is inferior to that of Thucydides, and even of Polybius, but it is a method almost necessitated by the existence of political power in the hands of an individual, and modern historians, except within the present century, have generally followed in the same track from the same cause.

Tacitus knew nothing of Christianity, which, says Montaigne, was his misfortune, not his fault. His practical morality was the Stoical, the only one that could give consolation in the age in which he lived. The highest example of Stoical morality among the Romans is the emperor Aurelius, whose golden book is the noblest monument that a Roman has left behind him. Great and good men were not wanting under the worst emperors, and Tacitus has immortalised their names. Germanicus Caesar, a humane man, and his intrepid wife, lived under Tiberius; Corbulo, an honest and able soldier, fell a victim to his fidelity to Nero. The memory of Agricola, and his virtues, greater than his talents, has been perpetuated by the affection of his son-in-law; and his prediction that Agricola will survive to future generations is accomplished. Thrasea Paetus and Helvidius Priscus were models of virtue; and Arria, the wife of Paetus, remembered the virtues of her mother. The jurists of Rome under the empire never forgot the bright example of the Scaevolae of the republic: strange, though true, the great lawyers of Rome were among the best men and the best citizens that she produced. As to the mass of the people we learn little from Tacitus: they have only become matter for history in recent days. The superficial suppose, that when rulers are vicious the people are so too; but the mass of the people in all ages are the most virtuous, if not for other reasons, they are so because labour is the condition of their existence. The Satires of Juvenal touch the wealthy and the great, whose vices are the result of idleness and the command of money.

Tacitus had not the belief in a moral government of the world which Aurelius had; or if he had this belief, he has not expressed it distinctly. He loved virtue, he abhorred vice; but he has not shown that the constitution of things has an order impressed upon it by the law of its existence, which implies a law-giver. His theology looks something like the Epicurean, as exhibited by Lucretius. A belief in existence independent of a corporeal form, of a life after death, is rather a hope with him than a conviction. (Compare Agricola, c. 46, Annals, iii. 18, vi. 22, and the ambiguous or corrupt passage, Hist. i. 4.)

The style of Tacitus is peculiar, though it bears some resemblance to Sallust. In the Annals it is concise, vigorous, and pregnant with meaning; laboured, but elaborated with art, and stripped of every superfluity. A single word sometimes gives effect to a sentence, and if the meaning of the word is missed, the sense of the writer is not reached. He leaves something for the reader to fill up, and does not overpower him with words. The words that he does use are all intended to have a meaning. Such a work is probably the result of many transcriptions by the author; if it was produced at once in its present form, the author must have practised himself till he could write in no other way. Those who have studied Tacitus much, end with admiring a form of expression which at first is harsh and almost repulsive. One might conjecture that Tacitus, when he wrote his Annals, had by much labour acquired the art of writing with difficulty.

The materials which Tacitus had for his historical writings were abundant; public documents; memoirs, as those of Agrippina; histories, as those of Fabius Rusticus and Vipsanius Messala; the Fasti, Orationes Principum, and the Acta of the Senate; the conversation of his friends, and his own experience. It is not his practice to give authorities textually, a method which adds to the value of a history, but impairs its effect simply as a work of art. He who would erect an historical monument to his own fame will follow the method of Tacitus, compress his own researches into a narrow compass, and give them a form which is stamped with the individuality of the author. Time will confer on him the authority which the rigid critic only allows to real evidence. That Tacitus, in his Annals, purposely omitted every thing that could impair the effect of his work as a composition, is evident. The Annals are not longer than an epitome would be of a more diffuse history; but they differ altogether from those worthless literary labours. In the Annals Tacitus is generally brief and rapid in his sketches; but he is sometimes minute, and almost tedious, when he comes to work out a dramatic scene. Nor does he altogether neglect his rhetorical art when he has an opportunity for displaying it: a Roman historian could never forget that a Roman was an orator. The condensed style of Tacitus sometimes makes him obscure, but it is a kind of obscurity that is dispelled by careful reading. Yet a man must read carefully and often in order to understand him; and we cannot suppose that Tacitus was ever a popular writer. His real admirers will perhaps always be few: his readers fewer still. Montaigne read the history of Tacitus from the beginning to the end, and he has given an opinion of Tacitus in his peculiar way; and his opinion is worth more than that of most people. (Montaigne's Essays, iii. ch. 8 Of the art of discoursing.) Montaigne justly commends Tacitus for not omitting to state rumours, reports, opinions; for that which is generally believed at any time is an historical fact, though it may be fact in no other sense.

The first edition of Tacitus, which is very rare, was printed at Venice, 1470, by Vindelin de Spira: it contains only the last six books of the Annals, the Histories, the Germany, and the Dialogue on Oratory. The edition of P. Beroaldus contains all the works of Tacitus. That of Beatus Rhenanus, Basil, 1533, folio, was printed by Froben. Subsequent editions are very numerous; and for a list of them, such works as Hain's Repertorium and Schweigger's Handbuch der Classischen Biographie, may be consulted. The edition of Ernesti by Oberlin, Leipzig, 1801, 8vo., is useful, for it contains the notes and excursus of Justus Lipsius. The edition of G. Brotier, Paris, 1771, 4 vols. 4to., has been much praised, and much bought; but it is a poor edition. There is an edition by I. Bekker, Leipzig, 1831, 2 vols. 8vo.; and by Orelli, Zürich, 1846 and 1848, 2 vols. 8vo. The Lexicon Taciteum of Bötticher, Berlin, 1830, 8vo., is not complete enough, nor exact enough, though it is of some use. The labours of Ruperti on Tacitus are of little value. The modern commentators are in all respects inferior to Lipsius, who did every thing that could be done at the time. Measured by his means, he is infinitely above all other commentators on Tacitus.

There are many editions of the several parts of Tacitus, particularly the Germania, the Agricola, and the Dialogue. The edition of G. L. Walch, Berlin, 1827, 8vo., contains the text and a German translation of the Agricola, with notes. J. Grimm published the text of the Germany, and all other passages relating to Germany, selected from the other parts of Tacitus, Göttingen, 1835, 8vo. The best and most complete edition of the Dialogue is by J. C. Orelli, Zürich, 1830, 8vo.

There are translations of Tacitus, or parts of Tacitus, in almost every European language. The Italian translation of Davanzati is considered to have great merit; and perhaps the Italian language, in able hands, is one of the best adapted for a translation of Tacitus. The French translations have little merit. D'Alembert translated various passages from Tacitus. There are English versions by Greenway, 1598, of the Annals and the Germany, and by Henry Savile, 1598, of the Histories and the Agricola; also versions by Gordon and by Murphy. Gordon's is a harsh version, but, on the whole, faithful. That of Murphy is excessively diffuse; perhaps it is only a dilution of Gordon. [G. L.]

TACO'NIDES or SACO'NIDES, a vase-painter, whose name appears on a vase found at Vulci, and published by Gerhard, who gives the name in the first of the above forms. (Rapport. Vol. cent. p. 180.) Raoul-Rochette, however, states that he has been informed by Gerhard himself that the true reading of the name is ϟΑΚΟΝΙΔΕϟ. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 60, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

TA'DIUS. 1. Appears to have held some property, which was said to belong to a girl who was in legitima tutela. Atticus thought that Tadius had a title to it by usucapion, at which Cicero expressed his surprise, as there could be no usucapion in case of a ward. (Cic. ad Att. i. 5, 8.)

2. Q. Tadius, a relation of Verres, bore witness against him when he was impeached by Cicero. (Cic. Verr. i. 49, iv. 13.)

3. P. Tadius, a Roman citizen, carried on the business of a negotiator or money-lender at Athens, and was subsequently a legatus of Verres in Sicily. Notwithstanding the latter connection, he is spoken of by Cicero as a man of honour. (Cic. Verr. i. 39, ii. 20, v. 25).

TAE'NARUS (Ταίναρος), a son of Elatus and Erimede, from whom the promontory and town of Taenarum, in Laconia, were believed to have their name. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 102; comp. Paus. iii. 14. § 2; Steph. Byz. s. v.) [L. S.]

TAGES, a mysterious Etruscan being, who is described as a boy with the wisdom of an old man. Once when an Etruscan ploughman, of the name of Tarchon, was drawing a deep furrow in the neighbourhood of Tarquinii, there suddenly rose out of the ground Tages, the son of a genius Jovialis, and grandson of Jupiter. When Tages addressed Tarchon, the latter shrieked with fear, whereupon other Etruscans hastened to him, and in a short time all the people of Etruria were assembled around him. Tages now instructed them in the art of the haruspices, and died immediately after. The Etruscans, who had listened attentively to his instructions, afterwards wrote down all he had said, and thus arose the books of Tages, which, according to some, were twelve in number. (Cic. de Div. ii. 23; Ov. Met. xv. 588; Festus, s. v. Tages; Isidor. Orig. viii. 9; Serv. ad Aen. vi. 808.) [L. S.]

TALA'SSIUS or TALASSIS. [Thalassius.]

TALAUS (Ταλαός), a son of Bias and Pero, and king of Argos. He was married to Lysimache (Eurynome, Hygin. Fab. 70, or Lysianassa, Paus. ii. 6. § 3), and was father of Adrastus, Parthenopaeus, Pronax, Mecisteus, Aristomachus, and Eriphyle. (Apollod. i. 9. § 13; Pind. Nem. ix. 14.) Hyginus (l. c.) mentions two other daughters of his. He also occurs among the Argonauts (Apollon. Rhod. i. 118), and his tomb was shown at Argos. (Paus. ii. 21. § 2.) Being a great grandson of Cretheus, Antimachus in a fragment preserved in Pausanias (viii. 25. § 5) calls him Cretheiades. His own sons, Adrastus and Mecisteus, are sometimes called Talaionides, as in Hom. Il. ii. 566; Pind. Ol. vi. 24. [L. S.]

TALEIDES, a maker of painted vases, an interesting work by whom has been found in a tomb at Agrigentum, representing the destruction of the Minotaur, in the stiff archaic style. It is now in the collection of Mr. Hope, and is one of the vases engraved by Moses. (Lanzi, dei Vasi antichi dipinti, pl. iii. p. 147; Millin, Peint. de Vas. vol. ii. pl. lxi.) Another specimen of his workmanship has been more recently discovered at Vulci, namely a small cup, bearing the inscription

ΓΑΥΕΙΔΕΣ ΕΠΟΙΕΣΕΝ, and now in the Museum at Berlin. (Levezow, Verzeichniss, No. 685, p. 136; Gerhard, Berlin's ant. Bildwerke, No. 685, p. 223.) It is remarkable that vases by the same maker should be found in Sicily and in Etruria; and also that the two specimens are in quite different styles of workmanship. The first of these facts is taken by R. Rochette as an indication of the early commercial intercourse between Sicily and Etruria, by which the former country obtained the manufactures of the latter. Müller supposes Taleides to have been of the Attic school of art, because the subject of the work found at Agrigentum is exactly repeated on an Attic vase. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 17, 60, 2d ed.; Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 99, n. 3, No. 2.) [P. S.]

TALNA, JUVE'NTIUS. [THALNA.]

TA'LIUS GE'MINUS, is mentioned by Tacitus under A. D. 62. The name of Talius is of rare occurrence, and is only found elsewhere in one or two inscriptions. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 50.)

TALOS (Τάλως). 1. A son of Perdix, the sister of Daedalus. He himself was a disciple of Daedalus, and is said to have invented several instruments used in the mechanical arts; but Daedalus incensed by envy thrust him down the rock of the Acropolis at Athens. The Athenians worshipped him as a hero. (Apollod. iii. 15. § 9; Diod. iv. 76; Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 1643; Lucian, Pisc. 42.) Pausanias (i. 21. § 6, 26. § 5, vii. 4. § 5) calls him Calos, and states that he was buried on the road leading from the theatre to the Acropolis. Hyginus (Fab. 39, 274) and Ovid (Met. viii. 255; comp. Serv. ad Virg. Georg. i. 143, Aen. v. 14) call him Perdix, which, according to the common tradition, was the name of his father.

2. A man of brass, the work of Hephaestus. This wonderful being was given to Minos by Zeus or Hephaestus, and watched the island of Crete by walking round the island thrice every day. Whenever he saw strangers approaching, he made himself red-hot in fire, and then embraced the strangers when they landed. He had in his body only one vein, which ran from the head to the ankles, and was closed at the top with a nail. When he attempted to keep the Argonauts from Crete by throwing stones at them, Medeia by her magic powers threw him into a state of madness, or, according to others, under the pretence of making him immortal, she took the nail out of his vein and thus caused him to bleed to death. Others again related that Poeas killed him by wounding him with an arrow in the ankle. (Apollod. i. 9. § 26; Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1638, &c.; Plat. Min. p. 320.)

3. A son of Oenopion. (Paus. vii. 4. § 6.)

4. A son of Cres, and father of Hephaestus. (Paus. viii. 53. § 2.) [L. S.]

TALTHY'BIUS (Ταλθύβιος), the herald of Agamemnon at Troy. (Hom. Il. i. 320; Ov. Her. iii. 9.) He was worshipped as a hero at Sparta and Argos, where sacrifices also were offered to him. (Paus. iii. 12. § 6, vii. 23, in fin.; Herod. vii. 134.) [L. S.]

TAMI'SIUS MUSTE'LA. [MUSTELA.]

TA'MOS (Ταμώς), a native of Memphis in Egypt, was lieutenant-governor of Ionia under Tissaphernes. In B. C. 412, we find him joining Astyochus, the Spartan admiral, in the unsuccessful endeavour to persuade the partizans of Athens at Clazomenae to remove to Daphnus,—a place on the main land, and therefore beyond the reach of the Athenian navy. (Thucyd. viii. 31; Arnold and Göller, ad loc.) In B. C. 411, when Tissaphernes went to Aspendus, with the professed intention of bringing to the aid of the Peloponnesians the Phoenician fleet which he had promised, he commissioned Tamos to provide for the maintenance of the Peloponnesian forces during his absence. (Thucyd. viii. 87.) Tamos afterwards attached himself to the service of the younger Cyrus, and, acting as his admiral, in B. C. 401, blockaded Miletus, which had refused to transfer its obedience from Tissaphernes to the prince. When Cyrus marched eastward against his brother, Tamos conducted the fleet along the coast to accompany the movements and second the operations of the army, which he joined at Issus in Cilicia. After the death of Cyrus and the consequent failure of the rebellion, Artaxerxes sent Tissaphernes into Western Asia to take, in addition to his own satrapy, the command of the provinces which had been subject to the prince, whereupon Tamos, in alarm, fled from Ionia with his treasures and all his children but one, and sailed to Egypt, where he hoped to find refuge with Psammetichus, on whom he had conferred an obligation. Psammetichus, however, put him and his children to death, in order to possess himself of his money and ships. (Xen. Anab. i. 2. § 21, 4. § 2. ii. 1. § 3, Hell. iii. 1. § 1; Diod. xiv. 19. 21. 35.) [E. E.]

TA'MPHILUS or TA'MPILUS, the name of a family of the plebeian Baebia gens. In the Fasti Capitolini we find Tamphilus, but on coins Tampilus.

1. Q. BAEBIUS TAMPHILUS, was sent in B. C. 219, along with P. Valerius Flaccus, by the Roman senate to Hannibal at Saguntum, and afterwards proceeded to Carthage, when Hannibal would not listen to them. Tamphilus was also sent in the following year on another embassy to Carthage. (Liv. xxi. 6, 9, 18; Cic. Phil. v. 10.)

2. CN. BAEBIUS TAMPHILUS, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 204, impeached the censors, M. Livius Salinator and C. Claudius Nero, on account of the way in which they had administered the duties of their office; but the senate, although discontented with the conduct of the censors, obliged the tribune to drop the prosecution, as they thought it more advisable to uphold the principle of the irresponsibility of the censors than to inflict upon them the punishment they deserved. In B. C. 199 Tamphilus was praetor, and received the command of the legions of the consul of the preceding year, C. Aurelius Cotta, which were stationed in the neighbourhood of Ariminum, with instructions to await the arrival of the new consul, C. Cornelius Lentulus. But Tamphilus, anxious to obtain glory, made an incursion into the country of the Insubrii, by whom he was defeated with great loss. On the arrival of Lentulus soon afterwards, he was ordered to leave the province, and was sent back to Rome in disgrace. In B. C. 186 Tamphilus was one of the triumviri for founding two colonies, and in B. C. 182 he was consul with L. Aemilius Paulus. In conjunction with his colleague, Tamphilus fought against the Ligurians with success, and remained in the country as proconsul in the following year. (Liv. xxix. 37; Val. Max. vii. 2. § 6; Liv. xxxi. 49, 50, xxxii. 1, 7, xxxix. 23, 56, xl. 1, 16, 25.)

3. M. BAEBIUS TAMPHILUS, brother of No. 2, was one of the triumviri for founding a colony in

B. C. 194. He was praetor in B. C. 192, when he received Bruttii as his province, with two legions, and 1500 foot-soldiers and 500 horse of the allies. In consequence of the threatening war with Antiochus the Great, he was ordered to march with these troops to the neighbourhood of Brundisium and Tarentum, and soon afterwards to cross over with them to Epeirus. He remained in Greece the following year as propraetor, and took an active part in the war against Antiochus. In conjunction with Philip, king of Macedonia, he marched into Thessaly, and as Antiochus retreated before them, Tamphilus obtained possession of many important towns in Thessaly. The consul M'. Acilius Glabrio arrived soon afterwards, and took the command of the troops, but Tamphilus continued in Greece, serving under the consul. (Liv. xxxiv. 45, xxxv. 10, 23, 24, xxxvi. 8, 10, 13, 14, 22.)

In B. C. 186, Tamphilus was one of the three ambassadors sent to settle the disputes between Eumenes and Philip and the Thessalian states. In B. C. 181 he was consul with P. Cornelius Cethegus. Both consuls received Liguria as their province, but they did not engage in any military operations. In the following year, however, when their command was prolonged till the arrival of the new consuls, they marched at the commencement of the spring into the territory of the Apuani Ligures, who, taken unawares, found themselves obliged to surrender. In order to prevent a renewal of the war, the consuls transported 40,000 of these people, with their wives and children, to Samnium. On account of this success, they triumphed on their return to Rome, being the first instance in which this honour had been conferred upon generals who had not carried on a war. (Liv. xxxix. 23, 24, xl. 18, 35, 37, 38.)

4. CN. BAEBIUS TAMPHILUS, probably son of No. 2, was praetor urbanus, B. C. 168. In the following year he was one of the five legati sent into Illyricum. (Liv. xliv. 17, xlv. 17).

The following coin of C. Baebius Tamphilus has on the obverse the head of Pallas, and on the reverse Apollo driving a quadriga.

COIN OF C. BAEBIUS TAMPHILUS.

TANAGRA (Τάναγρα), a daughter of Aeolus or Asopus, and wife of Poemander, is said to have given the name to the town of Tanagra in Boeotia. (Paus. ix. 20. § 2; Strab. ix. p. 403.) [L. S.]

TA'NTALUS (Τάνταλος). 1. A son of Zeus by Pluto, or according to others (Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 5; Tzetz. Chil. v. 444; Apostol. Cent. xviii. 7) a son of Tmolus. (Hygin. Fab. 82, 154; Anton. Lib. 36.) His wife is called by some Euryanassa (Schol. ad Eurip. l. c.; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 52), by others Taygete or Dione (Hygin. Fab. 82; Ov. Met. vi. 174), and by others Clytia or Eupryto (Schol. ad Eurip. Or. 11; Apostol. l. c.) He was the father of Pelops, Broteas, and Niobe. (Schol. ad Eurip. Or. 5; Diod. iv. 74.) All traditions agree in stating that he was a wealthy king, but while some call him king of Lydia, of Sipylus in Phrygia or Paphlagonia, others describe him as king of Argos or Corinth. (Hygin. Fab. 124; Serv. ad Aen. vi. 603; Diod. l. c.) Tantalus is particularly celebrated in ancient story for the severe punishment inflicted upon him after his death in the lower world, the causes of which are differently stated by the ancient authors. The common account is that Zeus invited him to his table and communicated his divine counsels to him. Tantalus divulged the secrets intrusted to him, and the gods punished him by placing him in the nether world in the midst of a lake, but rendering it impossible for him to drink when he was thirsty, the water always withdrawing when he stooped. Branches laden with fruit, moreover, hung over his head, but when he stretched out his hand to reach the fruit, the branches withdrew. (Hom. Od. xi. 582.) Over his head there was suspended a huge rock ever threatening to crush him. (Pind. Ol. i. 90, &c., Isthm. viii. 21; Eurip. Or. 5, &c.; Diod. v. 74; Philostr. Vit. Apollon. iii. 25; Hygin. Fab. 82; Horat. Sat. i. 1. 68; Tibull. i. 3. 77; Ov. Met. iv. 457, Art. Am. ii. 605; Senec. Herc. Fur. 752; Cic. de Fin. i. 18, Tuscul. iv. 16.) Another tradition relates that he, wanting to try the gods, cut his son Pelops in pieces, boiled them and set them before the gods at a repast. (Hygin. Fab. 83; Serv. ad Aen. vi. 603, ad Georg. iii. 7.) A third account states that Tantalus stole nectar and ambrosia from the table of the gods and gave them to his friends (Pind. Ol. i. 98; Tzetz. Chil. v. 465); and a fourth lastly relates the following story. Rhea caused the infant Zeus and his nurse to be guarded in Crete by a golden dog, whom subsequently Zeus appointed guardian of his temple in Crete. Pandareus stole this dog, and, carrying him to Mount Sipylus in Lydia, gave him to Tantalus to take care of. But afterwards, when Pandareus demanded the dog back, Tantalus took an oath that he had never received him. Zeus thereupon changed Pandareus into a stone, and threw Tantalus down from Mount Sipylus. (Anton. Lib. 36.) Others again relate that Hermes demanded the dog of Tantalus, and that the perjury was committed before Hermes. (Pind. Ol. i. 90.) Zeus buried Tantalus under Mount Sipylus as a punishment. (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. 90, 97.) There his tomb was shown in later times. (Paus. ii. 22. § 4, v. 13. § 4.) In the Lesche of Delphi Tantalus was represented by Polygnotus in the situation described in the common tradition: he was standing in water, with a fruit-tree over his head, and threatened by an overhanging rock. (Paus. x. 31. § 2.) The punishment of Tantalus was proverbial in ancient times, and from it the English language has borrowed the verb "to tantalize," that is, to hold out hopes or prospects which cannot be realized. Tzetzes (ad Lycoph. 355) mentions that Tantalus was in love with Ganymede, and engaged with Ilus in a contest for the possession of the charming youth.

2. A son of Thyestes, who was killed by Atreus (Hygin. Fab. 88, 244, 246; others call him a son of Broteas). He was married to Clytaemnestra before Agamemnon (Paus. ii. 22. § 4), and is said by some to have been killed by Agamemnon. (Paus. ii. 18. § 2, comp. iii. 22. § 4.) His tomb was shown at Argos.

3. A son of Amphion and Niobe. (Apollod. iii. 5. § 6; Ov. Met. vi. 240.) [L. S.]

TA'NTALUS, the name of the general who succeeded Viriathus and who shortly afterwards submitted to Caepio. He is called Tantamus by Diodorus (Appian, Hisp. 75; Diod. Ecl. xxxii. vol. ii. p. 524, ed. Wess.)

L. TANTA'SIUS, slain by Catiline in the times of Sulla. (Ascon. in Cic. Tog. Cand. p. 84, ed. Orelli.)

TANU'SII, people of property proscribed by Sulla. (Q. Cic. de Pet. Cons. 2.)

TANYOXARCES. [SMERDIS.]

TA'PHIUS (Τάφιος), a son of Poseidon and Hippothoë, was the father of Pterelaus. He led a colony to Taphos, and called the inhabitants Teleboans. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 5.) [L. S.]

TAPPO, VALE'RIUS. 1. L. VALERIUS TAPPO, praetor B. C. 192, obtained Sicily as his province. He was one of the triumvirs in B. C. 190 for settling new colonists at Placentia and Cremona in northern Italy. (Liv. xxxv. 10, 20, xxxvii. 46.)

2. C. VALERIUS TAPPO, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 188, proposed that the suffrage should be given to the Formiani, Fundani and Arpinates. (Liv. xxxviii. 36.)

2. P. VILLIUS TAPPULUS, plebeian aedile, B. C. 204, and praetor B. C. 203, with Sicily as his province. In B. C. 201, he was one of the decemviri for assigning some of the public land in Samnium and Apulia to the soldiers who had served under P. Scipio in Africa, and in B. C. 199 he was consul with L. Cornelius Lentulus. In his consulship he had the conduct of the war against Philip in Macedonia, but he performed nothing of importance. In the following year he served as legatus under his successor T. Quintius Flamininus, and on the conquest of Philip in B. C. 196, he was one of the ten commissioners appointed by the senate to determine with Flamininus upon the conditions of the peace. After concluding the peace with Philip, Tappulus and one of his colleagues went on a mission to Antiochus in Asia. In B. C. 193 he was again sent to Antiochus, and in the following year was also one of the ambassadors sent to Greece. (Liv. xxix. 38, xxx. 1, xxxi. 4, 49, xxxii. 3, 6, 28, xxxiii. 24, 35, 39, 40, xxxiv. 59, xxxv. 13—15, 23, 39.)

3. L. VILLIUS TAPPULUS, praetor B. C. 199, obtained Sardinia as his province. (Liv. xxxi. 49, xxxii. 1.)

TARANTUS, a nickname bestowed on Caracalla, after his death, from a gladiator of diminutive stature and repulsive aspect. It is first mentioned by Dion Cassius in the ninth chapter of his seventy-eighth book, and in the subsequent portions of his history he uniformly designates the son of Severus by this appellation. [W. R.]

TARAS (Τάρας), a son of Poseidon by a nymph, is said to have traversed the sea from the promontory of Taenarum to the south of Italy, riding on a dolphin, and to have founded Tarentum in Italy (Paus. x. 10. § 4, 13. § 5), where he was worshipped as a hero. (Strab. vi. p. 279.) [L. S.]

TARA'TIA, CAIA, a Vestal Virgin, who is said to have given the campus Tiberinus to the Roman people, and to whom, on that account a statue was erected. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 6. s. 11.)

TARAXIPPUS (Ταράξιππος), was the name of a particular spot in the race-course at Olympia, where horses often became shy and frightened. Superstition was not at a loss to account for this phenomenon, for some said that on that spot Olenius or Dameon had been slain by Cteatus, or because it was the burial-place of Myrtilus (who had frightened the horses of Oenomaus), Alcathous, or Pelops. Pausanias, however, considers Taraxippus to be a surname of Poseidon Hippius. On the isthmus of Corinth, Glaucus, the son of Sisyphus, was believed to be a Taraxippus. (Paus. vi. 20. § 8, &c.; comp. x. 37. § 4.) [L. S.]

TARCHE'SIUS, an architectural writer, whom Vitruvius mentions as one of those who maintained that the proportions of the Doric order were unsuitable to temples. He attributes the same opinion to Pytheus and Hermogenes. (Vitruv. iv. 3. § 1). [P. S.]

TARCHE'TIUS (Ταρχέτιος), a mythical king of Alba, who in some traditions is connected with the founders of Rome. Once a phallus was seen rising above one of his flocks. In compliance with an oracle he ordered one of his daughters to approach the phallus; but she sent one of her maid servants, who became pregnant, and gave birth to the twins Romulus and Remus. Tarchetius caused them to be exposed, but they were suckled by a she-wolf and brought up by a shepherd, and when they had grown up to manhood they dethroned Tarchetius. (Plut. Romul. 2.) [L. S.]

TARCONDI'MOTUS (Ταρκονδίμοτος), the king of Cilicia, fought on Pompey's side against Caesar, in B. C. 48, but was pardoned by Caesar, and allowed to retain his dominions. After the death of Caesar he joined C. Cassius, and subsequently espoused the side of Antony against Octavian. He was killed in a sea-fight in B. C. 31, while fighting under Sosius against M. Agrippa. His name is variously written in the ancient authors, but we learn from coins that Tarcondimotus is the correct form (Dion Cass. xli. 63, xlvii. 26, l. 14; Strab. xiv. p. 676; Cic. ad Fam. xv. 1; Flor. iv. 2. § 5; Plut. Ant. 61.) The sons of Tarcondimotus deserted Antony after the battle of Actium, and united themselves to Octavian; but Philopator, who had succeeded his father, was deprived by Octavian of the part of Cappadocian Pontus, which he held. In B. C. 20, however, Tarcondimotus, one of the sons, received from Octavian all the possessions of his father, with the exception of a few places on the coast. (Dion Cass. li. 2, 7, liv. 9.)

COIN OF TARCONDIMOTUS.

TARGITAUS (Ταργίταος), a son of Zeus by a daughter of Borysthenes, was believed to be the ancestor of all the Scythians. (Herod. iv. 5.) [L. S.]

TA'RIUS RUFUS. [RUFUS.]

TARPA, SP. MAE'CIUS, was engaged by Pompeius to select the plays that were acted at his games exhibited in B. C. 55 (Cic. ad Fam. vii. 1). Tarpa was likewise employed by Augustus as a dramatic censor. (Hor. Serm. i. 10. 38, Ars Poët. 386; Weichert, Poët. Lat. p. 334.)

TARPEIA, the daughter of Sp. Tarpeius, the governor of the Roman citadel on the Saturnian hill, afterwards called the Capitoline, was tempted by the gold on the Sabine bracelets and collars to open a gate of the fortress to T. Tatius and his Sabines. As they entered, they threw upon her their shields, and thus crushed her to death. She was buried on the hill, and her memory was preserved by the name of the Tarpeian rock, which was given to a part of the Capitoline (Liv. i. 11; comp. Dionys. ii. 38, 40). Niebuhr relates that a legend still exists at Rome which relates that the fair Tarpeia ever sits in the heart of the hill, covered with gold and jewels, and bound by a spell (Hist. of Rome, vol. i. p. 230). Varro (L. L. v. 41, ed. Müller) describes her as a Vestal Virgin; but Plutarch relates (Num. 10) that Tarpeia was the name of one of the four Vestals, who were first appointed by Numa.

TARPEIA GENS, occurs only in the kingly and the early republican period. We read of a Sp. Tarpeius, who was the governor of the Roman citadel under Romulus, and whose daughter betrayed it to the Sabines [TARPEIA], and of a Sp. Tarpeius Montanus Capitolinus, who was consul in B. C. 454 with A. Aternius Varus Fontinalis. [CAPITOLINUS.]

TARQUINIA. [TARQUINIUS.]

TARQUI'NIUS, the name of a family in early Roman history, to which the fifth and seventh kings of Rome belonged. The table on the following page represents the genealogy of the family according to Livy.

The legend of the Tarquins ran as follows. The Tarquins were of Greek extraction. Demaratus, their ancestor, belonged to the noble family of the Bacchiadae at Corinth, and fled from his native city when the power of his order was overthrown by Cypselus. He settled at Tarquinii in Etruria, where he had mercantile connections, for commerce had not been considered disreputable among the Corinthian nobles. He brought great wealth with him, and is said to have been accompanied by the painter Cleophantus, and by Eucheir and Eugrammus, masters of the plastic arts, and likewise to have introduced among the Etruscans the knowledge of alphabetical writing. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 5. s. 43; Tac. Ann. xi. 14.) He married an Etruscan wife, by whom he had two sons, Lucumo and Aruns. The latter died in the lifetime of his father, leaving his wife pregnant; but as Demaratus was ignorant of this circumstance, he bequeathed all his property to Lucumo, and died himself shortly afterwards.* But, although Lucumo was thus one of the most wealthy persons at Tarquinii, and had married Tanaquil, who belonged to a family of the highest rank, he was excluded, as a stranger, from all power and influence in the state. Discontented with this inferior position, and urged on by his wife, he resolved to leave Tarquinii and remove to Rome, where a new citizen had more chance of obtaining distinction. He accordingly set out for Rome, riding in a chariot with his wife, and accompanied by a large train of followers. When they had reached the Janiculum and were already within sight of Rome, an eagle seized his cap, and after carrying it away to a great height placed it again upon his head. Tanaquil, who was skilled in the Etruscan science of augury, bade her husband hope for the highest honour from this omen. Her predictions were soon verified. The stranger was received with welcome, and he and his followers were admitted to the rights of Roman citizens. He took the name of L. Tarquinius, to which Livy adds Priscus. His wealth, his courage, and his wisdom, gained him the love both of Ancus Marcius and of the people. The former appointed him guardian of his children; and, when he died, the senate and the people unanimously elected Tarquinius to the vacant throne.

The reign of Tarquinius was distinguished by great exploits in war, and by great works in peace. The history of his wars is related very differently by Livy and Dionysius. According to the former writer he waged war with the Latins and Sabines with great success. He first destroyed the wealthy town of Apiolae, which belonged to the Sabines, and subsequently took the Latin towns of Cameria, Crustumerium, Medullia, Ameriola, Ficulnea, Corniculum, and Nomentum. But his most memorable exploit was the defeat of the Sabines, who had advanced up to the very gates of Rome. They were at first driven back after a doubtful struggle, but were subsequently overthrown with great loss upon the Anio, and compelled to sue for peace. They ceded to the Romans the town of Collatia, where Tarquinius placed a strong garrison, the command of which he entrusted to Egerius, the son of his deceased brother Aruns, who, with his family, took the surname of Collatinus. Several traditions are connected with this war. The king's son, a youth of fourteen, slew a foe with his own hand, and received as a reward a golden bulla and a robe bordered with purple; and these remained in after times the ornaments and dress of youths of noble rank. In this war, also, Tarquinius is said to have vowed the building of the Capitol.

Livy says nothing more respecting the wars of this king, but Dionysius relates at great length his wars with the Etruscans. According to the latter writer five of the great Etruscan cities sent assistance to the Latins, which proved ineffectual; and subsequently all the twelve cities united their forces against Rome, but were overcome by Tarquinius, and compelled to submit to his authority. They are further stated to have done homage to him by presenting him with a golden crown, an ivory throne and sceptre, a purple tunic and robe figured with gold, and other badges of kingly power, such as the Etruscans used when their twelve cities chose a common chief in war. (Dionys. iii. 57, 59, 61.) Thus, according to this story, Tarquinius ruled over the Latins, Sabines, and Etruscans, as well as Romans; but no Latin writer mentions this war with the Etruscans, with the exception of Florus (i. 5), and the compiler of the triumphal Fasti. Cicero (de Rep. ii. 20) and Strabo (v. p. 231) relate that Tarquinius also subdued the Aequi;

* It is related by Strabo (viii. p. 378) that Demaratus became the ruler of Tarquinii, but this story is opposed to all other traditions, and should certainly be rejected.

but this war is not mentioned by Dionysius, and is referred by Livy (i. 55) to Tarquinius Superbus.

Although the wars of Tarquinius were of great celebrity, the important works which he executed in peace have made his name still more famous. Many of these works are ascribed in some stories to the second Tarquinius, but almost all traditions agree in assigning to the elder Tarquinius the erection of the vast sewers by which the lower parts of the city were drained, and which still remain, with not a stone displaced, to bear witness to his power and wealth. (See Dict. of Antiq. art. Cloaca.) The quay by which the Tiber is banked, and through which the sewer opens into it, must clearly have been executed at the same time, and may therefore be safely ascribed to the elder Tarquinius.

The same king is also said in some traditions to have laid out the Circus Maximus in the valley which had been redeemed from water by the sewers, and also to have instituted the Great or Roman Games, which were henceforth performed in the Circus. The Forum, with its porticoes and rows of shops, was also his work, and he likewise began to surround the city with a stone wall, a work which was finished by his successor Servius Tullius. The building of the Capitoline temple is moreover attributed to the elder Tarquinius, though most traditions ascribe this work to his son, and only the vow to the father.

Tarquinius also made some changes in the constitution of the state. He added a hundred new members to the senate, who were called patres minorum gentium, to distinguish them from the old senators, who were now called patres majorum gentium. He wished to add to the three centuries of equites established by Romulus three new centuries, and to call them after himself and two of his friends. His plan was opposed by the augur Attus Navius, who gave a convincing proof that the gods were opposed to his purpose. [NAVIUS.] Accordingly he gave up his design of establishing new centuries, but to each of the former centuries he associated another under the same name, so that henceforth there were the first and second Ramnes, Tities, and Luceres. He increased the number of Vestal Virgins from four to six.

Tarquinius had reigned thirty-eight years, when he was assassinated by the contrivance of the sons of Ancus Marcius. They had long wished to take vengeance upon him on account of their being deprived of the throne, and now fearing lest he should secure the succession to his son-in-law Servius Tullius, they hired two countrymen, who, feigning to have a quarrel, came before the king to have their dispute decided; and while he was listening to the complaint of one, the other gave him a deadly wound with his axe. But the sons of Marcius did not secure the reward of their crime, for Servius Tullius, with the assistance of Tanaquil, succeeded to the vacant throne. Tarquinius left two sons and two daughters. His two sons, L. Tarquinius and Aruns, were subsequently married to the two daughters of Servius Tullius. One of his daughters was married to Servius Tullius, and the other to M. Brutus, by whom she became the mother of the celebrated L. Brutus, the first consul at Rome. The principal authorities for the life of Tarquinius Priscus are Livy (i. 34—41), Dionysius (iii. 46—73, iv. 1), and Cicero (de Rep. iii. 20.).

The life of Servius Tullius is given under TULLIUS. There it is related how he was murdered, after a reign of forty-four years, by his son-in-law, L. Tarquinius, who had been urged on by his wicked wife to commit the dreadful deed. The Roman writers represent the younger Tarquinius as a cruel and tyrannical monarch, and the fact of his being the last king of Rome has doubtless contributed not a little to blacken his character. The estimation in which he was held by the Romans is shown by his surname of Superbus.

L. TARQUINIUS SUPERBUS commenced his reign without any of the forms of election. He seized the kingdom as a recovered inheritance, and did not wait to be elected by the senate or the people, or to receive the imperium from the curiae. One of the first acts of his reign was to abolish all the privileges which had been conferred upon the plebeians by Servius, since the patricians had assisted him in obtaining the kingdom. He forbade the meetings of the tribes, and repealed the laws which had conferred civil equality upon the plebeians, and which had abolished the right of seizing the person of a debtor. He also compelled the poor to work at miserable wages upon his magnificent buildings, and the hardships which they suffered were so great that many put an end to their lives. But he did not confine his oppressions to the poor. All the senators and patricians whom he mistrusted, or whose wealth he coveted, were put to death or driven into exile. The vacant places in the senate were not filled up, and this body was scarcely ever consulted by him. He surrounded himself by a body-guard, by means of which he was enabled to do what he liked. But, although a tyrant at home, he raised the state to great influence and power among the surrounding nations, partly by his alliances and partly by his conquests. He gave his daughter in marriage to Octavius Mamilius of Tusculum, the most powerful of the Latin chiefs, and by his means he acquired great influence in Latium. Under his sway Rome became eventually the acknowledged head of the Latin confederacy. According to Cicero (de Rep. ii. 24) he subdued the whole of Latium by force of arms; but Livy and Dionysius represent his supremacy as due to his alliances and intrigues. Any Latin chiefs, like Turnus Herdonius, who attempted to resist him, were treated as traitors and punished with death. At the solemn meeting of the Latins at the Alban Mount, Tarquinius sacrificed the bull on behalf of all the allies, and distributed the flesh to the people of the league. So complete was the union of the Romans and the Latins that the soldiers of the two nations were not kept separate, but each maniple in the army was composed of both Romans and Latins. The Hernici also became members of the league, but their troops were kept apart from the Roman legions.

Strengthened by this Latin alliance, and at the head of a formidable army, Tarquinius turned his arms against the Volscians. He took the wealthy town of Suessa Pometia, with the spoils of which he commenced the erection of the Capitol which his father had vowed; but great as these were, they were scarcely sufficient even for the foundations of this magnificent edifice, and the people were heavily taxed to complete the building. In digging for the foundations, a human head was discovered beneath the earth, undecayed and trickling with blood; and Etruscan soothsayers expounded the prodigy as a sign that Rome was destined to become the head of the world. In the vaults of this temple he deposited the Sibylline books, which the king purchased from a sibyl or prophetess. She had offered to sell him nine books for three hundred pieces of gold. The king refused the offer with scorn. Thereupon she went away, and burned three, and then demanded the same price for the six. The king still refused. She again went away and burnt three more, and still demanded the same price for the remaining three. The king now purchased the three books, and the sibyl disappeared.

In order to secure his Volscian conquests, Tarquinius founded the colonies of Signia and Circeii. He was next engaged in a war with Gabii, one of the Latin cities, which refused to enter into the league. Unable to take the city by force of arms, Tarquinius had recourse to stratagem. His son, Sextus, pretending to be ill-treated by his father, and covered with the bloody marks of stripes, fled to Gabii. The infatuated inhabitants intrusted him with the command of their troops, and when he had obtained the unlimited confidence of the citizens, he sent a messenger to his father to inquire how he should deliver the city into his hands. The king, who was walking in his garden when the messenger arrived, made no reply, but kept striking off the heads of the tallest poppies with his stick. Sextus took the hint. He put to death or banished, on false charges, all the leading men of the place, and then had no difficulty in compelling it to submit to his father.

In the midst of his prosperity, Tarquinius was troubled by a strange portent. A serpent crawled out from the altar in the royal palace, and seized on the entrails of the victim. The king, in fear, sent his two sons, Titus and Aruns, to consult the oracle at Delphi. They were accompanied by their cousin, L. Junius Brutus. One of the sisters of Tarquinius had been married to M. Brutus, a man of great wealth, who died, leaving two sons under age. Of these the elder was killed by Tarquinius, who coveted their possessions; the younger escaped his brother's fate only by feigning idiotcy. On arriving at Delphi, Brutus propitiated the priestess with the gift of a golden stick enclosed in a hollow staff. After executing the king's commission, Titus and Aruns asked the priestess who was to reign at Rome after their father. The priestess replied, whichsoever should first kiss his mother. The princes agreed to keep the matter secret from Sextus, who was at Rome, and to cast lots between themselves. Brutus, who better understood the meaning of the oracle, fell, as if by chance, when they quitted the temple, and kissed the earth, mother of them all. The fall of the king was also foreshadowed by other prodigies, and it came to pass in the following way: —

Tarquinius was besieging Ardea, a city of the Rutulians. The place could not be taken by force, and the Roman army lay encamped beneath the walls. Here as the king's sons, and their cousin, Tarquinius Collatinus, the son of Egerius, were feasting together, a dispute arose about the virtue of their wives. As nothing was doing in the field, they mounted their horses to visit their homes by surprize. They first went to Rome, where they surprized the king's daughters at a splendid banquet. They then hastened to Collatia, and there, though it was late in the night, they found Lucretia, the wife of Collatinus, spinning amid her handmaids. The beauty and virtue of Lucretia had fired the evil passions of Sextus. A few days he returned to Collatia, where he was hospitably received by Lucretia as her husband's kinsman. In the dead of night he entered the chamber with a drawn sword; by threatening to lay a slave with his throat cut beside her, whom he would pretend to have killed in order to avenge her husband's honour, he forced her to yield to his wishes. As soon as Sextus had departed, Lucretia sent for her husband and father. Collatinus came, accompanied by L. Brutus; Lucretius, with P. Valerius, who afterwards gained the surname of Publicola. They found her in an agony of sorrow. She told them what had happened, enjoined them to avenge her dishonour, and then stabbed herself to death. They all swore to avenge her. Brutus threw off his assumed stupidity, and placed himself at their head. They carried the corpse into the market-place of Collatia. There the people took up arms, and resolved to renounce the Tarquins. A number of young men attended the funeral procession to Rome. Brutus, who was Tribunus Celerum, summoned the people, and related the deed of shame. All classes were inflamed with the same indignation. A decree was passed deposing the king, and banishing him and his family from the city. Brutus now set out for the army at Ardea. Tarquinius meantime had hastened to Rome, but found the gates closed against him. Brutus was received with joy at Ardea; and the army likewise renounced their allegiance to the tyrant. Tarquinius, with his two sons, Titus and Aruns, took refuge at Caere in Etruria. Sextus repaired to Gabii, his own principality, where, according to Livy, he was shortly after murdered by the friends of those whom he had put to death. Tarquinius reigned twenty-five years. His banishment was placed in the year of the city 244, or B. C. 510. (Liv. i. 49—60; Dionys. iv. 41—75; Cic. de Rep. ii. 24, 25.)

The remainder of the story may be told with greater brevity. The history of the establishment of the republic and of the attempts of Tarquinius to recover the sovereignty, has already been related in detail in other articles. L. Brutus and Tarquinius Collatinus were the first consuls; but the people so hated the very name and race of the dethroned king, that Collatinus was obliged to resign his office, and retire from Rome. P. Valerius was elected consul in his place. [COLLATINUS.] Meantime ambassadors came to Rome from Tarquinii, to which city Tarquinius had removed from Caere, demanding the restitution of his private property. The demand seemed just to the senate and the people; but while the ambassadors were making preparation for carrying away the property, they found means to organize a conspiracy among the young Roman nobles for the restoration of the royal family. The plot was discovered by means of a slave, and the consul Brutus ordered the execution of his two sons, who were parties to the plot. The agreement to give up the property was made void by this attempt at treason. The royal goods were abandoned to the people to plunder, and their landed estates were divided among the poor, with the exception of the plain between the city and the river, which was reserved for public uses. This plain was consecrated to Mars, and called the Campus Martius.

Tarquinius now endeavoured to recover the throne by force of arms. The people of Tarquinii and Veii espoused his cause, and marched against Rome. The two consuls advanced to meet them. A bloody battle was fought, in which Brutus and Aruns, the son of Tarquinius, slew each other. Both parties claimed the victory, till a voice was heard in the dead of night, proclaiming that the Romans had conquered, as the Etruscans had lost one man more. Alarmed at this, the Etruscans fled, and Valerius, the surviving consul, entered Rome in triumph.

Tarquinius next repaired to Lars Porsena, the powerful king of Clusium, who likewise espoused his cause, and marched against Rome at the head of a vast army. The history of this memorable expedition, which was long preserved in the Roman lays, is related under PORSENA.

After Porsena quitted Rome, Tarquinius took refuge with his son-in-law, Mamilius Octavius of Tusculum. Under the guidance of the latter, the Latin states espoused the cause of the exiled king, and eventually declared war against Rome. The contest was decided by the battle of the lake Regillus, which was long celebrated in song, and the description of which in Livy resembles one of the battles in the Iliad. The Romans were commanded by the dictator, A. Postumius, and by his lieutenant, T. Aebutius, the master of the knights; the Latins were headed by Tarquinius and Octavius Mamilius. The struggle was fierce and bloody, but the Latins at length turned to flight. Almost all the chiefs on either side fell in the conflict, or were grievously wounded. Tarquinius himself was wounded, but escaped with his life; his son Sextus is said to have fallen in this battle, though, according to another tradition, as we have already seen, he is said to have been slain by the inhabitants of Gabii. It was related in the old tradition, that the Romans gained this battle by the assistance of the Dioscuri (Castor and Pollux), who were seen charging the Latins at the head of the Roman cavalry, and who afterwards carried to Rome the intelligence of the defeat of the Latins. A temple was built in the forum on the spot where they appeared, and their festival was celebrated yearly on the Ides of Quintilis (the 15th of July), the day of the battle of Regillus, on which all the knights passed in solemn procession to their temple. According to Livy the battle of the lake Regillus was fought in B. C. 498, but he says that some of the annals placed it in B. C. 496, in which year it is given by Dionysius (vi. 3) and in the Fasti Capitolini.

The Latins were completely humbled by this victory. Tarquinius Superbus had no other state to whom he could apply for assistance. He had already survived all his family; and he now fled to Aristobulus at Cumae, where he died a wretched and childless old man. (Liv. ii. 1—21; Dionys. v. 1—vi. 21.)

In the preceding account we have attempted to give the story of the Tarquins as nearly as possible in the words of the ancient writers. But it is hardly necessary to remark in the present day that this story cannot be received as a real history, or to point out the numerous inconsistencies and impossibilities in the narrative. It may suffice as a sample to remind the reader that the younger Tarquinius who was expelled from Rome in mature age, was the son of the king who ascended the throne 107 years previously in the vigour of life; and that Servius Tullius, who married the daughter of Tarquinius Priscus, shortly before he ascended the throne, immediately after his accession is the father of two daughters whom he marries to the brothers of his own wife. It would be a fruitless task to endeavour to ascertain the real history of the later Roman monarchy; for although the legend has doubtless preserved some facts, yet we have no criteria to determine the true from the false. The story of the Tarquins has evidently been drawn from the works of several popular poets, and there can be little doubt that one at least of the writers must have become acquainted with Greek literature from the Greek colonies in southern Italy. The stratagem by which Tarquinius obtained possession of Gabii is obviously taken from a tale in Herodotus (iii. 154), and similar cases might easily be multiplied. Hence we may account for the Greek origin of the Tarquins. There is, however, one fact in the common tale which it is impossible to disbelieve, although it has been questioned by Niebuhr, we mean the Etruscan origin of the Tarquins. Niebuhr attempts to establish the Latin origin of Tarquinius by several considerations. He remarks that we read of a Tarquinia gens; that the surname Priscus of the elder Tarquinius was a regular Latin surname, which occurs in the family of the Servilii and many others; and lastly, that the wife of the elder Tarquinius was called in one tradition, not Tanaquil, but Caia Caecilia, a name which may be traced to Caeculus, the mythic founder of Praeneste. These arguments, however, have not much weight, and certainly are insufficient to refute the universally received belief of antiquity in the Etruscan origin of the Tarquins, which is, moreover, confirmed by the great architectural works undertaken in the time of the last Roman kings, works to which no Sabine or Latin town could lay claim, and which at that time could have been accomplished by the Etruscans alone. Moreover the tradition which connects Tarquinius with the Luceres, the third ancient Roman tribe, again points to Etruria; for although Niebuhr looks upon the Luceres as Latins, most subsequent scholars have with far more probability supposed the third tribe to have been of Etruscan origin. (Comp. Becker, Handbuch der Römischen Alterthümer, vol. ii. part i. p. 30.) The statement of Dionysius that Tarquinius Priscus conquered the whole of Etruria, and was acknowledged by the twelve Etruscan cities as their ruler, to whom they paid homage, must certainly be rejected, when we recollect the small extent of the Roman dominions under the preceding king, and the great power and extensive territory of the Etruscans at that time. It is far more probable that Rome was conquered by the Etruscans, and that the epoch of the Tarquins represents an Etruscan rule at Rome. This is the opinion of K. O. Müller. He supposes that the town of Tarquinii was at this time at the head of Etruria, and that the twelve Etruscan cities did homage to the ruler of Tarquinii. He further supposes that Rome as well as a part of Latium acknowledged the supremacy of Tarquinii; and that as Rome was the most important of the possessions of Tarquinii towards the south, it was fortified and enlarged, and thus became a great and flourishing city. Many Tarquinian nobles would naturally take up their abode at Rome, and one of them might have been entrusted by Tarquinii with the government of the city. Müller however thinks that L. Tarquinius is not the real name of the Etruscan ruler, but that Lucius is the Latinized form of Lucumo, and that Tarquinius merely indicates his origin from Tarquinii. According to Müller the banishment of the Tarquins was not an isolated event confined to Rome, but was connected with the fall of the city of Tarquinii, which lost at that time its supremacy over the other Etruscan cities. (Müller, Etrusker, vol. i. p. 118, &c.)

TARQUI'NIUS. 1. P. TARQUINIUS, tribune of the plebs with Livius Drusus, B.C. 91, supported the latter in the laws which he proposed. (J. Obseq. c. 114.)

2. L. TARQUINIUS, one of Catiline's conspirators, turned informer, and accused M. Crassus of being privy to the conspiracy. (Sall. Cat. 48.)

TARQUI'TIA GENS, was of patrician rank, and of great antiquity, but only one member of it is mentioned, namely L. Tarquitius Flaccus, who was magister equitum to the dictator Cincinnatus in B.C. 458 [FLACCUS]. The other Tarquitii whose names occur towards the end of the republic, can scarcely be regarded as members of the patrician gens.

TARQUI'TIUS. 1. A Roman writer, who translated from the Etruscan a work entitled Ostentarium Tuscum. (Plin. H. N. in Catal. Auctor. lib. ii.; Macrob. Sat. iii. 7; Serv. ad Virg. Ecl. iv 43; Festus, p. 274, ed. Müller; Müller, Etrusker, vol. ii. p. 36.)

2. L. TARQUITIUS, mentioned by Cicero in B.C. 50. (Cic. ad Att. vi. 8. § 4.)

3. Q. TARQUITIUS, occurs only on coins, of which a specimen is annexed. The obverse represents a woman's head with C. ANNIVS, and the reverse Victory in a biga, with Q. TARQUITI. A similar coin is figured in Vol. I. p. 180, with the name of L. Fabius on the obverse; and Eckhel supposes that Q. Tarquitius and L. Fabius were the quaestors of C. Annius, who fought in Spain against Sertorius in B.C. 82. (Eckhel, vol. v. pp. 134, 322.)

TARQUI'TIUS PRISCUS. [PRISCUS.]

TARRUNTE'NUS PATERNUS. [PATERNUS.]

TA'RTARUS (Τάρταρος), a son of Aether and Ge, and by his mother Ge the father of the Gigantes, Typhoeus and Echidna. (Hygin. Praef. p. 3, &c., Fab. 152; Hes. Theog. 821; Apollod. ii. 1. § 2.) In the Iliad Tartarus is a place far below the earth, as far below Hades as Heaven is above the earth, and closed by iron gates. (Hom. Il. viii. 13, &c., 481; comp. Hes. Theog. 807.) Later poets describe Tartarus as the place in the lower world in which the spirits of wicked men are punished for their crimes, and sometimes they use the name as synonymous with Hades or the lower world in general; and pater Tartarus is used for Pluto. (Val. Flacc. iv. 258.) [L. S.]

TARU'TIUS FIRMIA'NUS. [FIRMIANUS.]

TASGE'TIUS, was of a noble family among the Carnutes, and was made king of his people by Caesar, but was assassinated in the third year of his reign. (Caes. B. G. v. 25).

TASIACES. [SABACES.]

TATIA'NUS (Τατιανός), a Christian writer of the second century, was born, according to his own statement (Orat. ad Graecos, sub fin.) in Assyria, and was educated in the religion and philosophy of the Greeks. (ibid.) Clement of Alexandria (Strom. lib. iii. c. xii. § 81, ed Klotz. Lips. 1831), Epiphanius, in the body of his work (Haeres. xlvi.), and Theodoret (Haeret. Fabul. Compendium, lib. i. c. 20), call him "the Syrian," or "a Syrian by race;" but Epiphanius, in another place (adv. Haeres. Indicul. ad lib. i. vol. iii.), followed by Joannes Damascenus (De Haeresib. apud Coteler. Eccles. Graec. Monum. vol. i. p. 292), says he was a Mesopotamian; a statement which is adopted by Cave and some other moderns. Tatian's own authority would of course be decisive, were it not for the vagueness with which the names Assyria and Syria are used by the ancients; however, we think it most probable that by "the land of the Assyrians" (ἐν τῇ τῶν Ἀσσυρίων γῇ) Tatian means the country east of the Tigris; but his mode of expression affords some ground to think that though born in the land of Assyria, he was not of Assyrian race; and his name has some appearance of being Roman. He appears to have followed the profession of a sophist, or teacher of rhetoric; and he was perhaps a teacher of philosophy also (comp. Tatian. Orat. ad Graec. c. ii. and lvi.; Euseb. H. E. iv. 16; Hieron. De Viris Illustr. c. 29; Theodoret. l. c.), though Valesius (Not. in Euseb. l. c.) contends earnestly against the supposition. He certainly acquired a considerable knowledge of Greek literature. He travelled over many countries, and appears to have been engaged in a variety of pursuits (τέχναις καὶ ἐπινοίαις ἐγκυρήσας πολλαῖς, Orat. ad Graec. c. lvi.) until, at last, he came to Rome. He had probably imbibed the doctrines of the Platonic philosophy (comp. Orat. ad Graec. c. xix. and Worth's note in loc.), but he was dissatisfied with the hollowness of the professions of the philosophers of his day, and disgusted with the cruelty and impurity of the worship both of the Greeks and Romans (Orat. ad Graec. cc. xliii—xlvi.); and his mind was anxiously longing for something more ennobling, when he met with the Scriptures of the Old Testament. By the perusal of these, his conversion to Christianity was effected. Whether his connection with Justin Martyr, of whom, according to the testimony of Irenaeus (Adv. Haeres. lib. i. c. 31), Epiphanius (Haeres. xlvi.), Jerome (l. c.), Philastrius (De Haeres. c. 48), and Theodoret (l. c.), he was the hearer or disciple, was previous to his conversion or subsequent to it, is not clear.

During Justin's life, Tatian remained in connection with the Catholic church; but after Justin's death he embraced views of a Gnostic character, with which probably the notions imbibed during his early residence in the East disposed him to sympathise. Whether he had been previously restrained by the influence of Justin from embracing those views, is not clear, though Irenaeus, Jerome, and Epiphanius seem to intimate that he had. He appears to have remained for a time after Justin's death in communion with the church. Tillemont thinks that after Justin's death many of his disciples, among them Rhodon [RHODON] placed themselves under Tatian's instruction; but though Rhodon himself (apud Euseb. H. E. v. 13) states that he was a disciple of Tatian, it does not follow that this was after Justin's death. Like Justin, Tatian engaged in controversies with the philosophers of his day, attacking them on the corruptions of heathenism, and pointing out the superiority of the Jewish and Christian religions. He was involved in a dispute with the Cynic Crescens [CRESCENS], whom he charges with having plotted his death, as well as that of Justin. [JUSTINUS, No. 1.]

His embracing, at least his avowal of his heretical opinions, was apparently not very long after Justin's death, otherwise we cannot account for the general impression that he had been kept from heresy by Justin's influence. He does not appear to have broached his obnoxious sentiments at Rome. According to Epiphanius, he returned into the East, and there imbibed and promulgated them. The statement of Epiphanius (l. c.), followed by Josephus [JOSEPHUS, No. 12] in his Hypomnesticon, that they were broached in Mesopotamia, leads to the conclusion that Tatian settled in that province; but when he further states that they were embraced by some persons at Antioch, the capital of Syria, and spread from thence into Cilicia and Pisidia, we cannot determine whether this was through the personal exertions and teaching of Tatian, or whether through some of his disciples. We have no further account of him; and neither the time nor place of his death is known. In fact, the chronology of his whole life is uncertain; we only know that he was contemporary with Justin, and was at Rome before and at the time of that martyr's death, the date of which, as we have shown elsewhere [JUSTINUS, No. 1], is by no means determined, but may be probably fixed in or near A. D. 166 or 167.

The followers of Tatian constituted a sect, designated from him Tatiani. (Epiphan. Haeres. xlvi.; Augustin. Haeres. xxv.) They appear to have been nearly identical with the Encratitae (the name is variously written Ἐγκρατεῖς, Irenaeus, Adv. Haeres. lib. i. c. 30, Ἐγκρατῖται, Epiphan. Haeres. xlvii.; or Ἐγκρατηταί, Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. i. c. 15, Paedagog. lib. ii. c. 2) and with the Severiani, who derived their name from Severus, a contemporary of Tatian. [SEVERUS, Greek, literary and ecclesiastical, No. 3.] These sects were also known by the name of Ὑδροπαραστάται, "Hydroparastatae," or "Offerers of water," from their use of water in the Eucharist. From this last peculiarity they were called by some of the Latin fathers (Augustin. Haeres. lxiv.; Philastrius, Haeres. lxxvii.) "Aquarii." Tillemont has collected a number of other names which he supposes to have been given them. The tenets of the Tatiani and Encratitae and Severiani, whether these names denote one sect, or different, but kindred sects, partook of the usual character of the Gnostic body to which they belonged. Tatian held the doctrine of Aeons, which he is said to have derived from Valentinus or Marcion (Philastrius, Haeres. xlviii.), and to have given further development to it. He distinguished the Demiurgus, the Creator of the world and giver of the Mosaic law, from the Supreme and Benignant God, from whom the Gospel came. Epiphanius (a not very trustworthy authority), ascribes to the Severiani the belief that beside the Supreme Being there was "a great ruler of the powers" named Ἰαλδαβαώθ "Ialdabaoth," or Σαβαώθ, "Sabaoth" (an obvious corruption of the "Jehovah-Sabaoth" of the Jewish Scriptures), of whom ὁ Διάβολος, "the devil," was the son; and that the devil, being by the Supreme God cast down to the earth in the form of a serpent, produced the vine, the tendrils of which indicated their origin by their serpent-like form: they ascribed also to the devil the formation of woman, and of the lower part of the man. The "ruler of the powers," Ialdabaoth, is apparently the Demiurgus of Tatian; but how far the other opinions described were held by him is not clear; it is, however, remarkable that he and his followers abstained from wine and animal food, and condemned marriage. But what especially shocked the piety and charity of the Catholics was Tatian's affirming the damnation of Adam, a "blasphemy" which is said to have originated with him, and drew upon him especial odium.

The sects of the Tatiani and Severiani are said by Epiphanius to have been nearly extinct in his time: but this can hardly mean more than that the names had gone into disuse; for the Encratitae, whom we take to have been substantially the same, were still numerous in Pisidia, the Torrid Phrygia (τῇ Κεκαυμένῃ), and other districts of Asia Minor.

Tatian is said to have rejected some of St. Paul's Epistles (Hieronym. Prooem. in Comment. in Titum), but to have received others. He also received, but not without mutilation, the four Gospels. (Irenaeus, l. c. and c. 31; Clem. Alex. l. c. and Fragmenta Propheticor. selecta, c. 38; Origen, De Oratione, p. 77, ed. Oxford; Hieronym. De Viris Illustr. c. 17, alibi; Epiphanius, Augustin, Philastrius, ll. cc.; Tertullian, or rather his anonymous continuator, De Praescript. Haereticor. c. 52; Theodoret. Haeretic. Fabul. Compend. lib. i. c. 20; Chron. Paschale, p. 260, ed. Paris, p. 486, ed. Bonn; comp. Neander, Church History (by Rose), vol. ii. p. 109.)

Tatian was a voluminous writer. Eusebius speaks of him in one place (H. E. iv. 16) as "leaving many memorials of himself in his writings;" and in another place (H. E. iv. 29) he says, "he left a great number of writings, of which the most celebrated is his Discourse to the Greeks." Jerome also states (De Viris Illustr. c. 17) that he wrote "a countless number of volumes" (infinita volumina); of which, however, even then, the above-mentioned discourse was the only one extant, at least so far as Jerome was informed. The Diatessaron was, however, still in existence, though Jerome does not mention it, either because he did not regard it as an original work, but only an arrangement of the Gospels, or perhaps because its existence was not known to him. The other works of Tatian were probably either such as the early Christians were little interested in, or were so replete with the wild speculations of his later years, as never to have had any circulation in the orthodox portion of the church.

The Πρὸς Ἕλληνας, Oratio adversus Graecos, as the title is commonly though incorrectly rendered (we believe it should be ad Graecos), is still extant, and is a remonstrance addressed to the Greeks on their repugnance to, and contempt for, the opinions of foreigners. Jerome (De Viris Illust. c. 17) and Rufinus translate the title Contra Gentes; but the contents of the work show that Ἕλληνας is not used as equivalent to Ἔθνη, "Gentiles" (a usage no doubt sufficiently common), but in its proper signification of "Greeks," as distinguished from Βάρβαροι, "Foreigners." This is clear from the opening sentence of the work, Μὴ πάνυ φιλέχθρως διατίθεσθε πρὸς τοὺς βαρβάρους, ὦ ἄνδρες Ἕλληνες, μηδὲ φθονήσητε τοῖς τούτων δόγμασι. "Be not quite hostile, O Greeks, in your disposition towards foreigners, and do not regard their opinions unfavourably." He then proceeds to show that they (the Greeks) had derived their own usages from the very foreigners whom they despised, borrowing from Telmessus the art of divination from dreams, astrology from the Carians, augury from the flight of birds from the ancient Phrygians and Isaurians, the practice of sacrifice from Cyprus, astronomy from Babylon, magic from Persia, geometry from Egypt, and alphabetic writing from Phoenicia, &c. (c. 1, 2.) He rakes together the current charges of folly against their philosophers, and of wickedness against their heroes. (c. 3—6.) He unfolds his views of the Supreme Being (c. 6, 7), of the Logos (c. 7, 8), the resurrection (c. 9, 10), of the freedom of the will, both of men and angels (c. 10), and of the fall (c. 11). He then exposes the follies and crimes ascribed to the divinities of the Greeks in the popular theology (c. 12—17), and contrasts with them the purer morality, and the more elevated views of the universe and of God, and of the divine administration, which he had received (c. 17, foll.). Throughout the work he pursues a similar strain of argument, examining the metaphysics and theology of his opponents, pointing out the superiority of the religion of the Jewish and Christian Scriptures, and insisting on the superior antiquity of Moses, the oldest Jewish writer, when compared with Homer, the oldest Greek writer. It has been a subject of dispute with the learned, how far this work of Tatian shows indications of those heretical views, the development of which afterwards entailed upon him so much odium. Brucker, in his Historia Critica Philosophiae, endeavours to show that Tatian's philosophy, even while he was accounted orthodox, was grievously corrupted by the intermixture of Cabbalistic, Gnostic, and Neo-Platonic notions: on the other hand, Lange (Historia Dogmatum, vol. i. p. 223, &c.), Bull (Defens. Fid. Nicaen. sect. iii. c. 6), and Ceillier (Auteurs Sacrés, vol. iii. p. 127), contend for his orthodoxy. Certainly some of his sentiments are of a very fanciful character, and his speculations very remote from the simplicity of Christian truth, but he was, when he wrote this work, far from holding the characteristic doctrines of Gnosticism, such as the eternity and evil nature of matter, and the alienation or hostility between the Supreme God and the Demiurgos or Creator.

The Greek text of this remarkable work was first published with a Latin version by Conrad Gesner, with the Sententiae of Antonius Melissa and Maximus, and the Ad Autolycum of Theophilus of Antioch, fol. Zuric. 1546. The Latin version of these works, by Gesner, was published separately, and that of Tatian was frequently reprinted in the successive editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum of De la Bigne, Paris, 1575, 1589, 1610, Cologne, 1618, Lyon, 1677, and also in the Mella Patrum of Francis Rous, 8vo. London, 1650, pp. 66, &c.; and both the Latin version of Gesner, and the original Greek, but varying from Gesner's text, are given in the Orthodoxographa of Heroldus, fol. Basel, 1555 (Cave speaks of a previous edition in A.D. 1551), and in the Auctarium of Ducaeus (Fronto Le Duc), fol. Paris, 1624. They were published also with the writings of Justin Martyr, Athenagoras, Theophilus, and Hermeias, Paris, 1615 and 1636, and Cologne (or rather Wittenberg), 1686. The last edition had the notes of Kortholt. Cave speaks of an edition of Tatian in folio, Paris, 1618, but Fabricius does not notice it. But the most valuable edition was that of William Worth, archdeacon of Worcester, 8vo. Oxford, 1700, which contained, besides a revised Greek text of Tatian, and of the Irrisio Gentilium Philosophorum of Hermeias, the Latin versions of Tatian by Gesner, and of Hermeias by Seiler, the entire notes of Gesner, Ducaeus, Kortholt, and others, and some valuable Dissertationes. The Oratio ad Graecos was also given by Prudentius Maran, in his (the Benedictine) edition of Justin Martyr, fol. Paris, 1742, in the first vol. of Galland's Bibliotheca Patrum, fol. Venice, 1765, and in the third vol. of the Sanctorum Patrum Opera Polemica, 8vo. Wurzburg, 1777.

Of the other works of Tatian only a few fragments are preserved: indeed we do not know even the names of more than a few of his "infinita volumina." They are as follows. 1. Περὶ τοῦ κατὰ τὸν Σωτῆρα καταρτισμοῦ, De Perfectione secundum Servatorem. This is quoted by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. lib. iii. c. 12). It was written after he had become heretical, for the passage cited by Clement is in condemnation of matrimony. 2. Προβλημάτων βίβλιον, Quaestionum Liber, mentioned by Rhodon (apud Euseb. H. E. v. 13), but it is not clear that Tatian ever completed the work, or did more than form the plan: it was to be on the difficulties of the Scriptures. 3. Πρὸς τοὺς ἀποφηναμένους τὰ περὶ Θεοῦ, Adversus eos qui fidem detrahunt rebus divinis. This work is mentioned by Tatian himself in his Oratio ad Graecos, c. 62, but in terms which render it doubtful whether he had then written the work or only projected it. 4. Περὶ ζώων, De Animalibus, mentioned by Tatian as already written by him (ib. c. 24). 5. He wrote also, as he tells us, a work in which he had treated of daemons, and of the state of the soul after death (ib. c. 24), but he does not mention the title of the work. 6. Διὰ τεσσάρων, Diatessaron. s. Harmonia Evangeliorum. Eusebius mentions the work (H. E. iv. 29), but in such a way as to show that he had not seen it: Jerome does not even mention it (De Vir. Illustr. c. 17), but Theodoret says it was used not only by Tatian's more immediate followers, but by some other heretics, and even by the orthodox; for Theodoret himself collected above two hundred copies from what he calls "our churches" (ταῖς παρ' ἡμῖν ἐκκλησίαις), apparently the churches of his own diocese, in exchange for which he gave or procured for them copies of the four gospels. According to him, not only the genealogies, but all the parts which recognized the descent of Jesus from David were omitted, so that the compilation was evidently made after Tatian had become heretical, and on a principle consistent with his heretical sentiments. The work has perished. There is extant an Harmonia Evangelica in Latin, translated by Victor, bishop of Capua, a writer of the middle of the sixth century, from a Greek manuscript, which did not contain any author's name. Victor sought to discover the author, and after weighing and rejecting the claims of Ammonius of Alexandria to be so considered, ascribed it to Tatian. There is also extant an ancient Tudesque or German version (versio Theotisca) of this Harmonia. The Latin version was published under the name of Tatian in the Orthodoxographa of Heroldus, fol. Basel, 1555, and of Grynaeus, fol. Basel, 1569, and in successive editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum of De la Bigne, fol. Paris, 1575, 1589, 1610, 1654, and Cologne, 1618. But as this Harmonia, which is in the words of the sacred writers, contains the genealogies, critics discovered that it had been incorrectly ascribed to Tatian; and in the Lyon edition of the Bibliotheca Patrum, fol. 1677, and in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, fol. Venice, 1765, &c., it appears under the name of Ammonius, to whom most critics, but not all, now ascribe it. [AMMONIUS SACCAS.] The ancient German version was published, but in an incomplete form, by Palthenius, 4to. Griefswald, 1706, and more fully, but still far from completely, in the Thesaurus Antiquitatum Teutonicarum of Schilter, fol. Ulm, 1728, vol. ii. p. 57, &c. Some supplementary portions are given by Hess, in the Biblioth. der Heil. Geschichte, part ii. p. 543—570. Another Latin Harmonia, so called, but which is in fact a condensed narrative of the History of Jesus Christ, arranged chronologically under the three years to which, as the writer supposed, the public ministry of the Saviour extended, was published in the Micropresbyticon, fol. Basel, 1550, in the two editions of the Orthodoxographa, and in the successive editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum of De la Bigne. In nearly all these it is given under the name of Ammonius, but it appears in the edition of the Bibliotheca, Lyon, 1677, under that of Tatian, to whom some critics have been disposed to ascribe it. Even Cave at one time held that opinion, though he afterwards renounced it; and the cautious and judicious Lardner was strongly inclined to it. Yet the work is by no means such as the description of Theodoret implies: and the general opinion of critics is unfavourable to the authorship of Tatian, to whom we can only wonder that any should have ascribed it. Le Nourry, the editor of the Lyon Bibliotheca, in his Dissertatio in Tatianum, justly rejects the opinion which ascribes it to him.

Rufinus, in his Historia Ecclesiastica (vi. 11), ascribes to Tatian a Chronicon. This statement is usually considered as erroneous, and is supposed to rest on the misinterpretation of a passage in Eusebius (H. E. vi. 13); but it is to be observed that the author of the Chronicon Paschale (l. c.) and Joannes Malalas, call Tatian "a chronographer," and refer to his notice of the quarrel of Peter and Paul at Antioch. Jerome (Epist. ad Magnum, ep. 84, edit. vett.; 83, ed. Benedictin.; 70, ed Vallarsi) says that Tatian had pointed out that various heresies had arisen from the opinions of the heathen philosophers; but he does not say to what work he refers. Eusebius says that some had charged Tatian with corrupting certain passages in the writings of the apostle Paul, under the plea of correcting their inaccuracy of construction; but we know not to what work of Tatian he refers; nor would the charge imply more than that he had paraphrased those passages. The ancient authorities for this article have been referred to in the course of it. We subjoin those of modern date:—Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 172, vol. i. p. 75, and ad ann. 220 (s. v. Ammonius), p. 109, &c., ed. Oxford, 1740—1743; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 87, &c.; Maran, Praefatio ad Justini Martyris Opera, fol. TAU'REA, JUBE'LLIUS, a Campanian of high rank and distinguished bravery in the second Punic war. He fought with Claudius Asellus in single combat in B. C. 215, and put an end to his own life on the capture of Capua by the Romans in B. C. 211. (Liv. xxiii. 8, 46, 47, xxvi. 15; comp. Cic. in Pis. 11.)

TAU'REUS (Ταύρεος), a surname of Poseidon, given to him either because bulls were sacrificed to him, or because he was the divinity that gave green pasture to bulls on the sea-coast. (Hes. Scut. Herc. 104; Hom. Od. iii. 6; Schol. ad Pind. Nem. vi. 69.) [L. S.]

TAU'RICA (DEA) (ἡ Ταυρική), "the Taurian goddess," commonly called Artemis. Her image was believed to have been carried from Tauris by Orestes and Iphigenia, and to have been conveyed to Brauron, Sparta, or Aricia. The worship of this Taurian goddess, who was identified with Artemis and Iphigenia, was carried on with orgiastic rites and human sacrifices, and seems to have been very ancient in Greece. (Paus. iii. 16. § 6; Herod. iv. 103; comp. ARTEMIS.) [L. S.]

TAURI'NUS, T. CAE'SIUS, a Roman poet, who probably lived in the fourth century of our era, is only known as the author of an extant poem in twenty-three hexameter lines, entitled Votum Fortunae. It is usually entitled Votum Fortunae Praenestinae; but although it is extant at present at Praeneste in the Palazzo Baronale, it refers to the temple of Fortuna in the Roman forum; and accordingly Meyer has correctly dropt the addition of Praenestinae in the title of the poem. It is printed in the Latin Anthology (i. Ep. 80, ed. Burmann and Ep. 622, ed. Meyer), and by Wernsdorf in his Poëtae Latini Minores (vol. iv. p. 309, &c.).

TAU'RION (Ταυρίων), a Macedonian officer in the service of Antigonus Doson, king of Macedonia, who had risen to so high a place in the confidence of that monarch that the latter appointed him, by his last will, to command the royal troops in the Peloponnese during the minority of Philip V. (Polyb. iv. 6, 87.) In this position we find him in B. C. 221, assisting the Achaean praetor Timoxenus in reducing the strong post of Clarium, which had been occupied by the Aetolians; and again, in B. C. 220, co-operating with Aratus against the inroads of the Aetolians, which terminated in the battle of Caphyae and the destruction of Cynaetha. (Id. iv. 6, 10, 19.) In B. C. 218, when Philip in person led an army into the Peloponnese, we once more find Taurion mentioned as rendering efficient assistance to his youthful sovereign in the invasion of Elis. So great indeed was the reputation and influence which he now enjoyed, that Apelles deemed it absolutely necessary, for the furtherance of his ambitious designs, to remove Taurion from the important post which he held, an object which he sought to effect under the pretext of attaching him more closely to the king's person. His designs were, however, detected, and Philip gave a fresh proof of his confidence in Taurion by placing under his command the troops whose fidelity had been corrupted by Leontius. (Id. iv. 80, 87, v. 27.) From this time we find him retaining the chief direction of the war in the Peloponnese, as well as rendering other important services: thus, in B. C. 217, we find him sent, together with Aratus, to treat with the Aetolians at Naupactus. He had, however, already displayed some jealousy of the Achaean leader, and appears to have done his best to inflame the growing enmity of Philip towards Aratus, until he at length lent his aid to the young king to remove his former friend and counsellor by means of secret poison, B. C. 214. (Id. v. 92, 95, 103, viii. 14; Plut. Arat. 52.) The part taken by Taurion in this transaction, is sufficient evidence of his character; and it is to him, in conjunction with Demetrius the Pharian, that Polybius imputes the blame of perverting and corrupting the naturally good disposition of Philip. (Polyb. ix. 23.) [E. H. B.]

TAURIO'NE, TAURO, TAURO'POLOS, or TAURO'POS (Ταυριώνη, Ταυρώ, Ταυροπόλος, Ταυρωπός), originally a designation of the Taurian goddess, but also used as a surname of Artemis or even Athena, both of whom were identified with the Taurian goddess. (Hesych. s. v. ταυροπόλαι.) The name has been explained in different ways, some supposing that it means the goddess worshipped in Tauris, going around (i. e. protecting) the country of Tauris, or the goddess to whom bulls are sacrificed; while others explain it to mean the goddess riding on bulls, drawn by bulls, or killing bulls. Both explanations seem to have one thing in common, namely, that the bull was probably the ancient symbol of the bloody and savage worship of the Taurian divinity. (Schol. ad Soph. Ajac. 172; Eurip. Iphig. Taur. 1457; Müller, Orchom. p. 305, &c. 2d ed.) [L. S.]

TAURISCUS, a Greek grammarian, and a disciple of Crates. (Sextus Empir. adv. Mathem. i. 248, p. 268, ed. Fabric.) The Greek actor of this name, spoken of by Theophrastus, must have been a different person. (Cic. de Orat. iii. 59.)

TAURISCUS, artists. 1. A sculptor of Tralles, who, with his brother Apollonius, made the celebrated Toro Farnese. [APOLLONIUS.] Pliny also mentions his Hermerotes, in the collection of Asinius Pollio. (H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4. § 10).

2. Of Cyzicus, a distinguished silver-chaser (caelator) whom Pliny distinguishes from the above artist (l. c.) He elsewhere mentions him, in his list of silver-chasers, as flourishing soon after Stratonicus. (xxxiii. 12. s. 55.)

3. A painter, mentioned by Pliny among the artists who were primis proximi. His works were a Discobolus, Clytaemnestra, Paniscus, Polynices regnum repetens and Capaneus. The Polynices and Capaneus, it may be presumed, formed parts of one composition, representing the battle of the Seven Chiefs against Thebes. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 40.) [P. S.]

TAUROCE'PHALUS (Ταυροκέφαλος, also Ταυρόκρανος, Ταυρομέτωπος, &c.), a surname of Dionysus in the Orphic mysteries. (Orph. Hymn. 51. 2; comp. TAURUS.) It also occurs as a surname of rivers and the ocean, who were symbolically represented as bulls, to indicate their fertilising effect upon countries. (Eurip. Iphig. Aul. 275, Orest. 1378; Aelian, V. H. ii. 33; Horat. Carm. iv. 14, 25.) [L. S.]

TAURO'POLIS (Ταυρόπολις). 1. A daughter of the Megarian Cleson, who was believed, together with her sister Cleso, to have found and buried the body of Ino, which had been washed on the coast of Megara. (Paus. i. 42, in fin.)

2. A son of Dionysus and Ariadne. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iii. 997.) [L. S.]

TAURUS (Ταῦρος), a bull, occurs: 1. as a surname of Dionysus. (Eurip. Bacch. 918; Athen. xi. p. 476; Plut. Quaest. Graec. 36; Lycoph. Cass. 209.)

2. According to some, another name for Talos. (Apollod. i. 9. § 26.)

3. A son of Neleus and Chloris. (Apollod. i. 9. § 9.) [L. S.]

TAURUS, ANTO'NIUS, a tribune of the praetorian cohorts, A. D. 69. (Tac. Hist. i. 20.)

TAURUS BERY'TIUS, a Platonic philosopher, who defended the Platonic philosophy against Aristotle. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 144.)

TAURUS, STATI'LIUS. 1. STATILIUS TAURUS, one of the most distinguished of Octavian's generals. His name appears in the Fasti as consul suffectus in B. C. 37, but he is first mentioned by ancient writers in the following year in the war against Sex. Pompeius, in Sicily. He commanded Antony's fleet, which sailed from Tarentum, and he rendered important services in the war. After the flight of Pompeius from Sicily, Taurus sailed over to Africa, which he secured for Octavian without difficulty. In B. C. 34 he received the honour of a triumph on account of his success in Africa (Fasti Capit.), and in the course of the same year he accompanied Octavian to Dalmatia, and was left in the country in command of the army when Octavian returned to Rome. At the battle of Actium, in B. C. 31, Taurus commanded the land-force of Octavian, which was drawn up on the shore. In B. C. 29 he defeated the Cantabri, Vaccaei, and Astures. He was raised to the consulship in B. C. 26; and in B. C. 16, when the emperor went to Gaul, the government of the city and of Italy was left to Taurus, with the title of praefectus urbi. (Appian, B. C. v. 97—99, 103, 105, 109, 118; Dion Cass. xlix. 14, 38; Appian, Ill. 27; Dion Cass. l. 13; Plut. Ant. 65; Dion Cass. li. 20, liii. 23, liv. 19; Tac. Ann. vi. 11; Vell. Pat. ii. 127.) In the fourth consulship of Augustus, B. C. 30, Taurus built an amphitheatre of stone at his own expence, and at its opening exhibited a show of gladiators; and the people in return allowed him to appoint one of the praetors every year. This amphitheatre was burnt down in the great fire at Rome, in the reign of Nero. (Dion Cass. li. 23, lxii. 18; Suet. Octav. 29; Tac. Ann. iii. 72.)

There was a Statilius Taurus, who was triumvir of the mint under Augustus, as we learn from coins, but whether he was the same person as the preceding cannot be determined. The annexed coin has on the obverse the legend, TAVRVS REGVLVS PVLCHER, and on the reverse, IIIVIR A A A F F (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 316.)

COIN OF STATILIUS TAURUS.

2. T. STATILIUS TAURUS, probably son of No. 1, was consul, A. D. 11, with M. Aemilius Lepidus. (Dion Cass. lvi. 25.)

4. M. STATILIUS TAURUS was consul A. D. 44 with L. Quintius Crispinus Secundus, and afterwards governed Africa as proconsul. He possessed great wealth, which proved his ruin. Agrippina, coveting his gardens, got Tarquitius Priscus, who had been the legate of Taurus in Africa, to accuse the latter of repetundae and of magic. Taurus put an end to his own life before the senate pronounced sentence. (Dion Cass. lx. 13; Tac. Ann. xii. 59, xiv. 46.)

5. TAURUS STATILIUS CORVINUS, consul A. D. 45. [CORVINUS.]

TA'XILES (Ταξίλης). 1. An Indian prince or king, who reigned over the tract between the Indus and the Hydaspes, at the period of the expedition of Alexander, B. C. 327. His real name was Mophis, or Omphis, and the Greeks appear to have called him Taxiles or Taxilas, from the name of his capital city of Taxila, near the modern Attock, (Diod. xvii. 86; Curt. viii. 12. §§ 4, 14.) He appears to have been on terms of hostility with his neighbour Porus, who held the territories east of the Hydaspes, and it was probably with a view of strengthening himself against this foe, that he sent an embassy to Alexander, while the latter was yet in Sogdiana, with offers of assistance and support. On the approach of the conqueror he hastened to meet him with valuable presents, and placed himself and all his forces at his disposal. Nor were these vain professions: he assisted Hephaestion and Perdiccas in constructing a bridge over the Indus, supplied their troops with provisions, and received Alexander himself, and his whole army, in his capital city of Taxila, with every demonstration of friendship and the most liberal hospitality. (Arr. Anab. iv. 22, v. 3, 8; Curt. viii. 12; Diod. xvii. 86; Plut. Alex. 59, 65; Strab. xv. p. 698.) On the subsequent advance of the Macedonian king, Taxiles accompanied him with a force of 5000 men, and bore a part in the contest at the passage of the Hydaspes. After that victory he was sent by Alexander in pursuit of Porus, to whom he was charged to offer favourable terms, but narrowly escaped losing his life at the hands of his old enemy. Subsequently, however, the two rivals were reconciled by the personal mediation of Alexander; and Taxiles, after having contributed zealously to the equipment of the fleet on the Hydaspes, was intrusted by the king with the government of the whole territory between that river and the Indus. (Arr. Anab. v. 8, 18, 20; Curt. viii. 14. § 35, ix. 3. § 22). A considerable accession of power was granted him after the death of Philip, son of Machatas; and he was allowed to retain his authority at the death of Alexander himself, as well as in the subsequent partition of the provinces at Triparadeisus, B. C. 321. (Arr. ap. Phot. p. 72, a.; Dexippus, ibid. p. 64, b.; Diod. xviii. 3, 39; Justin. xiii. 4.) But at a subsequent period we find Eudemus, the commander of the Macedonian troops in his province, possessing the sole authority: whether Taxiles had been displaced by force or removed by a natural death, we are not informed.

2. A general in the service of Mithridates the Great, and one of those in whom he reposed the highest confidence. He is first mentioned in B. C. 86, when he was sent by Mithridates, with an army of not less than 110,000 men, to Europe, to make his way, through Thrace and Macedonia, to the assistance of Archelaus in Greece. This task he successfully accomplished, reduced Amphipolis, which had at first defied his arms, and having thus struck terror into the Macedonians, advanced without further opposition, through that country and Thessaly, into Phocis. Here he at first laid siege to Elatea, but was foiled in his attacks, and relinquished the enterprise, in order to form a junction with Archelaus in Boeotia. This object he effected: but though the two generals now found themselves at the head of a formidable host, their combined forces were defeated by Sulla near Chaeronea, with great slaughter. (Plut. Sull. 15, 16, 19; Memnon, 3; Paus. i. 20. § 6, ix. 40. § 7, x. 34, § 2.) From this time we hear no more of Taxiles till B. C. 74, when he commanded (together with Hermocrates) the great army with which Mithridates invaded Paphlagonia and Bithynia, in the autumn of that year. During the subsequent operations at the siege of Cyzicus, he is mentioned as giving the king the most judicious advice. (Appian. Mithr. 70, 72.) After the defeat of the king and his retreat into his own territories, we again find Taxiles sharing with Diophantus the actual command of the army which Mithridates opposed to Lucullus near Cabeira, B. C. 72, where their skilful arrangements for a time held the balance of success doubtful, and reduced the Roman general to considerable straits for provisions. At length, however, the campaign was terminated by a total rout, in which the royal camp fell into the hands of the enemy. (Memnon. 4; comp. App. Mith. 79—82; Plut. Lucull. 15, 17.) Taxiles accompanied his royal master on his flight into Armenia, and we subsequently (B. C. 69) find him mentioned as present with Tigranes at the great battle of Tigranocerta, on which occasion he in vain endeavoured to restrain the overweening confidence of the Armenian monarch. (Plut. Lucull. 27.) This is the last time that his name occurs in history.

3. A general who commanded the auxiliary troops from the Lesser Armenia, that joined the army of Pompey before the battle of Pharsalia, B. C. 48. (Appian. B. C. ii. 71.) [E. H. B.]

TAY'GETE (Ταϋγέτη), a daughter of Atlas and Pleione, one of the Pleiades. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 1.) By Zeus she became the mother of Lacedaemon (Apollod. iii. 10. § 3; Paus. iii. 1. § 2, 18. § 7, 20. § 2) and of Eurotas. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ταΰγετον.) Mount Taygetus, in Laconia, derived its name from her. (Schol. ad Eurip. Or. 615.) According to some traditions, Taygete refused to yield to the embraces of Zeus, and in order to secure her against him, Artemis metamorphosed her into a cow. Taygete showed her gratitude towards Artemis by dedicating to her the Cerynitian hind with golden antlers. (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. iii. 53.) Some traditions, moreover, state that by Tantalus she became the mother of Pelops. (Hygin. Fab. 82.) [L. S.]

TEBRUS (Τέβρος), a son of Hippocoon, is also called Sebrus. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 5; Paus. iii. 15. § 2; comp. HIPPOCOON; DORCEUS.) [L. S.]

TECTAEUS and ANGE'LION (Τεκταῖος καὶ Αγγελίων), early Greek statuaries, who are always mentioned together. They were pupils of Dipoenus and Scyllis, and instructors of Callon of Aegina; and therefore they must have flourished about Ol. 58, B. C. 548. (Paus. ii. 32. § 4; CALLON; DIPOENUS.) They belong to the latter part of the so-called Daedalian period. [DAEDALUS.] The only work of theirs, of which we have any notice, is the celebrated statue of Apollo at Delos, mentioned by Pausanias (ix. 32. § 1. s. 4: where the corrupt word Διονύσου is very difficult to correct: Müller has suggested χρυσοῦ: see Schubart and Walz's note), and more fully described by Plutarch (de Mus. 14, p. 1136, a.) The right hand of the statue held a bow, and in the left hand were the Graces, each holding an instrument of music, one the lyre, another the flute, and the third the pan-pipes (σύριγξ). The tradition which ascribed the image to the Meropes in the time of Heracles, if worth anything, must signify that it was, like other works of the early Greek artists, a copy of an older image of unknown antiquity. If so, we may conjecture that it was of wood; and this tallies with Müller's correction of Pausanias, χρυσοῦ, which, if the true reading, must mean that the image was of wood gilt. The statue is also mentioned by Athenagoras, who further ascribes to the artists a statue of Artemis, but this statement cannot be accepted on such authority. (Legat. pro Christ. 14. p. 61, Dechair.) There are copies of the Delian Apollo on gems and on Attic coins. (Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 86, note.) [P. S.]

TECMESSA (Τέκμησσα), the daughter of the Phrygian king Teleutas, whose territory was ravaged by the Greeks during a predatory excursion from Troy. Tecmessa was made prisoner, and was given to Ajax, the son of Telamon, who lived with her as his wife, and had by her a son, Eurysaces. (Soph. Ajax; Schol. ad Hom. Il. i. 138.) [L. S.]

TE'DIUS. 1. SEX. TEDIUS, a senator, who carried the corpse of Clodius to Rome, after the murder of the latter by Milo. (Ascon. in Cic. Mil. p. 33, ed. Orelli.)

2. TEDIUS AFER, consul designatus under Augustus, put an end to his own life, terrified by the threats of the emperor. (Suet. Octav. 27.)

3. Q. TEDIUS, one of the friends of Augustus, notorious for his luxury. (Tacit. Ann. i. 10.)

TEGEA'TES (Τεγεάτης), a son of Lycaon, and the reputed founder of Tegea in Arcadia. (Paus. viii. 3. § 1, 45. § 1.) He was married to Maera, by whom he had two sons, Leimon and Scephrus. (Paus. viii. 53. § 1.) His tomb was shown at Tegea. (Paus. viii. 48. § 4.) [L. S.]

TE'GULA, P. LICI'NIUS, the author of a religious poem, which was sung by the Roman virgins in B. C. 200. (Liv. xxxi. 12.) Vossius supposed that he was the same person as the comic poet C. Licinus Imbrex, but this is not probable. [IMBREX.]

TEGYRE'IUS (Τεγυρήιος), a surname of Apollo, derived from the town of Tegyra in Boeotia, where, according to some traditions, the god had been born. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Τέγυρα; Plut. Pelop. 8.) [L. S.]

TEGY'RIUS (Τεγύριος), a Thracian king who received Eumolpus and his son Ismarus, and gave to the former his kingdom. (Apollod. iii. 15. § 4; comp. EUMOLPUS.) [L. S.]

TEIRE'SIAS or TIRE'SIAS (Τειρησίας), a son of Everes (or Phorbas, Ptolem. Hephaest. 1) and Chariclo, whence he is sometimes called Εὐηρείδης. (Callim. Lav. Pall. 81; Theocrit. Id. xxiv. 70.) He belonged to the ancient family of Udaeus at Thebes, and was one of the most renowned soothsayers in all antiquity. He was blind from his seventh year, but lived to a very old age. The cause of his blindness was believed to have been the fact that he had revealed to men things which, according to the will of the gods, they ought not to know, or that he had seen Athena while she was bathing, on which occasion the goddess is said to have blinded him, by sprinkling water into his face. Chariclo prayed to Athena to restore his sight to him, but as the goddess was unable to do this, she conferred upon him the power to understand the voices of the birds, and gave him a staff, with the help of which he could walk as safely as if he had his eyesight. (Apollod. iii. 6. § 7; Callim. Lav.

Pall. 75, &c., with Spanheim's note.) Another tradition accounts for his blindness in the following manner. Once, when on Mount Cythaeron (others say Cyllene), he saw a male and a female serpent together; he struck at them with his staff, and as he happened to kill the female, he himself was metamorphosed into a woman. Seven years later he again saw two serpents, and now killing the male, he again became a man. It was for this reason that Zeus and Hera, when they were disputing as to whether a man or a woman had more enjoyments, referred the matter to Teiresias, who could judge of both, and declared in favour of the assertion of Zeus that women had more enjoyments. Hera, indignant at the answer, blinded him, but Zeus gave him the power of prophecy, and granted him a life which was to last for seven or nine generations. (Apollod. l. c.; Hygin. Fab. 75; Ov. Met. iii. 320, &c.; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 682; Pind. Nem. i. 91.) In the war of the Seven against Thebes, he declared that Thebes should be victorious, if Menoeceus would sacrifice himself (Apollod. l. c.; Hygin. Fab. 68); and during the war of the Epigoni, when the Thebans had been defeated, he advised them to commence negotiations of peace, and to avail themselves of the opportunity that would thus be afforded them, to take to flight. He himself fled with them (or, according to others, he was carried to Delphi as a captive), but on his way he drank from the well of Tilphossa and died. (Apollod. iii. 7. § 3; Paus. ix. 33. § 1; Diod. iv. 66.) His daughter Manto (or Daphne) was sent by the victorious Argives to Delphi, as a present to Apollo. (Diod. l. c.; Apollod. iii. 7. § 4.) Another daughter of his is called Historis. (Paus. ix. 11. § 2.) Even in the lower world Teiresias was believed to retain the powers of perception, while the souls of other mortals were mere shades, and there also he continued to use his golden staff. (Hom. Od. x. 492, xi. 190, &c.; Lycoph. Cass. 682; Cic. de Div. i. 40; Paus. ix. 33. § 1.) His tomb was shown in the neighbourhood of the Tilphusian well near Thebes (Paus. ix. 18. § 3, 33. § 1, vii. 3. § 1), but also in Macedonia (Plin. H. N. xxxvii. 10); and the place near Thebes where he had observed the birds (οἰωνοσκόπιον) was pointed out as a remarkable spot even in later times. (Paus. ix. 16. § 1; Soph. Oed. Tyr. 493.) The oracle connected with his tomb lost its power and became silent at the time of the Orchomenian plague. (Plut. De Orac. Defect.) He was represented by Polygnotus in the Lesche at Delphi. (Paus. x. 29. § 2.) The blind seer Teiresias acts so prominent a part in the mythical history of Greece that there is scarcely any event with which he is not connected in some way or other, and this introduction of the seer in so many occurrences separated by long intervals of time, was facilitated by the belief in his long life. [L. S.]

TE'LAMON (Τελαμών). 1. A surname of Atlas, describing him as the sufferer or bearer of heaven, from τλάω. (Serv. ad Aen. i. 741, iv. 246.)

2. A son of Aeacus and Endeïs, and a brother of Peleus. He emigrated from Aegina to Salamis, and was first married to Glauce, a daughter of Cenchreus (Diod. iv. 72), and afterwards to Periboea or Eriboea, a daughter of Alcathous, by whom he became the father of Ajax. (Pind. Isthm. vi. 65; Apollod. iii. 12. § 6; comp. AJAX.) He was one of the Calydonian hunters and of the Argonauts. (Apollod. i. 8. § 2, 9. § 16, iii. 12. § 7; Paus. i. 42. § 4; Hygin. Fab. 173; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 175.) Miltiades traced his pedigree to Telamon. (Paus. ii. 29 § 4.) After Telamon and Peleus had killed their step-brother Phocus [PHOCUS], they were expelled by Aeacus from Aegina, and Telamon went to Cychreus in Salamis, who bequeathed to him his kingdom. (Apollod. l. c.; Paus. ii. 29. §§ 2, 7.) He is said to have been a great friend of Heracles (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 1289; Theocrit. Id. xiii. 38), and to have joined him in his expedition against Laomedon of Troy, which city he was the first to enter. He there erected to Heracles Callinicus or Alexicacus, an altar. Heracles, in return, gave to him Theaneira or Hesione, a daughter of Laomedon, by whom he became the father of Teucer and Trambelus. (Apollod. ii. 6. § 4, iii. 10. § 8, 12. § 7; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 468; Diod. iv. 32.) On this expedition Telamon and Heracles also fought against the Meropes in Cos, on account of Chalciope, the beautiful daughter of Eurypylus, the king of the Meropes, and against the giant Alcioneus, on the isthmus of Corinth. (Pind. Nem. iv. 40, &c., with the Schol.) He also accompanied Heracles on his expedition against the Amazons, and slew Melanippe. (Pind. Nem. iii. 65, with the Schol.) Respecting his two sons, see AJAX and TEUCER. [L. S.]

TELCHIN (Τελχίν), a son of Europs, and father of Apis, was king of Sicyon (Paus. ii. 5, § 5). According to Apollodorus (ii. 1. § 1, &c.) Telchin, in conjunction with Thelsion, slew Apis, and was killed in consequence by Argus Panoptes. [L. S.]

TELCHI'NES (Τελχῖνες), a family, a class of people, or a tribe, said to have been descended from Thalassa or Poseidon. (Diod. v. 55; Nonn. Dionys. xiv. 40.) It is probably owing to this story about their origin, that Eustathius (ad Hom. p. 771) describes them as marine beings without feet, the place of the hands being occupied by fins, though in the same page he also states that originally they were the dogs of Actaeon, who were changed into men. The following are mentioned as the names of individual Telchines: — Mylas (Hesych. s. v.), Atabyrius (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀτάβυρον), Antaeus, Megalesius, Hormenus, Lycus, Nicon, Simon (Tzetz. Chil. vii. 124, &c., xii. 835; Zenob. Cent. 5, par. 41), Chryson, Argyron, Chalcon (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 772; Diod. v. 55). The accounts of the Telchines are very few and scanty, and in them they appear in three different relations: 1. As cultivators of the soil and ministers of the gods; and as such they came from Crete to Cyprus and from thence to Rhodes, or they proceeded from Rhodes to Crete and Boeotia. Rhodes, and in it the three towns of Cameirus, Ialysos, and Lindos (whence the Telchines are called Ialysii, Ov. Met. vii. 365), which was their principal seat and was named after them Τελχινίς (Sicyon also was called Telchinia, Eustath. ad Hom. p. 291), was abandoned by them, because they foresaw that the island would be inundated, and thence they scattered in different directions: Lycus went to Lycia, where he built the temple of the Lycian Apollo. This god had been worshipped by them at Lindos (Ἀπόλλων Τελχίνιος), and Hera at Ialysos and Cameiros (Ἥρα τελχινία); and Athena at Teumessus in Boeotia bore the surname of Telchinia Nymphs also are called after them Telchiniae. Poseidon was intrusted to them by Rhea, and they in conjunction with Capheira, a daughter of Oceanus, brought him up. (Diod. l. c.; Strab. xiv. p. 653; Paus. ix. 19. § 1.) Rhea, Apollo and Zeus, however, are also described as hostile to the Telchines (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 1141), for Apollo is said to have assumed the shape of a wolf and to have thus destroyed the Telchines (Serv. ad Aen. iv. 377; comp. Eustath. ad Hom. p. 771), and Zeus is said to have caused their destruction by an inundation (Ov. Met. vii. 367). 2. As sorcerers and envious daemons (Suid. s. v. βάσκανοι καὶ γόητες; Strab. l. c.; Eustath. ad Hom. pp. 941, 1391.) Their very eyes and aspect are said to have been destructive (Ov. l. c.; Tzetz. Chil. xii. 814). They had it in their power to bring on hail, rain, and snow, and to assume any form they pleased (Diod. l. c.); they further mixed Stygian water with sulphur, in order thereby to destroy animals and plants (Strab. xiv. p. 653). 3. As artists, for they are said to have invented useful arts and institutions and to have made images of the gods. They worked in brass and iron, made the sickle of Cronos and the trident of Poseidon. (Diod. and Strab. l. c.; Callim. Hymn. in Del. 31.) This last feature in the character of the Telchines seems to have been the reason of their being put together with the Idaean Dactyls, and Strabo (x. p. 472) even states that those of the nine Rhodian Telchines who accompanied Rhea to Crete, and there brought up the infant Zeus, were called Curetes. (Comp. Höck, Creta, i. p. 345, &c.; Welcker, Die Aeschyl. Trilogie, p. 182, &c.; Lobeck, Aglaopham. p. 1182, &c.) [L. S.]

TELEBOAS (Τηλεβόας.) 1. A grandson of Lelex, a son of Pterelaus and brother of Taphius. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1473; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 747.) His descendants, the Teleboans, were believed to have settled in Acarnania. (Strab. vii. p. 322, x. p. 459.)

2. A son of Lycaon in Arcadia. (Apollod. iii. 8. § 1.)

3. A centaur. (Ov. Met. xii. 441.) [L. S.]

TELECLEIDES (Τηλεκλείδης), a distinguished Athenian comic poet of the Old Comedy, flourished about the same time as Crates and Cratinus, and a little earlier than Aristophanes, with whom, however, he may have been partly contemporary, and like whom he was an earnest advocate of peace, and a great admirer of the ancient manners of the age of Themistocles. Six plays are attributed to him (Anon. de Com. p. xxxiv.), perhaps including the one which the ancient critics considered spurious (Phryn. Ecl. Att. p. 291); for there are only five titles extant, Ἀμφικτύονες, Ἀψευδεῖς, Ἡσίοδοι, Πρυτάνεις, Στέῤῥοί. Of these plays we possess some interesting fragments, especially those in which he attacks Pericles and extols Nicias. (Plut. Per. 3, 16, Nic. 4.) Meineke conjectures that the second of these fragments was written soon after the ostracism of Thucydides and the complete establishment of the power of Pericles, in Ol. 83. 4, B. C. 444. Bergk thinks that the anonymous quotation in Plutarch (Per. 7), referring to the subjugation of Euboea by Pericles, after it had revolted (B. C. 445), ought to be assigned to Telecleides, as well as a fragment in Herodian (περὶ μον. λέξ. p. 17, 11) respecting Aegina, which may very probably refer to the expulsion of the Aeginetans in B. C. 431 (Thuc. ii. 27). There are several other chronological allusions in the extant fragments, which are fully discussed by Meineke. (Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 87—90, vol. ii. pp. 361—379, Editio Minor, pp. 130—138; Bergk, Reliq. Com. Att. Ant. pp. 327—331.) [P. S.]

TE'LECLES (Τηλεκλῆς), was one of the ambassadors sent by the Achaeans to Rome, in B. C. 160, to solicit the restoration of the remnant of the 1000 exiles, who had been taken by the Romans to Italy, in B. C. 167, after the conquest of Macedonia. Telecles and his colleague Xenon, were especially enjoined to intercede on behalf of Polybius and Stratius, and to use towards the Roman senate no language but that of supplication. Their prayer was refused, and, in B. C. 155, Telecles and Xenon were sent again to Rome on the same mission. On this occasion the senate was more favourable to them, and there would have been a majority for granting their request, had it not been for the manoeuvring of A. Postumius (the praetor who presided) in putting the question. (Polyb. xxxii. 7, xxxiii. 1.) In the latter of these passages Polybius calls Telecles τὸν Αἰγεάτην, but the conjectural substitution of Τεγεάτην is highly plausible. [E. E.]

TE'LECLES (Τηλεκλῆς), artist. [THEODORUS].

TE'LECLUS (Τήλεκλος), king of Sparta, 8th of the Agids, and son of Archelaus. In his reign the Spartans subdued the Achaean towns of Amyclae, Pharis, and Geranthrae. Not long after these successes Teleclus was slain by the Messenians, in a temple of Artemis Limnatis, on the borders. According to the Spartan account, he had gone thither to offer sacrifice, with a company of maidens, and fell in an attempt to rescue them from the violence of the Messenians. The Messenian statement, however, was, that he had treacherously brought with him a body of Spartan youths, disguised as maidens, and with daggers hidden under their dress, for the purpose of murdering a number of the noblest Messenians at the festival, and that the objects of the plot had killed him and his associates in self-defence. (Herod. vii. 204; Aristot. ap. Schol. ad Pind. Isthm. vii. 18; Paus. iii. 2, iv. 4; Ephor. ap. Strab. vi. p. 279; Clint. F. H. vol. i. pp. 129, 250, 337.) [E. E.]

TELE'GONUS (Τηλέγονος). 1. A son of Proteus and brother of Polygonus, was killed, together with his brother, by Heracles, whom they had challenged to a contest in wrestling. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 9; comp. POLYGONUS.)

2. A king of Egypt who married Io, after she had come to rest from her wandering and found her son Epaphus. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 3.) According to the Scholiast on Euripides (Or. 920) this Telegonus was a son of Epaphus and a brother of Libya.

3. A son of Odysseus by Circe. At the time when Odysseus had returned to Ithaca, Circe sent out Telegonus in search of his father. A storm cast his ship on the coast of Ithaca, and being pressed by hunger, he began to plunder the fields. Odysseus and Telemachus, on being informed of the ravages caused by the stranger, went out to fight against him; but Telegonus ran Odysseus through with a spear which he had received from his mother. (Comp. Horat. iii. 29. 8; Ov. Trist. i. 1, 114.) At the command of Athena, Telegonus, accompanied by Telemachus and Penelope, went to Circe in Aeaea, there buried the body of Odysseus, and married Penelope, by whom he became the father of Italus. (Hes. Theog. 1014; Hygin. Fab. 127; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 805; Eustath. ad Hom. pp. 1660, 1676; Serv. ad Aen. ii. 44; Lucian, De Salt. 46; Aristot. Poet. 14.) In Italy Telegonus was believed to have been the founder of the towns of Tusculum and Praeneste. (Ov. Fast. iii. 92, iv. 71; Horat. l. c.; Dionys. Hal. iv. 45; Plut. Parall. Min. 41.) In some traditions Telegonus (also called Teledamus) is described as a son of Odysseus by Calypso. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1796.) [L. S.]

TELE'MACHUS (Τηλέμαχος), the son of Odysseus and Penelope (Hom. Od. i. 216). He was still an infant at the time when his father went to Troy, and in his absence of nearly twenty years he grew up to manhood. After the gods in council had determined that Odysseus should return home from the island of Ogygia, Athena, assuming the appearance of Mentes, king of the Taphians, went to Ithaca, and advised Telemachus to eject the troublesome suitors of his mother from his house, and to go to Pylos and Sparta, to gather information concerning his father. Telemachus followed the advice, but the suitors refused to quit his house; and Athena, in the form of Mentes, accompanied Telemachus to Pylos. There they were hospitably received by Nestor, who also sent his own son to conduct Telemachus to Sparta. Menelaus again kindly received him, and communicated to him the prophecy of Proteus concerning Odysseus. (Hom. Od. i.—iv.) From Sparta Telemachus returned home; and on his arrival there, he found his father, with the swineherd Eumaeus. But as Athena had metamorphosed him into a beggar, Telemachus did not recognise his father until the latter disclosed to him who he was. Father and son now agreed to punish the suitors; and when they were slain or dispersed, Telemachus accompanied his father to the aged Laertes. (Hom. Od. xv.—xxiv.; comp. ODYSSEUS.) In the Post-Homeric traditions, we read that Palamedes, when endeavouring to persuade Odysseus to join the Greeks against Troy, and the latter feigned idiotcy, placed the infant Telemachus before the plough with which Odysseus was ploughing. (Hygin. Fab. 95; Serv. ad Aen. ii. 81; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 384; Aelian, V. H. xiii. 12.) According to some accounts, Telemachus became the father of Perseptolis either by Polycaste, the daughter of Nestor, or by Nausicaa, the daughter of Alcinous. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1796; Dict. Cret. vi. 6.) Others relate that he was induced by Athena to marry Circe, and became by her the father of Latinus (Hygin. Fab. 127; comp. TELEGONUS), or that he married Cassiphone, a daughter of Circe, but in a quarrel with his mother-in-law he slew her, for which in his turn he was killed by Cassiphone. (Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 808.) He is also said to have had a daughter called Roma, who married Aeneas. (Serv. ad Aen. i. 273.) One account states that Odysseus, in consequence of a prophecy that his son was dangerous to him, sent him away from Ithaca. Servius (ad Aen. x. 167) makes Telemachus the founder of the town of Clusium in Etruria. [L. S.]

TELE'MACHUS, an Asiatic monk and martyr, who is justly renowned for the act of daring self-devotion, by which he caused the gladiatorial combats at Rome to be abolished, and obtained for himself the honours of canonization. In the year A. D. 404, in the midst of the spectacles of the amphitheatre, Telemachus rushed into the arena, and tried to separate the gladiators. The spectators, in the first moment of exasperation, stoned him to death, but the emperor Honorius proclaimed him a martyr, and soon afterwards abolished the gladiatorial combats, a measure which Constantine had in vain attempted, and which Honorius had long hopelessly desired to effect. (Theodoret. H. E. v. 26). Some doubt has been thrown upon the story, on account of the absence from the Theodosian Code of any edict of Honorius prohibiting such combats; but there was already such an edict by Constantine in existence, and no evidence can be produced to show that there were any gladiatorial fights after this period, although we know that the combats of wild beasts continued till the fall of the Western Empire. (Schröckh, Christliche Kirchengeschichte, vol. vii. p. 254, or 238, 2d ed.; Gibbon, c. 30, vol. v. p. 199, ed. Milman, with Milman's Note.) [P. S.]

TELEMNASTUS (Τηλέμναστος), a Cretan, whom Perseus sent to Antiochus Epiphanes, in B. C. 168, to urge him by every motive of self-interest to side with him against Rome. (Polyb. xxix. 3.) We may perhaps identify this person with the Telemnastus, a Gortynian, who with 500 men effectually aided the Achaeans in their war with Nabis. (Polyb. xxxiii. 15.) [E. E.]

TE'LEMUS (Τήλεμος), a son of Eurymus, and a celebrated soothsayer. (Hom. Od. ix. 509; Ov. Met. xiii. 731; Theocrit. Idyll. vi. 23.) [L. S.]

TELENI'CUS (Τελένικος), of Byzantium, is mentioned by Athenaeus as one of the miserable flute-players of the Athenian dithyramb. (Ath. xiv. p. 638, b.) He appears to have been ridiculed by Cratinus, in his Seriphians, and the worthlessness of his nomes gave rise to the proverbial expressions, Τελενικίσαι and Τελενίκειος ἠχώ (Hesych. s. v. Τελενικίσαι; Etym. Mag. s. v. p. 751. 5; Phot. Lex. s. v. p. 574. 6; Suid. s. v. Τελενικῆσαι, which should be Τελενικίσαι; Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. ii. p. 139.) [P. S.]

TE'LEON (Τελέων). 1. An Athenian, a son of Ion, the husband of Zeuxippe, and father of the Argonaut Butes. (Apollod. i. 9. § 16; Apollon. Rhod. i. 95.) From him the Teleonites in Attica derived their name. (Eurip. Ion, 1579.)

2. The father of the Argonaut Eribotes. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 71.) [L. S.]

TELE'PHANES (Τηλεφάνης), artists. 1. Of Sicyon. [ARDICES].

2. A Phocian statuary, who flourished in Thessaly, where he worked for the Persian kings, and, according to Müller, for the Aleuads; but whatever probability there may be for the latter statement, it is not made by Pliny, who is our only authority for the artist. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 9; Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 112, n. 1, § 247, n. 6.) Pliny tells us that, although little known beyond Thessaly, where his works lay concealed from the notice of the rest of Greece, he was mentioned with great praise by artists who had written upon art, and who placed him on an equality with Polycleitus, Myron, and Pythagoras. His works were, Larissa, Spintharus a victor in the pentathlon, and Apollo. As he worked for Darius and Xerxes, he must have flourished in the early part of the fifth century, B. C. [P. S.]

TELEPHASSA (Τηλέφασσα), the wife of Agenor, and mother of Europa, Cadmus, Phoenix, and Cilix. She, with her sons, went out in search of

Europa, who had been carried off by Zeus; but she died on the expedition, and was buried by Cadmus. (Apollod. iii. 1. § 1.) Moschus (ii. 42) calls her the wife of Phoenix, the son of Agenor, and the Scholiast on Euripides (Ion, 5) calls her Telephe. [L. S.]

TE'LEPHUS (Τήλεφος), a son of Heracles and Auge, the daughter of king Aleus of Tegea. He was reared by a hind (ἔλαφος), and educated by king Corythus in Arcadia. (Comp. AUGE.) When Telephus had grown up, he consulted the Delphic oracle as to who his mother was. He was ordered to go to king Teuthras in Mysia. (Paus. i. 4. § 9.) He there found his mother, was kindly received, and married Argiope, the daughter of Teuthras, whom he succeeded on the throne of Mysia. (Apollod. iii. 9. § 1; Diod. iv. 33.) According to a different tradition in Hyginus (Fab. 100), king Teuthras being hard pressed by Idas, who wished to deprive him of his kingdom, solicited the aid of Telephus, who, accompanied by Parthenopaeus, had come into his kingdom, and promised him his throne and the hand of his daughter Auge, if he would deliver him from his enemy. Telephus did so, and thus unwittingly married his own mother Auge. She, however, without knowing her son, would hear nothing of the marriage, and resolved to murder her intended husband. A dragon sent by the gods prevented this crime; and as she confessed her intention to Telephus, he resolved to kill her; but as she invoked the aid of Heracles, the relation between them was discovered, and Telephus led his mother back to his own country. According to the common tradition, however, Telephus was king of Mysia at the time when the Greeks went to the Trojan war, and when they invaded Mysia, he repelled them, being of all the sons of Heracles the most like his father. (Pind. Ol. ix. 112, &c., Isthm. v. 52; Paus. x. 28, in fin.) Dionysus, however, assisted the Greeks, and caused Telephus to stumble over a vine, in consequence of which he was wounded by Achilles. (Pind. Isthm. viii. 109; Dict. Cret. ii. 3; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 46; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 206, 211; Hygin. Fab. 101.) Now it was discovered that Telephus himself was a Greek, and he was requested to join in the war against Priam. But he declined it on the plea that his wife Astyoche was a daughter of Priam. (Dict. Cret. ii. 5.) Other accounts state that Astyoche was a sister of Priam (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1697); Hyginus calls his wife Laodice, and a daughter of Priam; and some, again, call his wife Hiera, by whom he is said to have been the father of Tarchon and Tyrrhenus. (Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 1242, 1249; Philostr. Her. ii. 18.) The wound which Telephus had received from Achilles could not be cured (hence incurable wounds, proverbially τηλέφεια τραύματα, Paul. Aegin. iv. 46); and when he consulted the oracle he received the answer, that only he could cure him who had wounded him. Telephus, therefore, in a deplorable condition, went to seek Agamemnon; and on the advice of Clytaemnestra he carried off Orestes from his cradle, threatening to kill him unless his father would assist him in getting his wound cured. As the Greeks had received an oracle that without the aid of Telephus they could not reach Troy, a reconciliation was easily brought about, and Achilles cured Telephus by means of the rust of the spear by which the wound had been inflicted; Telephus, in return, pointed out to the Greeks the road which they had to take. (Dict. Cret. ii. 10; Ov. Met. xii. 112, Trist. v. 2, 15, Remed. Am. 47, Epist. ex Ponto ii. 26; Philostr. Vit. Apoll. ii. 14, &c.) Telephus was worshipped as a hero at Pergamus (Paus. v. 13. § 2), and on mount Parthenion, in Arcadia (Paus. viii. 34. § 5; Apollod. i. 8. § 6), and on the temple of Athena Alea, in Tegea, he was represented fighting with Achilles. (Paus. viii. 4, 5, in fin.; Müller, Anc. Art and its Rem. § 410, 8.) [L. S.]

TE'LEPHUS (Τήλεφος). 1. A Greek grammarian, a native of Pergamus. He lived in the time of Hadrianus, and was one of the instructors of Verus. (Capitol. Ver. 2.) He was the author of a considerable number of works, none of which, however, have come down to us. Suidas gives the following list of them: — 1. Περὶ τῶν παρ' Ὁμήρῳ σχημάτων ῥητορικῶν, in two books. 2. Περὶ συντάξεως λόγου Ἀττικοῦ, in five books. 3. Περὶ τῆς καθ' Ὅμηρον ῥητορικῆς. 4. Περὶ τοῦ Ὁμήρου καὶ Πλάτωνος συμφωνίας. 5. Ποικίλης φιλομαθίας βιβλία β'. 6. Βίοι τραγικῶν καὶ κωμικῶν. 7. Βιβλιακὴ ἐμπειρία, in three books (containing a list of books worth getting). 8. Ὡς μόνος Ὅμηρος τῶν ἀρχαίων ἑλληνίζει. 9. Περιήγησις Περγάμου. 10. Περὶ τοῦ ἐν Περγάμῳ Σεβαστίου, in two books. 11. Περὶ τῶν Ἀθήνησι δικαστηρίων. 12. Περὶ τῶν Ἀθήνησι νόμων καὶ ἐθῶν. 13. Περὶ τῶν Περγάμου βασιλέων, in five books. 14. Περὶ χρήσεως, a sort of dictionary, arranged in alphabetical order, of things in common use, words, dress, &c. 15. Περὶ τῆς Ὀδυσσέως πλάνης. 16. Ὠκυτόκιον, in ten books. This quaint title was given to a dictionary of synonymous words, designed to give copiousness and facility in speaking. (Suid. s. v.; Vossius, de Hist. Gr. p. 264; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. i. p. 525, vol. vi. p. 380.)

2. The father of the grammarian Philetas of Cos. He lived much earlier than the preceding, in the time of Philip of Macedon. [C. P. M.]

TELES (Τέλης), a Greek philosopher, who is erroneously ranked by Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. i. p. 876) among the Pythagoreans. He should rather be classed with the Socratics; Diogenes, Crates, Bion, Aristippus, Xenophon, and Socrates himself, being the philosophers with whose doctrines he seems chiefly to have concerned himself. He appears to have been a contemporary of Stilpon. (Teles, de Exilio, ap. Stob. Floril. xl. 8.) Teles was the author of various dialogues, of which some considerable fragments have been preserved by Stobaeus, though they are not printed in the dialogical form. (Welcker, Kleine Schriften, vol. ii. p. 495.) Stobaeus has quoted from the following pieces or dialogues:— 1. Περὶ αὐταρκείας (v. 67). 2. Μὴ εἶναι τέλος ἡδονήν (xcviii. 72). 3. Σύγκρισις πλούτου καὶ ἀρετῆς (xci. 33, xciii. 31). 4. Περὶ φυγῆς (xl. 8). 5. Περὶ περιστάσεως (cviii. 82). 6. Περὶ εὐπαθείας (cviii. 83). 7. A couple of epitomized extracts from pieces not named (xcv. 21. xcvii. 31). [C. P. M.]

TELESA'RCHIDES (Τελεσαρχίδης), an Athenian sculptor, who is mentioned by Eustathius (ad Il. xxiv. 333, p. 1353. 8), as the maker of a Hermes with four heads (Ἑρμῆς τετρακέφαλος), which stood in the Cerameicus at Athens, and bore the following inscription:

Ἑρμῆ τετρακάρηνε, καλὸν Τελεσαρχίδου ἔργον,
Πανθ' ὁρᾷς.

(Comp. Heyne, Prisc. Art. Opp. ex Epigr. Illustr. p. 84.) It is also mentioned in the Lexicon of Photius, in the following terms, Ἑρμῆς τετρακέφαλος: ἐν Κεραμεικῷ Τελεσαρχίδου ἔργον. There are some grounds for thinking that Raoul-Rochette may be right in his conjecture, that this statue was the celebrated Hermes which stood in the Cerameicus, at the junction of three roads, which is spoken of by the ancient writers both as Ἑρμῆς τετράκεφαλος and as Ἑρμῆς τρικέφαλος, and which is an object of some interest on account of the allusion to it in the Τριφάλης of Aristophanes. It is impossible here to discuss the question at length; those who wish to pursue it may consult the following authorities. (Phot. l.c. and s.v. Τρικέφαλοι; Harpocrat. s.v. Τρικέφαλος Ἑρμῆς, with the note of Valesius; Hesych. s. v. Ἑρμῆς τρικέφαλος; Etym. Mag. s. v. Τρικέφαλος; Aristoph. Frag. Triphal. No. 11, ed. Bergk, ap. Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. ii. p. 1168, ed. Dindorf, in Didot's Bibliotheca, p. 510; Süvern on the Clouds of Aristophanes, p. 87.) This Hermes was set up by Procleides or Patrocleides, the friend of Hipparchus; and therefore, if Raoul-Rochette be right, Telesarchides must have flourished under the Peisistratids, and probably before the murder of Hipparchus in B. C. 514. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 412, 413, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

TELESARCHUS (Τελέσαρχος), a Syro-Macedonian officer, who commanded a force of 500 men sent by Antiochus I. to assist the Greeks in the defence of Thermopylae against the Gauls under Brennus, B. C. 279. On that occasion he displayed the utmost zeal and courage, and rendered important services to the cause of the confederates, but was at length slain while valiantly defending a side pass over Mount Oeta, by which the Gauls sought to force their passage. (Paus. x. 20. § 5, 22. § 1.) [E. H. B.]

TELESARCHUS (Τελέσαρχος), the author of a work on the early history of Argolis. (Sextus Empir. adv. Math. i. 12; Schol. in Eurip. Alc. 2; Schol. in Hom. Il. ii. 690.)

TELE'SIAS (Τελεσίας), a Theban musician, of the time of the later Athenian dithyramb, whose career is adduced by Plutarch as an instance of the force of early education, whether good or bad. (Plut. de Mus. 31, p. 1142, b. c.) He relates, on the authority of Aristoxenus, with whom the musician was contemporary, that Telesias had been carefully instructed, when young, in the works of the most distinguished musicians, such as Pindar, Dionysius of Thebes, Lamprus, and Pratinas, and the great lyric poets; and that he had become an excellent flute-player, and thoroughly acquainted with the other branches of his art: but that, in middle life, he was so taken with the dramatic and artificial style of music which then prevailed, that he neglected his old models, and gave himself up to the study of the productions of Philoxenus and Timotheus, of which he chose the most novel and artificial: but, when he set himself to the work of composition, and tried both styles, that of Pindar and that of Philoxenus, he found himself quite unable to imitate the latter successfully, so great was the power of his early training in the better style. [P. S.]

TELE'SIAS, of Athens, a statuary, of unknown time, mentioned only by Clemens Alexandrinus (Protrept. p. 18, Sylb.), who states, on the authority of Philochorus, that he made the statues of Poseidon and Amphitrite, nine cubits in height, which were worshipped in the island of Tenos. (Philoch. Fr. 185, ed. Müller, Frag. Hist. in Didot's Bibliotheca, vol. i. p. 414). [P. S.]

TELE'SICLES (Τελεσικλῆς). [ARCHILOCHUS].

TELESILLA (Τελέσιλλα) of Argos, a celebrated lyric poetess and heroine, of the number of those who were called the Nine Lyric Muses (Antip. Thess. in Anth. Pal. ix. 26), flourished about Ol. 67, B. C. 510, in the times of Cleomenes I. and Demaratus, kings of Sparta. (Clinton, F. H. s. a., who corrects the errors of Eusebius and Fabricius). Plutarch relates the tradition that she was of noble birth, but was afflicted with a disease, concerning the cure of which she consulted an oracle, and received an answer directing her to serve the Muses. In obedience to the divine command, she applied herself to poetry and music; and was soon rewarded by restoration to health, and by the admiration which the Argive women bestowed upon her poetry. In the war of Argos against Sparta, she obtained the highest renown, not only by her poetry, but her personal valour; for, not content with encouraging her countrymen by her lyre and song, she took up arms at the head of a band of her countrywomen, and greatly contributed to the victory which they gained over the Spartans. (Plut. de Mul. Virt. p. 245, d. e.; Paus. ii. 20. § 7; Max. Tyr. Diss. xxxvii. 5, vol. ii. p. 209, ed. Reiske, Diss. xxi. p. 218, ed Davis; Suid. s. v.; comp. Herod. vi. 77). In memory of this exploit, her statue was erected in the temple of Aphrodite at Argos, with the emblems of a poetess and a heroine (Paus. l. c.; Tatian. ad Graec. 52, p. 114, ed. Worth); and Ares was worshipped in that city as a patron deity of women (Lucian. Amor. 30, vol. ii. p. 430); and the prowess of her female associates was commemorated by the annual festival called Ὑβριστικά, in which the women and the men appeared respectively in the attire of the other sex: this festival appears to be the same as the Ἐνδυμάτια. (Plut. de Mul. Virt. l. c.; de Mus. 9, p. 1134, c.; Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. p. 522, Sylburg; Polyaen. Strat. viii. 33.) Müller, however, regards this whole story as having a decidedly fabulous complexion: he explains the so-called statue of Telesilla, in the temple of Aphrodite, as being a statue of the goddess, of that well-known type, in which she was represented in the act of arming herself; and he ascribes quite a different origin to the festival of the Hybristica. (Dorier, bk. i. c. 8. § 6; Proleg. zu Mythol. p. 405; see also Grote, History of Greece, vol. iv. pp. 432—433.)

Our information respecting the poetry of Telesilla is very scanty. Athenaeus (xiv. p. 619, b.) states that she composed an ode to Apollo, called Φιληλίας, which Bode explains as the Argive name of the Paean, derived from the first words of the strain, ἔξερχ' (or ἔξεχ') ὦ φίλ' ἧλιε. (Pollux, ix. 123; Bode, Gesch. d. lyr. Dichtkunst, pt. ii. p. 119.) Pausanias also quotes from her poems in honour of Apollo and Artemis (iii. 35. § 2, ii. 28. § 2), and the statement respecting the children of Niobe, quoted from her by Apollodorus (Bibl. iii. 5. § 6), must have been derived from a similar source. A scholiast on Homer (Od. xiii. 289) mentions her representation of Virtue as being similar to that of Xenophon in the celebrated fable of Prodicus; and there are two or three grammatical references to single words used by her (Ath. xi. p. 467, f.; Eustath. p. 1207. 14; Poll. ii. 23; Hesych. s. v. Βελτιώτας). The only complete verses of her poetry which remain are the following two, which seem to come from a Parthenion, composed for a chorus of Argive virgins, on the subject of the love of the river Alpheus for Artemis:

Ἁ δ' Ἄρτεμις, ὦ κόραι, φεύγοισα τὸν Ἀλφεόν.

The metre is an Ionic a Majore Dimeter Catalectic, the terminal metre being Trochaic.

or, as Hephaestion, who quotes the passage, calls it, an Ionic Hephthemimeral (p. 62, ed. Gaisford, comp. p. 26), and it confirms the statement of the writer on music, appended to Censorinus (c. 9), that Telesilla went further than Alcman in breaking up the strophes into short verses. (Fulv. Ursin. Carm. novem illustr. Femin. Antwerp, 1568, 8vo. pp. 49, foll.; Wolfius, Poetriarum Fragmenta, Hamb. 1734 and 1735, 4to., with the preliminary Dissertation of Olearius; Telesillae Frag. in the Program. Acad. Upsal. 1826, 8vo.; Schneidewin, Delect. Poes. Graec. p. 374; Bergk, Poet. Lyr. Graec. pp. 742, 743; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 157; Bode, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. ii. pt. 2, pp. 118, foll.) [P. S.]

TELESI'NUS, C. LU'CIUS, consul A. D. 66 with Suetonius Paulinus. He is praised by Philostratus as a philosopher, and was, in consequence of his love of philosophy, banished by Domitian. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 14; Dion Cass. lxiii. 1; Philostrat. Vit. Apoll. iv. 40, vii. 11, viii. 12.)

TELESI'NUS, PON'TIUS. [PONTIUS.]

TELESIPPA (Τελέσιππα), a lyric poetess of Lesbos, and one of the friends of Sappho. (Suid.; comp. SAPPHO, p. 703.) [P. S.

TE'LESIS (Τέλεσις), of Methymna, an epic poet, not mentioned by any of the ancient authors, but referred to on the Borghese tablet as the author of a Titanomachia (Weichert, über Apollon. Rhod. p. 197; Bode, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. i. p. 396). [P. S.]

TELESON and MNASITI'MUS (Τελέσων, Μνασίτιμος), are names belonging to a family of Rhodian artists, with whom we have become acquainted through the inscriptions recently discovered by professor Ross in the Acropolis of Lindos, in Rhodes, from two of which we learn that Mnasitimus, the son of Teleson, made a bronze statue of Onomastus in Lindos, and Mnasitimus and Teleson together made a bronze statue of Callicrates. Ross supposes that the Mnasitimus of both inscriptions was the same person, and that, as the former Teleson was the father, so the latter Teleson was the son, of Mnasitimus, chiefly because, in the second inscription, the name of Mnasitimus is put before that of Teleson. (Ross, Inschriften von Lindos auf Rhodos, Nos. 5, 6, in the Rhein. Mus. 1846, vol. iv. pp. 171—173.)

From the same source we learn that there was a statuary Mnasitimus, the son of Aristonidas, as Ross, with great probability, completes the name, the inscription giving only . ΝΑΣΙΤΙΜΟΣΑΡΙΣΤΩ .... ; and it is most likely that we have here the very artist whom Pliny mentions only as a painter. (H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 42; Ross, l. c. No. 11, pp. 180, 181). [P. S.]

TELE'SPHORUS (Τελεσφόρος), that is, "the completing," is the name of a medical divinity who is mentioned now and then in connection with Asclepius. Pausanias (ii. 11. § 7) says: "In the sanctuary of Asclepius at Titane sacrifices are offered to Enamerion, to whom a statue is there erected; and, if I am not mistaken, this Enamerion is called at Pergamus Telesphorus, and at Epidaurus Ausius." (Comp. Müller, Anc. Art and its Rem. § 394.) [L. S.]

TELE'SPHORUS (Τελεσφόρος), a general in the service of Antigonus, the king of Asia, who was sent by him in B. C. 313, with a fleet of fifty ships and a considerable army to the Peloponnese, to oppose the forces of Polysperchon and Cassander. His arms were at first very successful; he drove out the Macedonian garrisons from all the cities of the peninsula, except Sicyon and Corinth, which were held by Polysperchon himself; but having joined with Medius in an attempt to relieve Oreus, to which Cassander had laid siege, they were defeated, with the loss of several ships. (Diod. xix. 74, 75.) The following summer (B. C. 312) Antigonus having conferred the chief direction of the war in the Peloponnese upon his nephew Ptolemy, Telesphorus was so indignant that he shook off his allegiance, and having induced some of his soldiers to follow him, established himself in Elis on his own account, and even plundered the sacred treasures at Olympia. He was, however, soon after, induced to submit to Ptolemy. (Id. ib. 87.) [E. H. B.]

TELESTAS or TELESTES (Τελέστας, Τελέστης). 1. A dancer, employed in the tragedies of Aeschylus; of whom Athenaeus (i. p. 22, a.) relates that his skill was so great, that, in the representation of the Seven against Thebes, he made the actions manifest by his mimetic dancing, no doubt as leader of the chorus. (Müller, Hist. Lit. of Greece, vol. i. p. 314.)

2. Of Selinus, a distinguished poet of the later Athenian dithyramb, is mentioned by Diodorus Siculus (xiv. 46) as flourishing at Ol. 95. 3, B. C. 398, with Philoxenus, Timotheus, and Polyeidus; and this date is confirmed by the Parian Marble (Ep. 66), according to which Telestes gained a dithyrambic victory in B. C. 401. (Comp. Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. s. aa. 401, 398). He is also mentioned by Plutarch (Alex. 8), who states that Alexander had the dithyrambs of Telestes and Philoxenus sent to him in Asia. He is also referred to by the comic poet Theopompus, in his Althaea (Ath. xi. p. 501, f.; Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. ii. p. 793, where Meineke promises some future remarks upon the poet). Aristoxenus wrote a life of him, which is quoted by Apollonius Dyscolus (Hist. Mirab. 40, in Westermann's Paradoxographi, p. 113); and Aristratus, the tyrant of Sicyon, erected a monument to his memory, adorned with paintings by Nicomachus. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 10. s. 36. § 22, where the common reading is Telesti, not Telestae; NICOMACHUS).

The only remains of the poetry of Telestes are some interesting lines preserved by Athenaeus (xiv. pp. 616, foll., 626, a., 637, a), from which we learn that the following were among the titles of his pieces, Ἀργώ, Ἀσκληπιός, Ὑμέναιος; and also that, in his poetry, he praised the music of the flute, and opposed the poet Melanippides respecting the subject of the rejection of that instrument by Athena. These fragments have been metrically analyzed by Böckh (de Metr. Pind. pp. 274, foll.). From the description of Dionysius (C. V. 19), his style appears to have been a mixture of bold and lofty with soft and complex rhythms, passing from one to the other by the most abrupt transitions. The statement of Suidas, that he was a comic poet, is a mere blunder. Athenaeus, whom Suidas avowedly copies, does not specify the kind of his poetry, no doubt because every well-informed person knew that he was a dithyrambic poet; and so Suidas, judging probably from the titles of his pieces, assumed that he was a comic poet. Such blunders are frequent in Suidas, and this specimen would not have required notice, had it not misled several critics. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 157, 158; Heeren, in the Bibl. f. alte Litt. u. Kunst, vol. iv. pp. 54, foll., Hist. Schrift. vol. iii. pp. 160, foll.; Müller, Hist. Lit. Greece, vol. ii. pp. 59, 60; Bernhardy, Gesch. d. Griech. Lit. vol. ii. p. 555; Ulrici, Gesch. d. Hell. Dichtk. vol. ii. pp. 610, foll.) [P. S.]

TELEU'TIAS (Τελευτίας), a Spartan, was brother on the mother's side to Agesilaus II., by whose influence he was appointed to the command of the fleet, in B. C. 393, in the war of the Lacedaemonians against Corinth and the other states of the hostile league. In this capacity, in the same year, he recovered from the Corinthians the mastery of the Corinthian gulf, and sailed up to Lechaeum, where he co-operated with the land force under Agesilaus, and took the ships and docks of the enemy. In B. C. 390, he was sent to Asia to supersede Ecdicus as admiral [ECDICUS]. On his arrival at Samos he added some vessels to his squadron, sailed on to Cnidus, where he received the fleet from Ecdicus, and then proceeded towards Rhodes. On his voyage he fell in with and captured ten Athenian triremes, which were on their way to Cyprus under the command of Philocrates, to aid Evagoras against the king of Persia [PHILOCRATES, No. 2]. Hereupon the Athenians sent out Thrasybulus, with forty ships, to act against Teleutias, especially in the support of the democratic party at Rhodes; but Thrasybulus, on his arrival at that island, found that his friends there were strong enough to be able to dispense with his assistance, while, on the other hand, he could not hope to effect much against the opposite party, aided as it was by the Lacedaemonians. He therefore proceeded to the Hellespont, and Teleutias meanwhile remained in the south, where we find him, in B. C. 388, bringing effectual assistance to the Aeginetans, whom a body of Athenians, under Pamphilus, were annoying from a fortified post which they had established and occupied in the island while the Athenian fleet was blockading the coast. Teleutias chased away the enemy's ships, but Pamphilus still continued to hold the fort,— and shortly after this Teleutias was superseded by Hierax, having endeared himself to his men during his command, in a very remarkable manner, as they showed by their enthusiastic testimonies of attachment to him on his departure. In B. C. 382 he was appointed general against the Olynthians, and it was chiefly his high reputation and his popular character which induced the allies of Sparta to furnish zealously their contingents for the war. He further obtained the assistance of Amyntas II., king of Macedonia, and of Derdas, prince of Elymia, from the latter of whom, in particular, he received valuable co-operation. He did not, however gain any decided advantage over the enemy in his first campaign, while in the next year (B. C. 381), in the closing scene of his life, he somewhat tarnished the reputation he had acquired as a general. A body of his targeteers having been routed, and their commander slain by the Olynthian cavalry, Teleutias lost his temper, and, ordering his whole force to charge, advanced too close to the walls of the city, and within reach of the enemy's missiles. His men accordingly were thrown into confusion, whereupon the Olynthians made a well-timed sally, in which Teleutias was slain, and the rout of his army then became complete. (Xen. Hell. iv. 4. § 19, 8. §§ 11, 23, 24, 25, v. 1. §§ 2—4, 2. §§ 37—43, 3. §§ 3—6, Ages. 2. § 17; Plut. Ages. 21; Diod. xv. 21.) [E. E.]

TE'LINES (Τηλίνης), an ancestor of Gelon, tyrant of Syracuse. On one occasion, some citizens of Gela having been banished by the opposite faction, Telines, appealing to the religious awe inspired by the infernal deities (Demeter probably and Proserpine), induced their countrymen to receive them back again. For this he was made hierophant of the goddesses mentioned, and transmitted the dignity to his children. Herodotus tells us that tradition spoke of Telines as an effeminate man. (Herod. vii. 153.) [E. E.]

TELLEN or TELLIS (Τέλλην, Τέλλις), a wretched flute-player and lyric poet, in the time of Epaminondas. (Plut. Reg. et Imp. Apophtheg. p. 193, f.) His name passed into the proverb, ἄειδε τὰ Τέλληνος, mentioned by Zenobius, who says, however, that the songs of Tellen were well composed and graceful, but jocose and licentious, (Zenob. Prov. i. 45, ii. 15; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 158). [P. S.]

TE'LLIAS (Τελλίας). 1. Of Elis, a distinguished seer, was one of the commanders of the Phocians in a war against the Thessalians a few years before the invasion of Greece by Xerxes. After the defeat of the Thessalians his statue was erected by the Phocians in the temple at Delphi. (Herod. viii. 27; Paus. x. 1. § 8—11, x. 13. § 7.)

2. One of the generals of the Syracusans, when their city was besieged by the Athenians during the Peloponnesian war. (Thuc. vi. 103.)

3. A citizen of Agrigentum, usually called Gellias. [GELLIAS.]

TELLIS (Τέλλις). 1. The great grandfather of the poet Archilochus, was the reputed founder in conjunction with Cleoboea, of the mysteries of Demeter at Thasos; and was introduced in that character, in the great painting of the world below, by Polygnotus, in the Lesche at Delphi (Paus. x. 28. § 1. s. 3.)

2. Lyric poet and musician. [TELLEN]. [P.S]

TELLUS, another form for terra, the name under which the earth was personified among the Romans, as Ge was among the Greeks. She is often mentioned in contrast with Jupiter, the god of heaven, and connected with Dis and the Manes. When an oath was taken by Tellus, or the gods of the nether world, people stretched their hands downward, just as they turned them upwards in swearing by Jupiter. (Varro, de Re Rust. i. 1, 15; Macrob. Sat. iii. 9; Liv. viii. 9, x. 29.) During the war against the Picentians, an earthquake having been felt during the battle, the consul P. Sempronius Sophus caused a temple of Tellus to be built on the spot where the house of Spurius Cassius had stood, in the street leading to the Carinae. (Liv. ii. 41; Flor. i. 19. § 2; Val. Max. vi. 3. § 1; Dionys. viii. 79; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 6, 14.) A festival was celebrated in honour of Tellus on the 15th of April, which was called Fordicidia or Hordicalia, from hordus or fordus, a bearing cow. (Ov. Fast. iv. 633; Arnob. vii. 22; Horat. Epist. ii. 1.

143.) In private life sacrifices were offered to Tellus at the time of sowing and at harvest-time, especially when a member of the family had died without due honours having been paid to him, for it was Tellus that had to receive the departed into her bosom. (Ov. Fast. iv. 629, &c.) At the festival of Tellus, and when sacrifices were offered to her, the priests also prayed to a male divinity of the earth, called Tellumo. (Varro, ap. August. de Civ. Dei, vii. 23.) [L. S.]

TELMI'SSIUS (Τελμίσσιος), a surname of Apollo derived from the Lycian town of Telmissus or Telmessus. (Cic. de Div. i. 41; Steph. Byz. s. v. γαλεῶται; Strab. xv. p. 665.) [L. S.]

TELPHU'SA (Τελφοῦσσα or Τέλφουσα). 1. A daughter of Ladon, a nymph from whom the town of Telphusa in Arcadia derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v.) Telphussaea or Tilphussaea occurs as a surname of Demeter Erinnys, derived from a town Telphussion. (Schol. ad Soph. Antig. 117; Callim. Fragm. 207, ed. Bentley.) [L. S.]

TELYS (Τῆλυς), a citizen of Sybaris, who raised himself to the tyranny by the arts of a demagogue, and persuaded the people to banish 500 of the richest citizens, and to confiscate their property. The exiles having taken refuge at Crotona, Telys sent to demand that they should be given up, but, if we may believe Diodorus, Pythagoras prevailed on the Crotoniats to persevere in protecting them. The consequence was the war between Sybaris and Crotona, in which the former was destroyed, B. C. 510. (Herod. v. 44; Diod. xii. 9.) In opposition to the above statement, Heracleides of Pontus (ap. Athen. xii. p. 521) represents the tyranny of Telys as overthrown by the Sybarites before the fatal war with Crotona. In this revolution, he tells us, they were guilty of great cruelty, massacring all the adherents of Telys even at the altars, so that the statue of Hera turned aside in horror and anger, and a fountain of blood gushed forth from the earth, which nothing but walls of brass could check. The destruction of their city followed as their punishment. [E. E.]

TEME'NIDAE. [TEMENUS, No. 3.]

TEMENITES (Τεμενίτης), a surname of Apollo, derived from his sacred temenus in the neighbourhood of Syracuse. (Steph. Byz. s. v.; Sueton. Tib. 74; Thuc. vi. 75, 100.) [L. S.]

TE'MENUS (Τήμενος). 1. A son of Pelasgus, educated Hera at Stymphalus in Arcadia. (Paus. viii. 22. § 2.)

2. A son of Phegeus. (Paus. viii. 24. § 4.)

3. A son of Aristomachus, one of the Heracleidae. He was the father of Ceisus, Cerynes, Phalces, Agraeus, and Hyrnetho. (Paus. ii. 28; Apollod. ii. 8. § 2.) He was one of the leaders of the Heracleidae into Peloponnesus, and, after the conquest of the peninsula, he received Argos as his share. (Apollod. ii. 8. § 4, &c.; Plat. Min. p. 683, b.; Strab. viii. p. 389.) His tomb was shown at Temenion near Lerna. (Paus. ii. 38. § 1.) His descendants, the Temenidae, being expelled from Argos, are said to have founded the kingdom of Macedonia, whence the kings of Macedonia called themselves Temenidae. (Herod. viii. 138; Thuc. ii. 99.) [L. S.]

TEMPA'NIUS, SEX., one of the officers of the cavalry under the consul C. Sempronius Atratinus, in the war against the Volscians, B. C. 423. It was chiefly through the exertions of Tempanius that the Roman army was saved from defeat; and the people out of gratitude elected him tribune of the plebs in the following year. When one of his colleagues L. Hortensius attempted to bring Sempronius to trial for his misconduct in the war, Tempanius generously came forward in defence of his former commander. (Liv. iv. 38—42; comp. Val. Max. vi. 5. § 2.)

TEMPSA'NUS, L. POSTU'MIUS, praetor B. C. 185, received Tarentum as his province, and proceeded with great vigour against the shepherds who had been plundering the surrounding country. He condemned as many as 7000 men. He was continued in his post the following year, that he might entirely crush the insurrection of the shepherds, and likewise apprehend those persons who had taken part in the Bacchanalia at Rome, and who had fled for refuge to that part of Italy. (Liv. xxxix. 23, 29, 41.)

TE'NERUS (Τένερος), a soothsayer, a son of Apollo by Melia, and a brother of Ismenius. (Paus. ix. 10. § 5, 26. § 1; Strab. ix. p. 413; Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. xi. 5.) [L. S.]

TENES or TENNES (Τέννης), a son of Cycnus, the king of Colone in Troas, and Procleia, or, according to others, a son of Apollo, and brother of Hemithea. After the death of Procleia, Cycnus married Philonome, a daughter of Craugasus or Traganasus. She fell in love with her stepson; and as she was unable to win the love of Tenes, she accused him before his father of improper conduct towards her. Cycnus accordingly threw both his son and daughter into a chest, and exposed them on the waves of the sea. But the chest was driven on the coast of the island of Leucophrys, which Tenes, after his own name, called Tenedos, after its inhabitants had chosen him for their king. Cycnus at length heard of the innocence of his son, killed Philonome, and went to his children in Tenedos, where both he and Tenes were slain by Achilles, who, on his voyage to Troy, made a landing on Tenedos. But Tenes was afterwards worshipped as a hero in Tenedos. (Paus. x. 14. § 2; Diod. v. 83; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 232; Strab. xiv. p. 640.) According to Pausanias, Tenes did not allow his father to land in Tenedos, but cut off the rope with which Cycnus had fastened his ship to the coast. (Comp. Steph. Byz. s. v. Τένεδος.) The death of Tenes by Achilles also is related differently, for once, it is said, when Achilles was pursuing the sister of Tenes in Tenedos, Tenes, endeavouring to stop him, was slain by Achilles, who did not know that Tenes was a son of Apollo. (Plut. Quaest. Graec. 28; Tzetz. l. c.) In the temple of Tenes in Tenedos, it was not allowed to mention the name of Achilles, nor was any flute-player permitted to enter it, because the flute-player Molpus had borne false witness against Tenes to please his step-mother Philonome. (Plut. and Diod. l. c.) [L. S.]

TE'NICHOS or TY'NNICHOS, an artist of unknown time, and perhaps only a mythological name, mentioned on an inscription quoted by Procopius (Bell. Goth. iv. 22, p. 355. 4, ed. Hoeschel), as occurring on a monument ascribed by local tradition, and by the inscription itself, to Agamemnon (See Welcker, Sylloge, No. 182, p. 226; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 413, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

TENNES (Τέννης), king of Sidon in the revolt of Phoenicia against Artaxerxes III. He betrayed the town to Artaxerxes, but was notwithstanding put to death by the Persian king.

B. C. 351. The Sidonians, however, resolving not to fall into the power of the king, set the town on fire and perished in the flames. (Diod. xvi. 41—45.)

TERAMBUS (Τέραμβος), a son of Euseirus and Eidothea. Once he was tending his flocks on Mount Othrys in Melis, under the protection of the nymphs whom he delighted with his songs, for he was a distinguished musician, and played both the syrinx and the lyre. Pan advised him to quit Mount Othrys, because a very severe winter was coming on. Terambus, however, did not follow the advice, and went so far in his insolence as to revile even the nymphs, saying that they were not daughters of Zeus. The predicted cold at length came, and, while all his flocks perished, Terambus himself was metamorphosed by the nymphs into a beetle called κεράμβυξ. (Anton. Lib. 22.) Ovid (Met. vii. 353) mentions one Cerambus on Mount Othrys, who escaped from the Deucalionian flood by means of wings which he had received from the nymphs. [L. S.]

TERE'NTIA. 1. The wife of M. Cicero. Her parentage is unknown. Her mother must have married twice, for she had a half-sister of the name of Fabia, who was a Vestal Virgin. This Fabia was charged with having had sexual intercourse with Catiline, who was brought to trial for the crime in B. C. 73, but was acquitted. (Ascon. in Cic. Corn. p. 93, ed. Orelli; Plut. Cat. min. 19; Sall. Cat. 15; Drumann, Geschichte Roms, vol. v. p. 392.) The year of Terentia's marriage with Cicero is not known, but as their daughter Tullia was married in B. C. 63, the marriage of her parents may probably be placed in 80 or 79. Terentia was a woman of sound sense and great resolution; and her firmness of character was of no small service to her weak and vacillating husband in some important periods of his life. On his banishment in B. C. 58, Tullia by her letters endeavoured to keep up Cicero's fainting spirits, though to little purpose, and she vigorously exerted herself on his behalf among his friends in Italy. Cicero, however, appears to have taken offence at something she had done during his exile, for on his return to Italy in the following year he writes to Atticus praising the sympathy which his brother and his daughter had shown him, without mentioning Terentia (ad Att. iv. 2). During the civil war, Cicero bitterly complained that his wife did not furnish him and Tullia with money; but on his departure for Greece, he had left his affairs in the greatest confusion, and Terentia appears to have done the best she could under the circumstances. Cicero, however, threw all the blame upon his wife, and attributed his embarrassments to her extravagance and want of management. He had returned to Brundisium after the defeat of Pompey, ruined in his prospects, and fearing that he might not obtain forgiveness from Caesar. He was thus disposed to look at every thing in the worst light. When Terentia wrote to him proposing to join him at Brundisium, he replied in a few lines telling her not to come, as the journey was long and the roads unsafe, and she moreover could be of no use to him (Cic. ad Fam. xiv. 12). In the following year, B. C. 46, Cicero divorced Terentia, and shortly afterwards married Publilia, a young girl of whose property he had the management. This marriage occasioned great scandal at Rome. Antonius and other enemies of Cicero maintained that he had divorced Terentia in order to marry a young wife; but this was not the real reason. He hoped to pay off his debts with the fortune of Publilia. [PUBLILIA.] Terentia had a large property of her own, and Cicero now had to repay her dos, which he found great difficulty in doing, and it seems that Terentia never got it back. She was not paid at all events in the summer of B. C. 44 (Cic. ad Att. xvi. 15). Terentia could not have been less than 50 at the time of her divorce, and therefore it is not probable that she married again. It is related, indeed, by Jerome (in Jovin. i. p. 52, ed. Basil.), that she married Sallust the historian, and the enemy of Cicero, and subsequently Messala Corvinus; but these marriages are not mentioned by Plutarch or any other writer, and may therefore be rejected. Some modern writers speak even of a fourth marriage; since Dion Cassius (lvii. 15) says that Vibius Rufus, in the reign of Tiberius, married Cicero's widow; but if this is a fact, it must refer to Publilia and not to Terentia. Terentia is said to have attained the age of one hundred and three. (Plin. H. N. vii. 48. s. 49; Val. Max. viii. 13. § 6.) The life of Terentia is given at length by Drumann. (Geschichte Roms, vol. vi. pp. 685—694.)

2. Also called TERENTILLA, the wife of Maecenas. Dion Cassius (liv. 3) speaks of her as a sister of Murena and of Proculeius. The full name of this Murena was A. Terentius Varro Murena: he was perhaps the son of L. Licinius Murena, who was consul B. C. 62, and was adopted by A. Terentius Varro. Murena would thus have been the adopted brother of Terentia: Proculeius was probably only the cousin of Murena. [See Vol. III. p. 540, b.]

We know nothing of the early history of Terentia, nor the time of her marriage with Maecenas. She was a very beautiful woman, and as licentious as most of the Roman ladies of her age. She was one of the favourite mistresses of Augustus; and Dion Cassius relates (liv. 19) that there was a report at Rome that the emperor visited Gaul in B. C. 16, simply to enjoy the society of Terentia unmolested by the lampoons which it gave occasion to at Rome. The intrigue between Augustus and Terentia is said by Dion Cassius to have disturbed the good understanding which subsisted between the emperor and his minister, and finally to have occasioned the disgrace of the latter. Maecenas however had not much right to complain of the conduct of his wife, for his own infidelities were notorious. But notwithstanding his numerous amours, Maecenas continued to his death deeply in love with his fair wife. Their quarrels, which were of frequent occurrence, mainly in consequence of the morose and haughty temper of Terentia, rarely lasted long, for the natural uxoriousness of Maecenas constantly prompted him to seek a reconciliation; so that Seneca says (Ep. 114) he married a wife a thousand times, though he never had more than one. Once indeed they were divorced, but Maecenas tempted her back by presents (Dig. 24. tit. 1. s. 64). Her influence over him was so great, that in spite of his cautious temper, he was on one occasion weak enough to confide to her an important state secret respecting the conspiracy of her brother Murena. (Dion Cass. liv. 3, 19, lv. 7; Suet. Aug. 66, 69; Frandsen, C. Cilnius Maecenas, pp. 132—136.)

TERE'NTIA GENS, plebeian. The name was said by Varro to be derived from the Sabine word terenus, which signified "soft" (Macrob. Sat. ii. 9.) The Terentii are mentioned as early as B. C. 462, for the C. Terentillus Arsa, who was tribune of the plebs in that year (Liv. iii. 9), must have belonged to the gens; and indeed he is called C. Terentius by Dionysius (x. 1). The first member of the gens who obtained the consulship was C. Terentius Varro, who commanded at the fatal battle of Cannae in B. C. 216; and persons of the name continue to be mentioned under the early emperors. The principal surnames of the Terentii during the republic are CULLEO, LUCANUS, and VARRO: there are a few others of less importance, which are given below under TERENTIUS.

TERENTIA'NUS MAURUS, a Roman poet, probably lived at the end of the first or the beginning of the second century under Nerva and Trajan, and is perhaps the same person as the Terentianus, the governor of Syene in Egypt, whose praises are celebrated by Martial (i. 87; comp. Wernsdorf, Poëtae Latini Minores, vol. ii. p. 269). Terentianus was a native of Africa, as we might have inferred from his surname Maurus. There is still extant a poem of Terentianus, intitled De Literis, Syllabis, Pedibus, Metris, which treats of prosody and the different kinds of metre with much elegance and skill. The work is printed in the collection of the ancient grammarians by Putschius, pp. 2383—2450, and in a separate form by Santen and Van Lennep, Traj. ad Rhen. 1825, and by Lachmann, Berol. 1836.

TERE'NTIUS. 1. C. TERENTIUS ARSA, called TERENTILLUS by Livy, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 462, proposed that five commissioners should be appointed to draw up a body of laws to define the consular imperium. (Liv. iii. 9; Dionys. x. 1.)

2. Q. TERENTIUS, was sent by the senate, along with M. Antistius, to bring back the consul C. Flaminius to the city, but he refused to obey their summons. (Liv. xxi. 63.)

3. L. TERENTIUS MASSALIOTA, plebeian aedile, B. C. 200, and praetor B. C. 187, when he obtained Sicily as his province. (Liv. xxxi. 50, xxxviii. 42.)

4. L. TERENTIUS, one of the ambassadors sent to king Antiochus in B. C. 196. (Liv. xxxiii. 35.)

5. C. TERENTIUS ISTRA, praetor B. C. 182, obtained Sardinia as his province. In the following year he was one of the triumviri for founding a colony at Graviscae. (Liv. xxxix. 56, xl. 1, 29.)

6. L. TERENTIUS MASSALIOTA, probably a son of No. 3, was tribunus militum in B. C. 180. (Liv xl. 35.)

7. P. TERENTIUS TUSCIVANUS, one of the ambassadors sent into Illyricum in B. C. 167. (Liv. xlv. 18.)

8. TERENTIUS VESPA, one of whose witticisms is quoted by Cicero in his De Oratore (ii. 61).

9. L. TERENTIUS, was the companion and tentmate of Cn. Pompeius, when the latter was serving under his father Strabo in B. C. 87, and was bribed by Cinna to kill Pompeius. (Plut. Pomp. 3.)

10. CN. TERENTIUS, a senator, into whose custody Caeparius, one of the Catilinarian conspirators, was given. (Sall. Cat. 47.)

11. P. TERENTIUS HISPO, a friend of Cicero, was promagister of the company of publicani, who farmed the taxes in Asia. Cicero recommended him in a letter to P. Silius. (Cic. ad Att. xi. 10, ad Fam. xiii. 65.)

12. SER. TERENTIUS, was a friend of D. Brutus, whom he pretended to be on the flight from Mutina, B. C. 43, in order to save the life of his friend; but he was recognised by the officer of Antony's cavalry, and preserved from death. (Val. Max. iv. 7. § 6.)

13. M. TERENTIUS, a Roman eques, was accused, in A. D. 32, on account of his having been a friend of Sejanus. He defended himself with great courage, and was acquitted. (Tac. Ann. vi. 8, 9.)

14. TERENTIUS LENTINUS, a Roman eques, was privy to the forgery of Valerius Fabianus, and was in consequence condemned in A. D. 61. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 40.)

15. TERENTIUS, was said by some persons to have been the murderer of the emperor Galba. (Tac. Hist. i. 41; Plut. Galb. 27.)

TERE'NTIUS CLEMENS. [CLEMENS.]

TERE'NTIUS SCAURUS. [SCAURUS.]

P. TERE'NTIUS AFER, was the second and the last of the Roman comic poets, of whose works more than fragments are preserved. The few particulars of his life were collected long after his decease, and are of very doubtful authority. It would therefore be to little purpose to repeat them without scrutiny or comment. We shall, in the first place, inquire who were the biographers of Terence, what they relate of him, and the consistency and credibility of their several accounts. We shall next briefly survey the comedies themselves, their reception at the time, their influence on dramatic literature, their translators and imitators, their commentators and bibliography.

Our knowledge of Terence himself is derived principally from the life ascribed to Donatus or Suetonius, and from two scanty memoirs, or collections of Scholia, the one published in the seventeenth century, by Abraham Gronovius, from an Oxford MS., and the other by Angelo Mai, from a MS. in the Vatican. The life of Terence, printed in the Milan edition of Petrarch's works 1476, is merely a comment on Donatus. Of these, the first mentioned is the longest and most particular. It is nevertheless a meagre and incongruous medley, which, for its barrenness, may be ascribed to Donatus, and for its scandal to Suetonius. But it cites still earlier writers, — C. Nepos, Fenestella, Porcius, Santra, Volcatius, and Q. Cosconius. Of these Nepos is the best known, and perhaps the most trustworthy. His contemporaries deemed him a sound antiquarian (Catull. i. 1), and his historical studies had trained him to examine facts and dates. (Gell. xv. 48.) Of Fenestella, more voluminous than accurate, we have already given some account [Vol. II. p. 145]. Q. Cosconius was probably the grammarian cited by Varro (L. L. vi. 36, 89), Porcius, the Porcius Licinius, a satirical and seemingly libellous versifier, mentioned by Gellius (xvii. 21, xix. 19), and Volcatius was the Volcatius Sedigitus quoted by the same author (xv. 24). Santra is enumerated by St. Jerome (Vit. Script. Eccles.) among the Latin compilers of Memoirs; he wrote also a treatise De Antiquitate Verborum, cited frequently by Festus. Such writers are but indifferent vouchers for either facts or dates, whether from their living so long after the poet's age, or from the character of their testimony. In the following account we interweave our comment with their text.

P. Terentius Afer was born at Carthage B.C. 195, since he was in his 35th year at the performance of his last play, the Adelphi, B.C. 160. By birth or purchase, he became the slave of P. Terentius Lucanus, a Roman senator. But if he were "civis Carthaginiensis," as the didascalia of Donatus and the biographers style him, his servile condition is difficult to understand. Fenestella remarked that Terence could not have been a prisoner of war, since Carthage was at peace with Rome from B.C. 201 to 149. But in that interim the Carthaginians were involved in wars with their own mercenaries, with the Numidians, and with the southern Iberians, and at least two Roman embassies visited Carthage. So that, although the truce with Rome was unbroken, Terence or his parents may have been exposed in the Punic slave-markets, and transported to Italy. His cognomen Afer rests on as good authority as any other circumstance related of him. Yet it is not conclusive. It may have been merely an inference from a popular rumour of his Punic origin; and it was a cognomen of the Gens Domitia at Rome, where it certainly does not imply African descent. Terence is said to have been of an olive complexion, thin person, and middle height. (Donat.) These are not the physical characteristics of the Punic race, but they accord with those of the Liby-phoenician or Celtiberian perioeci, who were planted as colonists in various parts of the Carthaginian territory; and it is more likely that a perioecus, or the son of a perioecus, should have been enslaved, than that a native Carthaginian should have become the property of a Roman senator, so long as their respective commonwealths were at peace. It is remarkable also that Plautus, an Umbrian, in his comedy of the "Poenulus" should have introduced a Carthaginian among his dramatis personae, and an entire scene in the Punic language, while neither Carthaginian words, names, or allusions, are to be met with in Terence.

We know not at what time Terence came to Rome; but from his proficiency in the language of his masters we infer that he fell early into the hands of Terentius Lucanus, even if he were not a verna, or slave born in the house. A handsome person and promising talents recommended Terence to his patron, who afforded him the best education of the age and finally manumitted him. The condition of slaves was not always unfavourable to intellectual development. More than one eminent writer was born in a servile station*, and Tiro, Cicero's freedman, was the associate of his patron's literary labours, and his amanuensis. On his manumission, according to the usual practice, Terence assumed his patron's nomen, Terentius, having been previously called Publius or Publipor. From his cognomen, Lucanus, the patron may have been a native or landholder of southern Italy, and the protégé, like Livius Andronicus, have acquired in one of the cities of Magna Graecia his taste for the Attic drama. The "Andrian" was the first play offered by Terence for representation. The curule aediles, who conducted the theatrical exhibitions, referred the piece to Caecilius, then one of the most popular play-writers at Rome. [CAECILIUS STATIUS.] Unknown and meanly clad, Terence began to read from a low stool his opening scene, so often cited by Cicero as a model of narration. (Invent. i. 23, de Orat. ii. 40, &c., &c.) A few verses showed the elder poet that no ordinary writer was before him, and the young aspirant, then in his 27th year, was invited to share the couch and supper of his judge. This reading of the Andrian, however, must have preceded its performance nearly two years, for Caecilius died in B.C. 168, and it was not acted till 166. Meanwhile copies were in circulation, envy was awakened, and Luscius Lavinius [Vol. II. p. 842] a veteran, and not very successful play-writer (comp. Prol. in Terent. Com.; Gell. xv. 24; Hieron. in Genes.), began his unwearied and unrelenting attacks on the dramatic and personal character of the author. The "Andrian" was successful, and, aided by the accomplishments and good address of Terence himself, was the means of introducing him to the most refined and intellectual circles of Rome. In the interval between Plautus and Terence, the great Roman families had more and more assumed the state and character of princely houses. In their town and country seats, the Scipios, the Laelii, the Metelli and the Mucii, formed each a petty court around themselves. Among the patrons or associates of Terence we find the names of L. Furius Philus, of C. Sulpicius Gallus, of Q. Fabius Labeo, and M Popilius Laenas. But from the comparative youth of the parties, his intercourse with Laelius and the younger Scipio had in it less of dependence on the one side, and more of friendship on the other. Nepos, indeed (Fr. Chron. i. 6), calls them aequales. Both Scipio and Laelius, however, were probably about nine years younger than their protégé. Both treated him as an equal, and this intimacy would open to him, as it formerly opened to Ennius, and subsequently to Lucilius, the houses of the Aemilii, Metelli, and Scaevolae. (Cic. Arch. 7; Vet. Schol. in Hor. Serm. ii. 1. 71.) Nor is it rash to conjecture that Terence may have conversed with Polybius at Alba or Liternum, or made one of the group immortalised by Horace. (Serm. ii. 1. 71, foll.; vet. Schol.)

Calumny did not fail to misrepresent their intercourse. His patrons, it was said, assisted Terence in the composition, nay, were the real authors of his plays, made him their playmate and butt, and let him starve. (Porcius, ap. Donat.) C. Memmius [No. 5] mentioned the rumour as notorious, in his speech "Pro Se;" Valgius wrote in his Actaeon (Bothe, Poet. Lat. Scen. v. p. 201), probably in the Prologue,

> "Hae quae vocantur fabulae cujae sunt?
> Non has, qui jura populis end'ibus (endo-tribus?) dabat
> Honore summo affectus, fecit fabulas;"

Cicero gave it credence (ad Att. vii. 3), and Nepos (Fr. Incert. 6), in the following story, ascribes at least one comedy to Laelius. It was, he says, the 1st of March, the festival of the Matronalia, on which, if on no other day of the year, the Roman ladies were absolute in their households. Laelius was spending the holiday at Puteoli; supper was announced, but he begged not to be interrupted, as he had business in hand. When at length he entered the supper-room, he excused his absence by saying he had been writing verses, and had never written any more to his liking. He then recited the opening lines of the 4th scene in the 4th act of the "Self-Tormentor:"

* Bentley (Praef. in Terent. Cantabr. 1726) remarks "Hi tres (Terentius, P. Syrus, Phaedrus) pari conditione liberti et peregrini, in non ita dissimili argumento, comoediis mimis et apologis, omnia Italorum ingenia facile superaverunt." For the intellectual opportunities of slaves, see also Nepos (Att. 13, 14). Before his manumission, Terence was probably anagnostes and librarius to Lucanus.

> "Satis, pol, proterve me Syri promissa huc induxerunt," &c.

The belief that Terence was aided by his friends in composition, if properly limited, has in it nothing improbable. He was a foreigner, and of a race, to which, whether Libyan or Iberian, the Greek and Latin idioms presented no ordinary difficulties. Of the English, who speak and write French, few attain to precision or purity, and the Punic or Basque dialects diverged more from the languages of Athens and Rome than the speech of London from the speech of Paris. From the purity of Terence's diction we might, without these anecdotes, infer his intimacy with the best society in Rome. Of that society, in that age, the Scipios were the leaders; and the Laelii, both male and female, the models of forensic and conversational eloquence. [Laelia, No. 1.] Nor did Terence deny the charge. He gloried in it, as the test of his proficiency as an artist. (Prol. in Adelph.) Our own dramatic literature furnishes parallel cases. Garrick added a scene to the "West Indian," and revised the "Clandestine Marriage." Pope retouched the songs in the "Beggar's Opera," and the "Medea" was submitted to the critics of Leicester House. Yet no one doubts that Cumberland, Colman, Gay, and Glover, were respectively the authors of those productions. The story of Terence's poverty is less easy to refute, but we disbelieve it equally. He owned an estate of a few acres, contiguous to the Appian road, and, after his decease, his daughter married a man of equestrian rank. Neither of these facts accords with the assertion of Porcius Licinius (Donat.), that he was too poor to hire a house or keep a slave. An eques would scarcely wed a portionless maiden, the daughter of a freedman; and even in that age, land lying near the great highway of Italy must have been valuable as pasture, arable, or building ground. Avarice, on the other hand, was not the vice of the Scipios. (Polyb. xxxii. 14.) If they took freely from kings and tetrarchs (Liv. xxxviii. 50), without scrupulously accounting to the treasury, they gave freely to their favourites and dependents. Ennius, though poor (Hieron. Chron. Ol. 135), did not starve under their roof, and was buried in their tomb; Polybius and Panaetius lightened the privations of exile in their camp and their villas, and Lucilius, who succeeded Terence in the friendship of Scipio and Laelius, could afford to make literature his profession. But, if by poverty be meant indigence, the tenour of Terence's history contradicts the rumour of his poverty. After the representation of his six comedies, for one of which, the Eunuch, he received the unprecedented sum of nearly 60*l.*, he travelled in Greece. Now a journey in Greece could not be performed in those days any more than in our own without cost, even if his patrons lightened his charges by their tesserae hospitales (Plaut. Poen. v. 1. 25), to their various clients and friends. And Terence resided, as well as travelled in Greece, since while there he translated 108 of Menander's comedies; nor as an alien could he hold a libera legatio, or commission to live at the public expense while transacting his private business. These facts, gleaned from his biographers themselves, render the neglect of the patrons and the indigence of the client very doubtful. The hostility to Terence was perhaps owing partly to professional causes, and partly to his popularity with the great. Terence was a foreigner, a freedman, and the adherent of a party. Even Horace was taunted with being libertino patre natus; and in Horace's days the long civil wars and the influx of strangers into the senate and the tribes had melted down many of the old Italian prejudices. In Terence's age there were two strongly opposed parties in literature, as well as in politics,—the Latin party, of which Cato and the Fabii were the representatives, and the Greek, or movement-party, of which the Scipios were the leaders and Terence the favourite. Here was plentiful matter for libel. Whether the attacks of Lavinius drove him from Italy, or whether he went to Greece as to a university, is uncertain. Before his departure his detractors had affirmed that from his ignorance of Attic manners and idiom his versions of Menander and Apollodorus were caricatures. (Prol. in Andr. Heautont. Phorm.) He never returned, and the accounts of his death are as various as the records of his life. According to one story, after embarking at Brundisium, he was never heard of more; according to others, he died at Stymphalus, in Arcadia (Auson. Epist. xviii.), in Leucadia, or at Patrae, in Achaia. One of his biographers said he was drowned, with all the fruits of his sojourn in Greece, on his home-passage. But the prevailing report was, that his translations of Menander were lost at sea, and that grief for their loss caused his death. He died in the 36th year of his age, in B. C. 159, or, according to St. Jerome (Chron. Ol. 155, 3), in the year following. He left a daughter, but nothing is known of his family.

Six comedies, all belonging to the Fabula Palliata, are all that remain to us; and since in these we can verify the citations from him in the grammarians, they are probably all that Terence produced. His later versions of Menander were, in all likelihood, from their number and the short time in which they were made, merely studies for future dramas of his own, and therefore are not to be ranked as deperdita. For Terence's exemption from the neglect or ravages of time various causes may be assigned. His works were few in number, and small in bulk. From their purity of diction, they became the text-books of the grammatical and rhetorical schools; they found favour with St. Jerome, and escaped the censures of the church. They were brought forward at the following seasons and under the following circumstances.

1. Andria, "the Woman of Andros," so called from the birth-place of Glycerium, its heroine, was first represented at the Megalesian Games, on the 4th of April, B. C. 166. It was, according to Donatus, the first in order of time of Terence's plays. This has been disputed by subsequent critics (Petitus, de Ord. Com. P. Ter.), but seems warranted by the poet's age—27—at his interview with Caecilius (suprà), and by the original title, Andria Terentii. For in the didascalia it was the custom to put the name of the play foremost, if by an author hitherto unknown; whereas Terentii Andria would import that it was a new play by a known writer. From the anecdote of Caecilius above related, it appears that the Andria circulated in manuscript nearly two years before it was acted. For the prologue refers to critical objections to the play, and says that the carpings of a malignant hacknied writer — malevolus vetus poeta — compelled the author to bring forward matters personal to himself, instead of confining himself to the argument of his piece The Andria is made up of two of Menander's comedies, the Andria and Perinthia, and Luscius Lavinius said that Terence had marred two good plays to make one bad one. Terence replies that if he were a compiler, so were Naevius, Plautus, and Ennius before him, and that he would rather err with them than be right with Lavinius. He ends by warning his assailant not to moot the question of piracy again, since his own offences in that way were notorious, and he begs the audience to give his play a patient hearing, for upon its reception would depend whether he wrote others.

The Roman theatre was ill suited to the representation of the Comoedia Palliata. The bustle and buffoons of Plautus required no better appointment than the wooden booths which that age afforded. The masks and the unities encumbered Menander as well as Terence; but the Roman play-writer had to contend with worse obstacles than the common conventionalities of his art. The manners he pourtrayed were exotic: his audience was gross and noisy (Prol. in Hecyr., comp. Prol. to B. Jonson's "The Case is altered"); and if Valerius Antias be correct in dating the introduction of the Ludi Scenici in B. C. 193 or 191, the Comoedia Palliata, or Genteel Comedy, was hardly a quarter of a century old at Rome. We find Terence, in his prologues, continually supplicating the spectators to sit still and be silent, and their rudeness and apathy must have formed a singular contrast to his subtle humour and refined pictures of life. Four of his six comedies, indeed, were played at the Megalesia, which were more decorous and orderly than the games of the circus, and are therefore described by Cicero (Harusp. Resp. 12) as maxime casti, sollemnes, religiosi. But at best the comedy of Terence was caviare to the Romans — an Italian opera performed at Bartholomew fair.

The Andrian has been often translated and imitated. The earliest English version was made in the reign of Edward VI. It is in rhymed stanzas of seven lines each, was probably performed as an exercise at one of the universities, and is in some degree adapted to the manners of the times. Baron, the celebrated French actor, imitated Terence closely in his Andrienne. Even the Latin names of the Dramatis Personae are retained, and in the third and fourth acts alone has he deviated, and then not for the better, from his original. The Andria has also suggested a portion of Moore's Foundling. But the most elaborate copy of this play is Sir Richard Steele's Conscious Lovers. The Latin names of the characters, indeed, are not preserved, but their English representatives, as the following list shows, exhibit a close parallelism. Sir John Bevil = Simo; young Bevil = Pamphilus; Indiana = Glycerium; Sealand = Chremes; Myrtle = Charinus; Humphrey = Sosia; Phillis = Mysis; and Tom = Davus, the "currens servus qui fallit senem," the prototype of Molière's Scapin. Steele's underplot is, on the whole, conducted more skilfully than Terence's; but for the management of the principal story, for consistency in the characters, for humour, and elegance of diction, the Conscious Lovers will bear no comparison with the Andrian.

2. Hecyra, "the Step-Mother," was produced at the Megalesian Games, in B. C. 165. It was a version of a play, bearing the same name, by Apollodorus (Meineke, Comic. Graec. Hist. vol. i p. 464), and is an ancient specimen of the comedie larmoyante. The Hecyra was twice rejected: the first time the spectators hurried out of the theatre to see a boxing match and rope-dancers; the second time, when it was played at the funeral games of Aemilius Paullus, B. C. 160, it was interrupted by a combat of gladiators. It owed its success, on a third trial, to the intercessions of Ambivius Turpio, the manager, with the audience. The Prologue to the Hecyra throws some light on the Roman theatrical system. It appears that the managers of the grex or company, in accepting a new piece, incurred no slight responsibility. Their judgment on the MSS. determined the aediles to purchase or refuse it. But if the public, after all, rejected it, the aediles looked to the manager to indemnify them for the outlay. Ambivius, by his appeals to the spectators, had more than once rescued the plays of Caecilius from rejection, and Terence, in his Prologue to the Phormio, acknowledges his exertions on the third representation of the Hecyra. The comedy, however, never was a favourite. It was acted quinto loco, fifth on the list, and Volcatius Sedigitus (Gell. xv. 24) pronounces it the worst of the author's plays. The plot, which is single, and which Hurd (Dial. ii.) somewhat magisterially calls "the true Greek plot," was too simple for Roman taste, and the long narrations and general paucity of action in this comedy will alone account for its bad reception. "Tous les genres," says Voltaire, "sont bons, hors le genre ennuyeux." The Hecyra has never been modernised.

3. Heauton-timoroumenos, "the Self-Tormentor," was performed at the Megalesian Games, B. C. 163. It was borrowed from Menander, and, like the Hecyra, belongs to the Comédie larmoyante. (Comp. Spectator, No. 502.) Its plot is twofold, and the parts are not better connected than the two stories in Vanbrugh's and Cibber's Provoked Husband. From the Prologue it appears that the critics had opened a new battery on Terence; they charged him with being a late learner of his art, and hinted what they afterwards expressed openly (comp. Prol. in Heaut. with Prol. in Adelph.) that his friends helped him in composition. He retorts upon them the grossness and impropriety of their scenes. Ambivius again pleaded the author's cause, and complained of the spectator's preference for such parts as exhausted the actor — the servus currens, the boisterous old man, and the parasite. The observation or neglect of the unities in the Heauton-timoroumenos was the subject of a fierce controversy among the French critics between 1640 and 1655. The principal combatants were Ménage and Hédelin (l'Abbé d'Aubignac); and Madam Dacier acted as moderator. Of the Terentian diction the Self-tormentor is the most perfect example, and the poet seems anxious to veil the anomalies of his plot beneath the dignity of his apophthegms and the splendour of his language. The part of Menedemus, the self-tormentor, rises to almost tragic earnestness, and reminds the reader occasionally of Shakspeare's Timon. But as none of Terence's plays are so remote from modern manners, the Heauton-timoroumenos has not retained its ancient reputation. Chapman's All Fools, printed in 1605, owes a portion of its plot to the Self-tormentor. (Collier, Annals of the Stage, iii. 95.) Colman (Terence, p. 160) notices the resemblance between Menedemus and Laërtes in the Odyssey (xv. 354, xvi. 139.) Some of the lines of Menander's Heauton-timoroumenos are preserved. (Meinek. Hist. Graec. Com.)

4. Eunuchus, "the Eunuch," was at the time the most popular of Terence's comedies. It was played at the Megalesian Games, B. C. 162, and so highly applauded that it was repeated at the same festival, and the poet received from the aediles the unusual sum of 8000 sesterces, a fact so memorable as to be recorded in the Didascalia. It is an adaptation of Menander's Εὐνοῦχος, but Thraso and Gnatho, the swaggering captain and the parasite, are taken from that author's Κόλαξ, "the Flatterer." There was also a "Colax" by Naevius, which Terence's enemies accused him of appropriating, but which he denies having ever seen. Lavinius (Prol. in Eunuch.) managed to get sight of the Eunuch before it was acted, and told the aediles they had bought stolen goods. Terence replied, that if stock-characters — currentes servos, bonas matronas, meretrices malas, parasitum edacem, gloriosum militem — were to be prohibited, there was an end of play-writing. He bids his censor mind the blunders in his own "Thesaurus," and remember that his Phasma was all Menander's, except the faults. As the manners of the Self-tormentor are obsolete, so the subject of the Eunuch is unsuitable to modern feelings, yet of all Terence's plays it is the most varied in action and the most vivacious in dialogue, and makes the received censure of his being deficient in vis comica scarcely intelligible.

Baif, a poet in the reign of Charles IX., translated the Eunuch into French verse. The modern imitations of it are Aretine's La Talanta, La-Fontaine's L'Eunuque, which is in fact a translation, retaining the names, scenes, and manners of the original; and Sir Charles Sedley's Bellamira 1687. It is also the source of Le Muet, by Bruyés and Palaprat, first acted in 1691.

5. Phormio, was performed in the same year with the preceding, at the Roman Games on the 1st of October. (Comp. Drakenborch. ad Liv. xlv. 1, 6.) This year (161) may therefore be regarded as the "annus mirabilis" of his reputation. It is borrowed from the Ἐπιδικαζόμενος, "Plaintiff" or "Heir at-Law" of Apollodorus, and is named "Phormio" from the parasite whose devices connect the double-plot. Phormio, however, is not a parasite of the Gnatho stamp, but an accommodating gentleman who reconciles all parties, somewhat after the fashion of Mr. Harmony in Mrs. Inchbald's Every One has his Fault. It would seem from the Prologue, that Terence wearied out, if not convinced, by his censors iterating that his plays were "tenui oratione et scripturâ levi," attempted in the present a loftier style, and, as Donatius says, dealt with passions too earnest for mirth. It is therefore the more strange that this comedy should have suggested to Molière one of his most extravagant farces, Les Fourberies de Scapin. Molière, however, borrowed from other sources as well.

6. Adelphi, "the Brothers," was acted for the first time at the funeral games of L. Aemilius Paullus, B. C. 160. The Greek stage possessed no less than seven dramas with this title. (Meineke, Comic. Graec. Hist.) But Terence took the greater part of his plot from Menander's Ἀδελφοί. One scene, however (Prol.), was borrowed from the Συναποθνήσκοντες of Diphilus, which Plautus had already reproduced under the title of Commorientes. A full and lively analysis of this play, to the modern reader the most delightful of all Terence's comedies, is given by Mr. Dunlop (Hist. of Rom. Lit. I. pp. 302—317). In its Prologue the charge implied before (Prol. in Heautont.), is expressed of the poet's being not merely helped in composition by his friends, but that the plays themselves were really written by Scipio or Laelius. We have already examined the validity of this accusation. The Prologue shows that the hostility of the critics increased with the success of Terence.

The modern imitations of this comedy are very numerous. Baron copied it in his Ecole des Pères, and it furnished Molière with more than hints for his Ecole des Maris. It is the original of Fagan's La Pupile, and of Garrick's Farce of the Guardian. Diderot in his comédie larmoyante Le Père de Famille, in his characters of M. d'Orbesson and Le Commandeur had evidently Micio and Demea before him, and Shadwell's Squire of Alsatia is from the same source. Manlove and Nightshade in Cumberland's Choleric Man are repetitions of Micio and Demea, and Know'ell in Every Man in his Humour is Micio. Even so recently as 1826—7 the "Brothers of Terence" in its essential parts of contrast, was brought upon the English stage as the Rose-Feast.

The comedies of Terence have been translated into most of the languages of modern Europe, and in conjunction with Plautus were, on the revival of the drama, the models of the most refined, if not the most genial play-writers. In Italy the Terentian Comedy was opposed in the 15th and 16th centuries to the Commédie dell' Arte, and Ariosto, Aretine, Lodovico Dolce, and Battista Porta drew deeply from "this well of" Latin "undefiled." The Pedante was substituted for the Currens Servus, but the swaggering captain and the parasite were retained with little alteration. In Spain Pedro Simon de Abril, about the middle of the 16th century, published a complete translation of Terence, which is still much esteemed. (Bouterwek, Spanish Lit. p. 198, Eng. trans. Bogue.) The English versions of Bernard, Hoole, and Echard (see Tytler's Essay on the Principles of Translat. p. 244,&c.) have been long superseded by that of Colman, one of the most faithful and spirited translations of an ancient writer. Besides Baif's Eunuchus Menage mentions a very old French version of the whole of Terence, partly in prose; but the most accurate and useful of the French translations is the prose version by the Daciers. Politian was the first to divide the scenes into metrical lines, but Erasmus greatly improved upon his arrangement.

The Didascalia preserve the names of the principal actors of Terence's plays, when originally produced. They were Ambivius Turpio, L. Atilius Praenestinus, and Minutius Prothimus; and Flaccus, son of Claudius, furnished the musical accompaniments to all six comedies. The Periochae or summaries in Iambic verse of the plot of each comedy were drawn up by C. Sulpicius Apollinaris.

In closing this summary of Terence's comedies, we may remark that Terence added no new characters to the repertoire of the Attic drama (comp. Prol. in Heautont. with Hor. A. P. 114), and that, even in Horace's time, in spite of the passion for spectacle and melodrama, his plays attracted crowded audiences, and were as familiarly known to the Roman populace, as the stanzas of Tasso's "Gierusalemme" to the Venetian gondoliers. (Hor. Ep. ii. 1. 60.)

An account of the principal ancient commentators on Terence will be found under the names Calliopius, Donatus, Eugraphius, and Evanthius. The earliest treatise on the Terentian metres is that of Rufinus of Antioch. Bentley, in his edition of the poet (Cambridge, 1726, 4to.), was the first to arrange them on a scientific principle: since that time no material improvement has been made either in the text or the metrical system of these comedies. For an account of Bentley's edition, see his Life by Monk (ii. pp. 225—231, 8vo. ed). Mr. Hallam (Mid. Ages, ii. p. 342, 8th ed.) has some very ingenious and instructive remarks on the versification of Terence, and there is a satisfactory article on the same subject in the Penny Cyclopaedia (Terentian Metres). A selection of Prolegomena to Terence is prefixed to the edition of Terence by Mr. Giles, London, 8vo. 1837.

The ancient critics on Terence were very numerous. We cite the principal of them chronologically before offering any remarks of our own.

Nearest in time, Afranius wrote in his Compitalia that Terence was sui generis, really incomparable,

"Terenti non similem dices quempiam."

Varro (Parmenio, Nonius, s. v. Poscere) says he was surpassing in the portraiture of character, "in ethesin Terentius poscit palmam." Cicero (Opt. Gen. Or. 1. § 3) said that he differed from his brother-artists in genere, "unum vero est genus perfecti, a quo qui absunt, genere differunt, ut ab Attio Terentius," and in a fragment of his Limo, probably a critical miscellany in verse, commends him as the interpreter of Menander,

"Quicquid come loquens, ac omnia dulcia dicens."

Volcatius Sedigitus (de Poet. Com. ap. Gell. xv. 24) assigns Terence only the sixth place among the Roman comic poets, an opinion deeply resented by many modern scholars. (Rutger's Var. Lect. iv. 19; Francis. Asulanus, Ep. &c.) Horace awards him the palm of art (Ep. ii. 1. 59, "vincere Caecilius gravitate, Terentius arte"), and Ovid distinguishes his festive humour (Trist. ii. 357),

"Nec liber est judicium animi; sed honesta voluntas,
Plurima mulcendis auribus apta refert.
Accius esset atrox, conviva Terentius esset."

Quintilian (x. 1) depreciates Roman comedy generally, "in comoedia maxime claudicamus," and thinks that Terence erred in not adhering to the Senarian measure of his Greek originals; and Servius (ad Aen. i. 414) says "sciendum est Terentium, propter solam proprietatem, omnibus comicis esse praepositum; quibus est, quantum ad caetera spectat, inferior." We cite Caesar's famous epigram last, both on account of its author and of the verdict he delivers.

"Tu quoque tu in summis, O dimidiate Menander,
Poneris, et merito, puri sermonis amator,
Lenibus atque utinam scriptis adjuncta foret vis
Comica, ut aequato virtus polleret honore
Cum Graecis, neque in hac despectus parte jaceres.
Unum hoc maceror et doleo tibi deesse, Terenti."

The preceding extracts show the ancient critics unanimous in ascribing to Terence immaculate purity and elegance of language, and nearly so in denying him vis comica. Their opinion is entitled to the more respect from their having had the entire Menander before them, and from its confirmation by modern censors from Erasmus to Colman. Yet we are not inclined to let their verdict pass unquestioned. In the first place, four of Terence's six plays are more or less comédies larmoyantes — sentimental comedies — in which vis comica is not a primary element. In the next, Terence is generally contrasted with Plautus, with whom he had so little in common that we might as justly compare Addison with Moliére. Granting to the elder poet the highest genius for exciting laughter, and the eloquence which Aelius Stilo ascribed to him (Varr. ap. Quinct. x. 1. § 99), and a natural force — "virtus" — which his rival wanted, there will remain to Terence greater consistency of plot and character, closer observation of generic and individual distinctions, deeper pathos, subtler wit, more skill and variety in metre, and in rhythm, and a wider command of the middle region between sport and earnest. It may be objected that Terence's superiority in these points arises from his copying his Greek originals more servilely. But no servile copy is an animated copy, and we have corresponding fragments enough of Menander to prove that Terence retouched and sometimes improved his model. (Zimmerman, Terenz. u. Menand. 1842.) He cannot, indeed, be ranked with the dramatic poets who exert a deep or permanent influence on the passions of men or the art of representation — with Sophocles and Aristophanes, with Shakspere or Lope de Vega, with Moliére or Schiller. But we incline to class him with Massinger, Racine, and Alfieri — writers in whom the form is more perfectly elaborated than the matter is genially conceived. Nor in summing up his merits should we omit the praise which has been universally accorded him — that, although a foreigner and a freedman, he divides with Cicero and Caesar the palm of pure Latinity.

The principal editions of Terence are, "princeps," Mediol. 1470, fol.; Mureti, 1555, 1558, 8vo. frequently reprinted; Faerni, Florent. 1565, 8vo.; Lindenbrogii, Paris, 1602, 4to., Francofurt, 1623; Parei et Riccii. Neap. Nemet. 1619, 2 vols. 4to.; Bentleii, an epoch in Terentian text and metres, Cantab. 1726, 4to., Amstel. 1727, 4to., Lips. 1791, 8vo.; Westerhovii. Hagae Com. 1727, 2 vols. 4to.; Stallbaum, Lips. 1830, 8vo. and Zeune, I. K. 1774, which contains nearly every thing good in its predecessors, and ample prolegomena. There are also numerous editions of single plays.

The principal Codices of Terence are, the Vatican Bembinus, written about the fifth century, A.D., and the Cambridge. A second Vatican Codex dates from the ninth century, A.D., and contains drawings of the masks worn by the actors. (Boëttig. Spec. ed. Terent. Lips. 1795.) TERES (Τήρης). 1. King of the Odrysae and father of SITALCES, was the founder of the great Odryssian monarchy A daughter of his married Ariapeithes, king of the Scythians. (Herod. iv. 80, vii. 137; Thuc. ii. 29; Xen. Anab. vii. 2. § 22, 5. § 1.)

2. King of a portion of Thrace in the time of Philip of Macedon, with whom he was at first allied against the Athenians. Afterwards, however, he joined Cersobleptes in hostilities to Philip, and, together with his confederate, was subdued by the Macedonian king early in B. C. 342. (Phil. Ep. ad Ath. ap. Demost. p. 161; comp. Diod. xvi. 71.) [CERSOBLEPTES.] [E. E.]

TEREUS (Τηρεύς), a son of Ares, a king of the Thracians, in Daulis, afterwards Phocis. (Apollod. iii. 14. § 8; Thucyd. ii. 29.) Some traditions place Tereus at Pegae, in Megaris. (Paus. i. 41. § 8.) Pandion, king of Attica, who by his wife Zeuxippe had two daughters, Philomela and Procne, and twin sons, Erechtheus and Butes, called in the assistance of Tereus against some enemy, and gave him his daughter Procne in marriage. Tereus became by her the father of Itys, and then concealed her somewhere in the country, that he might thus be enabled to marry her sister Philomela whom he deceived by saying that Procne was dead. At the same time he deprived Philomela of her tongue. Ovid (Met. vi. 565) reverses the story by stating that Tereus told Procne that her sister Philomela was dead. Philomela, however, soon learned the truth, and made it known by a few words which she wove into a peplus. Procne then came to Philomela and killed her own son Itys. Tereus, who had been cautioned by an oracle against such an occurrence, suspected his own brother Dryas and killed him. (Hygin. Fab. 45.) Procne took further vengeance by placing the flesh of her own child in a dish before Tereus, and then fled with her sister. Tereus pursued them with an axe, and when the sisters were overtaken they prayed to the gods to change them into birds. Procne, accordingly, became a nightingale, Philomela a swallow, and Tereus a hoopop. (Tzetz. Chil. vii. 142, 459; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1875; Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. vi. 78; Ov. Met. vi. 424—675.) According to some, Procne became a swallow, Philomela a nightingale, and Tereus a hawk. (Hygin. Fab. 45.) According to the Megarian tradition, Tereus, being unable to overtake the women, killed himself. The Megarians showed the tomb of Tereus in their own country, and an annual sacrifice was offered to him. Procne and Philomela, moreover, were there believed to have escaped to Attica, and to have wept themselves to death. (Paus. i. 41. § 8.) [L. S.]

TERILLUS (Τήριλλος), son of Crinippus, tyrant of Himera, in Sicily. We know nothing of the means by which he rose to power, or of the duration or events of his reign: it is only from subsequent circumstances that we learn that he had sought to fortify his power by giving his daughter Cydippe in marriage to Anaxilas, the ruler of Rhegium, while on the other hand he maintained relations of friendship and hospitality with the Carthaginian general Hamilcar. Hence, when he was expelled from Himera by Theron, tyrant of Agrigentum, he applied to the Carthaginians for assistance, and his son-in law Anaxilas not only supported his prayers, but gave his own children as hostages for his sincerity. The Carthaginians accordingly determined to undertake his restoration, or rather, under pretence of doing so, to extend their own power in Sicily, and the expulsion of Terillus thus became the real cause of their great expedition under Hamilcar, which terminated in the memorable battle of Himera, B. C. 480. (Herod. vii. 165.) Of the fate of Terillus himself after the defeat of his allies we know nothing. [E. H. B.]

TE'RMINUS, a Roman divinity presiding over boundaries and frontiers. His worship is said to have been instituted by Numa who ordered that every one should mark the boundaries of his landed property by stones to be consecrated to Jupiter (Ζεὺς ὅριος), and at which every year sacrifices were to be offered at the festival of the Terminalia. (Dionys. ii. 9, 74.) These sacred boundaries existed not only in regard to private property, but also in regard to the state itself, the boundary of which was not to be trangressed by any foreign foe. But in later times the latter must have fallen into oblivion, while the termini of private property retained their sacred character even in the days of Dionysius, who states that sacrifices of cakes, meal, and fruit (for it was unlawful to stain the boundary stones with blood), still continued to be offered. The god Terminus himself appears to have been no other than Jupiter himself, in the capacity of the protector of boundaries. (Ov. Fast. ii. 639, &c.; Lactant. i. 20, 37.) The Terminus of the Roman state originally stood between the fifth and sixth milestone on the road towards Laurentum, near a place called Festi, and that ancient boundary of the ager Romanus continued to be revered with the same ceremonies as the boundaries of private estates. (Ov. Fast. l. c.; Strab. v. p. 230.) Another public Terminus stood in the temple of Jupiter in the Capitol, and above it there was an opening in the roof, because no Terminus was allowed to be under cover. (Fest. p. 368, ed. Müller.) This is another proof that Terminus was only an attribute of Jupiter, although tradition gave a different reason for this circumstance; for when that temple was to be founded, and it was necessary to exaugurate other sanctuaries standing on the same site, all the gods readily gave way to Jupiter and Juno, but the auguries would not allow the sanctuaries of Terminus and Juventas to be removed. This was taken as an omen that the Roman state would remain ever undiminished and young, and the chapels of the two divinities were inclosed within the walls of the new temple. (Serv. ad Aen. ii. 575, ix. 448; Ov. Fast. ii. 671.) Here we may ask, what had a Terminus to do on the Capitol, unless he was connected or identical with Jupiter? (Comp. Liv. i. 55, v. 54, xliii. 13, xlv. 44; Polyb. iii. 25; Hartung, Die Relig. der Röm. ii. p. 50, &c.) [L. S.]

TERPANDER (Τέρπανδρος), of Lesbos, was the father of Greek music, and through it of lyric poetry, although his own poetical compositions were few and in extremely simple rhythms.

Müller, whose account of Terpander is so excellent, that it is necessary to follow him to a great extent, has justly remarked that, setting aside the mythological traditions about early minstrels, such as Orpheus, Philammon, Chrysothemis, and others, the history of Greek music begins with Terpander. But Müller, and other scholars, have pointed out the fact, that Terpander may be connected with one of the most interesting and important of those traditions. The beautiful fable, which told how the head and lyre of Orpheus, cast upon the waves by the Thracian Maenads, were borne to Lesbos, and there received with religious honours, was doubtless an allegory, signifying the transference of the art of music to that island from Pieria, which the ancients afterwards confounded with Thrace; a transference which is confirmed by the undoubted tradition, that Lesbos was colonised by the Aeolians of Boeotia, who were of the same race as the Pierians, and who had among them one of the earliest seats of the worship of the Muses, upon Mount Helicon. [ORPHEUS.] Now the very town in Lesbos, at which the grave of Orpheus was shown, and where the nightingales were said to sing most sweetly, Antissa, was the birthplace of Terpander. The presumption that he belonged to one of those families in which, according to the Greek custom, the art was handed down from father to son, is strengthened by the significancy of his name; and this significant name, again, finds numerous parallels in the early history of other arts as well as music [CHEIRISOPHUS, EUCHEIRUS, EUGRAMMUS]. It is not unreasonable to suppose, further, that the race of musicians, from which Terpander was descended, preserved traditions and rules which they had originally derived from the Pierian bards. The tradition which made him a decendant of Hesiod (Suid. s. v.) furnishes incidentally a certain degree of confirmation of these views. What Terpander himself effected for the art is thus described by Müller: — "Terpander appears to have been properly the founder of Greek music. He first reduced to rule the different modes of singing which prevailed in different countries, and formed, out of these rude strains, a connected system, from which the Greek music never departed throughout all the improvements and refinements of later ages. Though endowed with an inventive mind, and the commencer of a new era of music, he attempted no more than to systematise the musical styles which existed in the tunes of Greece and Asia Minor." (Hist. of the Lit. of Anc. Greece, vol. i. p. 149.)

His father's name is said to have been Derdeneus (Marm. Par. Ep. 34), while another account made him the son of Boeus, the son of Phoceus, the son of Homer. (Suid. s. v.) There can be no doubt that he was a Lesbian, and that Antissa was his native town. (Pind. ap. Ath. xiv. p. 635, d.; Marm. Par. l. c.; Plut. de Mus. 30, p. 1141, c.; Clem. Alex. Strom. vol. i. p. 309; Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἄντισσα; Suid. s. vv. Τέρπανδρος, Μετὰ Λέσβιον ᾠδόν.) The other accounts, preserved by Suidas (s. v.), which made him a native either of Arne in Boeotia, or of Cyme in Aeolis, are easily explained, and are connected with what has been already said in an interesting manner. Both Arne and Cyme were among the Aeolian cities which were said to have sent colonies to Lesbos, and both might therefore have claimed to reckon Terpander among their citizens, on the general principle by which the natives of Grecian colonies were regarded as citizens of the parent state; and, besides this, the tradition connecting him with Arne, one of the oldest cities of Boeotia, is another indication of his descent from the Pierians, while the claim of Cyme is probably connected with the traditions which derived his genealogy from Homer or from Hesiod. (See Plehn, Lesbiaca, pp. 140—142.) The statement of Diodorus (vi. 28, ap. Tzetz. Chil. i. 16) that he was a native of Methymna, must be regarded as simply a mistake.

The age at which Terpander flourished is generally considered one of the best ascertained dates of that remote period of chronology; although the still more important question of his relation, in point of time, to the other early musicians, Olympus and Clonas, and to the earliest iambic and elegiac poets, Archilochus and Callinus, and the lyric poets Tyrtaeus and Alcman, is allowed to present very great difficulties. As to the first point, C. O. Müller says that "it is one of the most certain dates of the more* ancient chronology, that in the 26th Olympiad (B. C. 676) musical contests were first introduced at the feast of Apollo Carneius [at Sparta], and at their first celebration Terpander was crowned victor." (Hist. Lit. Anc. Greece, vol. i. p. 150, vol. i. p. 268 of the German; comp. Dor. b. iv. c. 6. § 1; and Mr. Grote echoes the statement, that "this is one of the best ascertained points among the obscure chronology of the seventh century" (Hist. of Greece, vol. iv. p. 102); and in the two great chronological works of Clinton and Fischer (s. a. 676), the date is laid down as certain.) The ancient authorities for this statement are Hellanicus (Athen. xiv. p. 635, f., Fr. 122, ed. Car. Müller, Frag. Hist. vol. i. p. 627, in Didot's Bibliotheca), and Sosibius the Lacedaemonian (Ath. l. c., Fr. 3, ed. Müller, ibid. vol. ii. p. 625); of whom the former gives us only the fact, that Terpander was the first victor at the Carneia, without the date; and the latter gives us only the date of the institution of the Carneia, without mentioning the victory of Terpander: the combination of the two statements, on which the force of the chronological argument rests, is made by Athenaeus, whose only object, however, in making it is to prove that Terpander was older than Anacreon; and who, in the very same sentence, quotes the statement of Hieronymus (de Poetis), that Terpander was contemporary with Lycurgus. Mr. Grote says (p. 103, note), "That Terpander was victor at the Spartan festival of the Karneia, in 676, B. C., may well have been derived by Hellanikus from the Spartan registers;" and a similar meaning has been put upon the phrase used by Athenaeus, ὡς Ἑλλάνικος ἱστορεῖ, ἔν τε τοῖς ἐμμέτροις Καρνεονίκαις, κἂν τοῖς καταλογάδην: but, granting this supposition its full force, Hellanicus does not say that Terpander was victor "in 676, B. C.;" but he does give us, in another fragment, a date irreconcileable with this, namely, that Terpander flourished in the time of Midas. (Clem. Alex. Strom. vol. i. p. 398, Potter; Fr. 123, ed. Müller. l. c.) The date 676, B. C., for the institution of the Carneia, therefore, rests alone on the testimony of Sosibius, for it can hardly be doubted that the same date, as given by Africanus (Euseb. Chron. pars i. Ol. 26. p. 144, ed. Mai, vol. i. p. 285, ed. Aucher) was copied from the χρόνων ἀναγραφή of Sosibius. Still Sosibius alone would undoubtedly be a very high authority; but, in addition to the caution which is required in dealing with indirect evidence, and in addition to the testimonies which assign a different date to Terpander, it may be questioned whether the date of Sosibius for the institution of the Carneia is to be understood literally, or whether it was not derived from some other epoch by a computation which, on a different chronological system, would have given a different result. There can be little doubt that the records of Sparta, which Sosibius "may well have" followed were kept, not by Olympiads, but by the reigns of the kings, and that, in turning the dates of those early kings into Olympiads, Sosibius computed from the date which he assumed for the Trojan War, namely B. C. 1180; and that, if he had taken a different date for the Trojan War, e. g. that of B. C. 1217, he would, by the same computation, have placed the institution of the Carneia at Ol. 16, a date which would agree well enough with that really given by Hellanicus. (See Car. Müller, Frag. Hist. vol. ii. p. 626.) On the whole, then, it seems probable that the date of B. C. 676 is not quite so certain as it has been represented.

With respect to the other testimonies, that of Hellanicus, already referred to, is rendered somewhat indefinite by the, at least partly, mythological character of Midas; but, if the date has any historical value at all, it would place Terpander at least as high as Ol. 20, B. C. 700, the date of the death of Midas, according to Eusebius, confirmed by Herodotus (i. 14), who makes Midas a little older than Gyges. To the same effect is the testimony of the Lydian historian Xanthus, who lived before Hellanicus, and who placed Terpander at Ol. 18, B. C. 708 (Clem. Alex. Strom. vol. i. p. 398, Potter). Glaucus of Rhegium also, who lived not long after Hellanicus, stated that Terpander was older than Archilochus, and that he came next after those who first composed aulodic music, meaning perhaps Olympus and Clonas; and Plutarch, who quotes this statement (de Mus. iv. p. 1132, e.) introduces it with the remark, καὶ τοῖς χρόνοις δὲ σφόδρα παλαιός ἐστι, and presently afterwards (5, p. 1133, a) he adds, as a general historical tradition (παραδίδοται) that Archilochus flourished after Terpander and Clonas. Mr. Grote accepts these testimonies; but draws from them the inference, that Archilochus should be placed lower than he usually is, about B. C. 670 instead of 700. The statement of Hieronymus (Ath. l. c.) that Terpander was contemporary with Lycurgus, is perhaps only another form of the tradition that the laws of Lycurgus were aided by the music and poetry of Terpander and Tyrtaeus, which has evidently no chronological significance. On the other hand, Phanias made Terpander later than Archilochus (Clem. Alex. l. c.), and the chronologers place his musical reform at Ol. 33, 2, B. C. 647 (Euseb.) or Ol. 34. 1, B. C. 644. (Marm. Par. Ep. 34). Lastly, we are told that Terpander was victorious in the musical contest at four successive Pythian festivals; but there is abundance of evidence to prove that these Pythian musical contests were not those established by the Amphictyons in Ol. 48. 3, but some which had existed long before, and which were celebrated, according to Müller, every eight years, a circumstance which throws doubt on the number of Terpander's victories. (See Müller, Dor. b. iv. c. 6. § 2; Grote, Hist. of Greece. vol. iv. p. 103, note). These discrepancies will show the great uncertainty attending the chronology of so early a period, and the danger of resting even upon an apparently definite date; although in the present case, the general comparison of the testimonies makes it far from improbable that the date first assigned is about the right one. All that can be said, with any approach to certainty, is that Terpander flourished somewhere between B. C. 700 and 650, and that his career may possibly have extended either a little above the higher, or, less probably, a little below the lower, of those dates.

Fortunately, we have clearer information respecting the scene and the nature of his artistic labours. From motives which were variously stated by tradition, he removed from Lesbos to Sparta, and there introduced his new system of music, and established the first musical school or system (κατάστασις) that existed in Greece. (Plut. de Mus. 9, p. 1134, c.: the other authorities respecting the migration of Terpander, the powerful effect of his music on the Spartans, and the honour in which they held him, during his life and after his death, are collected by Plehn, Lesbiaca, p. 147.)

In order to explain fully the musical improvements introduced by Terpander, it would be necessary to enter into the subject of Greek music at greater length than is consistent with the limits of this article, or the plan of the work. A full account of the subject will be found in the Dictionary of Antiquities, art. Musica, in Müller's History of the Literature of Ancient Greece, c. 12, and in Böckh (de Metr. Pind. iii. 7). It will be enough here to state that Terpander enlarged the compass of the lyre from a tetrachord to an octave; but in a peculiar manner. The old lyre had four strings, which were so tuned that the extreme notes had to one another the relation called by the Greeks διὰ τεσσάρων, the fourth, and the two intermediate notes were such, according to the most ancient genus of music, namely, the diatonic, and the prevailing mode, the Dorian, that the intervals were (ascending) semitone, tone, tone, that is: —

To this tetrachord Terpander added another, the lowest note of which was one tone above the highest of the other, and the intervals of which the same as those of the former, that is: —

But, in combining these two tetrachords, he omitted the third string, reckoning from the highest, so that the intervals (ascending) were ½, 1, 1, 1, 1½, 1*, that is: —

* In Müller, two of these figures are transposed, p. 152, n. He gives the intervals (descending) 1, 1, 1½, 1, 1, ½; they should be 1, 1½, 1, 1, 1, ½. Also in the text, l. 4, the deficient string is said to have been in the lower tetrachord; it should be the upper.

The interval between the extreme notes is an octave, or, as the Greeks called it, διὰ πασῶν. Plutarch (de Mus. 19) adduces arguments to prove that the omission of the third string was intentional; but whether the reason was, the opinion that it could well be dispensed with, or some theoretical preference for the number 7, we are not informed. It was afterwards restored, so that the lyre had eight strings. The following table (from Plehn) shows the names of the strings, and the intervals between them, in the descending order, for each lyre: —

Heptachord.		Octachord.
E νήτη		E νήτη
	1 tone.		1 tone.
D παρανήτη		D παρανήτη

The invention of the seven-stringed lyre, or heptachord, is not only ascribed to Terpander by several ancient writers, but it is also referred to in two verses of his own still extant (Eucl. Introd. Harm. p. 19; Strab. xiii. p. 618): —

Σοὶ δ' ἡμεῖς τετράγηρυν ἀποστέρξαντες ἀοιδὰν
ἑπτατόνῳ φόρμιγγι νέους κελαδήσομεν ὕμνους.

It remained in use even as late as the time of Pindar (Pyth. ii. 70, Nem. v. 22). The invention of the barbiton or magadis, an instrument of greater compass than an octave, is ascribed to Terpander by Pindar, but probably erroneously (Pind. ap. Ath. xiv. p. 635, d.; Plehn, Lesb. p. 153). It is impossible here to enter on the question whether the lyre of Terpander could be adapted, by tuning its strings differently, to the different modes and genera of Greek music; and whether his own compositions were in any other mode than the Dorian. (See Dict. of Ant. art. Musica.)

While Terpander thus enlarged the compass of the lyre, he appears to have been the first who regularly set poetry to music. (Clem. Alex. Strom. vol. i. p. 364, b.) Plutarch (de Mus. 3) tells us that he set his own verses and those of Homer to certain citharoedic nomes, and sang them in the musical contests; and that he was the first who gave names to the various citharoedic nomes. These nomes were simple tunes, from which others could be derived by slight variations; and these latter were called μέλη. That the nomes of Terpander were entirely of his own composition, is not very probable, and indeed there is evidence to prove that some of them were derived from old tunes, ascribed to the ancient bards, and others from national melodies. Neither were they all adapted to the rhythm of the heroic hexameter; for among them we find mention made of Trochaic nomes and of Orthian nomes, which consisted in a great extension of certain feet; and there is still extant a fragment of Terpander, which affords a good specimen of those Spondaic hymns which were sung at festivals of peculiar solemnity, and the music of which would of course be in keeping with the gravity of the rhythm and of the meaning (Clem. Alex. Strom. vi. p. 784):

Ζεῦ, πάντων ἀρχά, πάντων ἁγήτωρ,
Ζεῦ, σοὶ πέμπω ταύταν ὕμνων ἀρχάν.

The question, whether any of Terpander's nomes were aulodic, cannot be decided with absolute certainty. Nearly all that we know of him is any connection with citharoedic music; and the arguments adduced to prove that he also used the flute are by no means conclusive; while, on the other hand, the improvement of that species of music is expressly ascribed to other composers, as Olympus and Clonas, who stand in much the same relation to aulodic music as Terpander does to that of the lyre. It is also uncertain whether his nomes were embodied in any written system of musical notation, or whether they were handed down by tradition in the school which he founded. Be this as it may, they remained for a very long period the standard melodies used at religious festivals, and the school of Terpander flourished for many generations at Sparta, and in Lesbos, and throughout Greece. At the festival of the Carneia, where Terpander had been the first to obtain a victory, the prize for lyric music was gained in regular succession by members of his school down to PERICLEITUS, about B. C. 550. Respecting the improvements in citharoedic music after the time of Terpander, see THALETAS.

The remains of Terpander's poetry, which no doubt consisted entirely of religious hymns, are comprised in the two fragments already quoted, and in two others, the one of one hexameter verse (Schol. Arist. Nub. 591), and the other of one and a half (Plut. Lyc. 21), and one reference. (Böckh, Plehn, and Müller, as above quoted; Ulrici, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichtk. vol. ii. pp. 341, foll.; Bode, vol. ii. passim; Bergk, Poet. Lyr. Graec. pp. 537, 538.) [P. S.]

TERPNUS, was the most celebrated citharoedus of his time, and taught Nero to play and sing to the cithara. The master was wise enough to let his imperial pupil conquer him in the Grecian games. Terpnus continued to enjoy a great reputation under Vespasian. (Suet. Ner. 20; Dion Cass. lxiii. 8; Suet. Vesp. 19; Philostr. Vit. Apollon. v. 7.)

TERPSICLES (Τερψικλῆς), wrote a work, Περὶ Ἀφροδισίων. (Athen. vii. p. 325, d. ix. p. 391, e. f.)

TERPSION (Τερψίων), a Megarian, mentioned by Suidas (s. v. Σωκράτης) as one of the disciples of Socrates. Plutarch also refers to him (de Gen.

Socr. p. 581, a.). It is doubtless this Terpsion who is introduced by Plato as one of the interlocutors in the Theaetetus.

Another person of this name is mentioned by Athenaeus (viii. p. 337) as the first author of a γαστρολογία, giving direction as to the viands from which it was advisable to abstain. A notable impromptu verse of his is recorded: Ἢ χρὴ χελώνης ἢ φαγεῖν ἢ μὴ φαγεῖν, which actually attained to the distinction of a various reading even in antiquity. [C. P. M.]

TERTULLIA'NUS, whose name appears in the best MSS. under the form Q. Septimius Florens Tertullianus, is the most ancient of the Latin fathers now extant. Notwithstanding the celebrity which he has always enjoyed, our knowledge of his personal history is extremely limited, and is derived almost exclusively from a succinct notice by St. Jerome.

From this we learn that Tertullian was a native of Carthage, the son of a proconsular centurion (an officer who appears to have acted as a sort of aide-de-camp to provincial governors); that he flourished chiefly during the reigns of Septimius Severus and of Caracalla; that he became a presbyter, and remained orthodox until he had reached the term of middle life, when, in consequence of the envy and ill-treatment which he experienced on the part of the Roman clergy, he went over to the Montanists, and wrote several books in defence of those heretics; that he lived to a great age, and was the author of many works.

Various editors and historians of ecclesiastical literature have endeavoured to extend or illustrate the scanty information conveyed in the above sketch.

1. Since the elevation of Septimius Severus took place in A. D. 193, and since Caracalla was slain in A. D. 217, if we suppose that Tertullian attained to the age of eighty, his birth would fall somewhere about A. D. 160, and his death about A. D. 240. Allix places his birth about 145 or 150, and his death about A. D. 220; but the period thus embraced would scarcely be sufficient to justify the statement of his biographer that he was believed to have attained to extreme old age (usque ad decrepitam aetatem vixisse fertur).

2. It has been inferred from certain expressions which occur in different treatises by Tertullian. that he was not born and educated in the true faith. Making every allowance for the rhetorical style to which he is so much addicted, the words in question seem upon the whole to warrant this interpretation, but nothing can be ascertained with regard to the time or the circumstances of his conversion. (Apolog. 18, de Poenit. 1, de Spectac. 19, de Resurrect. Carn. 59, de Fuga in Persec. 6, adv. Marc. iii. 21.)

3. There can be no doubt that he was married, for we find among his tracts an address to his wife, in two books, and it seems probable, from their tenor, that she was considerably younger than himself.

4. Some members of the Roman Church, disturbed by the example of a wedded priest, have maintained that he never was a presbyter, and appeal to two passages in which he certainly assumes the character of a layman (de Monog. 12, de Exhort. Cast. 7). But we are here again embarrassed by the abrupt transitions and bold personifications so common in this author, and it has been urged, with considerable force, that in the passages referred to he is led naturally, by the course of his argument, to speak as if he actually belonged to that class whose position he describes. It is perfectly true, on the other hand, that we might read through the works of Tertullian without discovering that he had ever been ordained; but neither this negative presumption nor the uncertain conclusions drawn from phrases of doubtful import can outweigh the positive testimony of Jerome, who had ample means of ascertaining the fact which he records, and no conceivable motive for suppressing or perverting the truth.

5. It being admitted that he was a presbyter, another question arises as to the place where he exercised his functions, whether at Carthage or at Rome. Here we shall have much difficulty in forming a positive opinion. We should naturally conclude, in absence of all direct evidence to the contrary, that he remained in his native country, and we know that writers who flourished towards the close of the fourth century designate him as a Carthaginian presbyter (Optat. adv. Parmen. i.; Praedest. de Haeres. 26). On the other hand, it being certain that he visited Rome (de Cult. Femin. i. 7), his collision with the Roman clergy and the intimate knowledge which he frequently manifests with regard to the state of parties and the ecclesiastical proceedings in the metropolis, seem to indicate a lengthened residence and close personal observation. (Comp. Euseb. H. E. ii. 2.)

6. His defection from the Church, caused, according to Jerome, by the harsh and insulting conduct of the Roman clergy, has been ascribed by some persons in modern times to disappointed ambition. They suppose that he had fixed his desires upon the bishopric of Rome or of Carthage, and that upon seeing others preferred to himself he seceded in disgust. It is unnecessary to enter into any lengthened investigation of this subject, for the views thus propounded are purely hypothetical, receiving no support or countenance from any trustworthy authority.

The classification of the works of this father is attended with much difficulty. Some have proposed to arrange them in regular chronological succession, but this scheme has proved altogether abortive; for very few of his writings offer any indications upon which we can even attempt to found a calculation, and in one case only can we determine the date with certainty. Others have thought it expedient to distribute them, according to the nature of the topics discussed, into Dogmatical, Polemical, and Moral, but many of the subjects are treated in such a manner as to render it impossible to assign them to any one of these divisions exclusively, and, when we consider that the opinions entertained by the author underwent material changes as he advanced in life, it is manifest that any arrangement which does not, to a certain extent, trace the gradual development of these new views, must be imperfect and unsatisfactory. Hence, theologians have now for the most part agreed merely to separate those tracts which were composed while Tertullian was still a member of the Church, from those which were composed after he became a Montanist. But even this plan, simple as it may appear, cannot be completely executed, for the doctrines of Montanus were, upon many points, strictly orthodox, and it was only when speaking of himself and the nature of his own mission that he became subject to the charge of extravagance and heresy. Thus, after we have set aside a few pieces which are stamped with broad and well-defined marks of heterodoxy, we shall find a considerable number in which the characteristics are faint and doubtful, and many more in which they are altogether wanting. Still the attempt ought to be made; and accordingly we shall pursue the method followed by the Bishop of Lincoln, the best, perhaps, which the circumstances of the case permit us to adopt. We shall place together:— I. Works probably written while he was yet a member of the Church. II. Works certainly written after he became a Montanist. III. Works probably written after he became a Montanist. IV. Works respecting which nothing certain can be pronounced.

I. WORKS PROBABLY WRITTEN WHILE HE WAS YET A MEMBER OF THE CHURCH.—1. De Poenitentia. Chiefly remarkable because the author here advocates a doctrine which at a subsequent period, after he had embraced the errors of Montanus, he sternly impugned, namely, that those who committed heinous sins after baptism might, notwithstanding their guilt, obtain absolution from the Church, if sincerely penitent. In the first chapter, when defining penitence and pointing out the erroneous ideas entertained by the gentiles, he makes use of an expression which has been regarded as an avowal that he had at one time been a heathen, "Poenitentiam, hoc genus hominum, quod et ipsi retro fuimus, caeci sine Domini lumine, natura tenus norunt," &c. Erasmus, in consequence of the elegance by which the style of this tract is distinguished, was led to doubt whether it really belonged to Tertullian, but it is quoted as his by Pacianus, a writer of the fourth century, and is now generally received as genuine.

2. De Oratione. Consists of two parts:—a. An exposition of the Lord's Prayer, which is represented as containing an epitome of the whole Gospel. b. Instructions with respect to certain forms to be observed by Christians in their devotions. The latter portion terminates abruptly in the MSS., but some additional chapters were supplied by Muratori, by whom they were discovered in the Ambrosian library, and published in his Anecdota. These are rejected by some critics, but admitted by others, among whom we may specially mention Neander.

3. De Baptismo. A certain Quintilla had been propagating at Carthage the heresy that baptism was neither imperative nor beneficial. Tertullian, in confuting this error, takes occasion—a. To examine fully into the nature and efficacy of this sacrament. b. To discuss certain questions touching the time at which it ought to be administered and the forms to be observed. He calls his opponent a Cainite; and if we suppose that he uses the term literally, and not as a mere epithet of reproach, she must have belonged to that wild sect who looked up with peculiar reverence to Cain and those other characters in the Bible who had fallen under the heavy displeasure of the Almighty.

4. Ad Uxorem Libri II. Advice to his wife, with regard to her conduct in the event of his predeceasing her. In the first book he earnestly dissuades her from contracting a second marriage, maintaining that all such alliances are wrong in principle and inexpedient in practice. In the second, supposing that, notwithstanding his arguments to the contrary, she may feel inclined again to enter into wedlock, he urges upon her the necessity of uniting herself to a Christian and not to a heathen, pointing out that it was contrary to the express commands of God, and in itself impure, unnatural, and dangerous to form so close a connection with an alien from the faith.

5. Ad Martyres. An earnest exhortation to the brethren who were suffering persecution on account of their faith, to remain steadfast, in defiance of imprisonment, torture, or death itself, looking forward with eager anticipations to the glories and privileges reserved for those who won the crown of martyrdom.

6. De Patientia. A moral essay on the importance and utility of this virtue, conceived in a truly Christian spirit, and expressed, especially towards the conclusion, in very dignified and picturesque language.

7. Adversus Judaeos Liber. A public debate had been held between a Jewish proselyte and a Christian, each supporting the claims of the creed which he professed. The discussion having been carried on irregularly, and frequently interrupted by the clamours of the partizans on either side, Tertullian deemed this a fitting opportunity for presenting in a written form a succinct view of the real merits of the question. He undertakes to demonstrate two propositions—a. That the Mosaic dispensation had been abrogated by Christ. b. That the Jews themselves had long looked for the arrival of a Messiah, that the Messiah looked for by them had actually arrived, and that Christ was that Messiah. In support of the first he argues that since God had the power to enact, so he had the power to repeal the ritual law, and that it was consonant both with reason and revelation to believe that in the fulness of time he would substitute for it a code applicable, not to one particular people, but to the whole of mankind, thus fulfilling the promise made to our first parents and to Abraham. The second he proves by pointing out how exactly the character and career of Jesus corresponded with the predictions contained in the divinely inspired books of the Old Testament.

Neander has written a dissertation to prove that Tertullian broke off this work at the beginning of the ninth chapter, and that what follows is by a later hand, being taken, with some slight alterations, from the remarks upon the same text of Isaiah, in the third book against Marcion, remarks altogether inapplicable to the debate with the Jew. But the Bishop of Lincoln insists that the argument is with a few changes, strictly applicable, and that the necessary changes have actually been made.

8. De Praescriptione Hereticorum, i. e. on the rules to be observed by Catholics in dealing with heretics. The subject is introduced by pointing out that the existence of heresy ought not to prove a source of wonder or of scandal to the orthodox, inasmuch as the appearance of false teachers had been predicted in the plainest terms by Christ himself, and since false doctrines might be regarded as valuable touchstones to test the purity of true belief. It is then laid down that all disputes or doubts on matters of faith or practice must be decided or solved by the judgment of some one of the churches planted by the Apostles. Thus those who dwelt in Southern Greece might, when difficulties arose, repair to Corinth, those in Macedonia to Philippi or Thessalonica, those in Asia to Ephesus, those in Italy to Rome. And here it is to be observed, that while Rome is represented as singularly happy in having enjoyed the instructions, and witnessed the martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul, and in having beheld the tortures inflicted or attempted to be inflicted on St. John the Evangelist, it is neither asserted nor implied that she possessed superior privileges or authority. There is some curious logic in the sections where the orthodox are forbidden to appeal to Scripture not merely in their controversies with the Gnostics, who were charged with mutilating and interpolating the sacred volume in order to force it into conformity with their own tenets, but in their discussions with all heretics whatsoever. Heretics, it is argued (see cc. 37, 38), have no right to make use of the Scriptures, because they are not Christians, and the Scriptures being the property of the Christians, none others can be permitted to employ them. It follows from this that heretics can be proved to be heretics without reference to the Bible at all, in other words that the authority of the Church must be held as superseding all private judgment, and that whomsoever she pronounces unsound must be held as such, without question or inquiry. No provision however is made for settling any difference which might arise between two Churches, both of which were apostolic, and perhaps, indeed, such a contingency was regarded as impossible. The best MSS. give nothing beyond the end of the forty-fifth chapter. What follows is either altogether wanting, or appears as a separate piece, and is generally regarded as the production of a later hand.

II. Works certainly written after he became a Montanist. — 9. Adversus Marcionem Libri V. The leading tenet of the Pontic heretic was that there were two great principles or deifies, the one perfect, the other imperfect. The latter was the creator of the world, the God of the Jews, the author of the Mosaic dispensation. The former was the father of Christ, whose mission was to destroy the old law. Marcion also maintained that the visible bodily frame, and the passion of our Lord were illusory, that he never really assumed human flesh, and never really suffered on the cross. In the first book of this refutation Tertullian asserts the Unity of God, and proves that the hypothesis of two Gods is directly opposed to reason and to all Scripture; in the second, it is demonstrated that the God of the Jews is the one true God, the author of all good; in the third, that Christ is the son of the Creator of the world, that his coming was predicted in the Law and the Prophets, that he assumed real flesh, and became a man like unto ourselves; in the fourth and fifth, the contradictions between the Old and New Testaments brought forward in the "Antitheses" of Marcion are shown to be only apparent, while in fact the utmost harmony subsists between the different portions of the Bible. The propositions advanced in the fourth are supported chiefly by quotations from the Gospel of St. Luke, which Marcion is accused of having corrupted, but in the fifth book the Epistles of St. Paul are employed for the same purpose. We gather from internal evidence that the first book was written in the fifteenth year of Septimius Severus, that is, in A. D. 207, and that the author was at this time undoubtedly a Montanist. (See cc 15. 29.)

10. De Anima. An inquiry into the nature of the soul; its origin; its excellence; its powers; its immortality; the period at which it enters into combination with the body; its progressive developement; its susceptibility of sin; its condition after death; together with a dissertation on dreams and ecstasies which occupied a prominent position in the system of Montanus. This dissertation possesses peculiar interest from containing a statement and examination of the views entertained by the most distinguished heathen philosophers upon these topics, but some of the views propounded by Tertullian himself would seem to lead directly to materialism.

11. De Carne Christi. Marcion, Valentinian, and other heretics, denied that the body of Christ was composed of real human flesh and blood. Tertullian here demonstrates from reason and revelation the double nature of Jesus, who, without ceasing to be God, was a perfect man, born of woman, with limbs formed of flesh in a literal, not in a spiritual or ideal, sense. In order to establish more fully the humanity of the Messiah, it is maintained that the Mother of God ceased to be a virgin in giving birth to the Saviour, a doctrine most vehemently assailed by St. Jerome and the later fathers, and formally repudiated by the third canon of the Lateran Council, held under Pope Martin I. This piece was written after the De Praescriptione Hereticorum, which is referred to in chapter second, and after the fourth book against Marcion, which is referred to in chapter seven.

12. De Resurrectione Carnis. A confutation of the heresy which denied the resurrection of the body. A. The doctrine does not imply an impossibility, because God is omnipotent, and, having created all things out of nothing, he may either reproduce the flesh from nothing, supposing it to have utterly perished, or he may recall and reunite the scattered elements if they have entered into new combinations: B. The doctrine is not even improbable, if we take into account the high dignity of the flesh, which is established by the following considerations: a. It is the work of God. b. It was assumed by the Saviour. c. It is intimately connected with the soul, which cannot be saved until it has formed this connection. d. It is the medium or instrument through which salvation is communicated to the soul in the sacraments and other holy ordinances of the Church. C. The doctrine must be true, because it is most clearly enunciated in many texts of Scripture.

The tract concludes with various speculations as to the manner in which the resurrection will take place, the absence of mutilation, disease, and deformity in the body when raised, and similar topics.

13. Adversus Praxeam. Praxeas was a heretic who held that God the Father had been incarnate, had been born of the Virgin, and had been crucified — in other words, that God the Father and God the Son were identical. In addition, however, to these errors, Praxeas had excited the wrath of Tertullian by stirring up one of the bishops of Rome to persecute the Montanists, the prelate in question having been, we are here assured, previously disposed to regard with favour the views entertained by the members of that sect, and to recognise its founder as a prophet. Neander believes that the pope here alluded to was Eleutherus, — according to Allix it was Victor. In consequence of the close correspondence between this piece and the work of Hippolytus, Contra Noetum, Semler has, without success, called in question its authenticity. For an account of this work of Hippolytus, see Vol. II. p. 492, a.

14. Scorpiace. This is a Greek word (σκορπιακη) signifying an antidote against the poison of scorpions. The present piece is a defence of martyrdom, intended to neutralise the venom of the Gnostics and Cainites, who denied the necessity and efficacy of such sacrifices, and even accounted them sinful. It was evidently composed during a period of persecution, and later than the second book against Marcion. (See cc. 1, 4, 5; comp. Hieron. c. Vigilant. 3.)

15. De Corona Militis. On a great public festival chaplets (coronae) had been distributed to the troops. A soldier was seen carrying the one which he had received in his hand instead of having placed it on his head, and when his officer demanded the reason of this proceeding, he replied that he was a Christian. He was placed under arrest, and was awaiting in prison the punishment of his insubordination, when, in consequence of a question having arisen among the Christian community with regard to the propriety of the man's conduct, Tertullian composed this tract, in which he eloquently defends, and loudly commends, the deed, declaring that this conscientious believer would receive the glorious crown of a martyr in exchange for the impure crown which he had rejected. Neander imagines that the largess alluded to was bestowed upon the army after the victory of Severus over the Parthians, in which case we may assign this piece to A. D. 204.

16. De Virginibus velandis. It was the practice in Africa for married women only to wear veils, while maidens appeared in public uncovered. The latter custom is here denounced as contrary to nature, contrary to the will of God, and contrary to the discipline of the Church as observed in other places. The position thus assumed is supported by eight arguments, which are urged with a degree of vehemence and heat somewhat disproportionate to the importance of the subject. The essay is, however, very interesting to the student of Tertullian's life and opinions, since it contains a more clear exposition of his views with regard to the Paraclete than we find in any other portion of his writings.

17. De Fuga in Persecutione. The stern and uncompromising Montanus not only forbade his followers to flee from persecution, but encouraged them to defy the heathens, and brave their wrath by an open and ostentatious profession of their religion. The Catholics, on the other hand, did not consider it unbecoming, under certain circumstances, to dissemble their faith, or to purchase toleration, or, in cases of imminent danger, to seek for safety in flight. We are here presented with an eloquent exposition of the beauty and holiness which graced the one course, and of the renegade cowardice evinced by the other.

18. De Exhortatione Castitatis Liber. Three degrees of purity are here distinguished. The first and highest consists in absolute restraint during the whole period of life, the second in continence from the time of baptism, the third and lowest in refraining from contracting a second marriage.

19. De Monogamia. May be considered as a supplement to the foregoing. It is declared that second marriages are not only inexpedient, but absolutely sinful, and that the permission to marry at all can only be regarded in the light of a concession to human weakness. There can be no doubt that this essay was composed after Tertullian had embraced the extreme views of Montanus, and it has been thought possible to discover the exact time at which it was written, for we are told in the third chapter that 160 years had elapsed since St. Paul addressed his epistle to the Corinthians. But the precise date of that epistle itself is still open to controversy, and we may moreover conclude that in this, as in similar passages, Tertullian speaks in round numbers.

20. De Jejuniis. A defence of certain fasts and ascetic observances, the necessity of which was insisted on by the Montanists, and denied by the Catholics. In the first chapter we find a reference to the De Monogamia.

21. De Pudicitia. A controversy had arisen between the Montanists and the Catholics as to the powers possessed by the Church to admit to her communion, and grant absolution to those who, after baptism, had been guilty of a flagrant breach of chastity. The rigid followers of the Phrygian closed the gates of forgiveness against even the repentant sinner, the orthodox advocated the milder doctrine. Although Tertullian had formerly supported the latter, to a certain extent at least (see de Poenit. 7, comp. ad Martyr. 1), he here sternly supports the opinions of his new friends.

III. WORKS PROBABLY WRITTEN AFTER HE BECAME A MONTANIST. — 22. Adversus Valentinianos. An attack upon the fantastic mysticism and reveries of Valentinus and his disciples [VALENTINUS]. It has been remarked that there is a very close resemblance, amounting in some cases to an identity of thought, and even of expression, between this work and the first book of Irenaeus on the same subject.

23. Ad Scapulam A remonstrance addressed to Scapula, governor of Africa, who was bitterly assailing the Christians, urging upon his attention the injustice and danger of the course which he was pursuing — unjust, because the objects of his attacks were the most harmless and most loyal adherents of the emperor — dangerous, because God had already on many occasions manifested his wrath by punishing in this world those who persecuted his people. In the last section he particularly alludes to a portentous darkening of the sun, which took place during a public assembly at Utica, and this is by some commentators believed to have been the great eclipse of A. D. 210. The capture of Byzantium also is spoken of, which took place in A. D. 196.

24. De Spectaculis. Preparations on a great scale were in progress at Carthage for celebrating with all pomp certain public games. This tract is a solemn denunciation, addressed to all true believers, against taking any part in such exhibitions, which were invented by devils, and were calculated to awaken and cherish feelings and passions altogether inconsistent with the Christian profession. Neander supposes that this and the following piece were called forth by the rejoicings at the termination of the civil war by the death of Niger (A. D. 194) and of Albinus (A. D. 197). Others believe that the preparations referred to were for the Secular Games, which commemorated the completion of the eighth great century of Rome (A. D. 204). This diversity of opinion upon such a point is in itself sufficient to prove that the historical allusions are of a vague and general character.

25. De Idololatria. Composed for the purpose of warning Christians that not those only were guilty of idolatry who actually offered sacrifice to false gods, but all who contributed in any way, directly or indirectly, to the support and diffusion of the popular religion by fabricating images, by assisting in the construction and decoration of temples, by consulting soothsayers and astrologers, by being present at heathen solemnities or festivities. In conclusion, it is asserted that no true believer can lawfully accept any public office, nor even serve as a soldier in the armies of the state.

26. De Cultu Feminarum Libri II. On the folly and sin displayed by women in devoting much time and anxious care to the decoration of that body which they ought to be willing and eager to sacrifice, at any moment, in the service of Christ.

IV. Works concerning which nothing certain can be pronounced. — 27. Apologia. A formal defence of Christianity. Much difference of opinion has been expressed by the earlier ecclesiastical historians as to the time when and the place where this work was composed, as well as with regard to the persons to whom the appeal is made. It is now, however, generally admitted that it was written at Carthage, and that the "Praesides," "Imperii Romani Antistites" ("vobis...in aperto et in ipso vertice civitatis praesidentibus") addressed, must have been the chief magistrates of the African province. The precise epoch at which it was drawn up is still a question open to discussion. We find clearly indicated a period of persecution against the church, of intestine discord in the state, and of attacks upon the dominion of Rome by various barbarous tribes, especially the Parthians, a series of conditions all of which were fulfilled by events which occurred during the reign of Severus; but here, as elsewhere in Tertullian, the historical allusions are couched in such general and vague terms, that it is impossible to fix with confidence on any one known event.

The Christians at the close of the second century were compelled to maintain a perilous struggle both with the government and the populace. By the former their rapidly increasing numbers were viewed with jealous apprehension; for not only did the multitudes who professed the new faith openly avow their contempt and abhorrence of the gods reverenced by the constituted authorities, and refuse to participate in any of their rites, even in the sacrifices offered up for the safety of the emperors, but the close correspondence, union, and organization which existed among all the members of the different churches induced the rulers to suspect that religion was, in this case, merely a convenient cloak employed to hide the intrigues of a widely-spread political combination. By the more ignorant portion of the crowd, on the other hand, their bold repudiation of the popular creed was regarded as an open avowal of absolute atheism, and every species of vice and crime were unhesitatingly ascribed to a class of men who were believed to have cast off all the restraints imposed by a fear of Divine wrath. Even those who did not admit without question the extravagant rumours, fabricated by intolerance and folly, and who knew enough of the real state of the case to feel sensible that the broad accusation of total unbelief could not be supported, still looked upon the Christians as wild fanatics who paid homage to new, foul, unrecognised, and therefore unlawful deities, and who were in consequence amenable to those ancient laws which denounced punishment upon all who introduced foreign superstitions without the sanction of the senate. Hence, the mere fact that a man was notoriously a Christian, was held by many governors to be a cause sufficient to justify the imprisonment or even the death of the individual in the absence of all proof of any specific offence, while the occurrence of any public disaster was considered by the rabble as a demonstration of Divine displeasure, called forth by the blasphemies of the hated infidels, whose instant destruction they clamorously demanded. The object of Tertullian in this, the most elaborate of all his treatises, is to combat and repel these attacks, to point out how unfounded were the fears entertained with respect to the loyalty of the Christians, how false the charges of atheism and immorality, how unreasonable the prejudices of the vulgar. He begins by complaining of the unfairness with which they were treated in courts of justice, since they alone were condemned without a hearing, and without being impeached of any definite crime, the name which they bore being held as a sufficient evidence of guilt, while their enemies were so ignorant, that they frequently mistook the real name, and substituted an appellation altogether different. He then proceeds to demonstrate how utterly absurd were the tales in common circulation, that they practised infanticide, and were guilty of gross debauchery in their holy assemblies; he explains that, far from being atheists, they paid the most solemn adoration to the only true God, rejecting the worship of dead men and of evil spirits, retorting at the same time upon the Gentiles, with great force and effect, the reproaches of cruelty and impurity in celebrating sacred observances, and exposing many of the most prominent follies and abominations, which were mingled with the heathen ceremonies. He next calls attention to the circumstance that, far from being bad subjects, they were bound by their Scriptures to submit themselves to the temporal powers, and that in public and private they joined in fervent prayer for the emperor; that far from cherishing hatred against the human race, forgiveness of enemies was one of the leading principles of their moral code; that their meetings were all of a harmless and devout character occupied entirely with holy ordinances and spiritual communion; that far from being the cause of national misfortunes, it was notorious that the most terrible visitations had often been mitigated by their supplications; and, finally, that the greatest loss and danger would arise to the state should it persist in alienating by persecution such a numerous, inoffensive, virtuous, and well-disposed class of citizens. He concludes by replying to some assailants who were content to disparage Christianity by representing it as merely a new form of philosophy, whose doctrines were either borrowed from the speculations of others, or, when original, were less brilliant and impressive than those enforced by the older theorists. It is urged against this, in the first place, that the effect produced by Christianity upon the lives and characters of its votaries was of a description very different from and very superior to that which resulted from the discipline of any philosophic sect, and, in the second place, that those who looked upon Christianity in this light were bound, at least, to extend to it the same toleration which they granted to all other schools.

28. Ad Nationes Libri II. The apology is addressed specially to the Roman magistrates: these books appear to be intended to prove, in like manner, to the satisfaction of the heathen public in general, that the prejudices cherished towards the Christians were altogether groundless, and that the charges of immorality, vice, and unnatural cruelty, preferred against them by their enemies were absolutely false and calumnious. The second book which is devoted to an exposition of the absurdity of the popular theology, of the gods whom the vulgar worshipped, and of the rites which they celebrated, is from the nature of the subject, and from the number of curious facts which it records, particularly interesting, but is unfortunately in a very mutilated condition. Indeed from the numerous blanks and imperfections which occur throughout, and from the circumstance that many of the arguments employed are identical, both in substance, and frequently in words, with those introduced in the Apology, it has been conjectured that the latter ought to be regarded as the finished performance of which this treatise is merely a rough draught, never intended to form a separate or complete work.

29. De Testimonio Animae. A developement of the argument for the unity of God and the reality of a future state, derived from the innate perceptions and feelings of the soul. We find in the fifth chapter a reference to the Apology.

30. De Pallio. Tertullian having exchanged the ordinary garment, which he had hitherto worn in common with his fellow-citizens, for the Pallium, and having been ridiculed in consequence, here defends himself, by arguing that there is nothing unnatural nor unprecedented in a change of dress, and that the garb in question was peculiarly convenient and suitable for those who desired to avoid all vain display in the decoration of their person. But to what class of persons the Pallium properly belonged, whether it was the habit assumed by philosophers in general, or by Christians as a body, or by presbyters only, or by those who laid claim to peculiar sanctity and austerity, are questions to which no one has yet been able to make a satisfactory reply. According to the views entertained upon this point the date of the piece has been variously determined. Some would refer it to the time when the author first embraced Christianity, others to the epoch of his ordination as a priest, others to the period of his conversion to Montanism. Neander supposes that he assumed the peculiar dress of the ascetics upon the death of his wife, and imagines that Severus, Caracalla and Geta, are indicated by the words "Praesentis imperii triplex virtus," an expression which has been differently interpreted by others.

31. Adversus Hermogenem. Hermogenes was an African, a painter by profession, who at one time had been an orthodox believer, but having fallen away from the faith now maintained, that God had not created the universe out of nothing, and agreed with the Stoics in the dogma that matter had existed from all eternity.

The merits of Tertullian as an author are of a very chequered character. He evidently was deeply imbued with all the learning of the age to which he belonged, and was familiar with the most celebrated poets, historians, jurists, orators, and philosophers of Greece and Rome. Nor, indeed, does he manifest any inclination to dissemble these accomplishments, for he perpetually calls to his aid illustrations and technicalities borrowed from every department of literature and science, dazzling us with a pompous array of opinions and authorities. But while it is impossible to question his erudition, no one can defend his style, which exhibits in a most repulsive form the worst faults of an ill-cultivated taste. It is in the highest degree rough, abrupt, and obscure, abounding in far-fetched metaphors and extravagant hyperboles, while the language is oftentimes uncouth and almost barbarous, so that the most indulgent critic feels inclined to turn away in disgust from pages where he is perpetually shocked, startled, and perplexed. On the other hand, the extreme liveliness and fertility of his imagination, the piercing sharpness of his wit, the trenchant edge of his sarcasm, the impetuous force of his arguments, which bewilder and stun even when they fail to convince, and the torrent flood of brilliant declamation in which his glowing conceptions are poured forth, at once excite, amuse, and overwhelm the reader.

His authority as a theologian has been variously estimated by ecclesiastical writers. While some appeal with confidence to his decision in all matters of controversy, not immediately connected with his peculiar views, others branding him with the title of a perverse heretic reject his testimony, upon all points alike, as altogether worthless. It seems absolutely necessary in this matter, if we would arrive at a fair and practical conclusion, to separate opinions from facts. The opinions of Tertullian, even when expressed at a period when his orthodoxy was beyond suspicion, bear such evident marks of an excitable temperament, and of rash impetuosity, combined with harsh and gloomy asceticism, that they ought to have been received with distrust, even if he had never become the advocate of gross errors; but when we remember the absurdities into which he was, at a subsequent period, actually betrayed, we must consider his judgment as disabled. At the same time, since we have not the slightest reason to suspect that he was ever guilty of wilful deception or misrepresentation, we may accept, without hesitation, the facts which he records. How large a mass of most curious and valuable information on the doctrine and discipline of the church in the second and third centuries may be collected from his works, will be at once seen by consulting the very able and elaborate analysis by the Bishop of Lincoln. The conduct of Cyprian is at once characteristic and instructive. It is recorded that he never allowed a day to pass without reading a portion of Tertullian, and that he was wont frequently to exclaim to his confidential attendants, "give me my master." But although the cautious prelate doubtless derived great pleasure and profit from these studies, and although his style bears evident marks of this familiar intercourse, on no single occasion does he ever name Tertullian, or give a quotation from his works, a sure indication that although he found him an agreeable companion, he considered him as no safe guide for himself or others, and was by no means desirous to proclaim his intimacy with a personage of such doubtful reputation.

In addition to the list given above Tertullian was the author of several works, some of which had been lost even in the time of Jerome. The titles only of the following have been preserved, and some of them are doubtful. 1. De Vestibus Aaron. 2. Ad Amicum Philosophum. 3. De Censu Animae. 4. De Spe fidelium. 5. De Paradiso. 6. De Ecstasi. 7. De Animae Summissione. 8. De Superstitione Saeculi. 9. De Carne et Anima. 10. Adversus Apelliacos. (See De Carne Christi, c. 8). 11. De Incommodis Nuptiarum. The following have sometimes been erroneously ascribed to Tertullian: 1. De Trinitate. 2. De Cibis Judaicis, both of which belong to Novatianus. 3. De Haeresibus, frequently appended to the tract De Praescriptione Hereticorum. 4. De Definitionibus Fidei, together with several poems — Sodoma; De Ligno Vitae; De Judicio Domini; Carmen ad Senatorem; Adversus Marcionem Libri V. &c.

The Apologia was printed before any other work by Tertullian, having been published at Venice by Bernardinus Benalius, fol. 1483.

The first edition of the collected works was printed at Basle, by Frobenius, under the editorial inspection of Beatus Rhenanus, fol. 1521, and contained, 1. De Patientia Liber. 2. De Carne Christi. 3. De Resurrectione Carnis. 4. De Praescriptione Hereticorum. 5. Adversus omnes Haereses. 6. Adversus Judaeos. 7. Adversus Marcionem Libri V. 8. Adversus Hermogenem. 9. Adversus Valentinianos. 10. Adversus Praxeam. 11. De Corona Militis. 12. Ad Martyres. 13. De Poenitentia. 14. De Virginibus velandis. 15. De Habitu Mulieris. 16. De Cultu Feminarum. 17. Ad Uxorem Libri II. 18. De Fuga in Persecutione. 19. Ad Scapulam. 20. De Exhortatione Castitatis. 21. De Monogamia. 22. De Pallio. 23. Apologeticus adversus gentes. Of the above the Adversus omnes Haereses, s. De Haeresibus is, as we have already remarked, spurious, and the two tracts De Habitu Muliebri and De Cultu Feminarum, are frequently regarded as a division of the same piece, and both included under the latter title. The edition of Gagnaeus, fol. Paris. 1545, contained eleven additional pieces. 1. De Trinitate. 2. De Animae Testimonio. 3. De Anima. 4. De Spectaculis. 5. De Baptismo. 6. Contra Gnosticos Scorpiacum. 7. De Idololatria. 8. De Pudicitia. 9. De Jejunio adversus Psychicos. 10. De Cibis Judaicis Epistola. 11. De Oratione. Of these the De Trinitate, and De Cibis Judaicis, belong to Novatianus, but the collection was now complete with the exception of the two books Ad Nationes, which were first published by Jac. Gothofredus (4to. Genev. 1625) from the Codex Agobardi, the most ancient MS. of Tertullian, and the only one which contains this piece.

The best editions are those of Pamelius, fol. Antv. 1579, and, in an improved form, revised by Franciscus Junius, Franeck. 1597; of Rigaltius fol. Lutet. 1634, improved by Priorius, fol. Lutet. 1664, 1675, fol. Venet. 1744; and of Semler, concluded by Schutz, 6 vols. 8vo. Hal. 1770. Of these the most desirable is the Venice edition of 1744, although it unfortunately abounds with typographical errors.

There is an excellent edition of the De Pallio, by Salmasius, 8vo. Lutet. 1622, 8vo. Lug. Bat. 1656, and of the Apologeticus, by Havercamp, 8vo. Lug. Bat. 1710, reprinted in the Venice ed. of 1744.

TESTA, C. TREBA'TIUS, a contemporary of Cicero and of the scholars of Servius Sulpicius, was a pupil of Q. Cornelius Maximus (Cic. ad Fam. vii. 8 and 17; and Dig. 33. tit. 7. s. 16. § 1.) Cicero recommended Testa to C. Julius Caesar (ad Fam. vii. 5), during his proconsulship of Gallia, and in his letter to Caesar he spoke of him as an honest man, and as possessing a great knowledge of the Jus Civile. (As to the expression "familiam ducit" in Cicero's Letter to Caesar, see the note of Zimmern, p. 298, n. 7: "quod familiam ducit," means "quod praecipuum est)." Trebatius had little taste for military matters, but still he kept with Caesar, and he wrote to Cicero and received from Cicero various letters while he was in Gaul (Cic. Ep. ad Fam. lib. vii.). It appears that Caesar offered him the pay of a tribune without requiring the discharge of the duties, and that Trebatius declined it. He did not accompany Caesar in his second British expedition, but he probably got a little inured to military service at last. Trebatius followed Caesar's party after the civil war broke out; and he wrote to Cicero to tell him that Caesar thought Cicero ought to join Caesar's side, or, if he would not do that, he ought to go to Greece and stay out of the way (Plutarch, Cicero, c. 37). Suetonius (Caesar, c. 78) tells an anecdote, that when all the senate approached Caesar, who was sitting in front of the temple of Venus Genetrix, with the decrees which conferred extraordinary honours on him, Trebatius advised Caesar to rise up to receive the senate, for which advice Caesar by his countenance showed his displeasure. Cicero dedicated to Trebatius his book of Topica, which he wrote to explain to him this book of Aristotle. The lawyer had turned it over in Cicero's library at Tusculum, but he found that it was too difficult for him (Topica, c. 1, ad Fam. vii. 19), and he asked Cicero for an explanation. Trebatius enjoyed considerable reputation under Augustus as a lawyer, and he was one of those whom Augustus consulted as to the giving a legal effect to codicilli. Trebatius advised that these informal testamentary dispositions should be allowed to have legal effect: he said "that it was very useful and necessary for the Roman citizens that this should be so, on account of the long journeys which people often took, during which, if a man could not make his testament, he might yet make codicilli" (Inst. 2, tit. 25, De Codicillis). Horace addressed to Trebatius the first Satire of the Second Book.

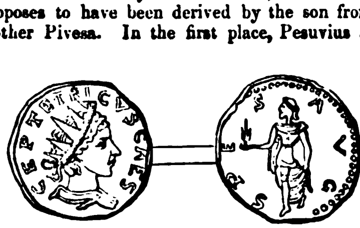
Trebatius was the master of Labeo, who, however, often differs from him in opinion (Dig. 16. tit. 3. s. 1. § 41; 18. tit. 6. s. 1. § 2). In the passage last referred to, the opinion of Labeo is decidedly right, and that of Trebatius as clearly wrong. He wrote some books (libri) De jure Civili, and nine books De Religionibus (Porphyrius, ad Horat. Sat. ii. 1); but Macrobius (Sat. iii. 3) quotes the tenth book Religionum. Trebatius is often cited in the Digest, but there is no direct excerpt from his writings. Pomponius speaks of several works of Trebatius being extant in his time, but he adds that his writings were not in great repute. His grammatical knowledge of his own language was ridiculously defective, for he said that Sacellum was composed of two words, sacrum and cella, a blunder which Gellius corrects (vi. 6).

The letters of Cicero to Trebatius are contained among those ad Familiares (vii. 6—22). (Grotius, Vitae Jurisconsult.; Zimmern, Geschichte des Röm. Privatrechts, i. p. 297.) [G. L.]

TETHYS (Τηθύς), a daughter of Uranus and Gaea, and wife of Oceanus, by whom she was conceived to be the mother of the Oceanides and the numerous river-gods. She also educated Hera, who was brought to her by Rhea. (Hes. Theog. 136, 337; Apollod. i. 1. § 3; Plat. Tim. p. 40; Ov. Fast. v. 81; Virg. Georg. i. 31.) [L. S.]

TE'TRICUS, C. PESU'VIUS, one of the thirty tyrants enumerated by Trebellius Pollio [AUREOLUS], was the last of the pretenders who ruled Gaul during its temporary separation from the empire under Gallienus and his successor. He was of noble descent, a senator, a consular, and praefect of Aquitania at the period when, after the death of Postumus, of Laelianus, of Victorinus, and of Marius, in rapid succession, the supreme power devolved on the popular Victoria, who, feeling unable or unwilling to undertake a task so onerous and so fraught with danger, persuaded the soldiers to accept of her kinsman Tetricus as their ruler, and he was accordingly invested with the purple at Bordeaux, in A. D. 267. Claudius Gothicus found his attention and resources so fully occupied by the wild tribes on the Danube and the coasts of the Euxine, that he considered it impolitic to commence hostilities against a chief who maintained tranquillity and order throughout the limits of France and Spain, and kept at bay the barbarians on the Rhenish frontier; indeed, we may conclude from medals, that he not merely tolerated, but acknowledged the authority of his rival. Upon the accession of Aurelian, however, Tetricus, if we can believe the concurring testimony of Pollio, Victor, and Eutropius, harassed and alarmed by the insolence and factious spirit of his troops, privately invited the new sovereign to relieve him from a load which he found intolerable, and betrayed his army to defeat at the great battle of Chalons. [AURELIANUS.] It is certain that although Tetricus, along with his son, in the guise of captives, graced the triumph of the conqueror, he was immediately afterwards treated with the greatest distinction, appointed corrector of the whole of Italy, and even addressed by Aurelian as comrade, colleague, and imperator. Retiring subsequently into private life, he died at a very advanced age.



(Every circumstance connected with the history of Tetricus has been collected and arranged, with great industry and learning, by De Boze, in a dissertation contained in the Mémoires de l'Academie de Sciences et Belles Lettres, vol. xxvi. p. 504; see Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyrann. xxiii.; Aurel. Vict. de Caes. xxxv., Epit. xxxv.; Eutrop. ix. 9; Zonar. xii. 27.) [W. R.]

COIN OF TETRICUS SENIOR.

TE'TRICUS, C. PESU'VIUS PIVE'SUS, twenty-fourth on the list of Pollio, son of the preceding, although a child at the time of his father's elevation, was forthwith proclaimed Caesar. Whether he subsequently received the title of Augustus is a matter of doubt, since the evidence afforded by medals, our surest guide in such matters, is in the present instance indistinct and contradictory He shared the favour displayed towards his father by Aurelian, was treated with distinction by the princes who followed, and passed with credit through all the grades of Senatorian rank, transmitting his patrimony, undiminished, to his heirs. The house of the Tetrici, on the Caelian hill, was still in existence when Pollio wrote, and contained a picture in which Aurelian was represented in the act of investing the father and son with senatorial robes, receiving from them, in return, a sceptre and civic crown.

We have given, above, the names of these two personages as exhibited by Eckhel. The family designation Pesuvius or Pesubius seems established, beyond a question, by coins and inscriptions, but we cannot so readily admit Pivesus, which Eckhel supposes to have been derived by the son from a mother Pivesa. In the first place, Pesuvius and

COIN OF TETRICUS JUNIOR.

Pivesus, or their contractions, are never found together upon the same piece. Secondly, PIVESUS, PIVESU, PIVES, and PIV., appear only in the silver and small brass coins, all of which are of rude and inferior workmanship, while the gold, which are executed with care and skill, present uniformly C. PES. TETRICUS. CAES., and hence we are inclined to conclude that Pivesus was a mispronunciation, by barbarous lips, of Pesuvius, and had no real existence as a distinct name. [W. R.]

TE'TTIUS. 1. P. TETTIUS, one of the witnesses against Verres. (Cic. Verr. i. 28.)

2. TETTIUS DAMIO, in whose house Cicero took refuge in order to avoid the mob of Clodius. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 3.)

3. TETTIUS JULIANUS, in some passages of Tacitus is called Titius, in others Tertius, but Tettius is probably the correct form. (Orelli, ad Tac. Hist. ii. 85.) He was the commander of one of the three legions stationed in Moesia, and along with his fellow-commanders received the consular insignia from Otho, in consequence of a victory which they gained over the Rhoxolani, a Sarmatian tribe. Shortly afterwards, Aponius Saturninus, the governor of Moesia, made an attempt upon the life of Tettius, who escaped across Mount Haemus. He took no part in the civil war, although the legion, which he commanded, espoused the cause of Vespasian, and pleaded various delays which prevented him from joining his troops. On the triumph of the party of Vespasian, he was, notwithstanding, appointed one of the praetors; but the senate would not allow him to enter upon the dignity, and conferred his office upon Plotius Griphus, on the 1st of January, A. D. 70. Domitian, however, almost immediately afterwards, restored him to the praetorship. (Tac. Hist. i. 79, ii. 85, iv. 39, 40.)

TEUCER (Τεῦκρος). 1. A son of the river-god Scamander by the nymph Idaea, was the first king of Troy, whence the Trojans are sometimes called Τευκροί. (Herod. vii. 122.) Dardanus of Samothrace came to Teucer, received his daughter Bateia or Arisbe in marriage, and afterwards became his successor in the kingdom. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 1; Diod. iv. 75.) According to others, Dardanus was a native prince of Troy, and Scamander and Teucer immigrated into Troas from Crete, bringing with them the worship of Apollo Smintheus. (Strab. xiii. p. 604; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 108; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 29, 1302, 1306.)

2. A son of Telamon and Hesione, of Crete, was a step-brother of Ajax, and the best archer among the Greeks at Troy. (Hom. Il. viii. 281, &c., xiii. 170.) On his return from the Trojan war, Telamon refused to receive him in Salamis, because he had not avenged the death of his brother Ajax, or because he had not brought with him his remains, Tecmessa, or his son Eurysaces. Teucer, therefore, in consequence of a promise of Apollo, sailed away in search of a new home. This he found in the island of Cyprus, which was given to him by Belus, king of Sidon. (Serv. ad Aen. i. 619.) He there married Eune, the daughter of Cyprus, by whom he became the father of Asteria, and founded the town of Salamis. (Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 447, 450; Pind. Nem. iv. 60; Aeschyl. Pers. 896; Eurip. Helen. 87, &c., 146, &c.; Paus. ii. 29. § 4; Horat. Carm. i. 7. § 21.) [L. S.]

TEUCER, artists. 1. A distinguished silver-chaser, the last in Pliny's list of the caelatores who flourished at Rome in the last age of the republic. Pliny mentions him in the following terms, Habuit et Teucer crustarius famam. (H. N. xxxiii. 12. s. 55.)

2. A gem-engraver, three of whose works are extant, and, by their beautiful execution, are thought to prove that the artist could not have lived later than the time of Augustus. He may therefore, perhaps, be the same as the foregoing. (Sillig, Cat. Art. s. v.; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 156, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

TEUTA (Τεῦτα), wife of Agron, king of the Illyrians, assumed the sovereign power on the death of her husband, B. C. 231. Elated by the successes recently obtained by the Illyrian arms [AGRON], she gave free scope to the piratical expeditions of her subjects, while she herself fitted out an armament which attacked the coast of Epeirus, while Scerdilaïdas, with an army of 5000 men, invaded that country by land, and reduced the wealthy city of Phoenice. An invasion of the Dardanians soon compelled her to recal her forces: but she had meanwhile provoked a more dangerous enemy. The injuries inflicted by the Illyrian pirates upon the Italian merchants had at length attracted the attention of the Roman senate, who sent two ambassadors, C. and L. Coruncanius, to demand satisfaction. But the haughty language of these deputies gave such offence to the Illyrian queen, that she not only refused to comply with their demands, but caused the younger of the two brothers to be assassinated on his way home. (Polyb. ii. 4, 6, 8; Dion Cass. Fr. 151; Zonar. viii. 19; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 6; Liv. Epit. xx.) This flagrant breach of the law of nations led to an immediate declaration of war on the part of the Romans, who sent both the consuls, Cn. Fulvius and A. Postumius, with a fleet and army, to punish the Illyrian queen. Meanwhile Teuta, who was herself engaged in the siege of Issa, had early in the spring (B. C. 229) sent out a large force under Demetrius the Pharian, who made himself master of the island of Corcyra, and laid siege to Epidamnus. On the arrival of the Roman fleet, however, Demetrius treacherously surrendered Corcyra into their hands, and lent every assistance to the further operations of the two consuls. These were so rapid and decisive that the greater part of Illyria quickly fell into their hands, and Teuta herself was compelled to fly for refuge to the strong fortress of Rhizon. From hence she made overtures for peace, which she at length obtained from the Roman consul, A. Postumius, in the spring of B. C. 228, on condition of giving up the greater part of her dominions, and restraining her subjects from all voyages beyond the island of Lissus. By this treaty she appears to have retained the nominal sovereignty of a small territory, while her stepson Pinnes obtained the greater part of her kingdom; but we do not again meet with her name, and it is probable that she soon after abdicated this small remnant of power. (Polyb. ii. 9—12; Dion Cass. Fr. 151; Zonar. viii. 19; Appian. Illyr. 7.) [E. H. B.]

TEU'TAMUS (Τεύταμος), a Macedonian officer, who, in B. C. 319, shared with Antigenes the command of the select troops called the Argyraspids. Of the services by which he had earned this distinguished post we know nothing. When Eumenes, after escaping from Nora, joined the Argyraspids in Cilicia, Antigenes and Teutamus at first, in obedience to the orders of the regent and Olympias, placed themselves under his command, but they secretly regarded him with jealousy, and Teutamus even listened to the overtures of Ptolemy, and would have joined in a plot against the life of Eumenes, had he not been dissuaded by his more prudent colleague. (Diod. xviii. 59, 62; Plut. Eum. 13.) But though they continued to follow the guidance of Eumenes, and with the troops under their command, bore an important part in his campaigns against Antigonus, they took every opportunity of displaying their envy and jealousy, which their general in vain tried to allay, by avoiding all appearance of the exercise of authority. [EUMENES, p. 89, a.] During the winter campaign in Gabiene (B. C. 316) the two leaders of the Argyraspids were the prime movers of a plot for the destruction of Eumenes; and after the final action, Teutamus was the first to open negotiations with Antigonus for the recovery of the baggage of the Argyraspids by the betrayal of his rival into his hands. (Plut. Eum. 13, 16, 17.) By this act of treachery he probably hoped to secure the favour of Antigonus, as well as to supplant his own colleague or leader, Antigenes; but we find no farther mention of his name, and it is probable that he was sent, with the greater part of the Argyraspids, to perish in Arachosia. (Diod. xix. 48.) [E. H. B.]

TEUTA'MIAS (Τευταμίας), a king of Larissa in Thessaly, and father of the Pelasgian Lethus. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 4; Hom. Il. ii. 843; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 838.) [L. S.]

TEU'TARUS (Τεύταρος), the original owner of the bow which was used by Heracles. (Lycoph. Cass. 56; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 50, 458.) [L. S.]

TEUTHRAS (Τεύθρας). 1. An ancient king of Mysia, who received Auge, the daughter of Aleus, and brought up her son Telephus. From him the town of Teuthrania in Mysia was believed to have received its name. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 4; Paus. viii. 4; Strab. xii. p. 571.) [TELEPHUS].

2. A Greek of Magnesia, who was slain by Hector at Troy. (Hom. Il. v. 705.)

3. An Athenian, who was believed to have founded Teuthrania in Laconia. (Paus. iii. 25. § 3.) [L. S.]

TEUTI'APLUS (Τευτίαπλος), an Elean, was one of the leaders of the Peloponnesian fleet which was sent under Alcidas, the Lacedaemonian, as admiral, to support Mytilene in its revolt from Athens, B. C. 427. The Mytilenaeans, however, had surrendered to Paches before the friendly armament reached the coast of Asia, and Teutiaplus then endeavoured, but without success, to persuade Alcidas to attempt the recovery of the island by a sudden attack. (Thuc. iii. 16, 29, 30.) [E. E.]

TEU'TICUS, an Illyrian noble, whom Gentius sent as ambassador to the Roman praetor, in B. C. 168, to beg for a truce. (Liv. xliv. 31.)

TEUTOBODUS, king of the Teutoni, when they were defeated by Marius at the great battle of Aquae Sextiae, in B. C. 102 [MARIUS, p. 955, b.]. According to some authorities Teutobodus was killed in the battle; according to others, he was taken prisoner and adorned the triumph of Marius. (Oros. v. 16; Eutrop. v. 1; Florus, iii. 3. § 10.)

TEUTOMA'LIUS, king of the Saluvii, took refuge among the Allobroges, after the conquest of his own people by the Romans, in B. C. 122. (Liv. Epit. 61.)

THAIS (Θαΐς), a celebrated Athenian Hetaera, who accompanied Alexander the Great on his expedition into Asia, or at least was present on various occasions during that period. Her name is best known from the story of her having stimulated the conqueror during a great festival at Persepolis, to set fire to the palace of the Persian kings: but this anecdote, immortalized as it has been by Dryden's famous ode, appears to rest on the sole authority of Cleitarchus, one of the least trustworthy of the historians of Alexander, and is in all probability a mere fable (Cleitarchus, ap. Athen. xiii. p. 576, e; Diod. xvii. 72; Plut. Alex. 38; Curt. v. 7. §§ 3—7; Droysen, Gesch. Alex. p. 247, note.)

After the death of Alexander, Thaïs attached herself to Ptolemy Lagi, by whom she became the mother of two sons, Leontiscus and Lagus, and of a daughter, Eirene. The statement of Athenaeus that she was actually married to the Egyptian king may be doubted, but he seems to have been warmly attached to her, and brought up their common children in almost princely style. (Athen. xiii. p. 576, e.) Many anecdotes are recorded of her wit and readiness in repartee, for which she seems to have been as distinguished as for her beauty. (Id. ib. p. 585.) [E. H. B.]

THA'LAMUS, P. LUCRINIUS, P. L., an artist, whose name appears on a Latin inscription, with the designation A'. CORINTHIS FABER, which Raoul-Rochette explains as sculptor of Corinthian vases. (Gruter, p. dcxxxix. 8; Muratori, Thes. vol. ii. p. cmlxiii.; Orelli, Inscr. Lat. Sel. No. 4181; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 414, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

THALASSA (Θάλασσα), a personification of the Mediterranean, is described as a daughter of Aether and Hemera. (Hygin. Fab. Praef. p. 2; Lucian, Dial. D. Marin. 11.) [L. S.]

THALA'SSIUS, TALA'SSIUS, or TALA'SSIO (Τάλασσιος), a Roman senator of the time of Romulus. At the time of the rape of the Sabine women, when a maiden of surpassing beauty was led away for Thalassius, the persons conducting her, in order to protect her against any assaults from others, exclaimed "for Thalassius." Hence, it is said, arose the wedding shout with which a bride at Rome was conducted to the house of her bridegroom. (Liv. i. 9; Serv. ad Aen. i. 651; Catull. 61, 134.) Others connect the name with the Greek ταλασία (spinning of wool), expressing the chief occupation of a newly married woman (Fest. p. 351, ed. Müller; Plut. Quaest. Rom. 31, Romul. 15); or regard it as the name of the god presiding over marriage. (Dionys. ii. 31; Martial, xii. 42. 4, iii. 93. 23.) [L. S.]

THALA'SSIUS. 1. Praefectus Praetorio of the East, under Constantius II., possessed great influence with this emperor. He had previously enjoyed the title of Comes, and as such was sent by Constantius on an embassy to his brother Constans at Petobio in Pannonia, in A. D. 348 (Athanasius, Apol. ad Constant. init.). As praefect of the East he did all in his power to excite the bad passions of Gallus, and to inflame Constantius against him. Thalassius died in A. D. 353, and was succeeded by Domitian (Amm. Marc. xiv. 1, 7; Zosim. ii. 48). Godefroy maintains that Thalassius could not have died earlier than A. D. 357 because he is said to have been at the conference at Sirmium, which is usually placed in this year, and because the name of Thalassius, praefectus praetorio, occurs in a law dated A. D. 357. But Tillemont has shown that the conference at Sirmium ought probably to be referred to the year 351; and as Ammianus expressly places the death of Thalassius in A. D. 353, the Thalassius mentioned in the law may have been praefectus praetorio of Illyricum. The matter is discussed by Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. iv. note xxix. sur Constance.

This Thalassius appears to have written some work on the history of his own times, as Suidas (s. v. Θεόφιλος) quotes his testimony respecting his contemporary Theophilus.

2. A monk, lived in the deserts of Libya, about A. D. 662. There are extant four hecatontades of Thalassius addressed to the presbyter Paulus, and entitled Περὶ ἀγάπης καὶ ἐγκρατείας καὶ τῆς κατὰ νοῦν πολιτείας, De caritate, vitae continentia et mentis regimine, which are printed in all the Bibliothecae Patrum. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. pp. 113, 114.)

THALEIA or THALIA (Θάλεια, Θαλία). 1. One of the nine Muses, and, at least in later times, regarded as the Muse of Comedy. (Hes. Theog. 77.) She became the mother of the Corybantes by Apollo. (Apollod. i. 3. § 4; Plut. Sympos. ix. 14.)

2. A daughter of Nereus and Doris. (Hom. Il. xviii. 39; Hes. Theog. 248; Virg. Georg. iv. 338, Aen. v. 826.)

3. A daughter of Hephaestus, and by Zeus, the mother of the Palici. (Serv. ad Aen. ix. 584; Steph. Byz. s. v. παλική.)

4. One of the Charites. (Hes. Theog. 909; Apollod. i. 1. § 3; Paus. ix. 35. § 1.) [L. S.]

THALELAEUS (Θαλέλαιος), a jurist, lived in the time of Justinian, and was a professor of law, and probably at Constantinople, though there is no evidence for that. He is mentioned among the Antecessores, to whom the Constitution Omnem, &c. is addressed; but he was not employed with Tribonian and others upon the compilation of any of Justinian's law books. Thalelaeus had a high reputation: he was called the "eye of jurisprudence," (τῆς νομικῆς ὀφθαλμός). His great work was a Greek commentary on the Code of Justinian, which was divided into three parts. The first and most extensive part is a kind of introduction to a knowledge of the text of the Code, which is properly called τὸ πλάτος, a name sometimes given, but perhaps incorrectly, to the whole commentary. The second part consisted of a literal Greek version (κατὰ πόδας) of the constitutions which existed in Latin in the Code, or of an extract only from those which had been copied in Greek into the same collection. The third part consists of observations on the Greek and Latin Constitutions.

The commentary of Thalelaeus is the most important of all that has been written upon the constitutions contained in the Code. He was not satisfied with taking the constitutions as they appear in the Code, but he consulted the texts of the original constitutions; for instance, he gives the constitution I. (Cod. 2. tit. (9) 10, De Errore Advocat.) more complete than it is in the Corpus Juris; and upon Constit. I. (Cod. 2. tit. 9. De Advoc. Fisci), he quotes a text of Paulus, which is found nowhere else. This commentary was first published in Meerman's Thesaurus, iii. and v., and since by Heimbach, Basil. i. 323—424.

It is sometimes said that Thalelaeus wrote a commentary on the Novellae, but this notion is only founded on a mistake of a copyist, who in a scholium of the Basilica on Nov. 115. c. 5. § 1, has written Thalelaeus for Theodorus. There appears also to be no ground for the opinion that Thalelaeus translated the Pandect, or that he wrote a commentary on it. (Mortreuil, Histoire du Droit Byzantin, vol. i.) [G. L.]

THALELAEUS (Θαλέλαιος) or THALLELAEUS (Θαλλέλαιος), Saint, a physician, who was born near Mount Lebanon in Phoenicia of Christian parents, and received his medical education from a physician named Macarius, who had attained the dignity of Archiater. He displayed on all occasions great zeal in favour of Christianity, and acquired considerable reputation by his medical skill, so that some of his cures were said to be miraculously performed. He attended on the heathen with as much care as on Christians, and was particularly charitable towards the poor. During the persecution carried on against the Christians in the short reign of the emperors Carinus and Numerianus, Thalelaeus was seized by Tiberius the governor of Edessa in Mesopotamia, from whose hands he is said to have been miraculously delivered. He was afterwards taken before Theodorus, the governor of Aegae in Cilicia, by whom he was exposed to various tortures, and at last put to death, A. D. 284. His constancy and his wonderful deliverances converted several of the bystanders, and among the rest his former tutor Macarius. His memory is celebrated by the Romish Church on May 20. (Acta Sanctorum, May 20. vol. v. p. 178*.) [W. A. G.]

THALES (Θαλῆς), the Ionian philosopher, was born at Miletus in the 35th Olympiad, according to Apollodorus (Diog. Laërt. i. 37). He is said (Herod. i. 74) to have predicted the eclipse of the sun, which happened in the reign of the Lydian king Alyattes (according to Oltmann's calculations, in the Abhandl. der Königl. Akademie der Wissenschaften in Berlin, 1812, 1813, in the year B. C. 609), and under Croesus to have managed the diversion of the course of the Halys (Herod. i. 75), and later, in order to unite and strengthen the Ionians when threatened by the Persians, to have instituted a federal council in Teos (Ib. 170). These statements, and the mention of Thales in the books of Xenophanes and Heracleitus (Diog. Laërt. i. 33) accord very well with the reckoning of Apollodorus, which may have been founded on the statement of Demetrius Phalereus, that Thales received the appellation of the Sage in the time of the Athenian archon Damasius (Diog. Laërt. i. 22). They confirm at the same time the statements respecting the long duration of his life, which extended to 78, or even 90 years (Diog. Laërt. i. 38). In the different lists of the seven sages his name seems to have stood at the head (Diog. Laërt. i. 41, &c. 22; comp. Cic. Acad. ii. 37), and, as his wisdom is said to have shown itself in political sagacity, so also it manifested itself in prudence in acquiring wealth (Arist. Eth. Nic. i. 1, comp. Diog. Laërt. i. 26). And, generally speaking, the above honourable designation which was given to those seven men, denoted, not scientific inquirers, but men of sound understanding, and famed for their legislative talents, as

Dicaearchus had already remarked (Diog. Laërt. i. 10; Cic. Lael. 2; Plut. Solon. 3). Nevertheless Thales is also brought forward as the originator of philosophy and mathematics (ἀρχηγὸς τῆς φιλοσοφίας, Arist. Metaph. i. 3; Diog. Laërt. i. 28, &c.; Apul. Flor. c. iv. p. 38, Beroald), and with good reason, if he first convinced himself of the necessity of scientific proof, and attempted it in philosophy and mathematics. In the latter science we find attributed to him only proofs of propositions which belong to the first elements of geometry, and could not possibly have put him in a position to calculate the eclipses of the sun, and the course of the heavenly bodies. Nevertheless, that careful inquirer, Eudemus of Rhodes, had attributed to him both these calculations and those proofs (Diog. Laërt. l. c.; Procl. in Euclid. i. p. x. 17, 19, 44, 67, 79, 92). It is possible that communications from the East, where greater progress had been made in astronomy, came to the help of the Milesian. The Peripatetic Hieronymus had already mentioned his stay in Egypt, which was devoted to mathematical pursuits (Diog. Laërt. i. 27; comp. Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 18). Others had attributed to him journeys to Crete and Asia (Diog. Laërt. i. 47. 24. ib. Menag.). In his dogma that water is the origin of things, that is, that it is that out of which every thing arises, and into which every thing resolves itself, Thales may have followed Orphic cosmogonies (Arist. l. c.; Justin Mart. Coh. ad Gr. p. 7, Paris; Plut. Placit. i. 3, &c.; comp. Ch. A. Brandis, Handbuch der griechisch-römischen Philosophie, i. p. 65, &c.), while, unlike them, he sought to establish the truth of the assertion. Hence, Aristotle, immediately after he has called him the originator of philosophy, brings forward the reasons which Thales was believed to have adduced in confirmation of that assertion; for that no written developement of it, or indeed any book by Thales, was extant, is proved by the expressions which Aristotle uses when he brings forward the doctrines and proofs of the Milesian (ἴσως, l. c., de Anim. i. 5; φασίν, de Caelo, ii. 13), nay, even in connection with the above-mentioned story (Polit. i. 11; comp. Plat. Theaet. 174, λέγεται). In other ways, also, it is established that Thales left behind him nothing in a written form (Diog. Laërt. i. 23; Themist. Orat. xxvi. 317, Hard.; Simpl. in Arist. de An. f. 8); a metrical work on astronomy, attributed to him, was regarded even in antiquity as the production of a Samian of the name of Phocas (Diog. Laërt. i. 23). Verses in which Thaletic doctrines and expressions were embodied (Diog. Laërt. i. 34; Plut. de Pyth. Orat. p. 402, e) belonged without doubt to a later period, and to attribute commentaries (ἀπομνημονεύματα) to him or his school, is an error into which Joannes Philoponus has been led merely by the words of Aristotle which he explains (ἐξ ὧν ἀπομνημονεύουσιν, de Anim. i. 2). Still, we can as little assume that Aristotle attributed the doctrines and their proofs to Thales from mere conjecture; he attaches much too decided an importance to them for that. Besides, Theophrastus seems to have repeated and somewhat modified them; and Eudemus had distinctly stated the mathematical propositions, for which Thales adduced proofs. That the fruit and seeds of things are moist, and that warmth is developed out of moistness, are the reasons which Aristotle regards as those which may have led Thales to the assertion that water is the origin of things. Simplicius (in Arist. Phys. f. 6) adds, probably after Theophrastus, to whom he refers immediately before and after, that what dies, dries up, and that water is what holds all things together: and further, that water is in the highest degree plastic (εὐτύπωτον). The sayings also attributed by Aristotle to Thales, that every thing is full of gods (de Anim. i. 5, p. 411. 70, Berol.), and that the soul is what originates motion, whence also he attributed soul to the magnet (ib. i. 2, p. 405. 19), betray the presupposition that it is by virtue of the indwelling power with which it is pervaded, as with a soul, that water produces the various phenomena. But neither the doctrine of the soul of the universe (Stob. Ecl. Phys. i. p. 54, Heeren; Plut. Plac. i. 20), nor that of a Deity forming the universe (Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 10; Joh. Philop. in Arist. de An. p. 7) which later writers attributed to him, can be inferred therefrom: they have here, as in other cases, defined more precisely, or amplified the cautious statements of Aristotle, and perhaps of Theophrastus (in all probability the only authentic sources which they had for the doctrines of Thales), and so make him teach that the soul is that which is moved eternally and by itself (Plut. Plac. iv. 2), and immortal (Diog. Laërt. i. 24), that matter is infinitely divisible (Stob. Ecl. Phys. i. p. 319, &c.) and without void space (ib. 378), that out of water first of all the four elements developed themselves (Heracl. Pont. Alleg. Hom. c. 22) and so forth, propositions which, as may be shown, Plato, Empedocles, and others were the first to lay down. [Ch. A. B.]

THALES or THALE'TAS (Θαλῆς, Θαλήτας), the celebrated musician and lyric poet. The two forms of the name are mere varieties of the same word: but Θαλῆς seems to be the more genuine ancient form; for it not only has the authority of Aristotle, Strabo, and Plutarch, but it is also used by Pausanias (i. 14. § 4) in quoting the verses composed in honour of the musician by his contemporary Polymnestus. Nevertheless, it is more convenient to follow the prevailing custom among modern writers, and call him Thaletas.

The position of Thaletas is one of the most interesting, and at the same time most difficult points, in that most interesting and difficult subject, the early history of Greek music and lyric poetry. The most certain fact known of him is, fortunately, that which is also the most important; namely, that he introduced from Crete into Sparta certain principles or elements of music and rhythm, which did not exist in Terpander's system, and thereby founded the second of the musical schools which flourished at Sparta. (Plut. de Mus. 9, p. 1135, b.)

He was a native of Crete, and, according to the best writers, of the city of Gortyna. (Polymnestus, ap. Paus. l. c.; Plut. de Mus. l. c.) Suidas has preserved other traditions, which assigned him to Cnossus or to Elyrus. (Suid. s. v., for the articles Θαλήτας Κρὴς and Θαλήτας Κνώσσιος refer without doubt to the same individual, and in the former article the words ἢ Ἰλλυρίος ought to be Ἐλύριος: comp. Meursius, Cret. i. 9; Küster, ad loc.; Müller, Hist. Lit. of Greece, vol. i. p. 159.)

In compliance, according to tradition, with an invitation which the Spartans sent to him in obedience to an oracle, he removed to Sparta, where, by the sacred character of his paeans, and the humanizing influence of his music, he appeased the wrath of Apollo, who had visited the city with a plague, and composed the factions of the citizens, who were at enmity with each other. (Paus. l. c.; Plut. Lycurg. 4; Ephorus, ap. Strab. x. pp. 480, 482; Sext. Empir. adv. Rhet. ii. p. 292, Fabric.; Aelian. V. H. xii. 50.) At Sparta he became the head of a new school (κατάστασις) of music, which appears never afterwards to have been supplanted, and the influence of which was maintained also by Xenodamus of Cythera, Xenocritus of Locris, Polymnestus of Colophon, and Sacadas of Argos. (Plut. de Mus. l. c.) These matters will be examined more fully presently; but the brief outline just given is necessary for the understanding of the chronological investigation which follows.

In studying the early history of Greek lyric poetry, nothing would be more desirable, if it were possible, than to fix the precise dates of the musicians and poets who contributed to its development; that so we might trace the steps of its progress, in relation to the time they occupied, the social state of the people amongst whom they were made, and the order in which they followed from one another. It must, however, be confessed that, after all the labour which scholars have bestowed on the subject, there is an uncertainty, generally to the extent of half a century, and in some cases more, respecting the dates of the earliest poets, while the more important point of their relative order of succession and their distance from each other in time is beset with great difficulties. These remarks apply most strongly to Thaletas, the various dates assigned to whom, by ancient and modern writers, range over a period from before the time of Homer down to the year B. C. 620.

How uncertain, and even fabulous, were the traditions followed by the generality of the ancient writers respecting the date of Thaletas, is manifest from the statements of Suidas, that he lived before the time of Homer, of Demetrius Magnes (ap. Diog. Laërt. i. 38), that he was "very ancient, about the time of Hesiod and Homer and Lycurgus," and of the many other writers, who make him contemporary with Lycurgus, and even an elder contemporary. In nearly all the accounts, above referred to, of the removal of Thaletas to Sparta, he is said to have gone thither at the invitation of Lycurgus, who used his influence to prepare the minds of the people for his own laws; while some even speak of him as if he were a legislator, from whom Lycurgus derived some of his laws. (Sext. Empir. l. c.; Arist. Pol. ii. 9. § 5, ii. 12.) These accounts, which Aristotle (l. c.) condemns as anachronisms, can easily be explained. The influence of music upon character and manners was in the opinion of the ancients so great, that it was quite natural to speak of Terpander and Thaletas as fellow-workers with the great legislator of the Spartans in forming the character of the people; and then such statements were interpreted by later writers in a chronological sense; for similar traditions are recorded of Terpander as well as of Thaletas. [TERPANDER.] Moreover, in the case of Thaletas, the supposed connection with Lycurgus would assume a more probable appearance on account of his coming from Crete, from whence also Lycurgus was supposed to have derived so many of his institutions; and this is, in fact, the specific form which the tradition assumed (Ephor. ap. Strab. x. p. 482; Plut. Lycurg. 4), namely, that Lycurgus, arriving at Crete in the course of his travels, there met with Thaletas, who was one of the men renowned in the island for wisdom and political abilities (ἕνα τῶν νομιζομένων ἐκεῖ σοφῶν καὶ πολιτικῶν), and who, while professing to be a lyric poet, used his art as a pretext, but in fact devoted himself to political science in the same way as the ablest of legislators (ποιητὴν μὲν δοκοῦντα λυρικῶν μελῶν καὶ πρόσχημα τὴν τέχνην ταύτην πεποιημένον, ἔργῳ δὲ ἅπερ οἱ κράτιστοι τῶν νομοθετῶν διαπραττόμενον). Add to this the great probability that later writers mistook the sense of the word νόμοι in the ancient accounts of Thaletas; and his association with Lycurgus is explained. It is not worth while to discuss the statement of Jerome (Chron. s. a. 1266, B. C. 750), who says that Thales of Miletus (probably meaning Thales of Crete, for the philosopher's age is well known) lived in the reign of Romulus. Perhaps this may only be another form of the tradition which made him contemporary with Lycurgus.

The strictly historical evidence respecting the date of Thaletas is contained in three testimonies. First, the statement of Glaucus, one of the highest authorities on the subject, that he was later than Archilochus. (Plut. de Mus. 10, p. 1134, d. e.) Secondly, the fact recorded by Pausanias (i. 14. § 4), that Polymnestus composed verses in his praise for the Lacedaemonians, whence it is probable that he was an elder contemporary of Polymnestus, and therefore older than Alcman, by whom Polymnestus was mentioned. (Plut. de Mus. 5, p. 1133, a.) Thirdly, in his account of the second school or system (κατάστασις) of music at Sparta, Plutarch tells us (de Mus. 9, p. 1134, c.) that the first system was established by Terpander; but of the second the following had the best claim to be considered as the leaders (μάλιστα αἰτίαν ἔχουσιν ἡγεμόνες γενέσθαι), Thaletas, Xenodamus, Xenocritus, Polymnestus, and Sacadas; and that to them was ascribed the origin of the Gymnopaedia in Lacedaemon, of the Apodeixeis in Arcadia, and of the Endymatia in Argos. This important testimony is very probably derived from the work of Glaucus. Lastly, Plutarch (de Mus. 10, p. 1134, e.) mentions a vague tradition, which is on the face of it improbable, and which is quite unworthy to be placed by the side of the other three, that Thaletas derived the rhythm called Maron and the Cretic rhythm from the music of the Phrygian flute-player Olympus (ἐκ γὰρ τῆς Ὀλύμπου αὐλήσεως Θαλήταν φασὶν ἐξειργάσθαι ταῦτα· the context shows that Plutarch here deserts his guide, Glaucus, and sets up against him the traditions of other writers, we know not whom).

Now, from these testimonies we obtain the results, that Thaletas was younger than Archilochus and Terpander, but older than Polymnestus and Alcman, that he was the first of the poets of the second Spartan school of music, by whose influence the great Dorian festivals which have been mentioned were either established, or, what is the more probable meaning, were systematically arranged in respect of the choruses which were performed at them.

These conditions would all be satisfied by supposing that Thaletas began to flourish early in the seventh century B. C., provided that we accept the argument for an earlier date of Terpander than that usually assigned to him [TERPANDER]. To escape from the difficulty as Clinton does (F. H. vol. i. s. a. 644), by making Terpander later than Thaletas, is altogether inadmissible; for, if we reject Plutarch's account of the two musical schools at Sparta, the first founded by Terpander, and the second by Thaletas, the whole matter is thrown into hopeless confusion. Such a mistake, made by so eminent a chronologer, through following implicitly Eusebius and the Parian marble, is an excellent example of the danger of trusting to the positive statements of the chronographers in opposition to a connected chain of inference from more detailed testimonies. On the other hand, Müller, while pointing out Clinton's error, appears to us to place Thaletas much too low, in consequence of accepting the tradition recorded by Plutarch respecting Olympus, whom also he places later than Terpander (Hist. Lit. vol. i. pp. 158, 159). The fact is that we have no sufficient data for the time of Olympus; and even if we had, the tradition recorded by Plutarch is much too doubtful to be set up against the evidence derived from the relations of Thaletas to Archilochus and Alcman. When Müller says that Clinton "does not allow sufficient weight to the far more artificial character of the music and rhythms of Thaletas" (i. e. than those of Terpander), he seems to imply that a long time must necessarily have intervened between the two. Not only is there no ground for this idea, but it is opposed to analogy. There is no ground for it; for it is clear from all accounts that the second system of music was not gradually developed out of the first, by successive improvements, but was formed by the addition of new elements derived from other quarters, of which the first and chief were those introduced by Thaletas from Crete. It is also opposed to analogy, which teaches us that the period of most rapid improvement in any art is that in which it is first brought under the dominion of definite laws, by some great genius, whose first efforts are the signal for the appearance of a host of rivals, imitators, and pupils. Moreover, if there be any truth in the tradition, it would seem probable that Terpander and Thaletas were led to Sparta by very similar causes at no very distant period; and it seems most improbable that, after music had attained the degree of developement to which Terpander brought it at Sparta, the important additional elements, which existed in the Cretan system, should not have been introduced for a period of forty years, which is the interval placed by Müller between Terpander and Thaletas. Müller's mode of computing backwards the date of Thaletas from that of Sacadas (B. C. 590) is altogether arbitrary; but if such a method be allowable at all, surely thirty years is far too short a time to assign as the period during which the second school of Spartan music chiefly flourished. On the whole, decidedly as Clinton is wrong as to Terpander, he is probably near the mark in fixing the period of Thaletas at B. C. 690—660; though it might be better to say that he seems to have flourished about B. C. 670 or 660, and how much before or after those dates cannot be determined. It appears not unlikely that he was already distinguished in Crete, while Terpander flourished at Sparta.

The improvement effected in music by Thaletas appears to have consisted in the introduction into Sparta of that species of music and poetry which was associated with the religious rites of his native country; in which the calm and solemn worship of Apollo prevailed side by side with the more animated songs and dances of the Curetes, which resembled the Phrygian worship of the Magna Mater (Müller, p. 160). His chief compositions were paeans and hyporchemes, which belonged respectively to these two kinds of worship. In connection with the paean he introduced the rhythm of the Cretic foot, with its resolutions in the Paeons; and the Pyrrhic dance, with its several variations of rhythm, is also ascribed to him. He seems to have used both the lyre and the flute. (See Müller, pp. 160, 161.)

Plutarch and other writers speak of him as a lyric poet, and Suidas mentions, as his works, μέλη and ποιήματά τινα μυθικά, and it is pretty certain that the musical compositions of his age and school were often combined with suitable original poems, though sometimes, as we are expressly told of many of the nomes of Terpander, they were adapted to the verses of Homer and others of the older poets. Be this as it may, we have now no remains of the poetry of Thaletas. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 295—297; Müller, Hist. of the Lit. of Anc. Greece, vol. i. pp. 159—161; Ulrici, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. ii. pp. 212, foll., a very valuable account of Thaletas; Bernhardy, Geschichte der Griech. Lit. vol. i. pp. 267, 270, vol. ii. pp. 420, 421, 427.) [P. S.]

THALES (Θαλῆς) of Sicyon, a painter who is mentioned with the epithet μεγαλοφυής by Diogenes Laërtius (i. 38), on the authority of Demetrius Magnes. In the same passage, Diogenes speaks of another Thales, as mentioned in the work of Duris on painting; and it may be presumed, therefore, that this Thales was a painter; but whether the two were different persons, or the same person differently mentioned by Demetrius and by Duris, cannot be determined.

A curious passage respecting an artist of this name has been discovered by Osann, in an oration of Theodorus Hyrtacenus, published in Boissonade's Anecdota Graeca, vol. i. p. 156:—Ἕλληνες Φειδίαν Θαλῆν τε καὶ Ἀπελλῆν, τὸν μὲν λιθοξοϊκῆς, τὸν δ' αὖ πλαστικῆς, Ἀπελλῆν δὲ γραφικῆς ἕνεκα καὶ τῶν ἐκεῖθεν χαρίτων ἐθαύμαζον. It is certainly remarkable to find a statuary, otherwise unknown (or, if he be the same person as the painter, little better than unknown), placed by a late Byzantine writer on a level with Pheidias and Apelles. There is probably some error; but whether it rests with the author or the transcriber, and what is its correction, we have not the means of deciding. Perhaps Osann may have discussed the question, but we have no opportunity of referring to his paper in the Kunstblatt, which we mention on the authority of Raoul-Rochette, who only observes that "the difficulty is not serious, as there were many artists who practised at the same time statuary and painting," as if that were the difficulty! (Osann, Kunstblatt, 1832, No. 74; Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 415, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

THALE'TAS. [THALES.]

THALE'TIO or THALA'TIO, C. JU'NIUS, a freedman of Maecenas, is mentioned on an extant inscription as FLATURARIUS SIGILLARIARIUS, that is, a maker of small bronze figures. (Gruter, p. dcxxxviii. 6; Muratori, Thes. vol. ii. p. cmlxi. 4; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 414, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

THALIA. [THALEIA.]

THALLO (Θαλλώ), one of the Attic Horae, who was believed to grant prosperity to the young shoots of plants, and was also invoked in the political oath which the citizens of Athens had to take. (Paus. ix. 35. § 1; Pollux, Onom. viii. 106.) [L. S.]

THALLUS (Θαλλός), of Miletus, an epigrammatic poet, five of whose epigrams are preserved in the Greek Anthology. Of these the first is in honour of the birthday of a Roman emperor, or one of the imperial family (Καῖσαρ), on which account Bovinus supposes the poet to be the same person who is mentioned in an extant inscription as a freedman of Germanicus (Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscr. vol. iii. p. 361). The name is given in various forms in the titles to the epigrams; the first is inscribed simply Θάλλου, the second and fourth Θαλοῦ Μιλησίου, the fifth Θαλλοῦ Μιλησίου, and the third Θυηλάου, which is perhaps a corruption of Θύλλου. The form Θαλοῦ may be explained by considering Θαλλός and Θαλῆς as mere variations of the same word, as in many similar double forms; or perhaps it may have arisen from a confusion between the poet and the celebrated philosopher, Thales of Miletus; but there is no ground whatever for supposing that the two epigrams are to be ascribed to the philosopher. The name Θαλλός occurs in Athenian inscriptions. (Pape, Wörterbuch d. Griech. Eigennamen; Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 164; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. ii. p. 150, vol. xiii. p. 956; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 496.) [P. S.]

THALLUS, P. CORNE'LIUS, son of an architect of the same name, is designated MAG. QUINQ. i. e. Magister Quinquennalis, on a Latin inscription. Hence the father, and perhaps the son too, must be added to the lists of ancient artists. (Gruter, p. xcix. 9; Bracci, Memor. de' Incisor. vol. ii. p. 265; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 415, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

THALNA or TALNA*, JUVE'NTIUS. 1. T. JUVENTIUS THALNA, praetor B. C. 194. He is, perhaps, the same as the T. Juventius who was sent, with two other commissioners, in B. C. 172, to purchase corn in Apulia and Calabria, for the use of the army and fleet in the war against Perseus. (Liv. xxxiv. 42, 43, xlii. 27.)

2. L. JUVENTIUS THALNA, served in Spain in B. C. 185, as legatus to the praetor Calpurnius Piso. (Liv. xxxix. 31, 38.)

3. M'. JUVENTIUS L. F. T. N. THALNA, son of No. 2, was tribune of the plebs B. C. 170, when, in conjunction with his colleague Cn. Aufidius, he accused the praetor C. Lucretius, on account of his tyrannical and oppressive conduct in Greece. He was praetor in B. C. 167, and obtained the jurisdictio inter peregrinos; and in this year he proposed to the people, without previously consulting the senate, that war should be declared against the Rhodians, in hopes of obtaining the command himself. His proposition was vehemently opposed by the tribunes M. Antonius and M. Pomponius. He was consul in B. C. 163, with Ti. Sempronius Gracchus, and carried on war against the Corsicans, whom he subdued. The senate in consequence voted him the honour of a thanksgiving; and he was so overcome with joy at the intelligence, which he received as he was offering a sacrifice, that he dropt down dead on the spot. (Liv. xliii. 8, xlv. 16, 21; Fasti Capitol.; Obseq. 73; Titulus Terent. Heautont.; Val. Max. ix. 12. § 3; Plin. H. N. vii. 53.)

4. (JUVENTIUS) THALNA, one of the judices at the trial of Clodius, in B. C. 61, was bribed by the latter. (Cic. ad Att. i. 16. § 6.)

5. (JUVENTIUS) THALNA, who appears to be a different person from No. 4, is mentioned by Cicero in his correspondence in B. C. 45, and again in B. C. 44. (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 29, xvi. 6.)

THA'LPIUS (Θάλπιος), a son of Eurytus, and one of the leaders of the Epeians in the Trojan war. (Hom. Il. ii. 620; Paus. v. 3. § 4.) [L. S.]

THA'MYRIS (Θάμυρις), an ancient Thracian bard, was a son of Philammon and the nymph Argiope. He went so far in his conceit as to think that he could surpass the Muses in song; in consequence of which he was deprived of his sight and of the power of singing. (Hom. Il. ii. 595, &c.; Apollod. i. 3. § 3; Paus. iv. 33. § 4, x. 7. § 2; Eurip. Rhes. 925.) He was represented with a broken lyre in his hand. (Paus. ix. 30. § 2.) [L. S.]

THA'MYRUS or THA'MYRAS (Θάμυρος, Θαμύρας), artists. 1. A gem-engraver, two of whose works are extant, one of which is a fine cameo, in the antique style, representing an infant seated, a subject which, from the numerous repetitions of it on ancient gems, is thought by R. Rochette to be copied from some celebrated work of art. (Stosch, pl. lxix.; Bracci, vol. ii. pl. cxiii.; Caylus, Recueil, pl. xlv. n. 2; Eckhel, Pierr. grav. de Vienne, pl. xxx.; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 156.)

A discussion has been raised respecting the true form of this name. Köhler (Einleitung, p. 13) blames Visconti for calling the gem-engraver Thamyrus instead of Thamyras. Of course ΘΑΜΥΡΟΥ, on the gems, might be taken as the genitive of either; but Stosch and R. Rochette decide in favour of Thamyrus on the evidence of the inscription. The truth, however, seems to be that Thamyrus is merely the Latin form of Θαμύρας, which is the genuine Greek, and which is only a variation of Θάμυρις. (Pape, Wörterbuch d. Griech. Eigennamen.) [P. S.]

THA'NATOS (Θάνατος), Latin Mors, a personification of Death. In the Homeric poems Death does not appear as a distinct divinity, though he is described as the brother of Sleep, together with whom he carries the body of Sarpedon from the field of battle to the country of the Lycians. (Il. xvi. 672, xiv. 231.) In Hesiod (Theog. 211, &c. 756) he is a son of Night and a brother of Ker and Sleep, and Death and Sleep reside in the lower world. (Comp. Virg. Aen. vi. 277.) In the Alcestis of Euripides, where Death comes upon the stage, he appears as an austere priest of Hades in a dark robe and with the sacrificial sword, with which he cuts off a lock of a dying person, and devotes it to the lower world. (Alcest. 75, 843, 845.) On the whole, later poets describe Death as a sad or terrific being (Horat. Carm. i. 4. 13, Sat. ii. 1. 58), but the best artists of the Greeks, avoiding any thing that might be displeasing, abandoned the ideas suggested to them by the poets, and represented Death under a more pleasing aspect. On the chest of Cypselus, Night was represented with two boys, one black and the other white (Paus. v. 18. § 1), and at Sparta there were statues of both Death and Sleep. (iii. 18. § 1.) Both were usually represented as slumbering youths, or as genii with torches turned upside down. There are traces of sacrifices having been offered to Death (Serv. ad Aen. xi. 197; Stat. Theb. iv. 528; Lucan, vi. 600; Philostr. Vit. Apoll. v. 4), but no temples are mentioned anywhere. Comp. the excellent Treatise of Lessing, Wie die Alten den Tod gebildet. [L. S.]

THARYPS or THA'RYPAS (Θάρυψ, Θαρύπας), king of the Molossians, is mentioned by Thucydides (ii. 80) as a minor in B. C. 429. He was the father of ALCETAS I., and is said to have been the first to introduce Hellenic civilization among his subjects. (Paus. i. 11; Plut. Pyrrh. 1.) Plutarch (l. c.) calls him Tharrhytas. [E. E.]

THASUS (Θάσος), a son of Poseidon, or Cilix or Agenor, was one of those who set out from Phoenicia in search of Europa, and thus founded the town of Thasos. (Herod. ii. 44, vi. 47; Paus. v. 25. § 7; Apollod. iii. 1. § 1.) [L. S.]

THAU'MACUS (Θαύμακος), the father of Poas, from whom the town of Thaumacia in Magnesia was believed to have received its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Θαυμακία; compare Hom. Il. ii. 716.) [L. S.]

THAUMAS (Θαύμας), a son of Pontus and Ge, and by the Oceanide Electra, the father of Iris and the Harpies. (Hes. Theog. 237, 265, &c.; Callim. Hymn. in Del. 67; Ov. Met. iv. 479, xiv. 845.) There is also mention of a Centaur Thaumas. (Ov. Met. xii. 304.) [L. S.]

THEAETE'TUS (Θεαίτητος), a Rhodian, who was one of the leaders of the party in his native city favourable to the Roman cause. He is first mentioned as accompanying Philophron on an embassy to the ten Roman deputies, who after the defeat of Antiochus settled the affairs of Asia, B. C. 189. (Polyb. xxiii. 3.) During the war between the Romans and Perseus, his name is again repeatedly associated with that of Philophron: their efforts to oppose all concessions to the Macedonian king and his partisans, have been already related. [PHILOPHRON.] Hence when the defeat of Perseus gave the decided preponderance to the Roman party, the Rhodians hastened to appoint Theaetetus their admiral, an office of the highest rank in that naval republic, and at the same time sent him as their ambassador to Rome, to intercede in favour of his native city. But the advanced age of their deputy frustrated their intentions: Theaetetus, who was above 80 years old, dying at Rome before the senate had come to a decision concerning his countrymen. (Polyb. xxvii. 11, xxviii. 2, 14, xxix. 5, xxx. 5, 19.) [E. H. B.]

THEAETE'TUS (Θεαίτητος), literary. 1. A Pythagorean philosopher, who legislated for the Locrians. (Iamblich. Vit. Pyth. 30; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 876, vol. ii. p. 38.)

2. An Athenian, the son of Euphronius of Sunium, is introduced as one of the speakers in Plato's Theaetetus and Sophistes, in which dialogues he is spoken of as a noble, courageous, and well-disposed youth; in person somewhat like Socrates; and ardent in the pursuit of knowledge, especially in the study of geometry. (Plat. Theaet. pp. 143, 144, et alib.; Sophist. passim; Polit. pp. 257, 258, p. 266, a.) Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 29) mentions him as an example of the happy effects of the teaching of Socrates. Eusebius (Chron.) places "Theaetetus the mathematician" at Ol. 85, B. C. 440, a date which can only be accepted as referring, not to the time when he really flourished, but when, as a mere youth, he became the disciple of Socrates. (Comp. Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 78, note.)

3. A poet of the Greek Anthology, of whom we only know with certainty that he lived at or after the time of the Academic philosopher Crantor, his epitaph upon whom is preserved by Diogenes Laërtius (iv. 25). Crantor flourished about Ol. 116, B. C. 316. Six epigrams of his are contained in the Greek Anthology (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 251, vol. iii. p. 131, Lection. p. 189; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. ii. p. 227, vol. xiii. p. 957; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 496.)

4. Scholasticus, an epigrammatist of the time of Justinian, as is clearly proved by the references in his epigrams to Domninus, who was prefect of the city under Justin I. (Ep. 5), and to Julianus Antecessor (Ep. 6). Reiske confounded him with the former epigrammatist of the same name (No. 2). The Medicean library contains a MS. tract περὶ ἀττικῶν ὀνομάτων under the name of Theaetetus Scholasticus (Bandini, Catal. vol. ii. p. 368); and Suidas (s. v. Οὐδὲν πρὸς τὸν Διόνυσον) mentions a work on Proverbs (περὶ παροιμιῶν) by a certain Theaetetus. (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 514; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 214, vol. xiii. p. 957; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 496.) [P. S.]

THEA'GENES (Θεαγένης), historical. 1. Tyrant of Megara. He obtained his power probably about B. C. 630, having espoused the part of the commonalty against the nobles. He is said to have gained their confidence by violent aggressions on the wealthy proprietors, whose cattle he destroyed in their pastures. (Arist. Pol. v. 4, 5, Rhet. i. 2, 7.) Mr. Malden (Hist. of Rome, p. 153, "Library of Useful Knowledge,") supposes that these were public lands. By these outrages, and other demagogic arts, he gained the enthusiastic attachment of the commonalty, and by a vote of the people obtained a body of guards, by whose aid he overthrew the oligarchy, and made himself tyrant. He was, however, driven out before his death. He gave his daughter in marriage to Cylon. [CYLON.] Pausanias (i. 40. § 1, i. 41. § 2) mentions some public works which he erected in Megara. Like most of the other tyrants, he, doubtless, found it expedient to foster industry and the arts. But from the picture which some time after Theognis gives of the state of the country, it does not seem that the people generally were permanently benefited by the reign of Theagenes. (Thirlwall, Hist. of Greece, vol. i. p. 428; Grote, Hist. of Greece, vol. iii. p. 59.)

2. A Thasian, the son of Timosthenes, renowned for his extraordinary strength and swiftness. At the age of nine years he was said to have carried home a brazen statue of a god from the agora. As he grew up he became distinguished in every species of athletic contest, and gained numerous victories at the Olympian, Pythian, Nemean, and Isthmian games. Altogether he was said to have won 1300 crowns. (Paus. vi. 11. § 2, &c.; Plut. Reip. gerend. Praecept. p. 811.) He gained one victory at Olympia in the 75th Olympiad, B. C. 480. (Paus. vi. 6. § 5.) The popular story among the Thasians was, that Hercules was his father. A curious story is told by Pausanias (vi. 11. § 6, &c.) about a statue of Theagenes, which a man, who had a spite against him, scourged by way of revenge, till one night it fell upon, and killed him; upon which the statue was thrown into the sea, but was very fortunately fished up again by some fishermen, for barrenness had come upon the country, and the Delphic oracle had declared that it would not be removed till they restored Theagenes. Pausanias mentions having seen many statues of Theagenes among both the Greeks and the Barbarians. (vi. 11. § 9.)

3. General of the Theban forces at the battle of Chaeroneia (B.C. 338). Deinarchus (in Dem. § 75) brands him as a traitor, but according to Plutarch (Alex. 12), he fell in the battle.

4. An Athenian, a contemporary of the philosopher Marinus. He was distinguished for his liberality and his enormous wealth, which he employed in helping needy persons and restoring decayed towns. The philosophers and literary men of his day found in him a munificent, though rather imperious patron. (Suid. s. v. Θεαγ.; Damasc. ap. Phot. p. 346, a. ed. Bekker.) [C. P. M.]

THEA'GENES (Θεαγένης), literary. 1. A native of Rhegium, who was contemporary with Cambyses. (Tatianus, adv. Graec. p. 105; Euseb. Praep. Evang. x. 11.) He was one of the earliest writers on Homer and his works (l. c.; Suid. s. v. Θεαγ.; Fabr. Bibl. Gr. i. pp. 525, 321).

2. An historical writer, of uncertain date. Stephanus of Byzantium frequently quotes from a work of his, entitled Μακεδονικά (s. v. Ἄλτος, Βάλλα, &c), as also from another entitled Καρικά (s. v. Κασταλία). It is, perhaps, this same Theagenes, who wrote a work on Aegina, quoted by Tzetzes (ad Lycoph. 176; Schol. Pind. Nem. iii. 21; Clinton, Fasti Hellen. vol. ii. p. 369, note 1).

3. A Greek grammarian, a native of Cnidus, who was one of the instructors of Herodes Atticus in criticism. (Philost. Vit. Soph. 13, p. 243, ed. Kayser.) [C. P. M.]

THEAGES (Θεάγης). 1. A Pythagorean philosopher, the author of a work on virtue (Περὶ ἀρετῆς), from which Stobaeus (Serm. i. 67—69) has preserved some extracts. Fabricius (vol. i. p. 876) identifies him with the Theages mentioned by Iamblichus (Pyth. Vit. 257). There is no evidence to decide the question.

2. The son of Demodocus, is introduced by Plato in the dialogue Theages which takes its name from him. [C. P. M.]

THEANO (Θεανώ). 1. One of the Danaides. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5.)

2. A daughter of Cisseus, the wife of Antenor, and priestess of Athena at Ilion. (Hom. Il. v. 70, vi. 298, xi. 224; Dict. Cret. v. 8.) She was painted by Polygnotus in the Lesche of Delphi. (Paus. x. 27.)

3. The wife of Metapontus, king of Icaria. (Hygin. Fab. 186; comp. AEOLUS.) [L. S.]

THEANO (Θεανώ). 1. The most celebrated of the female philosophers of the Pythagorean school, appears to have been the wife of Pythagoras, and the mother by him of Telauges, Mnesarchus, Myia, and Arignote; but the accounts respecting her were various. Some made her a daughter of Pythonax of Crete, others of Brontinus of Croton, while, according to others, she was the wife of Brontinus, and the disciple of Pythagoras. Her traditional fame for wisdom and virtue was of the highest order, and some interesting sayings are ascribed to her by Diogenes Laërtius, and by Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. iv. p. 522). Diogenes also informs us that she left some writings, but he does not mention their titles. Suidas ascribes to her ὑπομνήματα φιλόσοφα καὶ ἀποφθέγματα καὶ ποίημά τι δι' ἐπῶν. Several interesting letters are still extant under her name; and, though it is now universally admitted that they cannot be genuine, they are valuable remains of a period of considerable antiquity. They were first edited in the Aldine collection of Greek Epistles, Venet. 1499, 4to.; then in the similar collection of Cujacius, Aurel. Allob. 1606, fol.; then in Gale's Opuscula Mythologica, pp. 84, foll. Cantab. 1671, Amst. 1688; then, far more accurately in Wolf's Mulierum Graecarum Fragmenta, pp. 162, foll. 1739, 4to.; and lastly in Io. Conrad Orelli's Socratis et Socraticorum, Pythagorae et Pythagoreorum, quae feruntur Epistolae, pp. 55, foll. Lips. 1815, 8vo.; the Greek text is also printed with Wieland's admirable translation of the letters, Leipz. 1791, 8vo. Wieland's translation is reprinted at the end of Orelli's work. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 42, foll.; Suid. s. v.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 687, 884; Orelli, ut sup. cit. p. 307.)

Suidas mentions another Theano, of Metapontum or Thurium, also a Pythagorean, the wife of Carystus or Croton or Brontinus; who wrote works on Pythagoras, on Virtue addressed to Hippodamus of Thurium, παραινέσεις γυναικείας, and ἀποφθέγματα Πυθαγορείων. It is pretty clear, however, that this is only another account, somewhat more confused, of the celebrated Theano. (Comp. Fabric. vol. i. p. 885.)

3. A Locrian lyric poetess of this name is mentioned by Suidas (s. v.) and Eustathius (ad Il. ii. p. 327. 10). Ulrici supposes that she lived in the fifth century (Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. ii. p. 473). [P. S.]

THEA'RIDAS (Θεαρίδας). 1. A citizen of Megalopolis, who was taken prisoner by Cleomenes, when he surprised that city in B.C. 224. He united with Lysandridas, another of the captives, in persuading the conqueror to offer favourable terms to their fellow-citizens who had escaped to Messene, to which Cleomenes had the magnanimity to consent: but the Megalopolitans refused his overtures, and repulsed Lysandridas and Thearidas with indignation as traitors to their country. (Plut. Cleom. 24.)

2. An Achaean who was sent by his countrymen as ambassador to Rome in B.C. 159. (Polyb. xxxii. 17.) In B.C. 147, he was again placed at the head of an embassy which was designed to excuse the insult offered to the Roman legate Aurelius Orestes, but having on his way to Italy met with the Roman deputy Sex. Julius Caesar, who was appointed to investigate the subject, he was compelled to return with him to Achaia. (Id. xxxviii. 2.) [E. H. B.]

THEA'RIDES (Θεαρίδης), a Syracusan, son of Hermocrates and brother of Dionysius the elder, tyrant of Syracuse. He is first mentioned in B.C. 390, when he was appointed by Dionysius to succeed his brother Leptines in the command of the fleet. The next year he commanded an expedition to the Liparaean islands, where he captured ten ships belonging to the Rhegians. Again in B.C. 388 he was chosen by his brother to conduct the magnificent procession which Dionysius sent to the Olympic festival. (Diod. xiv 102, 103, 109.) [E. H. B.]

THEBE (Θήβη). 1. A daughter of Prometheus, from whom the Boeotian Thebes was believed to have derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v.)

2. A daughter of Asopus and Metope, the daughter of Ladon, became by Zeus the mother of Zethus. She, too, is said to have given her name to the city of Thebes. (Apollod. iii. 5. § 6; Paus. ii. 5. § 2, v. 22. § 5; Pind. Isthm. viii. 37; Diod. iv. 72.) [L. S.]

THEIA (Θεία). 1. A daughter of Uranus and Ge, one of the female Titans, became by Hyperion the mother of Helios, Eos, and Selene, that is, she was regarded as the deity from which all light proceeded. (Hes. Theog. 135, 371; Pind. Isthm. v. 1; Apollod. i. 1. § 3, 2. § 2; Catull. 66. 44.)

2. A daughter of Oceanus and mother of the Cercopes. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1864; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 91.) [L. S.]

THEIAS (Θείας), a king of the Assyrians, and father of Smyrna, the mother of Adonis. (Apollod. iii. 14. § 4; Anton. Lib. 34; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 829; comp. ADONIS.) [L. S.]

THEIO'DAMAS (Θειοδάμας), the father of Hylas, and king of the Dryopes. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 7; Apollon. Rhod. i. 1213, and his Schol. on i. 1207; Propert. i. 20. 6: comp. HYLAS.) [L. S.]

THEIODAS. [THEUDAS.]

THEISOA (Θεισόα), one of the nymphs who brought up the infant Zeus, was worshipped at Theisoa in Arcadia. (Paus. viii. 38. §§ 3, 7, 47. § 2.) [L. S.]

THELXION (Θελξίων), in conjunction with Telchin, murdered Apis, when he attempted to subjugate Peloponnesus; but they themselves were slain in return by Argus Panoptes. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 1, &c.) Pausanias (ii. 5. § 5) calls him a son of Apis and the father of Aegyrus. [L. S.]

THEMIS (Θέμις). 1. A daughter of Uranus (others say Helios, Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 129) and Ge, was married to Zeus, by whom she became the mother of the Horae, Eunomia, Dice (Astraea), Eirene, and the Moerae. (Hes. Theog. 135, 901, &c.; Apollod. i. 3. § 1.) In the Homeric poems, Themis is the personification of the order of things established by law, custom, and equity, whence she is described as reigning in the assemblies of men (Od. ii. 68, &c.), and as convening, by the command of Zeus, the assembly of the gods. (Il. xx. 4.) She dwells in Olympus, and is on friendly terms with Hera. (xv. 87, &c.) This character of Themis was recognised in the fact that at Thebes she had a sanctuary in common with the Moerae and Zeus Agoraeus (Paus. ix. 25. § 4), and at Olympia in common with the Horae. (Paus. v. 14. § 8, 17. § 1; comp. Diod. v. 67.) Besides this she is also described as an ancient prophetic divinity, and is said to have been in possession of the Delphic oracle as the successor of Ge, and previous to Apollo. (Ov. Met. i. 321, iv. 642; Apollon. Rhod. iv. 800; Serv. ad Aen. iv. 246; Apollod. i. 4. § 1; Paus. x. 5. § 3; Aeschyl. Eum. init.) The worship of Themis was established at Thebes, Olympia, Athens (Paus. i. 22. § 1), at Tanagra (ix. 22. § 1), and at Troezene, where an altar was dedicated to the Themides. (ii. 31. § 8.) Nymphs believed to be daughters of Zeus and Themis lived in a cave on the river Eridanus (Apollod. ii. 5. § 11; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1396; Hesych. s. v. Θεμιστιάδες), and the Hesperides also are called daughters of Zeus and Themis. (Schol. ad Eurip. Hippol. 737.) She is often represented on coins resembling the figure of Athena with a cornucopia and a pair of scales. (Gellius, xiv. 4; Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb. p. 112; Müller, Anc. Art and its Rem. § 406.)

2. A daughter of Ilus and the wife of Capys, by whom she became the mother of Anchises. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 2.) [L. S.]

THEMIS or THEOMIS, the name of a poet to whom some late Greek writers ascribe the invention of tragedy, is probably nothing more than a corruption of Thespis. (Bode, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. iii. pt. 1. p. 34.) [P. S.]

THE'MISON (Θεμίσων). 1. A merchant of the island of Thera, who, according to the Cyrenaean accounts of the foundation of their city, was the instrument made use of by Etearchus, king of Axus, for the destruction of his daughter Phronime. [ETEARCHUS.] Themison, however, evaded the fulfilment of the oath by which he had involuntarily bound himself to drown Phronime, and carried her in safety to Thera. (Herod. iv. 154.)

2. A tyrant of Eretria who in B. C. 366 assisted the exiles of Oropus in recovering possession of their native city. They succeeded in occupying it by surprise, but the Athenians having marched against them with their whole force, Themison was unable to cope with their power, and called in the Thebans to his assistance, who received possession of the city as a deposit, but afterwards refused to give it up. (Diod. xv. 76; Xen. Hell. vii. 4. § 1; Dem. de Cor. p. 259.)

3. Of Samos, a naval officer in the service of Antigonus, king of Asia. In B.C. 315 we find him joining that chief in Phoenicia, with a fleet of forty ships from the Hellespont, and again in 306 he is mentioned as commanding a part of the fleet of Demetrius, in the great sea-fight off Salamis in Cyprus. (Diod. xix. 62, xx. 50.)

4. A Cyprian, who enjoyed a high place in the favour of Antiochus II. king of Syria, which he had earned by the basest means as the minister and companion of his abandoned pleasures. The king is said to have committed to him and his brother Aristus, the whole administration of affairs, and not only presented Themison to the people on public occasions in the garb of Heracles, but caused sacrifices to be offered to him under that title. (Athen. vii. p. 289, x. p. 438, c; Aelian. V. H ii. 41.)

5. An officer in the service of Antiochus the Great, who commanded the cavalry which formed the left wing of his army at the battle of Raphia, B.C. 217. (Polyb. v. 79, 82.) [E. H. B.]

THE'MISON (Θεμίσων), the name of probably three physicians. 1. The founder of the ancient medical sect of the Methodici, and one of the most eminent physicians of his time, was a native of Laodiceia in Syria (Pseudo-Gal. Introd. c. 4. vol. xiv. p. 684). He was a pupil of Asclepiades of Bithynia (Pliny, H. N. xxix. 5), and must have lived, therefore, in the first century B. C. Augustin, in his Gesch. der Med. in tabellarischer Form, says he was born B. C. 123, and died B. C. 43, which may possibly be quite correct, though he has not stated his reasons for giving such exact dates. Nothing more is known of the events of his life, except that he seems to have travelled a good deal; as he mentions Crete and Milan, apparently as an eye-witness (ap. Cael. Aurel. De Morb. Acut. iii. 18, p. 252). Neither is it certain whether he ever visited Rome, though it is perhaps more probable that he did so. He differed from his tutor on several points in his old age, and became the founder of a new sect called the "Methodici," which long exercised an extensive influence on medical science. (Cels. De Med. i. praef. p. 5; Galen, De Meth. Med. i. 4, 7. vol. x. pp. 35, 52; Cramer's Anecd. Graeca Paris. vol. i. p. 395, where he is called by an obvious mistake Μεθήσων). He wrote several medical works, but in what language is not mentioned; of these only the titles and a few fragments remain, preserved principally by Caelius Aurelianus: e. g.—1. "Libri Periodici." 2. "Epistolae," in at least nine* books. 3. "Celeres Passiones," and 4. "Tardae Passiones," each in at least two books. 5. "Liber Salutaris." 6. "De Plantagine." (Plin. H. N. xxv. 39; Macer Flor. De Vir. Herb. c. 6. v. 265.) To these works Fabricius adds one, "De Elephantiasi" (Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 432, ed. vet.), but this is probably a mistake (see Cael. Aurel. De Morb. Chron. iv. 1. p. 493). An account of the doctrines of the Methodici is given in the Dictionary of Antiquities, and his medical opinions on different subjects (so far as they can be ascertained) may be found in Haller's Biblioth. Medic. Pract. vol. i., or in Sprengel's Hist. de la Méd. vol. ii. The only points worth noticing here, are, that he is perhaps the first physician who made use of leeches (Cael. Aurel. De Morb. Chron. i. 1. p. 286); and that he is said to have been himself attacked with hydrophobia, and to have recovered (id. De Morb. Acut. iii. 16. p. 232; Dioscor. De Venen. Animal. c. 1. vol. ii. p. 59). Eudemus and Proculus are said to have been followers ("sectatores") of Themison, but this probably only means that they belonged to the sect of the Methodici (Cael. Aurel. De Morb. Acut. ii. 38, De Morb. Chron. iii. 8. pp. 171, 469). Besides the passages in ancient authors relating to Themison that are referred to by Haller, Sprengel, and Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 431, ed. vet.), he is also quoted by Soranus (De Arte Obstetr. pp. 12, 21, 210, 212, 240, 290.)

2. The physician mentioned by Juvenal in his well-known line

"Quot Themison aegros autumno occiderit uno."
(Sat. x. 221.)

is by many commentators (perhaps by most) considered to be the same person as the founder of the Methodici. However, it seems hardly probable that Juvenal would have cared for satyrizing a physician who was not a contemporary; and therefore perhaps the old scholiast on Juvenal is right in saying that he was "archiater illius temporis," i. e. in the first century after Christ.

3. A slave of Appuleius, the author of the "Golden Ass," who lived in the second century after Christ. (Appul. Apol. pp. 39, 46, 55, ed. 1635.)

Haller mentions in his list of physicians "Themison Macedo, Antiocho carus," and refers to Athen. vii. [§ 35. p. 289], but this appears to be a mistake. [W. A. G.]

THE'MISON (Θεμίσων) the author of a work entitled Παλληνίς, which is cited by Athenaeus (vi. p. 235, a).

THEMISTA (Θεμιστή), of Lampsacus, the wife of a certain Leonteus or Leon, was a contemporary and correspondent of Epicurus, and was celebrated herself as a philosopher. (Diog. Laërt. x. 5, with the note of Menagius; Cic. in Pison. 26, de Fin. ii. 21; Lactant. iii. 25.)

THEMISTA'GORAS (Θεμισταγόρας), the author of a work entitled the Golden Book (χρυσέη βίβλος), which appears to have been partly of an historical nature. (Athen. xv. p. 681, a; Etym. s. v. Ἀστυπαλαία.)

THEMI'STIUS (Θεμίστιος). 1. The distinguished philosopher and rhetorician, surnamed Euphrades on account of his eloquence, was a Paphlagonian, the son of Eugenius, who was also a distinguished philosopher, and who is more than once mentioned in the orations of Themistius. He flourished, first at Constantinople and afterwards at Rome, in the reigns of Constantius, Julian, Jovian, Valens, Gratian, and Theodosius; and he enjoyed the favour of all those emperors, notwithstanding their diversities of character and opinion, and notwithstanding the fact that he himself was not a Christian. Themistius was instructed by his father in philosophy, and devoted himself chiefly to Aristotle, though he also studied the systems of Pythagoras and Plato. While still a youth he wrote commentaries on Aristotle, which were made public without his consent, and obtained for him a high reputation. He passed his youth in Asia Minor and Syria. He first met with Constantius when the emperor visited Ancyra in Galatia in the eleventh year of his reign, B. C. 347, on which occasion Themistius delivered the first of his extant orations, περὶ φιλανθρωπίας. It was not long after that he fixed his residence at Constantinople, where he taught philosophy for twenty years. In A. D. 355 he was made a senator; and the letter is still extant, in which Constantius recommends him to the senate, and speaks in the highest terms both of Themistius himself and of his father. We also possess the oration of thanks which Themistius addressed to the senate of Constantinople early in A.D. 356, in reply to the emperor's letter (Orat. ii.). In A. D. 357 he recited in the senate of Constantinople two orations in honour of Constantius, which were intended to have been delivered before the emperor himself, who was then at Rome (Orat. iii. iv.). As the reward of his panegyrics, Constantius conferred upon him the honour of a bronze statue; and, in A. D. 361, he was appointed to the praetorian dignity by a decree still extant, in which he is mentioned in the following terms, Themistius, cujus auget scientia dignitatem (Cod. Theodos. vi. tit. 4. s. 12; comp. Orat. xxxi., in which Themistius says, ἀρκεῖ μοι Κωνστάντιος, ὁ κόσμον τῆς ἑαυτοῦ βασιλείας τὴν ἐμὴν φιλοσοφίαν εἰπὼν πολλάκις, and in which he also recites the compliments paid to him by Julian, Valens, Gratian, and Theodosius). Constantius died in A. D. 361; but Themistius, as a philosopher and a heathen, naturally retained the favour of Julian, who spoke of him as the worthy senator of the whole world, and as the first philosopher of his age. (Themist. Orat. xxxi.) Suidas (s. v.) states that Julian made Themistius prefect of Constantinople; but this is disproved by the speech delivered by Themistius, when he was really appointed to that office under Theodosius. (See below.) The error of Suidas simply arises from his placing together, with his usual carelessness, two distinct facts in the life of Themistius. Shortly before the death of Julian, A.D. 363, Themistius delivered an oration in honour of him, which is no longer extant, but which is referred to at some length by Libanius, in a letter to Themistius (Ep. 1061). In A.D. 364 he went, as one of the deputies from the senate, to meet Jovian at Dadastana, on the confines of Galatia and Bithynia, and to confer the consulate upon him; and on this occasion he delivered an oration, which he afterwards repeated at Constantinople, in which he claims full liberty of conscience both for the Christians and the heathen. (Orat. v.; Socrat. H. E. iii. 26.) In the same year he delivered an oration at Constantinople, in honour of the accession of Valentinian and Valens, in the presence of the latter. His next oration is addressed to Valens, congratulating him on his victory over Procopius in June 366, and interceding for some of the rebels; it was delivered in A. D. 367. (Orat. vii.) In the next year he accompanied Valens to the Danube in the second campaign of the Gothic war, and delivered before the emperor, at Marcianopolis, a congratulatory oration upon his Quinquennalia, A.D. 368. (Orat. viii.) His next orations are to the young Valentinian upon his consulship, A. D. 369 (Orat. ix.), and to the senate of Constantinople, in the presence of Valens, in honour of the peace granted to the Goths, B. C. 370 (Orat. x.). On March 28, A. D. 373, he addressed to Valens, who was then in Syria, a congratulatory address upon the emperor's entrance on the tenth year of his reign (Orat. xi.). It was also while Valens was in Syria, that Themistius addressed to him an oration by which he persuaded him to cease from his persecution of the Catholic party. (Socrat. H. E. iv. 32; Sozom. H. E. vi. 36.) It is thought by the best critics that this oration is lost, and that the extant oration to Valens on behalf of religious liberty (Orat. xii.) was delivered at some other time, probably soon after the emperor's accession. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 797.) In addition to these numerous orations, which prove that the orator was in high favour with the emperor, we have the testimony of Themistius himself to his influence with Valens. (Orat. xxxi. where the words, ἡττηθεὶς ὑπὸ τῶν ἐμῶν λόγων πολλάκις, seem to refer to such examples of the orator's power as that mentioned just above.)

* The passage quoted by Paulus Aegineta (iii. 15. p. 426), from Epist. lib. x. is quoted by Caelius Aurelianus (De Morb. Chron. i. 3. p. 288), from lib. ii.

In A. D. 377 we find him at Rome, whither he appears to have gone on an embassy to Gratian, to whom he there delivered his oration entitled Ἐρωτικός (Orat. xiii.). On the association of Theodosius in the empire by Gratian, at Sirmium, in A. D. 379, Themistius delivered an elegant oration, congratulating the new emperor on his elevation (Orat. xiv.). Of his remaining orations some are public and some private; but few of them demand special notice as connected with the events of his life. In A. D. 384, about the first of September, he was made prefect of Constantinople (Orat. xvii.), an office which had been offered to him, but declined, several times before (Orat. xxxiv. 13). He only held the prefecture a few months, as we learn from an oration delivered after he had laid down the office (Orat. xxxiv.), in which he mentions, as he had done even six years earlier (Orat. xiv.), and more than once in the interval (Or. xv. xvi.), his old age and ill-health. From the 34th oration we also learn that he had previously held the offices of princeps senatus and praefectus annonae, besides his embassy to Rome; in another oration he mentions ten embassies on which he had been sent before his prefecture (Orat. xvii.); and in another, composed probably about A. D. 387, he says that he has been engaged for nearly forty years in public business and in embassies (Orat. xxi.). So great was the confidence reposed in him by Theodosius, that, though Themistius was a heathen, the emperor, when departing for the West to oppose Maximus, entrusted his son Arcadius to the tutorship of the philosopher, A. D. 387—388. (Socrat. H. E. iv. 32; Sozom. H. E. vi. 36; Niceph. H. E. xi. 46.) We have no particulars of the history of Themistius after this time; and it may therefore be inferred that his life did not extend much, if at all, beyond A. D. 390. Besides the emperors, to whom so many references have been made, he numbered among his friends the chief orators and philosophers of the age, Christian as well as heathen. Not only Libanius, but Gregory of Nazianzus also was his friend and correspondent, and the latter, in an epistle still extant, calls him the "king of arguments" (βασιλέα λόγων, Greg. Naz. Epist. 140).

The orations (πολιτικοὶ λόγοι) of Themistius, extant in the time of Photius, were thirty-six in number (Phot. Bibl. Cod. 74), of which thirty-three have come down to us in the original Greek, and one in a Latin version. The other two were supposed to be lost, until one of them was discovered by Cardinal Maio, in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, in 1816. His philosophical works must have been very voluminous; for Photius (l. c.) tells us that he wrote commentaries (ὑπομνήματα) on all the books of Aristotle, besides useful abstracts (μεταφράσεις) of the Analytics, the books on the Soul, and the Physics, and that there were exegetical labours of his on Plato; "and, in a word, he is a lover and eager student of philosophy" (ἐραστής ἐστι καὶ σπουδαστὴς φιλοσοφίας). Suidas mentions his Paraphrase of the Physics of Aristotle, in eight books; of the Analytics, in two books; of the Apodeictics, in two books; of the treatise on the Soul, in seven books; and of the Categories in one book. Of these, we have the Paraphrases of the Second Analytics, of the Physics, of the treatise on the Soul, and of the works on Memory and Recollection, on Sleeping and Waking, on Dreams, and on Divination in Sleep. Besides these, which are in the original Greek, we have two other commentaries in Latin, translated from Hebrew versions of the originals, namely, that on the work on Heaven, translated by Moses Alatinus, and that on the twelve books of the Metaphysics, translated by Moses Finzius.

The earliest editions of Themistius contained only the philosophical works, in the Latin version of Hermolaus Barbarus, which was first published at Venice, 1481, fol., and reprinted, Venet. 1502, fol., 1520, fol., 1527, fol., Paris, 1528—1529, fol., Basil. 1530, fol., 1533, 4to., Venet. 1554, fol., 1559, fol., 1570, fol.: the last is the most complete of the old editions. The two commentaries which only exist in Latin were published at Venice in 1574 and 1576 respectively, both in folio.

Of the Greek text the Editio Princeps is that of Aldus, 1534, fol., containing the Paraphrases and eight Orations, together with the treatises of Alexander Aphrodisiensis on the Soul and on Fate. There has been no subsequent edition of the whole works, or of the Paraphrases; but the Orations have been since published, by H. Stephanus, whose edition contains thirteen of them, Paris, 1562, 8vo.; by G. Remus, who reprinted, with a Latin version, only the six orations which Stephanus had published for the first time, and a seventh in Latin only, Amberg, 1605, 4to.; by Petavius, who printed sixteen, in Greek and Latin, fifteen of which had been hitherto ascribed to Synesius, besides a seventeenth, which is only extant in Latin, but of which Petavius gives also a Greek version by himself, Paris, 1613, 8vo.; by P. Pantinus, who printed a few orations not before edited, 1614, 8vo.; by Petavius again, who inserted in this second edition all the orations which had as yet appeared, to the number of nineteen, in Greek and Latin, several of the Latin versions being new, with fuller notes than in his first edition, Paris, 1618, 4to.; and by Harduin, who first published the whole thirty-three orations, with the versions and notes of Petavius and his own, Paris, 1684, fol. Besides these thirty-three orations, another, hitherto unknown, against certain persons who had attacked Themistius for accepting the prefecture of the city, was discovered at Milan by Cardinal Mai, as mentioned above, and published by him, in Greek and Latin, in 1816, 8vo., together with a newly-discovered fragment of the second oration, and two supplements to the nineteenth and twenty-third. Dindorf also founded upon the Milan MS. a new edition, first of two of the orations, Lips. 1830, 8vo., and afterwards of them all, Lips. 1832, 8vo. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. pp. 790, foll.; Clinton, Fasti Romani, under the several dates given in this article; Hoffmann, Lexicon Biliograph. Script. Graec. s. v.)

The Greek Anthology contains one epigram ascribed to Themistius, on the subject, according to the superscription in the Aldine edition, of his own appointment to the prefecture of the city by Julian. It would seem, however, that there is a mistake respecting both the author and the subject of this epigram. In the Palatine MS. it is ascribed to Palladius, and it is quite in his style. The subject is explained by Maio. (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 404; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 112, vol. x. p. 191, vol. xiii. p. 957; Maio, ad Orat. xxxiv. p. 458, p. 471, ed. Dindorf.)

2. There was another Greek writer of this name, who lived much later, and was the founder of the sect of the Agnoetae, who were so called from their asserting that Christ's knowledge was not perfect. The little that is known of him is not worth mentioning here. (See Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 794.) [P. S.]

THEMISTO (Θεμιστώ). 1. A daughter of Nereus and Doris. (Hes. Theog. 261.)

2. A daughter of the Lapithe Hypseus, and the wife of Athamas. (Apollod. i. 9. § 2; Athen. xiii. p. 560; comp. ATHAMAS.)

3. The mother of Arcas, who is commonly called Callisto, and by some Megisto. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀρκάς; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 300; Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 1.)

4. Of Cyprus, was said by some to be the mother of Homer. (Paus. x. 24. § 3.) [L. S.]

THEMISTOCLEIA. [ARISTOCLEIA.]

THEMI'STOCLES (Θεμιστοκλῆς), was the son of Neocles, not one of the most distinguished among the Athenians, though he was allied to the Lycomedae. The name of his mother was Abrotonon, a Thracian woman, according to some authors, but others call her Euterpe, and say that she was a Carian; and Neanthes adds that she was of Halicarnassus. As his mother was not an Athenian, Themistocles belonged to the class of nothi. (Plut. Themist. 1, compare Pericl. c. 37.) Themistocles was born about B. C. 514 as it is conjectured. In his youth he had an impetuous character; he displayed great intellectual power combined with a lofty ambition and desire of political distinction. In his hours of relaxation he did not join in the ordinary amusements of the boys, but he practised himself in making speeches on imaginary subjects. His master used to say to him "My boy, you will not be any thing little, but certainly something great, good or bad." He had not much taste for the usual branches of learning and for accomplishments, but he showed a decided liking for all studies which strengthened the understanding and had a practical object. There is a story that his father who saw his ambitious turn of mind, wishing to divert him from a political career, pointed out to him some old gallies thrown on the shore and neglected, and he told him that this was the way that "the many" treated popular leaders, when they were no longer of any use. The remark, though true, did not keep Themistocles from his course, nor will it keep others.

The ambition of Themistocles was to be the first man in Athens, and he began his career by setting himself in opposition to those who had most power, among whom Aristides was the chief. We cannot infer from the words of Plutarch (c. 3) whether Themistocles was in the battle of Marathon (B. C. 490) or not; but if he was born so early as B.C. 514, he must have been old enough for military service in B.C. 490. The fame which Miltiades acquired by his generalship at Marathon made a deep impression on Themistocles; he became thoughtful, and avoided his usual company; and in reply to the remarks of his friends on the change in his habits, he said, that the trophy of Miltiades would not let him sleep. Others thought that the victory of Marathon had terminated the Persian war; but Themistocles foresaw that it was only the beginning of a greater struggle, and it was his policy to prepare Athens for it.

His rival Aristides was ostracized in B. C. 483, to which event Themistocles contributed; and from this time he was the political leader in Athens. In B. C. 481 he was Archon Eponymus. The chronology of the early part of the life of Themistocles is uncertain. It was perhaps before his archonship, or it may have been in that year that he persuaded the Athenians to employ the produce of the silver mines of Laurium in building ships, instead of distributing it among the Athenian citizens. (Herod. vii. 144; Plut. Themist. c. 4.) The motive which he suggested was that the fleet of Athens should be made a match for that of Aegina, with which state Athens was then at war; but his real object was to prepare Athens against a future attack from the Persians. It was the policy of Themistocles to draw the Athenians to the sea, as he was convinced that it was only by their fleet that Athens could repel the Persians and obtain the supremacy in Greece. The number of ships which were built at the suggestion of Themistocles was two hundred, according to Herodotus; and they were not employed against Aegina, with which state Athens made peace, but against the Persians; and thus, as Plutarch remarks, the policy of Themistocles saved Greece. Either at this time or somewhat later he persuaded the Athenians to pass a decree that twenty new ships should be built every year.

When news arrived of the immense armament of Xerxes, the Athenians deliberated about choosing a commander. Themistocles had no rival at Athens except Epicydes, who was strong with his tongue, but weak in spirit. Themistocles, fearing that matters would go ill if this incompetent man was elected commander-in-chief, bought off his opposition and was elected himself (Plut. Themist. 6). There can be no doubt that Themistocles was ambitious to have the command, and his ambition was justified by his talents. A body of men was sent by sea to Alus in Achaea, whence they marched to the pass of Tempe, under the command of Themistocles and Euaenetos, a Spartan, to make a stand against the army of Xerxes; but after a few days this force retreated to their ships in alarm before Xerxes had crossed over to Europe from Abydos (Herod. vii. 173; Plut. Themist. 7). The Thessalians being thus deserted, joined the Persians, and all Greece as far south as Boeotia also went over to them. Upon this the Greek confederates held a council at the isthmus of Corinth, in which it was resolved to make a stand against the Persians at Thermopylae, and to send the fleet to Artemisium on the north-west coast of Euboea, where it could watch the operations of the forces at Thermopylae. Themistocles showed his magnanimity by offering to serve under Eurybiades, the Spartan, though the Athenians furnished a greater number of ships than the Spartans. The Persian fleet sustained great loss on the coast of Thessaly from bad weather (Herod. vii. 190), but at last it reached Aphetae. Eurybiades being alarmed at the approach of this great force meditated a retreat to Southern Greece (Herod. viii. 4; Plut. Themist. 7); but the Euboeans, who were afraid of being deserted at this critical time, before they should be able to put their women and children in a place of safety, gave Themistocles thirty talents, part of which he gave to Eurybiades and to Adimantus, the Corinthian commander, and thus induced them to stay and hazard a battle. The Greeks had the advantage in the naval engagements off Artemisium, and the Persian fleet was damaged by another storm; but the Greek fleet also suffered in the battle, and half of the Athenian ships were disabled (Herod. viii. 18). The fights off Artemisium took place on the same days on which Leonidas and his little band fought with the Persians at Thermopylae. The Greek fleet retired to Salamis opposite the south-western coast of Attica. Before leaving Artemisium Themistocles cut on the rocks and on pieces of stone an address to the Ionians, who were in the fleet of Xerxes, hoping that either the Ionians might be detached from the cause of Xerxes, if what he had written should not become known to the king, or that if the king should be informed of what was written, he might suspect the fidelity of the Ionians and not let them engage in the sea-fights. (Herod. viii. 22.)

It was the plan of the Peloponnesians to retire within the peninsula, and to build a wall across the isthmus, and the fleet had withdrawn to Salamis only at the entreaty of the Athenians to allow them time to remove their women and children from Attica. An answer of the oracle of Delphi had advised the Athenians to defend themselves with wooden walls, and Themistocles, who may have suggested the answer of the oracle, also gave it an interpretation, saying that they must take refuge in their fleet. Accordingly he recommended that Athens should be left to the care of its tutelary deity, and that the women, children, and infirm persons should be removed to Salamis, Aegina, and Troezen, which was done. The people of Troezen received most hospitably the fugitives, and provided for their maintenance at the public expense. The united fleet of the Greeks was now assembled at Salamis, consisting both of ships from Artemisium and the navy which was stationed at Troezen; in al' three hundred and seventy-eight ships, besides penteconters (Herod. viii. 48). In the mean time the Persian army advanced through Boeotia, and entered Attica, destroying all before them. Athens also was occupied by them, and the Acropolis was burnt. The Greek confederates assembled at Salamis were alarmed, and many of them were preparing to escape in their vessels. In this emergency Mnesiphilus, a friend of Themistocles, hearing from him that the Greeks had resolved in council to withdraw to the Isthmus, and fight a naval battle there, urged him to prevent so fatal a step, and to induce Eurybiades to stay. Themistocles, who was of the same opinion as Mnesiphilus, prevailed on Eurybiades to hold a fresh council of war, in which Themistocles showed the consequences of the intended movement. Adimantus the Corinthian insolently told Themistocles to be silent, and said that a man who had no city ought not to speak in the council. Themistocles rated him soundly and his countrymen of Corinth too; and added, that the Athenians had a larger country and city than the Corinthians, inasmuch as they had two hundred vessels, and that no Greek state could resist such a force if attacked by it. Then turning to Eurybiades, he told him that if he did not stay there, he would cause the ruin of Greece, for that all the power of the Greeks was in their fleet; and that if they would not fight at Salamis, the Athenians would sail off to Italy, and the Greeks being left alone would then remember what he had said. Eurybiades at last yielded, and it was determined to stay at Salamis.

On the arrival of the huge armament of Xerxes, consisting of twelve hundred vessels, in the Saronic gulf, the fears of the Greeks were renewed, and a fresh council was held, in which it was proposed by the rest of the Greeks to sail off to the Peloponnesus, while the Athenians, Aeginetae, and people of Megaris, still urged that they should keep their position (Herod. viii. 74). Themistocles, however, frustrated the plan of the dissentient Greeks. He sent a faithful slave, named Sicinnus, in a boat to the Persian commanders, with a message to this effect: that the Athenian commander, without the knowledge of the other commanders, inasmuch as he wished success to the king's cause, had sent him to say that the Greeks were alarmed, and intended to make their escape, and that the Persians had now the opportunity of accomplishing a noble enterprise, if they would only cut off the retreat of the Greeks. The Persians believed what they were told, and took their measures accordingly. They landed a large force on Psyttaleia, a little island in the channel which separates Salamis from the Attic coast, and about midnight the Persian fleet occupied the whole of the channel between Salamis and the mainland as far as Munychia, and thus the Greeks were hemmed in. (Herod. viii. 76.)

The Greek commanders were disputing in council, not yet being aware that their retreat was cut off. Aristides, who was still in exile, crossed over from Aegina to Salamis, and sending for Themistocles out of the council, told him that it was useless to discuss the matter of retreat any longer, for he had seen the enemy's fleet, and the Greeks were completely blockaded. Themistocles communicated to Aristides what he had done to bring this about, and asked him to inform the council of what he had seen. Though Aristides assured the council that retreat was now impossible, and urged them to prepare for battle, many of the commanders would not believe the intelligence until it was confirmed by a Tenian galley which had deserted from the Persians. In the morning the battle took place, in which the Greeks had the advantage of their position over the Persian fleet, which was crowded in too narrow a space. The battle was fought chiefly in the eastern strait. The Greeks gained a signal victory, in which the Aeginetae most distinguished themselves, and next to them the Athenians. Aristides did good service by landing on Psyttaleia with some soldiers from Salamis, and cutting to pieces the Persians who were on this islet. Xerxes, who watched the battle from the shore of the mainland, saw his mighty armament defeated and dispersed in the autumn of B. C. 480. The fleet of the Persians was pursued by the Greeks as far as Andros, and as they did not come up with it there, a council was held, in which Themistocles advised that they should pursue the enemy through the Aegean, and sail to the Hellespont to destroy the bridge of boats by which Xerxes had passed over. Eurybiades more prudently suggested that they should allow the immense army of Xerxes to move off as quick as they could, and should leave the bridge standing; and this advice was approved by the other Peloponnesian commanders. (Herod. viii. 107; compare Plut. Aristid. 9, Themist. 16.) Themistocles pacified the Athenians, who were most eager to follow the Persians, by urging plausible arguments against the pursuit at present, and saying that in the following spring they might sail to the Hellespont and to Ionia. Herodotus attributes to Themistocles a treacherous motive in the affair, and says that his object was to secure a retreat to Persia, if any thing should befal him at Athens (Herod. viii. 109); and accordingly he sent some confidential persons to Xerxes, and among them the faithful Sicinnus, to tell him that Themistocles had prevented the Greeks from pursuing the Persian fleet, and destroying the bridge over the Hellespont, and he advised the king to move off. Xerxes retreated with his army, and left Mardonius with a large force behind him.

While the Greek fleet was among the islands of the Aegean, Themistocles attempted to levy contributions on the islanders. The people of Andros were called upon to pay money in the name of two powerful deities, Persuasion and Necessity, but they answered, as other people may answer to the collector of imposts, that they possessed two invincible antagonist deities, Poverty and Want of means, whose powerlessness no power could vanquish. Themistocles, however, got money from the Carystians and Parians (Herod. viii. 111, &c.); and probably he filled his own pockets. The victory of Salamis, however, which was due to Themistocles, established his reputation among the Greeks; and it was only jealousy among the commanders which caused him to receive at the Isthmus the second prize of merit instead of the first. (Herod. viii. 123.) But on his visiting Sparta, he was received with extraordinary honours by the Spartans, who gave Eurybiades the palm of bravery, and to Themistocles the palm of wisdom and skill, with a crown of olive, and the best chariot that Sparta possessed. When he returned home, three hundred select Spartan horsemen accompanied him as far as the borders of Tegea. (Herod. viii 124; Plut. Themist. 17.)

In the battle of Plataea, B. C. 479, in which Mardonius was defeated, Aristides, now no longer an exile, commanded the Athenians. (Herod. viii. 28; Plut. Arist. 11.) The name of Themistocles is not mentioned on this occasion by Herodotus or by Plutarch; nor on the occasion of the fight at Mycale, which took place on the same day. Neither does it appear clearly what he was doing all this time, except so far as may be collected from Plutarch's vague narrative. (Plut. Themist. 18.) It seems probable that his political influence declined very speedily after the affair which raised his reputation to the greatest height; and that his conduct to the Spartans on two several occasions contributed to his final downfal.

The Athenians began to restore their ruined city after the barbarians had left the country, and Themistocles advised them to rebuild the walls, and to make them stronger than before. The Spartans sent an embassy to Athens to dissuade them from fortifying their city, for which we can assign no motive, except a miserable jealousy. Themistocles, according to Theopompus, quoted by Plutarch, got over this opposition by bribing the Ephori, which is probable enough, and not inconsistent with the story told circumstantially by Thucydides of his deceiving the Spartans. He prevailed on the Athenians to dismiss the Spartan ambassadors, and to send him and others to Sparta on the matter of the fortifications. Themistocles went first, after advising the Athenians not to send his colleagues till the walls were far enough advanced to be in a state of defence. In the mean time he amused the Spartans with lies, and pretended that he was waiting for his colleagues in order to be enabled to enter on the business on which he was sent; and when the report of the progress of the walls was confirmed by fresh intelligence, Themistocles told the Spartans to send trusty persons to Athens to inquire, and not to trust to rumours. The Spartans despatched their agents, and Themistocles at the same time sent instructions to Athens, to detain the Spartans until he and his colleagues should return in safety, for his colleagues had now joined him. When he was informed that the walls of Athens were in a fit state for defence, he came before the Spartans, and told them plainly that Athens could now protect herself. The Spartans dissembled their resentment, and the ambassadors respectively returned from Athens and Sparta. (Thucyd. i. 90, &c.) It was also on the advice of Themistocles that the Athenians finished the fortifications of the port of Peiraeeus, which they had commenced during his archonship (Thucyd. i. 93; Diod. xi. 41); the position was exceedingly favourable, possessing three natural harbours, and as the Athenians had been made a naval power, the improvement of their ports would contribute to the increase of it. For Themistocles was the first who declared that the Athenians must make the sea their element, and he took the first steps towards this object. His policy was not to let the fortune of the Athenians depend on the fate of their city Athens; but if they were ever hard pressed, his advice was that they should leave it for the Peiraeeus, which he designed to make so strong that a few men could defend it, while the rest could embark in the fleet. The building of the walls which connected Athens with Peiraeeus and Phalerum was later, and accomplished about B. C. 456. (Thucyd. i. 107.)

The influence of Themistocles does not appear to have survived the expulsion of the Persians from Greece and the fortification of the ports. He was probably justly accused of enriching himself by unfair means, for he had no scruples about the way of accomplishing an end. A story is told by Plutarch in his Lives of Aristides and Themistocles, that after the retreat of the fleet of Xerxes, when the Greek fleet was wintering at Pagasae, Themistocles told the Athenians in the public assembly that he had a scheme to propose which was beneficial to the state, but could not be expounded to the many. Aristides was named to receive the secret, and to report upon it. His report was that nothing could be more profitable than the scheme of Themistocles, but nothing more unjust; and the Athenians abided by the report of Aristides. His project was to burn the Greek fleet, and thus confirm the naval supremacy of Athens. Themistocles resisted the proposal of the Lacedaemonians to exclude from the Amphictyonic assembly those states which had not aided the Greeks against Xerxes, for such a measure, he argued, would put the whole power of the Amphictyonic federation in the hands of two or three of the chief states. He succeeded in defeating this scheme, and thus incurred the enmity of the Spartans, who supported his rival Cimon. (Plut. Themist. 20.) If this affair took place soon after the battle of Salamis, it will help to account for the disappearance of Themistocles from the stage. In B. C. 471 he was ostracised from Athens, and retired to Argos. He had now leisure to think of the old gallies and his father's lessons.

Pausanias, being detected in a treacherous correspondence with the Persian king, lost his life, and the Lacedaemonians sent persons to Athens to accuse Themistocles of being privy to the designs of Pausanias. (Thucyd. i. 135; Plut. Themist. 23.) The Athenians, either convinced of his guilt or affecting to be convinced, sent off persons with the Lacedaemonians with instructions to arrest Themistocles wherever they should find him. (B. C. 466.) But Themistocles, hearing of what was designed against him, fled from Argos to Corcyra, the inhabitants of which owed him some obligations; but as the Corcyraeans were afraid to keep him for fear of incurring the hostility of Athens and Sparta, they took Themistocles across to the main land. Being followed by his pursuers, he took refuge in the house of Admetus, king of the Molossi, who happened to be from home. Admetus was no friend to Themistocles, but his wife, at the entreaty of the fugitive, told him that he would be protected if he would take their child in his arms, and sit on the hearth. The king soon came in, and respecting his suppliant attitude, raised him up, and refused to surrender him to the Lacedaemonian and Athenian agents. He also sent him to Pydna on the coast of the Aegean, where Themistocles found a merchant vessel bound for Ionia. The vessel was carried by the weather close to the Athenian armament, which was blockading Naxos, on which Themistocles discovered himself to the master, and told him, that if he did not carry him off safely, he would inform the Athenians that he was aiding him to escape for a sum of money. The master kept his vessel tossing off the island a whole day and night to avoid the risk of landing, and at last safely reached Ephesus. Themistocles, who received money from his friends at Athens, and from Argos, where he had money, rewarded the master for his pains.

Xerxes was now dead (B. C. 465), and Artaxerxes was on the throne. Themistocles went up to visit the king at his royal residence, in company with a Persian, and on his arrival he sent the king a letter, in which he told him that he had done the greatest damage to the cause of the king's father, when out of necessity he fought against him, but that he had done him still greater services, by which he meant his information as to the intended retreat of the Greeks from Salamis, and the not breaking down of the bridge over the Hellespont, the merit of which he falsely claimed: he said that he could do the king good service, and that his life was sought by the Greeks on account of his friendship to the king; he prayed that he might be allowed to wait a year, and then to explain personally what brought him there. Themistocles was too cunning to entrust his business to an interpreter. In a year he made himself master of the Persian language and the Persian usages, and, being presented to the king, he obtained the greatest influence over him, and such as no Greek ever before enjoyed; partly owing to the high reputation and the hopes that he gave to the king of subjecting the Greeks to the Persians. The king gave him a handsome allowance, after the Persian fashion; Magnesia supplied him with bread nominally, but paid him annually fifty talents. Lampsacus supplied wine, and Myus the other provisions. Before he could accomplish any thing he died; some say that he poisoned himself, finding that he could not perform his promise to the king. A monument was erected to his memory in the Agora of Magnesia, which place was within his government. It is said that his bones were secretly taken to Attica by his relations, and privately interred there. Themistocles was, according to Plutarch, sixty-five years of age when he died, and if he was born B. C. 514, he died in B. C. 449. He left several sons and daughters. The descendants of Themistocles enjoyed certain honours in Magnesia in Plutarch's time. A tomb called that of Themistocles existed in the Peiraeeus in the time of Pausanias (i. 1): Pausanias mentions also a portrait of Themistocles in the Parthenon: he says, it appears that the sons of Themistocles returned to Athens, and dedicated the painting in the Parthenon in which Themistocles was represented: it was probaby an historical piece, in which Themistocles appeared as an actor. (Compare Paus. i. 26 and 37.)

The great abilities of Themistocles are thus briefly characterised by Thucydides (i. 138): — "Themistocles was the strongest example of the power of natural talent, and in this respect is particularly worthy of admiration; for by his natural understanding, without any education originally to form it, or afterwards to strengthen it, he had the best judgment in actual circumstances, and he formed his judgment with the least deliberation; and as to future events he made, in the general, the best conjectures; whatever he took in hand, he was also able to expound; and on matters where he had no experience, he was not unable to form a competent judgment; and both of the better and the worse, while it was still in uncertainty, he had a most excellent foresight; and to express all in brief, by the force of his natural capacity, and the quickness of his determination, he was the most efficient of all men in promptly deciding what was to be done." Undoubtedly he possessed great talents as a statesman, great political sagacity, a ready wit, and excellent judgment: but perhaps he was not an honest man; and, like many other clever men with little morality, he ended his career unhappily and ingloriously, an exile and a traitor too. Some of the anecdotes about him deserve little credit; but an examination of them belongs to another kind of work.

There is a life of Themistocles in the collection which goes under the name of Nepos. Plutarch has enlivened his biography with several curious stories about Themistocles, after his arrival in Asia. Diodorus (xi.), always a careless writer, is of little value for the biography of Themistocles. One and twenty letters attributed to Themistocles are spurious. [G. L.]

THEMISTO'GENES (Θεμιστογένης), of Syracuse, is said by Xenophon (Hell. iii. 1. § 2) to have written a work on the Anabasis of Cyrus; but most modern writers, following the statement of Plutarch (de Gloria Athen. p. 361), suppose that Xenophon really refers to his own work, to which he prefixed the name of Themistogenes. It appears, however, that Themistogenes is not a fictitious name, since Suidas says (s. v.) that he wrote other works. (C. Müller, Fragm. Historic. Graec. vol. ii. p. 74, Paris, 1848.)

THEMISTIUS, the son-in-law of Gelon, was slain along with Andranodorus. (Liv. xxiv. 24, 25.) [ANDRANODORUS.]

THEOCHRESTUS (Θεόχρηστος), of Cyrene, grandfather and grandson, won a victory at the Olympic games in the chariot-race, but in what Olympiad is not stated (Paus. vi. 12. § 7). A person of the same name is quoted by the Scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius (iv. 1750) as the author of a work on Libya; and from the subject of the book we may reasonably infer that he was a native of Africa, and may have been the same as one of the Olympic victors. Pliny also refers to Theochrestus as one of his authorities. (H. N. Index, lib. xxxvii. and xxxvii. 2. s. 11. § 1.)

THEOCLEIA. [ARISTOCLEIA.]

THE'OCLES (Θεοκλῆς). 1. A Pythagorean philosopher. (Iamblich. Vit. Pyth. 27.)

2. Of Naxos or Eretria, a poet of unknown time, to whom some ascribed the invention of the elegiac metre; but there can be little doubt that the tradition is as untrustworthy, as the etymology, in connection with which it is mentioned, is absurd. (Suid. and Etym. Mag. s. v. ἐλεγεἰνειν). His verses appear to have been of a licentious character, and it is most probable that he is the same person as the Theocles from whose Ithyphallics Athenaeus (xi. p. 497, c.) quotes three lines. [P. S.]

THE'OCLES (Θεοκλῆς), the son of Hegylus, was a Lacedaemonian statuary, and one of the disciples of Dipoenus and Scyllis. He therefore flourished about B. C. 550. He wrought in wood and in ivory and gold. Two of his works are apparently mentioned by Pausanias; but they were only separate parts of one and the same group, representing Hercules preparing to carry off the golden apples of the Hesperides. This group consisted of a celestial hemisphere (πόλος, see Dict. of Antiq. s. v. 2d ed.) upheld by Atlas, with Hercules, and the tree which bore the golden apples of the Hesperides, and the dragon coiled around the tree, all carved out of cedar wood. An inscription on the πόλος stated that the work was executed by Theocles and his son. It stood at Olympia, in the treasury of the Epidamnians; but, in the time of Pausanias, the figures of the Hesperides had been removed from it by the Eleians, and placed in the temple of Hera. (Paus. vi. 19. § 5. s. 8.) In his description of the temple of Hera (v. 17. § 1), Pausanias mentions these statues, five in number, as being of gold and ivory, which is not inconsistent with the other statement, that they were of cedar-wood; for the two accounts can easily be reconciled by supposing that they were of cedar-wood gilt, and the faces, hands, and feet covered with plates of ivory. Possibly the ivory may have been added to the statues when they were transferred to the temple of Hera. [P. S.]

THEO'CLIUS, a Greek writer of the lives of the Caesars, appears to have lived in the time of Aurelian or shortly afterwards. (Vopisc. Aurel. 6.)

THEOCLY'MENUS (Θεοκλύμενος). 1. A son of Polypheides of Hyperasia, and a descendant of Melampus, was a soothsayer, who, in consequence of a murder, was obliged to take to flight, and came to Telemachus at the time when the latter quitted Sparta to return to Ithaca. (Hom. Od. xv. 256, &c., 507, &c., xvii. 151, &c., xx. 350, &c.)

2. A son of Proteus. (Eurip. Helen. 9.) [L. S.]

THEOCOSMUS (Θεόκοσμος), of Megara, a statuary, whose time is accurately defined by two statements in Pausanias. In the temple of Zeus Olympius at Megara, the traveller saw an unfinished chryselephantine statue of the god, which Theocosmus had undertaken to make, with the assistance of Pheidias, but the execution of which was interrupted by the breaking out of the Peloponnesian War, and the consequent incursions of the Athenians into the Megarensian territory. The face alone was of ivory and gold, and the rest of the statue of mud (or plastic clay) and gypsum; and behind the temple there lay some half-wrought logs of wood, which Theocosmus had intended to cover with ivory and gold, and to use in completing the statue. Above the head of the god were the Hours and the Fates (Paus. i. 40. § 3. s. 4).

Theocosmus also made the statue of Lysander's pilot, Hermon, which formed a portion of the great votive offering dedicated by the Lacedaemonians at Delphi, out of the spoils of the battle of Aegospotami (Paus. x. 9. § 4. s. 8). Hence Theocosmus must have flourished from before the beginning till after the end of the Peloponnesian War, that is, in round numbers, about B. C. 435—430. He was the father of CALLICLES I. [P. S.]

THEO'CRATES is given as the name of a physician by Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 432, ed. vet.) and Haller (Bibl. Medic. Pract. vol. i.

p. 299, where the reference is defective), on the authority of the Latin Version of Avicenna (v. 2. § 2, vol. ii. p. 320, ed. Venet. 1595). The printed Arabic edition has باوقراطس which is an error. The Latin translator (Gerardus Cremonensis?) appears to have read in his MS. تاوقراطس or ثاوقراطس, which is not a bad conjecture, but which is also wrong. Sontheimer, in his "Zusammengesetzte Heilmittel der Araber" (p. 218), has clumsily confounded the word with بقراط and reads Hippocrates. The true reading is probably ناوقراطس Naucratis, as appears from Galen, De Compos. Medicam. sec. Loc. iv. 8, vol. xii. p. 764, from which work the passage in question (as also many other medical formulae in the same chapter of Avicenna) is taken. Galen attributes the medicine to ὁ Ναυκρατίτης, "the native of Naucratis" in Egypt; but who is the individual thus designated, the Writer is at present unable to determine. [W. A. G.]

THEOCRINES (Θεοκρίνης), the person against whom Demosthenes spoke in one of his extant orations (p. 1322, foll. ed. Reiske), which is, however, ascribed by Dionysius of Halicarnassus to Deinarchus. (Dein. 10.)

THEO'CRITUS, an actor, the dancing-master of Caracalla, under whom he enjoyed high honour and exercised unbounded influence. In the year A. D. 216 he was despatched at the head of an army against the Armenians, and sustained a signal defeat. (Dion Cass. lxxvii. 21.) [W.R.]

THEO'CRITUS (Θεόκριτος). 1. Of Chios, an orator, sophist, and perhaps an historian, in the time of Alexander the Great, was the disciple of Metrodorus, who was the disciple of Isocrates. (Suid. s. v.) He was contemporary with Ephorus and Theopompus; and the latter was his fellow-citizen and political opponent, Theopompus belonging to the aristocratic and Macedonian, and Theocritus to the democratic and patriotic party. (Strab. xiv. p. 645; Suid.) There is still extant a passage of a letter from Theopompus to Alexander, in which he charges Theocritus with living in the greatest luxury, after having previously been in poverty. (Ath. vi. p. 230, f.; Theop. Frag. 276, ed. Müller, Frag. Hist. vol. i. p. 325, in Didot's Bibliotheca). Theocritus himself, too, is said to have given deep offence to Alexander by the sarcastic wit, which appears to have been the chief cause of his celebrity, and which at last cost him his life. When Alexander was making preparations for a magnificent celebration of his Asiatic victories on his return home, he wrote to the Greek cities of Asia Minor and the islands, to send him a large supply of purple cloth; and when the king's letter was read at Chios, Theocritus exclaimed that he now understood that line of Homer, — ἔλλαβε πορφύρεος θάνατος καὶ μοῖρα κραταιή.

(Plut. Op. Mor. p. 11, a.; Ath. xii. p. 540, a.) It is observed by C. Müller (loc. inf. cit.) that Arrian mentions (Anab. iv. 13. § 4), among the boys concerned in the conspiracy of Hermolaüs against Alexander, one Anticles, the son of Theocritus; and that, if this was Theocritus the Chian, the fate of his son would account for his enmity against Alexander. A very bitter epigram upon Aristotle, by Theocritus, is preserved, in separate portions, by Diogenes Laërtius (v. 11), Plutarch (Op. Mor. p. 303, c.), and Eusebius (Praep. Ev. xv. 1), and is contained in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck, Anal. vol. i. p. 184; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. i. p. 117, comp. vol. xiii. p. 958). Numerous examples of his satirical wit might be quoted from the ancient authors: as a specimen we may mention his description of the speeches of Anaximenes as "a stream of words, but sense drop by drop" (λέξεων μὲν ποταμὸς, νοῦ δὲ σταλαγμός, Stob. Serm. xxxvi. p. 217, ed. Gesner, comp. Ath. i. p. 21, c.; and, for other examples, see Stob. Serm. ii., iv., xxi., xxxviii., lxxxi., cxxiii.; Ath. viii. p. 344, b.; Plut. Mor. pp. 534, c., 631, f.). At last he was put to death by Antigonus Gonatas, in revenge for a jest upon the king's single eye, though perhaps he might have escaped, if he had not included the king's cook also in his witticism. That functionary, the story goes, having been despatched by Antigonus, to require the orator's attendance, "I perceive," replied Theocritus, "that you mean to serve me up raw to the Cyclops." "Yes! and without your head," retorted the cook, and repeated the conversation to Antigonus, who at once put Theocritus to death. (Plut. Mor. p. 633, c.; Macrob. Sat. vii. 3.) This must have happened before B. C. 301, when Antigonus fell in battle.

The works of Theocritus, mentioned by Suidas, are Χρεῖαι, Ἱστορία Λιβύης, and ἐπιστολαὶ θαυμασίαι, to which Eudocia (p. 232) adds, λογοὶ πανηγυρικοί. The Χρεῖαι, that is, clever sayings, were probably, as C. Müller suggests, not a work written by Theocritus himself, but a collection, made by some one else, of the witticisms ascribed to him. By ἐπιστολαὶ θαυμασίαι is not meant, as Vossius calls them, epistolae admirabiles, but de rebus mirabilibus. About the Libyan history there is perhaps some mistake, as the name of Theocritus might easily be confounded with that of Theocrestus, whose Libyan history we know. It is true that Fulgentius quotes a stupid story about the Gorgons and Perseus from "Theocritus antiquitatum historiographus" (Mythol. i. 26); but the same confusion of names might easily happen here; and, even if the passage be from Theocritus, it would rather seem to belong to the ἐπιστολαὶ θαυμασίαι than to the Libyan history. Another case, in which the name of Theocritus has probably been confounded with one like it, is pointed out by C. Müller (Ath. p. 14, e., Διαβόητοι δὲ ἐπὶ σφαιρικῇ Δημοτέλης ὁ Θεόγνιδος τοῦ Χίου σοφιστοῦ ἀδελφός. Nothing is known of a sophist named Theognis).

Theocritus of Chios is mentioned by Clemens Alexandrinus (Protrept. p. 45), as ὁ θεῖος σοφιστής. A life of him by Ambryon, is quoted by Diogenes Laërtius (v. 11). The epigram, prefixed to some editions of the poems of the more celebrated Theocritus of Syracuse, as in Brunck's Analecta (Epig. 22, ed. Kiessling), is probably not the production of the poet himself, but of some grammarian who wished to mark clearly the distinction between the two persons. It is inscribed to Theocritus in the Palatine MS. and the Codex Politianus, and in the editions of the Anthology by Stephanus and Wechel; but in the Aldine edition it is assigned to Artemidorus, who is also the author of a distich prefixed to the ancient collection of the bucolic poets. (Brunck, Anal. vol. i. p. 263; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. i. p. 194, vol. vi. p. 490.) The following is the epigram: —

> Ἄλλος ὁ Χῖος· ἐγὼ δὲ Θεόκριτος, ὃς τάδ' ἔγραψα, > Εἷς ἀπὸ τῶν πολλῶν εἰμὶ Συρηκόσιος,
> Υἱὸς Πραξαγόραο περικλειτῆς τε Φιλίννης·
> Μοῦσαν δ' ὀθνείην οὔποτ' ἐφελκυσάμην.

(Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 775; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 68, ed. Westermann; Menagius, ad Diog. Laërt. v. 11; Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 477; Müller, Frag. Hist. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 86, 87, in Didot's Bibliotheca Scriptorum Graecorum).

2. The celebrated poet, was, according to the epigram just quoted, a native of Syracuse, and the son of Praxagoras and Philinna. This is also the statement of Suidas (s. v.), who adds, however, that others made him the son of Simichus, or Simichidas, and also that, by some accounts, he was a native of Cos, and only a μέτοικος at Syracuse. The origin of the former variation will be understood by a reference to the brief account of him prefixed to his poems, under the title of Θεοκρίτου γένος, and to the Scholia on Idyl. vii. 21, from which it appears that Simichidas, the person into whose mouth that Idyl is put, was naturally identified by the ancients with the poet himself, whom, therefore, they made a son of Simichus or Simichidas (Schol. l. c., et ad v. 41). Theocritus again speaks in the name of Simichidas in the 12th line of his Syrinx; but, as the full name there used is Πάρις Σιμιχίδας, it would evidently be unsafe to understand the latter word literally as a patronymic. The idea is much more probable, and more in harmony with the spirit of poetry, that Simichidas is an assumed name, like Tityrus in Virgil; and this is the explanation given by some of the ancient grammarians, who couple it, however, with an etymology which is not at all probable. (Schol. l. c.; Θεοκ. γένος.) The other statement, that Theocritus was a native of Cos, has probably arisen out of his connection with Philetas. In the Θεοκρίτου γένος we are told that "he was the disciple of Philetas (of Cos) and Asclepiades (of Samos), whom he mentions," namely, in Id. vii. 40: —

> οὔτε τὸν ἐσθλὸν

the first words of which the ancient commentators are probably right in referring to Asclepiades (Schol. ad loc.) Another reference to his connection with Philetas has been discovered by Bekker in a corrupted passage of Choeroboscus. (Bekker, Annot. in Etym. p. 705; Φιλίππας [i. e. Φιλήτας] διδάσκαλος Θεοκρίτου). He appears also to have been intimate with the poet Aratus, to whom he addresses his sixth Idyl (v. 2), and whom he mentions three times in the seventh (vv. 98, 102, 122); at least, it was the belief of the ancient commentators that the Aratus mentioned in these passages was the author of the Phaenomena. (Schol. ad ll. cc.) Now, it may safely be assumed that Theocritus became acquainted with these poets at Alexandria, which had already become, under the first and second Ptolemy, a place of resort for the literary men of Greece, and which it is certain that Theocritus visited at least once in his life. The 14th, 15th, and 17th Idyls bear every mark of having been written at Alexandria, and at all events they prove that the poet had lived there, and enjoyed the patronage of Ptolemy Philadelphus. The 16th, in praise of Hiero, the son of Hierocles, was evidently written at Syracuse, and its date cannot be earlier than B. C. 270, when Hiero was made king. To these indications of the date and residences of Theocritus, must be added the testimony of the author of the Θεοκρίτου γένος, that Theocritus flourished under Ptolemy the son of Lagus; that of the Greek argument to the first Idyl, namely, that he was contemporary with Aratus and Callimachus and Nicander, and that he flourished in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus; and also the important statement, in the argument to the fourth Idyl, that he flourished about Ol. 124, B. C. 284—280. (There can be little doubt the ρκδ' is the true reading.) The writer of the argument to the 17th Idyl mentions the statement of Munatus, that Theocritus flourished under Ptolemy Philopator, but only in order to refute it.

In interpreting these testimonies, our chief difficulty arises from a two-fold uncertainty respecting Philetas; first, as to the precise period down to which he lived; and, secondly, whether the accounts of his being the teacher of Theocritus refer to personal intercourse and instruction, or only to the influence of the works of Philetas upon the mind of Theocritus. Without attempting to decide these questions, we would hazard the conjecture, that the date above mentioned, of Ol. 124. B. C. 284—280, marks the period, either when Theocritus first went to Alexandria, or when, after spending some time there in receiving the instruction, or studying the works, of Philetas and Asclepiades, he began to distinguish himself as a poet; that his first efforts obtained for him the patronage of Ptolemy Philadelphus, who was associated in the kingdom with his father, Ptolemy the son of Lagus, in B. C. 285, and in whose praise, therefore, the poet wrote the Idyls above referred to, which bear every mark of having been composed in the early part of Ptolemy's sole reign (from B. C. 283), and of being productions of the poet's younger days. The manner in which Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, is alluded to, in Id. xvii. 14, confirms the supposition that Theocritus had lived under that king. From the 16th Idyl it is evident that Theocritus returned to Syracuse, and lived there under Hiero II., but the contents of the poem are not definite enough to determine the precise period of Hiero's reign at which it was composed: from the 76th and 77th lines it may perhaps be inferred that it was written during the first Punic War, after the alliance of Hiero with the Romans in B. C. 263. Be this as it may, the whole tone of the poem indicates that Theocritus was dissatisfied, both with the want of liberality on the part of Hiero in rewarding him for his poems, and with the political state of his native country. It may, therefore, be supposed that he devoted the latter part of his life almost entirely to the contemplation of those scenes of nature and of country life, on his representations of which his fame chiefly rests.

These views are, of course, to some extent, affected by the question respecting the genuineness of some of the Idyls; but the only one of those which furnish our chief evidence, that is generally regarded as spurious, is the 17th. We possess no further information respecting the poet's life, except that another of his intimate friends was the physician Nicias, whom he addresses in terms of the highest commendation (Id. xi. 5, 6, xxviii. 7; comp. Arg. ad Id. xi., and Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. xiii. p. 923).

Theocritus was the creator of bucolic poetry as a branch of Greek, and, through imitators, such as Virgil, of Roman literature. The germ of this species of poetry may be discovered, at a very early period, among the Dorians, both of Laconia and of Sicily, especially at Tyndaris and Syracuse, where the festivals of Artemis were enlivened by songs, in which two shepherds or herdsmen, or two parties of them, contended with one another, and which gradually grew into an art, practised by a class of performers called Lydiastae and Bucolistae, who flourished extensively in Sicily and the neighbouring districts of Italy. The subjects of their songs were popular mythical stories, and the scenes of country life; the beauty, love, and unhappy end of Daphnis, the ideal of the shepherd, who was introduced by Stesichorus into his poetry, and of Diomus, who was named by Epicharmus; the melancholy complaints of the coy huntsman Menalcas; and other kindred subjects. These songs were still popular in the time of Diodorus; but the only fragment of them which has come down to us consists of the two following lines in the Priapeian metre, prefixed to the works of Theocritus: —

Δέξαι τὰν ἀγαθὰν τύχαν, δέξαι τὰν ὑγίειαν,
Ἂν φέρομεν παρὰ τᾶς θεοῦ, ἂν ἐκαλέσσατο τήνα.

Theocritus, however, was the first who reduced this species of poetry to such a form as to constitute it a branch of regular literature; and, in so doing, he followed, not merely the impulse of his own genius, but, to a great extent, the examples of Epicharmus and of Sophron, especially the latter. His bucolic idyls are of an essentially dramatic and mimetic character. They are pictures of the ordinary life of the common people of Sicily; whence their name, εἴδη, εἰδύλλια. The pastoral poems and romances of later times are a totally different sort of composition from the bucolics of Theocritus, who knows nothing of the affected sentiment, the pure innocence, the primeval simplicity, or even the worship of nature, which have been ascribed to the imaginary shepherds of a fictitious Arcadia; nothing of the distinction between the country and the town, the description of which has been made a vehicle of bitter satire upon the vices of civilized communities. He merely exhibits simple and faithful pictures of the common life of the Sicilian people, in a thoroughly objective, although truly poetical spirit. He abstains from all the mere artifices of composition, such as fine imagery, high colouring, and pathetic sentiment. He deals but sparingly in descriptions, which he introduces only as episodes, and never attempts any of those allegorical applications of the sentiments and adventures of shepherds, which have made the Bucolics of Virgil a signal failure. Dramatic simplicity and truth are impressed upon the pictures exhibited in his poems, into the colouring of which he has thrown much of the natural comedy which is always seen in the common life of a free people. His fifteenth idyl, the Adoniazusae, is a masterpiece of the mimetic exhibition of female character, rendered the more admirable by the skill with which he has introduced the praises of Arsinoë and Berenice, without sacrificing anything of its genuine dramatic spirit. The form of these poems is in perfect keeping with their object. The symmetrical arrangement and the rapid transitions of the lively dialogue, the varied language and the musical rhythms, the combination of the prevailing epic verse and diction with the forms of common speech, all contribute much to the general effect. In short, as Theocritus was the first who developed the powers of bucolic poetry, so he may also be said to have been the last who understood its true spirit, its proper objects, and its natural limits.

The poems of Theocritus, however, are by no means all bucolic. The collection, which has come down to us under his name, consists of thirty poems, called by the general title of Idyls, a fragment of a few lines from a poem entitled Berenice, and twenty-two epigrams in the Greek Anthology, besides that upon the poet himself, which, as above stated, is probably the production of Artemidorus. Several other works were ascribed to him by the ancient grammarians. Suidas (s. v.) tells us that he wrote the poems called Bucolics in the Doric dialect, and that some ascribed to him also the following: — Προιτίδας, Ἐλπίδας, ὕμνους, Ἡρωίνας, ἐπικήδεια μέλη, ἐλεγείας, ἰάμβους, ἐπιγράμματα. The Greek author of a few sentences on the characteristics of the poetry of Theocritus, prefixed to his works, says that all poetry has three characters, the διηγηματικός, the δραματικός, and the μικτικός, and that bucolic poetry is a mixture of every form. Bergk has recently classed the poems of Theocritus under the heads of Carmina Bucolica, mimica, lyrica, epica, and epigrammata (Rhein. Mus. 1838—1839, vol. vi. pp. 16, &c.)

Of the thirty so-called Idyls, the last is a late Anacreontic, of scarcely any poetical merit, and has no claim to be regarded as a work of Theocritus. Of the others, only ten belong strictly to the class of poems which the ancients described by the specific names of βουκολικά, ποιμενικά, αἰπολικά, or by the first of these words used in a generic sense, Bucolics, or, as we say, pastoral poems; but, taking the term Idyl in the wider sense explained above, we must also include under it several of the poems which are not bucolic, but which are pictures of the life of the common people of Sicily. In this general sense, the Idyls, properly so called, are the first eleven, the fourteenth, fifteenth, and twenty-first, the last of which has a special interest, as being the only representation we possess of the life of Grecian fishermen: the second and fifteenth are evidently pretty close imitations of the mimes of Sophron. Several of them are erotic in their character, and allied, in their form, to different species of poetry: thus, the twelfth and twenty-ninth have a decidedly lyrical complexion, while that of the nineteenth is epigrammatic, of the twentieth bucolic, and of the twenty-third tragic: the thirteenth and eighteenth, which are also erotic, have the epic character, both in their subjects and their form; and the twenty-seventh is an erotic poem under the form of a mime. The sixteenth and seventeenth are imitations of another branch of the ancient lyric poetry, the encomium. The twenty-second is an epic hymn to the Dioscuri; the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth appear to be fragments of an epic poem on the adventures of Hercules, in the learned tone of the Alexandrian epos, but still distinguished by the free and simple style of Theocritus; and the twenty-sixth is also epic, but of very inferior merit, being a fragment of the story of Pentheus, related in a dry rhetorical manner. Lastly, the twenty-eighth, entitled 'Ηλακάτα, is an occasional poem, written in a very pleasing style. This great intermixture of the different species of poetry is quite in accordance with the spirit of the age and of the Alexandrian school, in which the poet was brought up. But, in those of the idyls which are certainly genuine, all these varieties are harmonized by the true poetical genius of Theocritus.

But yet, if we carefully examine the collection as a whole, it will be found to contain incongruities of style and subject, and varieties of merit, too great to allow of the belief that all these twenty-nine idyls (for the thirtieth may be certainly excluded) are the genuine productions of Theocritus. The introduction of spurious poems into the collection can easily be accounted for. As early as B. C. 200 there existed a collection of the works of the bucolic poets, Theocritus, Bion, and Moschus, as we learn from the following epigram of Artemidorus, which is prefixed to the works of Theocritus, and is also contained in the Greek Anthology (Brunck, Anal. vol. i. p. 293; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. i. p. 194): —

'Εντὶ μιᾶς μάνδρας, ἐντὶ μιᾶς ἀγέλας.

Into such a collection, made at a time when critical science was in its infancy, every thing would naturally be swept together that had the least traditional or other claim to be regarded as the production of one of these three poets; and, moreover, whatever was of doubtful authority would naturally be ascribed to Theocritus, as the most celebrated of the three. Of this large collection the idyls that have come down to us are merely samples, selected by the grammarians (whence the name of Eclogae, which was afterwards applied to bucolic poetry in general); and thus it has happened that, while much of the genuine poetry of Theocritus has been lost, there must be much that is not his in the collection we now possess. To distinguish the genuine from the spurious, we have scarcely any other test than internal evidence; and here the danger arises, into which some critics appear to have fallen, of making the comparative excellence of the poems the sole test of their genuineness. It is impossible here to enter upon the detailed critical arguments for and against the genuineness of the several poems. The whole subject has been discussed by Eichstädt (de Carm. Theocr. ad sua Genera revocat. &c., Lips. 1794, 4to.), by E. Reinhold (de Genuinis Theocr. Carm. et Supposititiis, Jen. 1819), by A. Wissowa (Theocritus Theocriteus, Vratislav. 1828, 8vo.), and by Warton, Meineke, and Wüstemann, in their editions of Theocritus. Those idyls, of which the genuineness is the most doubtful, are the 12th, 17th, 18th, 19th, 20th, 26th, 27th, 29th, and 30th.

The Metre chiefly employed in these poems is the heroic hexameter, adapted to the purposes of Theocritus by having a more broken movement substituted for the sustained and stately march of the Homeric verse. In a few cases other metres are employed. The dialect of Theocritus has given the grammarians considerable trouble. The ancient critics regarded it as a modification of the Doric dialect, which they called νέα Δωρίς, and some of the modern editors have carried this notion so far as to try to expunge all the epic, Aeolic, and Ionic forms, which the best MSS. present. The fact, however, is, that Theocritus purposely employed a mixed or eclectic dialect, in which the new or softened Doric predominates. (Jacobs, Praef ad Anth. Pal. p. xliii.; Wüstemann, Proleg. ad Theocr. p. xxxiv.)

Of the other poems which have come down to us, the Berenice, of which we only possess five lines and a word, preserved by Athenaeus (vii. p. 284), was an encomium of the celebrated queen, the wife of Ptolemy the son of Lagus, and the mother of Ptolemy Philadelphus. The poem entitled Syrinx, contained in the Greek Anthology, is an exercise of ingenuity, consisting in the composition of twenty verses in such a manner that the length of each pair of verses is less than that of the pair before, and thus the whole resembles the ten pipes of the mouth-organ or Pan-pipes (σύριγξ). Of the epigrams, two (Nos. 17, 18, Brunck) are supposed by Jacobs to be the productions of Leonidas of Tarentum, while, on the other hand, the Palatine MS. assigns the 10th epigram of Erycius to Theocritus. (Brunck, Anal. vol. i. p. 376; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. i. p. 194, vol. xiii. p. 958.)

It is unnecessary to say much of the reputation of Theocritus. Both in ancient and in modern times, he has been deservedly placed at the head of the species of poetry which he formed, and in a very high rank among all poets, for the force and truthfulness of his pictures, the beauty of his language, and the simple good taste of his style. The best discussion of his characteristics is that by Finkenstein, in the Introduction and Appendices to Arethusa, oder d. Bukol. Dichter des Alterthums, Berl. 1806—1810. The Eclogues of Virgil are mere imitations of the Bucolics of Theocritus, to which they are immeasurably inferior. [VIRGILIUS.] The Alexandrian grammarians gave Theocritus a place in one of their Pleiads, that, namely, of the seven miscellaneous poets; and commentaries were written upon him by Amerias, Asclepiades of Myrlea, Theon, Theaetetus, Amarantus, Munatus, and others. The existing Scholia evidently contain a very small, and probably not the most valuable, portion of those commentaries: they consist chiefly of paraphrastic explanations of the text.

The modern literature of Theocritus is much too voluminous to admit of any attempt to give here a list even of the chief editions and illustrative works. The titles of the whole occupy forty-nine columns of Hoffmann's Lexicon Bibliographicum Scriptorum Graecorum. The Editio Princeps, in folio, containing the Works and Days of Hesiod and the Idyls of Theocritus, is without place or date, but is believed to have been printed at Milan about 1481. There is another very early edition, in 8vo., without place or date. The next earliest edition is that of Aldus, containing the Idyls, and a vast mass of other matter, Venet. 1495, fol. For a full account of this and the other ancient editions, see Hoffmann. The chief among the more recent editions are those of Reiske, Viennae, 1765, 1766, 2 vols. 4to.; of Warton, Oxon. 1770, 4to.; of Brunck, in the Analecta, 1772, 4to.; of Valckenaer, 1779—1781, 8vo.; of Schaefer, 1810, fol.; of Heindorf, 1810, 8vo.; of Gaisford, in his Poetae Minores, Oxon. 1816, 1820, 1823, 8vo.; of Kiessling, Lips. 1819, 8vo., reprinted, with Bion and Moschus, Notes, Scholia, Indices, and Portus's Lexicon Doricum, Lond. 1829, 2 vols. 8vo.; of Jacobs, Halae, 1824, 8vo., only vol. i. published; of Meineke, Lips. 1825, 12mo.; and, the most useful of all for ordinary purposes, that of Wüstemann, in Jacobs and Rost's Bibliotheca Graeca, Gothae, 1830, 8vo. (a new edition is expected). For an account of the numerous Delectuses, and of the translations of the whole, or separate portions, of the Idyls, and of the works upon Theocritus, the reader is referred to Hoffmann. The chief English versions are those of Creech, Lond. 1681, 1684, 1713, 1721, 12mo.; Fawkes, Lond. 1767, 8vo.; and Polwhele, Lond. 1786, 4to., 1792, 1811, 8vo. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. pp. 764, foll.; Wüstemann's Prolegomena; Bernhardy, Gesch. d. Griech. Lit. vol. ii. pp. 925, foll.; Ulrici; Bode.) [P. S.]

THEODECTES (Θεοδέκτης). 1. The son of Aristander, of Phaselis, a Dorian city of Pamphylia, on the borders of Lycia, was a highly distinguished rhetorician and tragic poet in the time of Philip of Macedon (Suid. s. v.; Steph. Byz. s. v. Φασηλίς (Eustath. ad Dion. Perieg. 855). He was a pupil of Isocrates (Pseudo-Plut. Vit. Isocr. 10, p. 837, d.); and also, according to Suidas, of Plato and of Aristotle. The greater part of his life was spent at Athens, where he died at the early age of forty-one, while his father was still alive, and was buried by the side of the sacred road to Eleusis (Paus. i. 37. § 3; Pseudo-Plut. l. c.). The following epitaph, which was inscribed upon his tomb, is preserved by Stephanus (l. c.): —

> Ἥδε χθὼν κόλποισι Φασηλίτην Θεοδέκτην
> Κρύπτει, ὃν ηὔξησαν Μοῦσαι Ὀλυμπιάδες·

The people of his native city also honoured the memory of Theodectes with a statue in their agora, which Alexander, when he stopped at Phaselis on his march towards Persia, crowned with garlands, to show his respect for the memory of a man who had been associated with himself by means of Aristotle and philosophy (Plut. Alex. 17; the words are τιμὴν ἀποδιδοὺς τῇ γενομένῃ δι' Ἀριστοτέλην καὶ φιλοσοφίαν ὁμιλίᾳ πρὸς τὸν ἄνδρα.) On this passage the question arises, whether the somewhat vague expressions used by Plutarch are to be understood as meaning simply that Alexander recognized a sort of tie between Theodectes and himself on account of their common connection with Aristotle, or whether the strict sense of the word ὁμιλίᾳ is to be so urged as to establish a personal acquaintance between the king and Theodectes; each of these opinions having been maintained by eminent scholars (see Welcker, Kayser, Wagner, and Clinton, as quoted below). We believe the former view to be the right one; but the question is too minute to be discussed here; nor is it of much importance, since the age of Theodectes can be determined on other grounds.

He was one of the orators who contended for the prize proposed by Artemisia for a funeral oration in honour of Mausolus, in B. C. 352 (Suid. s. v.; Aul. Gell. x. 18: Suidas, however, gives the date wrongly, Ol. 103, ργ', instead of Ol. 107, ρζ'; see Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. s. a., and p. 287). Now the visit of Alexander to Phaselis was in Ol. 111. 4, B. C. 333; and, if we assume that the statue of which he took such special notice had been but recently erected, we may suppose that Theodectes died about B. C. 335 or 334, and therefore, according to Suidas's account of the length of his life, that he was born about B. C. 376 or 375. He would then be about 23 or 24 at the time of the funeral of Mausolus; about the same age as Theopompus, his rival on that occasion, and his fellow-pupil under Isocrates; and about ten years younger than Aristotle, a result agreeing with the account which makes him not merely the friend, but the pupil of that philosopher (Suid. l. c.; Cic. Orat. 51, 57), and also with a story respecting their relation to each other, preserved by Athenaeus (xiii. p. 566, e). It is said that Theodectes was distinguished for his personal beauty (see also Steph. Byz. l. c.), which excited the admiration of Aristotle, as much as the beauty of Alcibiades enchanted Socrates. The several passages of Aristotle, in which Theodectes is mentioned, furnish decisive evidence of the strong regard and high esteem in which he was held by the philosopher. (Aristot. Rhet. ii. 23. § 13, &c.)

Theodectes devoted himself, during the first part of his life, entirely to rhetoric, and afterwards he turned his attention to tragic poetry, but his dramatic works partook largely of the rhetorical character, so that, while in tragedy he may be regarded as, to some extent, an imitator of Euripides, he must be considered, in his whole literary character, as the disciple of Isocrates, whose style he is said to have followed very closely. (Dionys. de Is. 19; Hermipp. ap. Ath. x. p. 451, f.; Phot. Bibl. Cod. 260, p. 487, a. 1, Bekker; Suid. l. c.) Like his master, he was a professional teacher of rhetoric and composer of orations for others, and was in part dependent on this profession for his subsistence, as we learn from a passage of Theopompus, who, while placing himself and Theodectes and Naucrates, with their common master Isocrates, at the head of the oratorical profession (τῆς ἐν λόγοις παιδείας) among the Greeks, boasts that he and Naucrates were independent by their fortunes, while Isocrates and Theodectes were compelled by their necessities to teach, and to write orations for pay. (Phot. Cod. 176, p. 120, b. 30, foll.) Such a boast betrays, perhaps, a consciousness that, in real merit and in public esteem, Theodectes stood above the other pupils of Isocrates, and nearest to his master. It appears, however, pretty certain that, on one great occasion, when these four orators were placed in competition with each other, namely, at the funeral of Mausolus, the prize was gained by Theopompus, who in this case also betrayed his jealousy and vanity by the manner in which he boasted of his victory over his master Isocrates. (Euseb. Praep. Ev. x. 3.) In the accounts of this transaction an important question arises respecting the share of Theodectes in the contest. Some writers have concluded, from the testimonies on the subject, that, while the other three orators came forward with funeral orations in honour of Mausolus, Theodectes entered the contest with a tragedy on the subject of the king's life, under the title of Mausolus. This idea is perhaps sufficiently absurd to carry with it its own refutation; but it is also quite unsupported by the testimonies on which it professes to rest, a careful examination of which will show that Theodectes composed both an oration and a tragedy on the same subject; that, though he was defeated by Theodectes in the competition of oratory, his tragedy gained the prize; and that, while his oration was lost, his tragedy was extant down to the time of Gellius. (Gell. x. 18; Pseudo-Plut. Vit. Isocr. p. 838, b.; Suid. s. vv. Θεοδέκτης, Ἰσοκράτης). In this, as in so many other cases, we have to thank Suidas for originating the error by confounding the testimonies together; but the truth may be detected even in his confused account. (Suid. s. v. Θεοδέκτης· καὶ ἐνίκησε [ὁ Θεοδέκτης] μάλιστα εὐδοκιμήσας ἐν ᾗ εἶπε τραγῳδίᾳ· ἄλλοι δέ φασι Θεόπομπον ἔχειν τὰ πρωτεῖα). There still remains, however, a minor, and not unimportant question; namely, whether the tragedy of Theodectes was brought out in a dramatic contest (or perhaps merely recited) at the funeral of Mausolus, or whether it was afterwards composed for the Athenian stage, and there rewarded with the first prize. It is no sufficient answer to the latter idea, to say that the subject was not one which would interest the Athenians, for, besides that the tragedies of that day derived nearly all their interest from their manner rather than their matter, the Athenians could not be indifferent to a subject which was employing the genius, not only of the greatest rhetoricians, but also of the greatest artists whom they then possessed. (See Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Mausoleum, 2d ed.) The only safe conclusion, we believe, is that the evidence is insufficient to determine the question.

For excellence in the art of rhetoric, as it was practised by the school of Isocrates, Theodectes appears to have possessed the highest qualifications. Among these, no mean place must be assigned to that personal beauty which has been already mentioned. His memory was so strong, that he could repeat any number of verses, after they had been read to him only once. (Quintil. xi. 2. § 51; Aelian, N. A. vi. 10; Pollux, vi. 108; Cic. Tusc. i. 24). Connected with this strength of memory was a power greatly prized by the rhetoricians of the day, and possessed in a high degree by Theodectes, of solving a kind of complicated riddles called γρῖφοι. (Poll. l. c.; Athen. p. 451, f.; where two examples are given from his tragedies; Fr. 8, 19, ed. Wagner).

Dionysius places him, with Aristotle, at the head of the writers on the art of rhetoric. (De Comp. Verb. 2, de Vi dic. in Dem. 48.) His treatise on the subject, entitled τέχνη ῥητορική (Suid. Steph. Eustath. ll. cc.), is repeatedly referred to by the ancient writers, from the comic poet Antiphanes, who was his elder contemporary (Ath. iv. p. 134, b.), down to Tzetzes (Chil. xii. 573). If we may believe Suidas (s. v.) it was in verse. Some appear to have believed the Rhetoric of Aristotle to be the work of Theodectes; but this is a manifest error. (Quintil. ii. 15. § 10; with Spalding's Note; comp. Val. Max. viii. 14. § 3.) It seems, however, as might have been expected, that his work had some things in common with Aristotle's views, especially as to the classification of words, and the exclusion of the idea of metrical numbers from prose composition (Dion. ll. cc.), and we are told that Aristotle wrote an introduction (εἰσαγωγή) to the work of Theodectes. (Diog. Laërt. v. 24; Anon. Vit. Aristot., where it is called Συναγωγή, and is said to have been in three books.) Cicero quotes certain statements, respecting the alleged occurrence of certain feet in prose, from the work of Theodectes, whom he calls in primis politus scriptor atque artifex (Orat. 51). The work is now entirely lost, as are also his orations, which are mentioned under the title of λόγοι ῥητορικοί (Steph. Byz. l. c.), and which Eustathius (l. c.) calls λόγοι ἀγαθοί. All that we know of their subjects is that one of them was a defence of Socrates (Aristot. Rhet. ii. 23; Phot. Frag. Cantab. p. 671, where he is wrongly called Θεόδεκτος), and that another was entitled Νόμος. (Aristot. l. c.) A most valuable account of all that is known of the prose compositions of Theodectes is contained in the work of Märcker, de Theodectis Phaselitae Vita et Scriptis Comment. I., Vratislav. 1835.

We now turn to his dramatic works. It was not till after he had obtained renown in rhetoric, that he turned his attention to tragedy. (Suid. Plut. Vit. Isocr.; Phot. Cod. 260, ll. cc.). If, therefore, the view above stated be correct, that he brought out his tragedy of Mausolus at the funeral of the Carian prince in B. C. 352, it may be assumed that this was about the time when he began to compose tragedies. The number of his dramas is uniformly stated as fifty. (Suid.; Steph.; Eustath.; ll. cc.) According to his epitaph, quoted above, he entered the dramatic contests thirteen times, and gained eight victories. Hence the conjecture seems very probable, that he always brought out a tetralogy, and that the fifty dramas ascribed to him are to be taken as a round number, for fifty-two; or it may be said that he brought out eleven tetralogies and two trilogies; but the latter, though a more literal, is a less natural and more arbitrary explanation. We have the titles of ten of these dramas, Αἴας, Ἀλκμαίων, Ἑλένη, Θυέστης, Λυγκεύς, Μαύσωλος, Οἰδίπους, Ὀρέστης, Τυδεύς, Φιλοκτήτης, to which three may be added with great probability, namely, Βελλεροφόντης, Θησεύς, and Μέμνων ἢ Ἀχίλλευς. Popular as his dramas were, on account of their adaptation to the taste of his contemporaries, it is probable, from the fragments which survive, that they would be condemned by a sound aesthetic criticism, as characterised by the lax morality and the sophistical rhetoric of the schools of Euripides and Isocrates. The former censure is meant to apply to the choice of his subjects rather than to the manner in which he treated them; for we find in the fragments sound moral sentiments, lamentations over the growing vice of the poet's times, examples of the heroic virtues, arguments against impiety and atheism, and in favour of divine providence and justice; the last of which subjects appears to have been treated in such a manner as entirely to reject the old doctrine of fate, and consequently to make an essential change in the whole character and spirit of tragedy. His tragedies contained many of the enigmas to which reference has been made above; an ingenious specimen is the attempt of a rustic to describe the letters which compose the name Θησεύς.

A story is related about Theodectes, which, though almost certainly fabulous, ought not to be passed over, namely, that, in one of his tragedies he borrowed, or thought of borrowing, something from the sacred books of the Jews, and was struck blind as a punishment for his profanity; but, on his repenting of the crime, his sight was restored to him. (Aristeas, de LXX. Interpr. in Gallandii Bibl. Patr. vol. ii. p. 803; Joseph. Antiq. xii. 2. § 14; Euseb. Praep. Ev. vii.; and other writers cited by Wagner, p. 114, b.) A sufficient proof of the fabulous character of the story is derived from the non-existence, at that time, of any Greek version of the Old Testament.

Theodectes had a son of the same name (see below), and a domestic slave, who was also his amanuensis (ἀναγνώστης καὶ οἰκέτης), named Sibyrtius, who is said to have been the first of his condition who devoted himself to the study of rhetoric. He wrote a treatise on the art, τέχναι ῥητορικαί, according to Suidas, who, however, is just as likely as not to have confounded the master and the slave. (Suid. s. v. Σιβύρτιος.)

2. A son of the former, who followed his father's profession as a rhetorician, and, according to Suidas (s. v.), wrote an Encomium on Alexander the Epeirot, historical memoirs (ἱστορικὰ ὑπομνήματα), a work on the customs of barbarian nations (νόμιμα βαρβαρικά), a treatise on rhetoric in seven books (τέχνη ῥητορική), and many other works. THEODEMIR, king of the Ostrogoths, and father of THEODORIC the GREAT. [THEODORICUS the GREAT.]

THEO'DOCUS (Θεόδοκος), the name given by Pococke (in his Latin Version of Abú-l-Faraj, Hist. Dynast. p. 128), and Wüstenfeld (Gesch. der Arab. Aerzte, p. 9) to a Greek physician in the service of Hajáj Ibn Yúsuf, the general of the chalif 'Abdu-l-Malek Ibn Merwán, in the seventh century after Christ. He is called in Arabic تياذوق Tiádúk (though with some slight variations in different MSS.), which Reiske (Opusc. Med. ex Monim. Arab. p. 46) renders Theotychus, but Theodocus is probably nearer the truth. He is said to have had numerous eminent pupils; and is probably the person called Tiaducus in the Latin Version of Rhazes (Cont. iii. 2, p. 53 ed. 1506,) and Tiaduk in Sontheimer's German translation of Ibn Baitár (vol. i. pp. 14, 137, &c.). There is rather a long life of Theodocus in Ibn Abí Osaibi'ah (vii. 5, Arab. MS. in the Bodleian Library), which is chiefly filled with anecdotes of his sayings. [W. A. G.]

THEODO'RA, FLA'VIA MAXIMIA'NA, the daughter of Galeria Valeria Eutropia [EUTROPIA] by her first husband, whose name and station are alike unknown. After the second marriage of Eutropia with Maximianus Herculius, Constantius Chlorus having been elevated (A. D. 292) to the rank of Caesar was required to repudiate his wife Helena [HELENA] and to wed the step-daughter of his Augustus. By Constantius Theodora had six children, three daughters and three sons. The daughters were, 1. Flavia Valeria Constantia, united to the emperor Licinius. 2. Anastasia, wife of Bassianus [BASSIANUS]. 3. Eutropia, mother of Nepotianus who assumed the purple in A.D. 350 [NEPOTIANUS]; with regard to the names of the sons, see the article HANNIBALLIANUS. (Aurel. Vict. de Caes. 39, Epit. 39; Eutrop. x. 14; Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. iv. Dioclet. Art. iii.) [W. R.]

THEODO'RA, the wife of the emperor Justinian, was the daughter of Acacius, who had the care of the wild beasts of the Green faction of Constantinople. After the death of her father, she and her sisters earned their living as pantomimic actresses; and Theodora, by the charms of her person and her skill in acting, soon became one of the greatest favourites of the stage. She earned the reputation of being the most beautiful and most licentious courtezan of the city, and Procopius, in his Secret History, has related the most scandalous tales of her amours. After practising her profession in public and in private at Constantinople for some time, she accompanied Ecebolus, who had been appointed to the government of the African Pentapolis. But she was soon deserted by her lover, and returned in indigence to the imperial city. On her arrival at the scene of her former glory and infamy, she assumed a virtuous character, retired from the world, and appeared to support herself by spinning. While living in this retirement she attracted the notice of Justinian, who then governed the empire under his uncle Justin, and she gained such a mastery over the affections and the passions of the youthful prince, that he married the fair courtezan in 525, in spite of the vehement remonstrances of his mother and other relatives. On the death of Justin, and the elevation of Justinian in 527, Theodora was publicly proclaimed empress; and not content with conferring upon her this honour, her uxorious husband declared her to be an equal and independent colleague in the empire, and required all public functionaries to take the oath of allegiance in the joint names of himself and of Theodora. The part which she took in public affairs is related in the life of Justinian. [JUSTINIANUS I.] She died in 548 of a cancer, having retained to the last her hold on the affections of Justinian. She is represented by the historians as proud and tyrannical in the exercise of power; but as none of her enemies have brought any charge against her chastity after her marriage with Justinian, we may safely conclude that she never proved unfaithful to her husband. She bore Justinian only one child, a daughter, whom she buried in her life-time. (Procopius, Historia Arcana; the graphic sketch of Gibbon, Decline and Fall, c. xl.; and the authorities quoted in the life of Justinian.)

THEODORE'TUS (Θεοδώρητος) is mentioned by Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 432, ed. vet.) as a physician quoted by Paulus Aegineta (iii. 46, 50. vii. 11. pp. 470, 475, 659), but in these passages the word is the name of a medicine, not of a man. [W. A. G.]

THEODORE'TUS (Θεοδώρητος), or, as the name is sometimes written, both in ancient MSS. and in modern works, THEODORITUS, — though the former is undoubtedly the more correct orthography, — was one of the most eminent ecclesiastics of the fifth century; confessedly surpassing all his contemporaries in learning, and inferior to none of them in piety; while, in his public conduct, he stands conspicuous and almost alone, as a calm and moderate champion of freedom of opinion in religious matters, in an age when the orthodox and the heretics vied with one another in the bitterest intolerance and rancour. The one blot of moral weakness on the character of Theodoret is by no means so dark as some have represented, and, at all events, may be greatly extenuated, without unfairness. And yet, but for that one fault, his name would have come down to us consigned to the list of heretics, by men, such as Cyril and Dioscorus, to whose spirit, it is no small praise to Theodoret to say, his conduct displays the most marked contrast.

Theodoret was born at Antioch towards the end of the fourth century of our era. The exact year of his birth is uncertain: from a minute examination of the fragments of evidence, which are supplied chiefly by his own works, Garnier has fixed it at A. D. 386; and Tillemont, with greater probability, at A. D. 393. (See their works, quoted at the end of this article.) Theodoret himself, who was naturally infected with the credulity, which was universal in his age,—for even the sceptics of the time were grossly credulous in some matters,—has related various marvels which attended his birth, as well as subsequent passages of his life. His parents were persons of good condition in life, and of distinguished piety; and his mother, especially, had the most profound respect for the hermits or ascetics, one of whom had healed her of a disease of the eyes by means of the sign of the cross, and had also convinced her of the sinfulness of worldly pomp and luxury. After thirteen years of sterile wedlock, during which the prayers of several of these pious men had been offered on her behalf in vain, one of them named Macedonius at length announced that a son should be granted to her, but upon the condition that he should be consecrated to the service of God. It was not, however, till three years afterwards that the child was born, and named Θεοδώρητος, as being a special gift of God. As the period of his birth approached, the holy man who had predicted it kept continually in his mother's recollection the condition attached to the gift, of which too he frequently reminded Theodoret himself in after years. The record of these circumstances, which are only a specimen of the wonders he relates, is important, on account of the influence which the belief of them exercised on the mind of Theodoret.

He was brought up, and instructed in religion, by his mother, with a care suited to his peculiar position, and which he often mentions with gratitude. At a very early age (scarcely seven years, according to an inference drawn from his 81st epistle) he was sent for his education to a celebrated monastery near Antioch, presided over by Euprepius; and there he remained for twenty years (Ep. 81), until he left it to take charge of his diocese. He had for his instructors some of the most eminent ministers of the Eastern Church. He himself names Diodorus of Tarsus and Theodorus of Mopsuestia as his teachers; but, as the former died before the end of the fourth century, he can scarcely have instructed Theodoret, except through his writings. Still less can we take literally the statement of Nicephorus (H. E. xiv. 54), that Theodoret was a disciple of Chrysostom, which can only mean (and in this sense it deserves notice) that the writings of Chrysostom were studied by Theodoret as a model for his own exegetical works. Of his actual teachers, it appears that the chief was Theodore of Mopsuestia, whose memory and works he constantly defended from the charge of heterodoxy. The use which Theodoret made of those twenty-five years of study and retirement appears in the fruit which they bore at a later period, in his profoundly learned writings. During his residence in the monastery he was appointed, first a reader, and then a deacon, in the Church of Antioch, by the patriarchs Porphyry and Alexander; and, in the latter office, he seems to have obtained considerable reputation by his sermons against the Arians, Macedonians, and especially the Apollinarists, who were the most formidable, by their numbers, among the heretics in the diocese. This matter is not very certain; but it is clear that he must in some way have obtained a public reputation, to account for his appointment to the episcopate by Theodotus, the successor of Alexander in the see of Antioch.

It was in A. D. 420 or 423, according to different computations, from his own writings (Epist. 81, 113, 116), that he left his monastery to succeed Isidorus as bishop of Cyrus, or Cyrrhus, a small and poor city near the Euphrates, about two days' journey from Antioch; which was, however, the capital of a district of Syria, called Cyrrhestice, and the diocese of which contained eight hundred parishes (Epist. 32, 113). We learn from his own testimony, which there is every reason to believe, that he carried into his new office the quiet spirit of the monastery, and that ecclesiastical domination was never an object of his ambition. He still practised also the greatest moderation in his own mode of life; while he improved the opportunities, presented by his office, of exercising the utmost generosity towards others. The fortune, which he had inherited on the death of his parents, he had at once divided among the poor; and his bishopric brought him no property, neither house, nor even a tomb (Epist. 113), and its annual revenues could not have been large. Yet out of these, in addition to his alms to the poor, he expended a large sum in the decoration of the city, in which he built covered porticoes, two large bridges, public baths, and an aqueduct (Epist. 79, 81, 138). He also attracted to the city artists and professional men, who were much wanted there, especially physicians; and he interceded, both with the imperial procurator, and with the empress Pulcheria, for an alleviation of the taxes with which the people of his diocese were burthened. In the midst of these acts of his public munificence we see an instance of his generosity to individuals, in the zeal with which he pleads in several letters to his friends, on behalf of Celestiacus of Carthage, who had been stript of his all by the Vandals (Epist. 29—36). After an episcopate of five and twenty years he could declare that he had never had anything to do with a court of justice, and had never received the smallest present; and afterwards, in his adversity, he suffered extreme want rather than accept presents which would have enabled him to live in luxury. Not only did he thus conduct himself, but he succeeded, by his example and authority, in inducing his clergy to follow a similar mode of life. (Epist. 81.)

At the same time he administered the spiritual affairs of his diocese with great vigour. At that wretched period in the history of the Church, one of the chief occupations of an orthodox bishop was to maintain the contest with the so-called heretics. The diocese of Theodoret was overrun with Arians, Macedonians, and especially Marcionites; but such was his success in converting them, that he speaks of them, in the year 449, as being all reconciled to the Catholic Church, and he declares that he had baptized ten thousand Marcionites. In this contest he ran great personal risks, having been more than once in danger of being stoned to death. Still he never, like many bishops, called in the aid of the temporal power; but he was assisted by a devoted band of monks, among whom one named Jacob was conspicuous; and his zeal was inflamed by the belief that supernatural powers took part both for and against him. He tells us of devils appearing to him in the night, and demanding why he persecuted Marcion, with other marvels in the spirit of his age.

In these useful labours and clerical duties, and in the composition of his exegetical and other works, Theodoret would, in happier times, have spent a peaceful life. But in that age it was impossible for a man of any eminence to be neutral in the internecine war of the religious parties; and there were various influences at work to draw Theodoret into the vortex of the Nestorian controversy. To understand what follows, the reader not acquainted with the details of the history may read the article NESTORIUS. This part of the life of Theodoret has been grossly misrepresented by Garnier, and the writers who have followed him. If we are to believe them, he first adopted a heresy to gratify a private friendship: and afterwards, from selfish motives, recanted his heresy, and anathematized his friend. It is true that Theodoret had formed an acquaintance with Nestorius in the convent of Euprepius, where they were fellow students; but there is no proof of any great intimacy between them, and none that Theodoret ever adopted the tenets of Nestorius. His share in the contest is more that of an impartial mediator than that of a devoted friend and adherent: he acts, not with Nestorius, but with John of Antioch and the Oriental party; not in order to favour Nestorianism, but to resist the overbearing intolerance of Cyril, and to combat the errors, opposite to those of Nestorius, into which he conceived Cyril, and afterwards Eutyches, to have fallen. The proof of these statements is contained in the numerous writings in which Theodoret explains his views respecting the dispute, in all of which he appears as the champion of religious freedom, and the opponent of those authoritative statements of doctrine, which fetter private opinion without settling any controversy, or ensuring any permanent peace. To enter into the details of this subject would be inconsistent with the nature of this work, as well as impossible within the limits of the present article. We must be content to give a brief sketch of the external history of Theodoret's share in the dispute.

At an early stage of the controversy (A. D. 430), he wrote a letter to the monks of Syria and the neighbouring countries, in reply to the twelve capitula of Cyril, the patriarch of Alexandria, in whose representations he detects, of course by inference only, Apollinarianism, Arianism, and other errors at the opposite extreme to those of Nestorius, especially the confusion of the two natures in the person of Christ, by so representing the hypostatical union as to make them only one. At the council of Ephesus (A. D. 431) he arrived earlier than the great body of the Eastern bishops, for whose presence he, with others, in vain urged the assembly to wait before condemning Nestorius; and, upon their arrival, he took part with them in the separate synod which condemned the proceedings of the council, and decreed the deposition of Cyril. The council of Ephesus having thus only widened the breach, it remained for the feeble emperor, Theodosius II., to decide which party he would support. At first he warmly espoused the cause of Nestorius, but soon afterwards, falling under the influence of certain monks of Cyril's party, he summoned the African and Oriental bishops to send seven representatives each, to explain to him the proceedings of the council of Ephesus. Theodoret was one of the seven delegates of the Oriental party. On their arrival at Chalcedon, they were ordered to wait there for an audience with the emperor; and meanwhile Theodoret, being excluded from the Church by the influence of Cyril's party, preached to immense audiences, and celebrated the sacraments, in a large court surrounded by porticoes. On the emperor's arrival, Theodoret pleaded the cause of the Oriental bishops before him with great eloquence and courage; but the mind of Theodosius was already surrendered to the other party, and the ambassadors of the Eastern churches were dismissed to their homes. On his return to Cyrus, Theodoret composed an elaborate work on the Incarnation, in five books (πενταλόγιον ἐνανθρωπήσεως), in order fully to explain his own views upon the question, to guard himself against the accusation of sharing in the opinions of Nestorius, and to expose the heretical tendencies of Cyril's tenets, and the unjust conduct of his party at the council of Ephesus. Of this work we only possess a few fragments, and those chiefly from the Latin translation of Marius Mercator, a bigotted adherent of the Cyrillian party, who declares his belief that Theodoret wrote the book at the instigation of the devil. About the same time, also, Theodoret came forward in defence of the memory of his master, Theodore of Mopsuestia, whose works had been denounced by Cyril and his friend Proclus of Constantinople, as the poisonous source of the Nestorian heresy. In a work which is now lost, Theodoret replied in detail to all the arguments advanced by Cyril against the works of Theodore; and attacked Cyril with considerable bitterness, as we see from some fragments of the book, which are preserved in the acts of the fifth oecumenical council. (Hardouin, Act. Concil. vol. iii. pp. 106, &c.)

Of the transactions of the following years, until the death of Cyril, it must suffice to say that Theodoret acquiesced in the peace effected by the intercession of the emperor between the parties of Cyril and of John, in so far as its doctrinal basis was concerned; and he even submitted, and urged the friends of Nestorius to submit, to the deposition of Nestorius. But he always protested against that deposition; and, when it became evident that no limits were assigned to the severity with which the Nestorians were to be treated (A. D. 435), he threw aside all pretence of peace, and stood forth as the decided opponent of Cyril, who, on his part, displayed the bitterest enmity against Theodoret. It is alleged that, when Cyril died (A. D. 444), Theodoret so far forgot himself as to express his exultation at the event. Such conduct might be excused on the plea, that his joy was for the deliverance of the Church from a source of bitterness; but the truth is, that the charge rests on passages in two works which it is probable that Theodoret never wrote, while, in other works, which are undoubtedly genuine, he refers to Cyril's death in quite a different spirit.

Dioscorus, the successor of Cyril in the see of Alexandria, pursued his predecessor's line of conduct, with even greater bitterness, and Theodoret soon found himself forced into a more prominent and disastrous position in the controversy, through the necessity of resisting the renewed diffusion of the opinions of Cyril by the efforts of a party of Syrian monks, and still more by those of the celebrated Eutyches of Constantinople, with whose name the Cyrillian doctrine became identified. [EUTYCHES.] Dioscorus supported the party of Eutyches with all his might; and, besides this ground of opposition, he had a personal motive of dislike to Theodoret, because the latter had signed a synodical epistle of Proclus, the bishop of Constantinople, implying thereby, as Dioscorus maintained, the superiority of that patriarch to those of Alexandria and Antioch. In fact, the conduct of Dioscorus throughout the whole Eutychian controversy betrays at least as much care for the aggrandisement of his own see as for the cause of truth. Through the influence of this prelate at the imperial court, Theodosius, who made no secret of the dislike he bore to Theodoret for his opposition to Cyril, was induced to issue a command to the bishop of Cyrus to confine himself within the limits of his own diocese, A. D. 448. At the same time that he obeyed the mandate, Theodoret addressed letters to some of the principal men of the empire, in vindication of his conduct; and in these letters we find some of the most interesting particulars of his previous life (Epist. 79—82). He had already done his best to appease the enmity of Dioscorus by a letter, explaining his opinions, and adducing, as a proof of his orthodoxy, his acceptance of the statement of doctrine agreed upon by John and Cyril. Dioscorus, however, replied in the most violent language, plainly calling Theodoret a Nestorian. As a last attempt to pacify the proud patriarch, Theodoret went so far, in a second letter, as to declare those accursed who said that the Virgin was not the mother of God, or that Christ was a mere man, or who would represent the Only-begotten as if in his person there were two Sons of God; Dioscorus cut short the correspondence, by pronouncing a public anathema upon Theodoret in the church of Alexandria; and soon afterwards, in A. D. 449, he assembled under his own presidency the second Council of Ephesus, justly called the robber-synod, which pronounced the deposition both of Theodoret, and of Flavian, patriarch of Constantinople, Domnus, patriarch of Antioch, and the other bishops who had condemned Eutyches at the synod of Constantinople in the preceding year.

Theodoret had been excluded from the synod which deposed him by the express wish of the emperor, who now commanded him to retire to a monastery at Apamea; his enemies even threatened him with banishment. He bore his fall with dignity and cheerfulness, and preferred rather to suffer want than to accept the presents which were offered to him on every hand. Still neither he nor Flavian felt themselves bound to leave their enemies to enjoy their triumph and to domineer over the Church. They turned to the only remaining quarter in which there was any power to help them, the Roman bishop, Leo the Great, to whom Theodoret wrote a letter (Epist. 113), celebrating the renown of the apostolic see, praising the virtues and religious zeal of Leo, defending his own orthodoxy by quotations from his writings, and requesting permission to come to Rome, provided that the emperor should give his consent, to submit the whole case to the judgment of Leo and the Western bishops; at the same time he requested to be advised whether he should submit to his deposition. Leo, who had already pronounced against the Eutychians, accepted Theodoret's confession of faith as satisfactory, and declared him absolved from all ecclesiastical censure: but the proposal for an oecumenical council in Italy was negatived by the emperor.

At this precise juncture, however, the whole state of affairs was suddenly changed by the death of Theodosius II., A. D. 450, and the accession of Pulcheria and Marcianus, who were unfavourable to the Eutychians. Theodoret and the other deposed bishops were recalled from retirement, on the condition that they should be reinstated in their sees by the decision of an oecumenical council; and Theodoret himself joined in the demand for such a council, as necessary to restore peace to the Church. It assembled, first at Nicaea, and afterwards at Chalcedon, in A. D. 451. At its eighth session the petition of Theodoret for restoration to his bishopric was discussed, and he himself appeared to plead his cause. He was most enthusiastically received by his friends, but the party of his enemies was still powerful, at least in clamour. When he attempted to give an account of his opinions, he was interrupted by the cry, "Curse Nestorius, his doctrines, and his adherents!" In vain did he represent that he cared far less for restoration to his see than for permission to clear himself from the misrepresentations to which he had been subjected: the generous answer to his appeal was the renewed cry, "He is a heretic himself: he is a Nestorian: thrust out the heretic!" Yielding at last to the clamour, he exclaimed, "Anathema on Nestorius, and on every one who denies that Mary is the mother of God, and who divides the Only-begotten into two Sons. I have subscribed the confession of faith, and the letter of the bishop Leo; and this is my faith.—Farewell." This declaration was received with the applause of the whole assembly, and their unanimous vote restored Theodoret to his bishopric. (Harduin. Concil. vol. ii. pp. 496, foll.)

Whatever weakness Theodoret displayed on this occasion consisted, not in the sacrifice of any religious conviction, but in suffering himself to be deprived of the opportunity of explaining his real opinions. He was no Nestorian; and, though his whole character forbids us to suppose that he was a believer in anathemas, yet he had the misfortune to live in an age when the anathema was esteemed the natural and proper form for a declaration of religious belief, and when no man was deemed sincere in the faith which he professed, until he was also prepared to declare the doctrines from which he differed accursed. Theodoret himself, as we have seen, had already condemned the tenets of Nestorius in nearly the very words which he uttered at the council; and if he hesitated to repeat them then, it was only as a protest against the spirit in which the declaration was sought to be extorted from him; a protest which, we think, is implied in the "farewell," by which he appears to utter his resolution never more to mix in such scenes of strife. That resolution he kept. After sharing in the subsequent proceedings of the council, which compensated to some degree for its conduct towards him by pronouncing the condemnation of Eutyches, Theodoret returned to his home at Cyrus, where he devoted the rest of his life to literary labours, committing the charge of his diocese to Hypatius. He appears to have died in A. D. 457 or 458. (Gennad. de Vir. Illustr. 89.) His remains were deposited in the same urn with those of his stedfast supporter, the monk Jacobus Thaumaturgus, who died shortly after him.

Since his death his memory has met with the same varied fortune that he himself suffered during life. The emperor Justin honoured his statue with a solemn installation in his episcopal throne; but the various Monophysite sects continued their opposition to his writings, and twice procured the condemnation of them by ecclesiastical synods during the reign of Anastasius, in A. D. 499, and 512. Marius Mercator, the bitter opponent of everything connected with Nestorianism, represents Theodoret as one of the worst of heretics; and he is followed by Garnier, the completer of Sirmond's edition of Theodoret, the value of whose very learned and elaborate treatise on the life of Theodoret is seriously diminished by the recklessness with which he not only adopts the calumnies of Mercator, but even falsifies facts in order to support them. Cave has been to some degree misled by these writers; but yet he gives us so warm and just a eulogy of the character of Theodoret as to make one smile at the words with which he introduces it: "Meliori quidem fato, et molliori censura dignus erat Theodoritus." Tillemont has refuted many of Garnier's misrepresentations; but he sometimes defends the orthodoxy of Theodoret by arguments which the bishop of Cyrus himself would scarcely have adopted. For the complete vindication of Theodoret's character we are indebted to the German church historians, Schröckh and Neander.

A strong encomium upon his learning and his style will be found in Photius (Bibl. Cod. 46), who describes his language as pure and well-chosen, and his composition as clear, rhythmical, and altogether pleasing. In other passages Photius notices several of the works of Theodoret (Cod. 31, 56, 203—205, 273); and an incomplete list of them is given by Nicephorus Callistus (H. E. xiv. 54). Many of them are mentioned by Theodoret himself, in his letters (Epist. 82, 113, 116, 145). The fullest account of them is contained in Garnier's second Dissertation, de Libris Theodoreti.

I. The most important of Theodoret's works are those of an exegetical character, in several of which he adopts the method, not of a continuous commentary, but of proposing and solving those difficulties which he thinks likely to occur to a thoughtful reader; so that these works are essentially apologetic as well as exegetical. This method is pursued, especially in the first of his commentaries, which is upon the first eight books of the Old Testament, that is, the five books of Moses, Joshua, Judges, and Ruth, and is entitled εἰς τὰ ἄπορα τῆς θείας γραφῆς κατ' ἐκλογήν, or, Quaestiones in Octateuchum; and also in the second of them, upon the books of Kings (i. e. Samuel and Kings) and Chronicles, entitled Εἰς τὰ ζητούμενα τῶν βασιλειῶν καὶ τῶν παραλειπομένων. As a specimen of his method, we give two or three of the first questions which he proposes on the book of Genesis. First, "Why did not the writer preface his account of the creation with the doctrine of God" (θεολογία); to which he replies, that Moses was sent to a people infected with Egyptian pantheism, and that therefore the very first thing that he had to teach them was the distinction between the creature and the Creator; and in so doing, instead of passing by the general subject of theology, he has laid the foundation on which it all rests, in the doctrine of the independent and eternal existence of the one true God. The second question is, "Why does he not mention the creation of angels?" The third, "Did angels exist before the heaven and the earth, or were they created at the same time with them?" In this and many other questions he grapples with some of the most difficult points of controversy which had occupied the Church from the apostolic age to his own time, especially with the various forms of Gnosticism and Manichaeism. His other commentaries are upon the Psalms (Ἑρμηνεία εἰς τοὺς ἑκατὸν πεντήκοντα ψαλμούς), the Canticles (Ἑρμηνεία εἰς τὸ ᾆσμα τῶν ᾀσμάτων), Isaiah (Εἰς τὸν Ἡσαΐαν προφήτην ἑρμηνεία κατ' ἐκλογήν), Jeremiah, with Baruch and the Lamentations (Ἑρμηνεία τῆς προφητείας τοῦ θείου Ἱερεμίου), Ezekiel (Ἑρμηνεία τῆς προφητείας τοῦ θείου Ἰεζεκιήλ), Daniel (ὑπόμνημα εἰς τὰς ὁράσεις τοῦ προφήτου Δανιήλ), and the Twelve Minor Prophets (ὑπόμνημα εἰς τοὺς δώδεκα προφήτας). With respect to the New Testament, we have commentaries by Theodoret on the fourteen epistles of Paul (Ἑρμηνεία τῶν ιδ' ἐπιστολῶν τοῦ ἁγίου ἀποστόλου Παύλου).

II. Theodoret has also left two works of an historical character, but of very different value. (1) His Ecclesiastical History, in five books (Ἐκκλησιαστικῆς ἱστορίας λόγοι πέντε), is a very valuable work, on account of its learning and general impartiality, though it is occasionally one-sided, and often runs into a theological treatise. It was intended, as he himself tells us in the preface, as a continuation of the History of Eusebius. It begins with the history of Arianism, under Constantine the Great, and ends with the death of Theodore of Mopsuestia in A. D. 429, although it contains an allusion to an isolated fact which occurred as late as A. D. 444. (2) The work entitled Φιλόθεος Ἱστορία, or Religiosa Historia, contains the lives of thirty celebrated hermits, and displays that weak side of the character of Theodoret, which has already been mentioned as the necessary result of the earliest impressions he received. It is rather the work of a credulous ascetic than of a learned theologian.

III. Of his works against Cyril, the Eutychians, and the heretics in general, the chief are, (1) His censure (ἀνατροπή) of the twelve heads of anathematisation (ἀναθεματισμοί) of Cyril: (2) The great work against the Eutychians, in A. D. 447, the year before the condemnation of Eutyches at Constantinople, entitled Ἐρανίστης ἤτοι Πολύμορφος (the Mendicant or Many-shaped), which, as he explains in the preface, was intended to imply that the Eutychians endeavoured to pass off their doctrines, like beggars with their tales of imposture, under many guises derived from many previous heresies. The work is in the form of a discussion between the Mendicant and the Orthodox (Ἐρανίστης and Ὀρθόδοξος), and it is divided into three dialogues; the first, entitled Ἄτρεπτος, to prove that the Son of God is unchangeable; the second, Ἀσύγχυτος, that his divine nature is incapable of being mixt or confounded with the nature of man; the third, Ἀπαθής, that the divine nature is insusceptible of suffering; and to these dialogues are appended syllogistic demonstrations (ἀποδείξεις διὰ συλλογισμῶν) of the three propositions maintained in them, namely, first, that God the Word is unchangeable (ὅτι ἄτρεπτος ὁ Θεὸς), secondly, that his union with the human nature is without confusion (ὅτι ἀσύγχυτος ἡ ἕνωσις), and, thirdly, that the divine nature of the Saviour is incapable of suffering (ὅτι ἀπαθὴς ἡ τοῦ Σωτῆρος θεότης). The work displays great learning and power, with a moderation which made it as displeasing to the Nestorians as it was to the Eutychians: (3) A work against heresies in general, entitled Αἱρετικῆς κακομυθίας ἐπιτομή, or, Haereticarum Fabularum Epitome, in five books, addressed to Sporacius. In this work, which seems to have been written after the end of the Nestorian and Eutychian disputes, he not only uses, with regard to other heretics, the intolerant language which was common in that age, but he speaks of Nestorius in terms of bitterness which cannot be defended, and which occur again in a special work against Nestorius, addressed to the same Sporacius. The warmest admirers of Theodoret must lament that, after the contest was over, he took such means to set himself right with his former opponents: (4) Twenty-seven books against various propositions of the Eutychians (λόγοι κζ' πρὸς διαφόρους θέσεις), an abstract of which is supplied by Photius. (Bibl. Cod. 46.)

IV. The chief of his remaining works are: (1) An apologetic treatise, intended to exhibit the confirmations of the truth of Christianity contained in the Gentile philosophy, under the title of Ἑλληνικῶν θεραπευτικὴ παθημάτων· ἢ εὐαγγελικῆς ἀληθείας ἐξ Ἑλληνικῆς φιλοσοφίας ἐπίγνωσις, Graecarum Affectionum Curatio; seu, Evangelicae Veritatis ex Gentilium Philosophia Cognitio: (2) Ten Orations on Providence (περὶ προνοίας λόγοι δέκα): (3) Various Orations, Homilies, and minor treatises: (4) One hundred and eighty-one letters, which are of the greatest importance for the history of Theodoret and his times.

There are only two complete editions of the works of Theodoret, both of very great excellence; but the later having the advantage of containing all that is good, and correcting much that is faulty, in its prodecessor. The first is that edited by the Jesuits Jac. Sirmond and Jo. Garnier, in five volumes folio, Paris, 1642—1684: the first four volumes, by Sirmond, contain the bulk of the works of Theodoret in Greek and Latin; and the fifth, some minor works and fragments omitted by Sirmond, together with Garnier's five dissertations on (1) the History, (2) the Books, (3) the Faith of Theodoret, (4) on the fifth General Council, (5) on the Cause of Theodoret and the Orientals. The faults of these valuable treatises have been already mentioned. The other edition, founded on the former, is that of Lud. Schulze and J. A. Noesselt, Halae Sax. 1769—1774, 5 vols. in 10 parts 8vo. For an account of the editions of separate works, see Hoffmann, Lexicon Bibliogr. Scriptorum Graecorum.

(Garnier, Dissertationes, in vol. 5 of Schulze's edition; Tillemont, Mém. vol. xiv.; Cave, Hist. Litt. s. a. 423, pp. 405, foll., ed. Basil.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. pp. 429, foll., vol. viii. pp. 277, foll.; Schulze, De Vita et Scriptis B. Theodoreti Dissertatio, prefixed to vol. i. of his edition; Neander, Geschichte der Christl. Relig. u. Kirche, vol. ii. passim; Schröckh, Christliche Kirchengeschichte, vol. xviii. pp. 355, foll.)

THEODORICUS or THEODERICUS I., king of the Visigoths from A. D. 418* to 451, was the successor of Wallia, but appears to have been the son of the great Alaric. (Gibbon, Decline and Fall, c. xxxv. note 10.) Not content with the limits of his dominions, Theodoric broke the peace which existed between the Visigoths and the Romans, took several places in Gaul, and laid siege to Arles in A. D. 425. He was, however, obliged to retire on the approach of Aëtius, with whom he concluded a peace; and he then turned his arms against the Vandals in Spain, upon receiving a sufficient subsidy from the Roman general. Theodoric however was only waiting for a favourable opportunity to attack the Romans again; and accordingly, while the Burgundians invaded the Belgic provinces, Theodoric laid siege to Narbonne in A. D. 436. Aëtius displayed his usual activity; he defeated the Burgundians in battle, and sent Litorius to oppose Theodoric. The inhabitants of Narbonne had resisted many months all the efforts of Theodoric to take the town; but they were reduced to the last extremities of famine, when Litorius, in the following year (A. D. 437) cut his way through the entrenchments of the besiegers. The siege was immediately raised; and Aëtius, who arrived shortly afterwards, defeated Theodoric with great slaughter, and obliged him to retire into his own dominions. The Gothic king was now obliged to act on the defensive; and Aëtius, on his return to Italy, left Litorius at the head of an army, chiefly consisting of Huns, to prosecute the war. Unable to resist the Romans in the field, Theodoric retired to Toulouse, where he was besieged by Litorius in A. D. 439. Despairing of success, Theodoric now endeavoured to obtain a peace by the mediation of his Christian bishops; but Litorius, confident of success, and relying upon the predictions of the pagan augurs, that he should enter the Gothic capital in triumph, refused all the proposals which were repeatedly made him. The presumption of Litorius appears to have made him careless. The Goths availed themselves of a favourable opportunity, sallied out of their city, and, after a long and obstinate battle, defeated the Roman army, made their general prisoner, and conducted him in triumph through the streets of Toulouse. This victory turned the fortune of the war; and the whole of the country as far as the Rhone lay exposed to the ravages of the barbarians. Avitus, who was then praefectus praetorio in Gaul, had no army to resist the Visigoths, and accordingly entered into negotiations with Theodoric, which ended in a peace, the terms of which are not related, but which must have been in favour of the barbarians. This last peace between Theodoric and the Romans does not appear to have been interrupted. Theodoric had sought to strengthen his power by giving one of his daughters in marriage to the eldest son of Genseric, king of the Vandals in Africa; but Genseric, who suspected that his son's wife had conspired to poison him, ignominiously deprived her of her nose and ears, and sent her back in this mutilated condition to her father at Toulouse. To revenge this unpardonable outrage, Theodoric made formidable preparations for an invasion of Africa; and the Romans, who always encouraged the discords of the barbarians, readily offered to supply him with men and arms. But Genseric averted the threatening danger by persuading Attila to attack both the Romans and the Goths. With an enormous army composed of various nations, Attila crossed the Rhine at Strasburg, and marched into Gaul. Aëtius collected a powerful force to oppose him, and Theodoric, at the head of his Visigoths, and accompanied by his two sons Thorismond and Theodoric, joined the Roman general. On the approach of Aëtius, Attila, who had laid siege to Orleans, retreated to the plains of Champagne. Aëtius followed close upon his rear. The hostile armies at length met in the neighbourhood of Châlons on the Marne, and in a short but most bloody engagement, Attila was defeated with great loss. The victory was mainly owing to the courage of the Visigoths and of the youthful Thorismond; but their king Theodoric fell at the commencement of the engagement, as he was riding along the ranks to animate his troops (A. D. 451). He was succeeded by his son Thorismond. Theodoric was a wise and prudent monarch; and by his courage in war, and his just administration at home, he earned the love of his subjects and the respect of his enemies. He introduced among his subjects a love of Latin literature, and his sons were carefully trained in the study of the writers and the jurisprudence of Rome. (Jornandes, de Reb. Get. 34, 36—41; Sidon. Apoll. Panegyricus Avito; the Chronicles of Idatius and the two Prospers; Gibbon, Decline and Fall, c. xxxv.; Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. vi.)

* His accession was not in A.D. 419, as is stated by Gibbon and most writers. See Clinton, Fasti Rom. ad ann. 418.

THEODORICUS or THEODERICUS II., king of the Visigoths A. D. 452—466, was the second son of Theodoric I. He was present with his father at the battle of Châlons in 451, and succeeded to the throne by the murder of his brother Thorismond at the close of the following year (452). [THORISMOND.] In A. D. 455 Avitus, who had been well acquainted with the elder Theodoric, was sent as ambassador to the court of Toulouse, to renew the alliance between the Visigoths and the Romans. While staying with Theodoric, he received intelligence of the death of Maximus, and of the sack of Rome by the Vandals. His royal host pressed him to mount the vacant throne, and promised him his powerful assistance. Avitus could not resist the temptation, and the senate was obliged to receive a master from the king of the Visigoths. Theodoric soon showed that he was an able and willing ally of the emperor whom he had placed upon the throne. The Suevi, who had settled in Gallicia in Spain, threatened to extinguish the last remains of Roman independence in that country. The inhabitants of Carthagena and Tarragona implored the assistance of Avitus; and when Rechiarius, the king of the Suevi, refused to listen to the proposals of peace and alliance which were made by the emperor, Theodoric, at the head of a formidable army, crossed the Pyrenees. This expedition was followed with the most complete success. The Suevi were defeated with great slaughter about twelve miles from Astorga, their capital Braga fell into the hands of Theodoric, and their unfortunate monarch, who had attempted to escape, was taken prisoner and put to death. These events happened towards the close of 456. Theodoric now carried his victorious arms into Lusitania, and took Merida the capital of the country. But early in the following year (457), before he had time to provide for the security of his conquests, he was obliged to return in haste to his own dominions, probably fearing evil consequences from the fall of Avitus. [AVITUS.] Although Theodoric had professed to invade Spain as the servant of Avitus, he had made a secret stipulation that all the conquests he effected should belong to himself. He was therefore unwilling to relinquish the advantages he had already gained in that country; and accordingly we find that he sent an army into Spain in 458, under the command of Cyrila, and again in the following year (459) fresh troops under Suniericus. In the course of the latter year he had a more formidable enemy to cope with; for the emperor Majorian marched into Gaul, defeated Theodoric in battle, and concluded a peace with him. The death of Majorian in 461, and the conquests of the Vandals in Italy released Theodoric from all fear; he violated his recent treaty with the Romans, and appears to have designed to make himself master of the whole of the Roman dominions in Gaul. He succeeded in uniting the territory of Narbonne to his own; but his victorious career was checked by the defeat and death of his brother Frederic, who was slain in battle near Orleans by Aegidius, the Roman commander in Gaul. A great part of Spain apparently owned the authority of Theodoric; but the Chronicles merely tell us of embassies that constantly passed between the king of the Visigoths and the king of the Suevi, and give us little or no information of the relative power of the two parties. Theodoric lost his crown by the same crime by which he had gained it. He was assassinated in 466 by his brother Euric, who succeeded him on the throne. Theodoric II. was, like his father, a patron of letters and learned men; and the poet Sidonius Apollinaris, who resided for some time at his court, has given us an interesting account, in a letter to a friend (Ep. i. 2), of the personal appearance, manners and habits, of the king of the Visigoths. (Jornandes, de Reb. Get. 43, 44; Sidon. Apoll. Panegyr. Avito; the Chronicles of Idatius, Marius, and Victor; Greg. Tur. ii. 11; Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. vi.)

THEODORICUS or THEODERICUS (Θευδέριχος), surnamed the GREAT, king of the Ostrogoths, was the son of Theodemir by his favourite concubine Eralieva. He was born in the neighbourhood of Vienna in A. D. 455, two years after the death of Attila. His father, and his father's brothers, Walamir and Widimir, had secured the independence of the Ostrogoths by the defeat of the Huns, and ruled their people as the acknowledged descendants of the royal race of the Amali. In the eighth year of his age Theodoric was sent as a hostage to the emperor Leo, who had purchased the assistance of the Ostrogoths by an annual subsidy. Theodoric received his education at Constantinople, and was restored to his father in 473, when he had reached the age of eighteen, as the emperor hoped to gain the favour of the Ostrogoths by this mark of confidence. During his absence Theodemir had become sole ruler of the nation, since Walamir had fallen in battle, and Widimir, the younger of the brothers, had marched into Italy and Gaul at the head of an army of barbarians. Theodoric had been carefully trained at Constantinople in all martial exercises, and had not lost, amidst the effeminacy of the Greek court, any of the ferocious valour of his people. Soon after his return he gathered around him a body of volunteers, and, without the knowledge of his father, descended the Danube, and conquered and slew in battle a Sarmatian king. Theodoric afterwards accompanied his father and the Ostrogoths, when they quitted their settlements in order to obtain a more fertile territory at the expense of the Byzantine empire. This was in the last year of the reign of the emperor Leo; and Zeno the Isaurian, who succeeded him in 474, hastened to make peace with the Ostrogoths, cedod to them the southern part of Pannonia and Dacia, and entrusted them with the defence of the lower Danube. They had scarcely time to take possession of their new territory, when the death of Theodemir, in 475, placed Theodoric on the throne of the Ostrogoths.

Theodoric was for some time a faithful ally of Zeno. He was of great assistance to the emperor in restoring him to the throne, when he was expelled in 476 [ZENO]; and he carried on war, on behalf of Zeno, with another Gothic prince, Theodoric, the son of Triarius; but the treachery of Zeno, who neglected to supply him with the provisions and the reinforcements of troops he had promised, led the son of Theodemir to conclude a peace with the son of Triarius. To punish the emperor, and, still more, to satisfy the appetite of his subjects for plunder, Theodoric, the son of Theodemir, now ravaged the Byzantine dominions, and laid waste the whole of Macedonia and Thessaly. At length, in 483, Zeno appeased his resentment by conferring upon him the titles of Patrician and Praefectus militiae, by liberal donatives, by adopting him as his son, by erecting his statue in front of the imperial palace, and, finally, by raising him to the consulship in the following year, 484. But these honours did not long retain Theodoric in his allegiance; the restless spirit of his countrymen would not allow him to remain quiet if he had desired it; and accordingly he again took up arms in 487, and marched upon Constantinople. To save himself and his capital, Zeno gave Theodoric permission to invade Italy, and expel the usurper Odoacer from the country. The proposal was gladly accepted by the king of the Ostrogoths; but the terms on which the conquered country was to be held seem to have been purposely left in ambiguity. The Greeks afterwards asserted that Theodoric had promised to conquer the country for the emperor; while the Ostrogoths, on the other hand, alleged that Zeno had expressly ceded Italy to their king.

Theodoric commenced his march towards Italy in 488. The reputation of the leader, and the wealth and beauty of Italy, attracted to his standard a vast host of Goths. They were accompanied by their wives and children, and they carried with them all their moveable property. It was, in fact, an emigration of the whole nation. After encountering numerous obstacles and dangers, and fighting his way through various tribes of Bulgarians, Gepidae, and Sarmatians, Theodoric at length entered Italy in the summer of 489. Odoacer had collected a powerful army to oppose him, and the first battle was fought on the banks of the Sontius or Isontius, not far from Aquileia (28th of August, 489). Odoacer was defeated with great loss, but he again collected his troops in the neighbourhood of Verona, and offered battle a second time to Theodoric (27th of September, 489). This second battle was still more disastrous than the former one, and Odoacer was compelled to relinquish the open country to the invaders, and to shut himself up within the strong fortifications of Ravenna. In the following year (490) he sallied out of the town, and at first gained some advantages over the troops of Theodoric in the neighbourhood of Pavia; but the Gothic king soon rallied his forces, and defeated Odoacer in a third and decisive victory on the banks of the Adda (August, 490). Odoacer again took refuge in Ravenna, where he sustained a siege of three years, while the generals of Theodoric gradually subdued the whole of Italy. At length, in 493, Odoacer agreed to admit the Ostrogoths into Ravenna, on condition that he and Theodoric should rule jointly over Italy. The treaty was confirmed by an oath, but after a few days Odoacer, in the midst of a banquet, was stabbed by the hands or command of his more fortunate rival (5th of March, 493).

Theodoric was now the undisturbed master of Italy, which he ruled for thirty-three years, till his death in 526. The history of his long and prosperous reign does not fall within the plan of the present work. A few particulars only can be mentioned, and the reader must refer for further information to the glowing description of Gibbon. As soon as Theodoric was firmly seated on the throne, he turned his attention to the improvement of the country, which had sunk into the most miserable condition from the long and devastating wars it had gone through. The third part of the lands, which had been previously seized by Odoacer, were assigned to his Gothic warriors, who were thus scattered over the whole country, and formed the standing army of his kingdom. The Italians were secured in the possession of the remaining two thirds of the lands; they were debarred from the use of arms, but they retained all the other rights and privileges which they had previously enjoyed. Theodoric also gradually introduced among his rude warriors a strict discipline, and taught them to respect the lives and property of their Italian neighbours. Although an Arian himself, the most complete toleration was given to the Catholic religion, and Theodoric rather discouraged than promoted conversion to the Arian faith among his Italian subjects. Under his mild and beneficent rule agriculture and commerce flourished, and Italy again became one of the most prosperous countries in the world. Theodoric's relations with foreign nations were marked by principles of justice and integrity, and he showed no desire to extend his dominions at the expense of his neighbours. Unlike other barbarians, he had sufficient penetration to see that the extension of his dominions would not bring an extension of power, and thus most of the wars in which he engaged were purely defensive. The various Germanic nations looked up to him as their chief, and he cemented his connection with them by intermarriages with most of their royal families. Thus he married his two daughters Theodichusa and Ostrogotha, the former to Alaric II., king of the Visigoths, and the latter to Sigismund, the son of Gundobald, king of the Burgundians; his sister Amalfrida, the widow of a noble Goth, he gave in marriage to Thrasimund, king of the Vandals; and his niece Amalaberga to Hermanfried, the last king of the Thuringians. So widely extended was Theodoric's name that the most distant nations courted his alliance and his friendship, and embassies from the rude people on the shores of the Baltic came to Ravenna to present to him their gifts. He became ruler of the Visigoths on the death of his son-in-law Alaric II. The only legitimate son of Alaric was a child named Amalaric, whom he had by the daughter of Theodoric; and to protect the rights of his grandson against the Franks, he sent an army into Gaul, by which he established his power in that country.

Theodoric usually resided at Ravenna, but he removed his court to Verona, whenever his kingdom was threatened by the neighbouring barbarians. On one occasion (A. D. 500), he visited Rome, where he convened the senate, and assured them of his intention to govern with justice. Although ignorant of literature himself, Theodoric encouraged learned men; and among his ministers were Cassiodorus and Boëthius, the two last writers who can claim a place in the literature of ancient Rome. Prosperous as had been the reign of Theodoric, his last days were darkened by disputes with the Catholics, and by the condemnation and execution of Boëthius and Symmachus, whom he accused of a conspiracy to overthrow the Gothic dominion in Italy. [BOETHIUS; SYMMACHUS.] Theodoric died in 526. His death is said to have been hastened by remorse. It is related that one evening, when a large fish was served on the table, he fancied that he beheld the head of Symmachus, and was so terrified that he took to his bed, and died three days afterwards. Theodoric was buried at Ravenna, and a monument was erected to his memory by his daughter Amalasuntha. His ashes were deposited in a porphyry vase, which is still to be seen at Ravenna.

Theodoric left no male issue. He bequeathed his dominions to his two grandsons, Athalaric, the son of his daughter Amalasuntha by a prince of the royal race of the Amali, and Amalaric, the son of Alaric II. and Theodichusa. The Rhone was declared to be the boundary of their dominions: Athalaric was to possess Italy and the conquests of the Ostrogoths, while Amalaric was to succeed to the sovereignty of the Visigoths in Gaul and Spain. The great monarch of the Ostrogoths was long celebrated in the old Teutonic songs. He appears in the "Niebelungen-Lied" under the title of Dietrich of Bern, that is, Verona. (Jornandes, *de Reb. THEODO'RIDAS (Θεοδωρίδας), of Sicyon, was one of the ambassadors sent by the Achaeans in B. C. 187, to renew the alliance with Ptolemy Epiphanes, king of Egypt. (Polyb. xxiii. 1.) He must have been a man of considerable power and influence in his native country, as at a later period (B. C. 168), we find the two Ptolemies (the sons of Epiphanes), who were then joint rulers of Egypt, applying to him to raise for them 1000 mercenaries. (Id. xxix. 8.) [E. H. B.]

THEODO'RIDAS (Θεοδωρίδας), of Syracuse, a lyric and epigrammatic poet, who is supposed to have lived at the same time as Euphorion, that is, about B. C. 235; for, on the one hand, Euphorion is mentioned in one of the epigrams of Theodoridas (Ep. ix.), and, on the other hand, Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. v. p. 673) quotes a verse of Euphorion ἐν ταῖς πρὸς Θεωρίδαν ἀντιγραφαῖς, where Schneider suggests the emendation Θεοδωρίδαν. He had a place in the Garland of Meleager. In addition to the eighteen epigrams ascribed to him in the Greek Anthology, about the genuineness of some of which there are doubts (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 41; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. ii. p. 42, vol. xiii. p. 959), he wrote a lyric poem Εἰς Ἔρωτα, upon which a commentary was written by Dionysius, surnamed ὁ Λεπτός (Ath. xi. p. 475, f.), a dithyramb entitled Κένταυροι (Ath. xv. p. 699; Eustath. ad Odyss. p. 1571, 16), licentious verses of the kind called φλύακες (Suid. s. v. Σωτάδης, as corrected by Meineke, Anal. Alex. p. 246), and some other poems, of which we have a few fragments, but not the titles. The name is more than once confounded with Θεόδωρος and Θεοδώριτος. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 496; Bode, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. ii. pt. 2, p. 333; Ulrici, vol. ii. p. 613; Schmidt, Diatribe in Dithyramb. pp. 147—150.) [P. S.]

THEODORITUS. [THEODORETUS.]

THEODO'RUS I. LA'SCARIS, Greek emperor of Nicaea, A. D. 1206—1222, was descended from a noble family at Constantinople. While in a private station he married Anna Angela Comnena, the second daughter of the emperor Alexis III. Angelus. He was a man of energy and ability, and exhorted his father-in-law to resist the Latins when they laid siege to Constantinople in 1203; but Alexis in despair abandoned the city and fled to Italy, to Conrad, Marquis of Monteferrato, who had married his sister. In the troubles which followed at Constantinople, the history of which has been related elsewhere [ALEXIS IV. and V.], Theodore continued to support the party that was opposed to the Latins; but after Constantinople had been taken by storm on the 12th of April 1204, and Baldwin, count of Flanders, had been placed on the imperial throne, Theodore fled with his wife to the Asiatic coast. Here he succeeded in raising some troops, by means of which he made himself master of the town of Nicaea, and the greater part of Bithynia. He was, however, soon deprived of his conquests by Louis Count of Blois, who had received Bithynia as his share of the Byzantine dominions; but he recovered them again when Louis was recalled to Constantinople to the assistance of Baldwin, who was hard pressed by the Bulgarians and the revolted Greeks. Theodore had previously governed with the title of Despot, in the name of his father-in-law, the deposed emperor Alexis III.; but as the latter was still retained in captivity by the Marquis of Monteferrato, he now assumed the title of emperor of the Romans, as lawful heir to the crown, in virtue of his marriage with Anna, and was publicly crowned at Nicaea as emperor by Michael Autorianus, the Greek patriarch (1206). His title, however, was disputed by several other Greek princes, who had established for themselves independent principalities in Asia Minor. The most formidable of these rivals was Alexis Comnenus, who reigned as emperor at Trebizond, with whom Theodore carried on a successful war for some years. He also had to contend with Henry, the Latin emperor at Constantinople, and the successor of Baldwin, over whom he gained several victories; and it is no small proof of his abilities, that although surrounded by so many enemies, he gradually extended his dominions, and increased his power. For the history of his war with the Latins, see HENRICUS. In 1210 a new enemy appeared. In this year his father-in-law, Alexis, who had escaped from captivity, claimed the throne, and was supported in his claims by Gayáth-ed-dín, the powerful sultan of Koniah. As Theodore refused to surrender the crown to his father-in-law, the sultan marched against him at the head of a powerful army, but was defeated and slain in battle. Alexis fell into the hands of Theodore, who kept him in confinement in a monastery, where he died some years afterwards. Theodore spent the latter years of his reign in peace. He died in 1222, a little more than 45 years of age, and in the 18th year of his reign, computing from the time that he first became master of Nicaea, but in the 16th year from the date of his coronation. He left no male offspring, and was succeeded by his son-in-law Joannes Vatatzes, who had married his daughter Irene [JOANNES III.]. Theodore was married thrice. 1. To Anna Comnena, the daughter of Alexis III. 2. To Philippa, an Armenian princess, whom he divorced. 3. To Maria, the daughter of Peter of Courtenay, emperor of Constantinople. (Nicetas, Alex. Comn. and Balduinus; Acropolita, cc. 6, 14, 15, 18; Du Cange, Familiae Byzantinae, p. 219.)

THEODO'RUS II. LA'SCARIS, Greek emperor of Nicaea, A. D. 1255—1259, was the son of Joannes Vatatzes and of Irene, the daughter of Theodorus I. Lascaris, from whom he derived the surname of Lascaris. His short reign presents nothing worthy of record. He died in August, 1259, in the 36th or 37th year of his age, and was succeeded by his son Joannes Lascaris. [JOANNES IV.] (Du Cange, Familiae Byzantinae, p. 223.)

THEODO'RUS A'NGELUS, the Greek emperor of Thessalonica, A. D. 1222—1230, was descended from a noble family, being the son of Joannes Angelus, also called Comnenus, and the grandson of Constantinus Angelus. After the overthrow of the Greek empire by the Latins in 1204, Theodore Angelus served for some time under Theodore Lascaris, the emperor of Nicaea, but afterwards passed over to Europe to join his bastard brother Michael, who had established an independent principality in Epeirus. On the death of Michael he succeeded to his dominions, which he greatly enlarged by the conquest of Thessaly, Macedonia, and other surrounding countries. He took Peter of Courtenay prisoner, who had been elected emperor of Constantinople, as he was travelling through Epeirus to the imperial city, and kept him in captivity till his death [PETRUS]. Elated by his numerous successes, Theodore assumed the title of Emperor of the Romans, and was crowned at Thessalonica in 1222, in the same year that Joannes Vatatzes succeeded to the imperial title at Nicaea, and Andronicus at Trebizond. He carried on war with success against the Latins, took Adrianople, and advanced as far as the walls of Constantinople. He was, however, recalled to the defence of his own dominions by an invasion of Asan, king of the Bulgarians, who defeated him in battle, took him prisoner, and deprived him of his eyes, in 1230. During his captivity among the Bulgarians, his brother Manuel had seized his dominions and assumed the title of emperor; but Theodore having obtained his liberty, gained possession of Thessalonica by stratagem, and deposed his brother. In consequence of the loss of his sight, he conferred the title of emperor upon his son Joannes; but the latter was subsequently conquered in the life-time of his father by Joannes Vatatzes, the emperor of Nicaea, who compelled him to renounce the imperial dignity, and to content himself with the rank of despot. [JOANNES III.] (Acropolita, cc. 14, 21, 25, 26, 38, 40, 42; Du Cange, Familiae Byzantinae, p. 207.)

THEODO'RUS (Θεόδωρος), literary and ecclesiastical. 1. ABBAS et PHILOSOPHUS, a learned Greek ecclesiastic of the latter part of the sixth or the beginning of the seventh century, from whom it is commonly supposed that Leontius of Byzantium [LEONTIUS, No. 5] derived the materials of his work De Sectis. (Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 538, ed. Oxford, 1740—1743; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. p. 310.)

2. ABUCARA (Ἀβουκαρᾶ, an Arabic name signifying "Father (sc. bishop) of Cara;" derived from the city of which Theodore was bishop), a Greek ecclesiastical writer. He flourished, at the latest, in the beginning of the ninth century, and is to be carefully distinguished from Theodorus, bishop of Caria in Thrace [No. 20], the contemporary of Photius; from Theodore of Rhaithu [No. 65], and from Theodore of Antioch, otherwise Theodore Hagiopolita [No. 11], with each of whom he appears to have been, by various writers, improperly confounded. Very little is known of him. The time at which he lived is ascertained by the inscription to a piece published among his works, from which it appears that he was contemporary with the patriarch Thomas of Jerusalem, probably Thomas I., whose patriarchate extended from A. D. 807, or earlier, to somewhere between A. D. 821 and 829. (Comp. Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, vol. iii. col. 356.) Of what place Abucara was bishop has been much disputed, but it appears probable that it was a village called Cara or Charran in Coele-Syria.

The pieces published under the name of Theodore Abucara are forty-three in number, and are almost entirely on polemical divinity. They are chiefly directed against the Mahometans, and against the Jacobites and Nestorians, the predominant heretical sects of the East. It is to be observed that in the Latin versions of two of his pieces by Turrianus (Nos. 26 and 27 in Gretser), he is called "Theodorus Monachus," and "Theodorus Hagiopolita:" presuming that these designations were found in the originals employed by Turrianus, it would appear, either that Theodore had been a monk at Jerusalem before he was bishop, or that his works have been confounded with those of another Theodore [No. 11]. Many of the pieces are in the form of a dialogue, and it is not impossible, from the great brevity of some, that they may be accounts of actual discussions in which Theodore was engaged, and which were reported by John, a disciple of Theodore, or some other person. The first published were fifteen, in the Latin version of Gilbertus Genebrardus (Nos. 1, 3, 7, 11, 13, 14, 16, 23, 25, 31, 33, in Gretser, whose arrangement differs much from that of Genebrardus). They were given in vol. v. of the Bibliotheca Patrum of

De la Bigne, fol. Paris, 1575, and again, in vol. iv. of the second edition, fol. Paris, 1589. In the Lectiones Antiquae of Canisius, vol. iv. 4to., Ingolstadt, 1604 (vol. ii. pt. ii. p. 463, ed. Basnage), appeared a Latin version by Franciscus Turrianus, of three others (Nos. 27—29, in Gretser); and very soon after Gretser published, with the Hodegus of Anastasius Sinaita (4to. Ingolstadt, 1606), forty-two pieces of Theodore, including all those which had been given in the Bibliotheca and by Canisius. They were given in the Greek (except Nos. 18, 25, and 32) and in a Latin version, partly by Gretser himself, but chiefly by Turrianus, and in a very few short pieces by Genebrardus. The Latin version was reprinted in the Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. iv. ed. Paris, 1609—1610, vol. ix. p. ii. Cologne, 1618, and vol. xvi. ed. Lyon, 1677: the Greek text and Latin version were both given in the Auctarium of Ducaeus to the edit. of Paris, 1624, in vol. xi. of the edit. Paris, 1654, and in the collected edition of Gretser's works, vol. xv. fol. Ratisbon, 1741. The Greek text of No. 18 was published by Le Quien in his edition of Damascenus (vol. i. p. 470, fol. Paris, 1712), with the version of Turrianus, a little altered: the Greek of No. 25 was published by Coteletius, in a note to the Constitutiones Apostolicae, lib. v. c. 7, in his Patres Apostolici, fol. Paris, 1672 (vol. i. p. 310, ed. Leclerc, fol. Amsterdam, 1724): the Greek of No. 32 has never been printed. (Cave (who has confounded him with Theodore of Caria [No. 20]), Hist. Litt. ad ann. 867, vol. ii. p. 54; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 364, &c.; Gretser (who also identifies him with Theodore of Caria), Epistol. Dedicat. Opusculis Abucarae praefixa; Bayle, Dictionnaire, s. v. Abucaras; Le Quien, Opera Damasceni, and Oriens Christianus, ll. cc.)

3. Of Alania. There is extant in MS. at Vienna, and perhaps elsewhere, a Sermon on the Burial of Christ, In Jesu Sepulturam, by Theodore, bishop of Alania, which Cave conjectures to be a city not far from Constantinople. But as the Vienna MS. contains also a discourse or letter addressed by Theodore to the Patriarch of Constantinople, in which are recorded his apostolic labours among the Alani, and his subsequent consecration as bishop of Alania, it is evident that the name Alania designates the country of the Alani, between the Euxine and Caspian seas, north of the Caucasian range. Kollar has given a brief extract from this discourse. The time in which Theodore lived is not clear; but the mention of his apostolic labours among the Alani indicates that he first converted them to the belief of Christianity, which may have been in the time of Justinian, when the neighbouring tribe of the Abasgi were converted. He must, as the Apostle of the Alani, have been a different person from the Theodorus who was bishop of Alania in the thirteenth century. (Kollar, Supplement. ad Lambecii Commentar. de Biblioth. Caesaraea, lib. i. col. 254, &c.; Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, vol i. col. 1348; Allatius, De Symeon. Scriptis, p. 82; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 372; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. Dissert. Prima, p. 19.)

4. Of Alexandria (1, 2). There were two patriarchs of Alexandria of the name of Theodore: one surnamed Scribo (Σκρίβων), a Melchite, or of the orthodox Greek Church, who, after a patriarchate of two years, perished apparently in the troubles occasioned by the revolt of Egypt and Africa against the usurper Phocas, A. D. 609; the other, a Jacobite, who was patriarch from A. D. 727 to 738. (Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, vol. ii. col. 445, 457.)

5. Of Alexandria (3). Theodore, a deacon of the church at Alexandria, who at the Council of Chalcedon, A. D. 451, presented a Λίβελλος, Libellus, against the patriarch of Alexandria, Dioscorus, charging him with having grievously oppressed him (Theodore), on account of the regard in which he had been held by Cyril, the predecessor of Dioscorus. The document is given in the various editions of the Concilia (e. g. vol. iv. col. 395, ed. Labbe, vol. ii. col. 321, ed. Hardouin), in the Acta Concilii Chalcedonensis, actio iii. (Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 451, vol. i. p. 443; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 386.)

6. Of Alexandria (4). A monk who flourished about the commencement of the sixth century. Cave improperly places him in the seventh. He belonged to that branch of the Monophysite body called Theopaschitae, and is known by his controversy with Themistius, another Theopaschite monk, who is charged with having broached the heresy of the Agnoetae, a sect so called from their affirming that Christ knew not the time of the Day of Judgment. Theodore attacked Themistius in a work of which Photius has given an account. As in this controversy Theodore was on the same side as the orthodox Church, it was probably by some other writing that he incurred the condemnation of the emperor Justinian, as mentioned by Facundus. (Phot. Bibl. Cod. 108; Facundus Hermian. Pro Defensione trium Capitulorum, lib. ii. c. 3; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 794, vol. x. pp. 372, 710; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 601, vol. i. p. 573.)

7. Of Amasia. Possevino (Apparatus Sacer, vol. ii. p. 462, ed. Cologne, 1608) mentions two works, Explicatio ad Ecclesiastem et Canticum Canticorum, and Dogmatica Panoplia adversus Judaeos, Armenios et Saracenos, as written by Theodore, bishop of Amasia in Pontus. Le Quien (Oriens Christianus, vol. i. col. 528) notices both works in speaking of Theodore, who was bishop of Amasia at the time of the fifth General Council, A. D. 553, where his signature appears among those of the subscribing prelates; but if, as its title indicates, the Panoplia is a defence of orthodox Christianity against Mohammedanism, the work cannot be of so early a date. No other Theodore is known among the bishops of Amasia. (Possevin.; Le Quien, ll. cc.)

8. Anagnostes (Ἀναγνώστης) or Lector, the Reader, an ecclesiastical historian, generally supposed to have written in the reign of the emperor Justin I., or his successor Justinian I. Nothing of his personal history is known, except that he held the subordinate ecclesiastical post of reader at Constantinople, and, as Suidas states, in the great church (Suidas, s. v.). Suidas states that he brought down his history to the time of Justinian I.: and though nothing in the extant fragments of his works leads us to a later time than the accession of Justin I., we may not unreasonably admit the correctness of Suidas' statement, so far as to place the composition of the history of Theodore in the reign of Justinian. Theodore is quoted by Joannes Damascenus and by Theophanes, and in the Acta of the second Nicene (seventh General Council), all in the eighth century. He was the author of two works on ecclesiastical history, which were sometimes both comprehended under the general title of Ἐκκλησιαστικὴ Ἱστορία, Historia Ecclesiastica, and referred to as constituting one work. They are, in fact, two consecutive works on one subject. 1. Ἐκλογὴ ἐκ τῶν ἐκκλησιαστικῶν ἱστοριῶν, Selecta ex Historiis Ecclesiasticis, a compendium of Church history from the time of Constantine the Great, in two books, compiled chiefly from Sozomen, with additions from Socrates and Theodoret. It is probable that Theodore intended that this compendium should comprehend the whole period included in the histories from which he made his extracts: but if so, the work was not completed; for it breaks off at the death of Constantius II. From its incomplete state it was probably the latter of Theodore's two works in the order of composition, and was apparently designed as an introduction to the other. 2. Ἐκκλησιαστικὴ ἱστορία, Historia Ecclesiastica. An original work on ecclesiastical history, also in two books, comprehending the period from the reign of Theodosius the younger, where Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret end to the reign of Justin I., perhaps of Justinian I. From the circumstance of this work commencing from the point where the earlier ecclesiastical histories cease, it is inferred that the compendium just mentioned was intended to come down to the same point, and consequently that it was never completed. Its incompleteness occasioned a void of seventy years to be left between the close of one, and the commencement of the other of Theodore's works. The compendium is extant in MS., in the library of St. Mark at Venice, though the MS. is mutilated at the beginning. A copy (whether transcribed from the Venetian MS. is not known) was in the possession of Allatius, who intended to publish it, but who never fulfilled his intention; nor has it ever been published. Allatius sent a transcript of some portions to Valesius, who employed it in correcting the text of his edition of the original authors. Theodore's own history is lost, except some extracts ἀπὸ φωνῆς Νικηφόρου Καλλίστου τοῦ Ξανθοπούλου, ex ore Nicephori Callisti Xanthopuli. As Nicephorus never in his own Ecclesiastical History quotes Theodore, except for statements contained in these extracts, it is fairly inferred by Valesius that the original was not in his hands; and that the extracts were made by some one before his time, and were all the remains of Theodore's work then extant, at least all that he had access to. These extracts (Ἐκλογαί, Excerpta) were first published by Robert Stephens, with Eusebius and the other Greek ecclesiastical historians, fol. Paris, 1544; and again, with the Latin version of Christopherson, fol. Geneva, 1612: but the best edition is that of Henri Valois, or Valesius; who published them with the ecclesiastical histories of Theodoret, Evagrius, and Philostorgius, fol. Paris, 1673, reprinted under the care of Reading, fol. Cambridge, 1720, and again at Turin, 1748. Valesius published not only the Excerpta of Nicephorus, but some other fragments of Theodore. Combéfis, in his Originum Rerumque CPolitanarum Manipulus, and Bandurius in his Imperium Orientale, have given an anonymous work Παραστάσεις σύντομοι χρονικαί, Breves Demonstrationes s. Enarrationes Chronographicae, in which are some citations from a Θεόδωρος, Theodorus, or Θεόδωρος Ἀναγνώστης, Theodorus Lector, or Θεόδωρος Χρονογράφος ἀναῤῥωσθεὶς ἀναγνώσμασιν, Theodorus Chronographus Lectionibus clarus (comp. Combéfis, pp. 11, 12, 19, 33, ed. Paris, 1664; Bandurius, vol. i. p. iii. pp. 88, 89, 93, 102, ed. Paris, 1711). If these references are to one and the same writer, and that writer the subject of this article, as critics generally seem to admit, he must have written on other subjects than ecclesiastical history, and have lived at a considerably later period than is generally supposed. The extracts chiefly or wholly relate to the statues with which Constantinople was adorned; and one of them (p. 11, Combéfis, p. 88, Bandurius) contains a curious incident in the personal history of the writer which shows him to have lived in the reign of the emperor Philippicus (A. D. 711—713), nearly two centuries after the reign of Justin I., in which Theodorus is usually placed. Another extract notices statues of the daughter and niece of the empress Sophia, wife of Justin II., which also implies the writer to have lived long after the time of Justin I. Though there seems no decisive reason for identifying the writer on the statues with the ecclesiastical historian, yet the name and title render their identity not improbable: and it may be observed that Damascenus, the earliest writer who has mentioned Theodore, belongs to a period somewhat later than the reign of Philippicus [DAMASCENUS]. (Vales. Praefatio ad Theodoretum, &c.; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 518, vol. i. p. 503; Dupin, Nouvelle Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccles. vol. iv. (6me siècle) p. 92, 2d ed. Paris, 1698; Ceillier, Auteurs Sacrés, vol. xvi. p. 187, &c.; Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. vii. pp. 368, 435, &c., vol. x. p. 398; Schoell, Hist. de la Litterature Grecque Profane, vol. vii. p. 26, 2d ed. Paris, 1825.)

9. Of ANCYRA. Fabricius in two places (Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. p. 696, x. p. 359) mentions a Theodore of Ancyra, as being cited in the Catenae of the Fathers on the Acts of the Apostles and the Catholic Epistles: but the similarity of the names leads us to suspect that the author cited is Theodotus, who was bishop of Ancyra in the first half of the fifth century. The names Theodotus and Theodorus are in MSS. frequently confounded (comp. Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 512). Dr. J. A. Cramer, in the Catena in Acta SS. Apostolorum, edited under his care (8vo. Oxford, 1838), has substituted (pp. 33, 227, 427, 438) the name of Theodotus where the MSS. have that of "Theodore of Ancyra," or "Theodore the Monk," or "Theodore the Monk and Presbyter."

10. Of ANTIDA or ANDIDA or more correctly of SANDIDA, a bishopric of the province of Pamphylia Secunda, of which Perga was the ecclesiastical metropolis (comp. Le Quien, Oriens Christian. vol. i. col. 1013, 1030). Allatius in several of his works has cited some passages from an Expositio Missae by "Theodorus Antidorum (s. Andidorum) Episcopus:" but gives us no clue to the age of the writer except in one place, and there (J. H. Hottingerus fraudis, &c. convictus, p. 12, 8vo. Rom. 1661) we only learn that Theodore was later than Photius, who lived in the ninth century. The citations of Allatius are enumerated by Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 372).

11. Of ANTIOCH (1—6). There were several patriarchs of Antioch of the name of Theodore. An Arian patriarch in the reign of the emperor Valens is called Dorotheus by Sozomen (H. E. vi. 37), but Theodorus by Philostorgius (H. E. ix. 14), who identifies him with Theodore of Heracleia (No. 42).

The orthodox Greeks do not recognise him; their lists contain Theodorus I. from A. D. 750 or 751 to 773 or 774, or later; Theodorus II. under the reign of the emperor John Tzimisces; Theodorus III. in the first half of the eleventh century; Theodorus IV. a learned jurist [BALSAMO, THEODORUS] in the twelfth century; and Theodore V. of a more recent date. (Le Quien, Oriens Christian. vol. ii.) Theodoretus, successor of Theodorus I., is sometimes erroneously called Theodorus. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 396, vol. xii. p. 733.) An extract from a Συνοδικόν, Synodica Epistola, of Theodore of Antioch, evidently Theodore I., is cited by Theodore Studita in his Antirrheticus II. (Sirmond, Opera Varia, vol. v. p. 124.) Two works entitled Homilia de Sancto Theodoro Orientali, and In duodecim Prophetas, the first in Arabic, the second in Greek, both by a Theodore of Antioch, are extant in MS. (Le Quien, Oriens Christian. vol. ii. col. 746; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 396), but whether they are by the same person, and with which of the Theodores he is to be identified, is not known.

12. ASCIDAS (ὁ Ἀσκιδᾶς), a Cappadocian, first a monk of the convent of Nova Laura in Palestine, and afterwards archbishop of Caesaraeia in Cappadocia in the reign of Justinian I. He was probably appointed to his see in A. D. 536, or soon after, but resided little in his diocese, being much at court, where he enjoyed the favour and confidence of the emperor, and was much employed by him. He was also in favour with the empress Theodora, probably from his secretly holding the opinions of the Acephali. When the revival of the doctrines of Origen [ORIGENES] in the monasteries of Palestine, and especially in that monastery called Nova Laura, began to excite attention, Eustochius, patriarch of Jerusalem, a decided Anti-Origenist expelled from the convent of Nova Laura those of the monks who were known as Origenists, and compelled them, by his persecution, to fly to distant parts. In their dispersion, however, they diffused their views more widely, and their cause was warmly espoused by many persons, of whom Theodore Ascidas was at once the most active and influential. He loudly protested against the conduct of Eustochius as both impious and unjust; so that Eustochius found it needful to send as delegates to Constantinople, to counteract Theodore's influence, several monks of his own party, at the head of whom were Conon of the monastery of St. Saba and Rufus, abbot of the monastery of St. Theodosius. Theodore, with undaunted resolution, maintained the Origenists, but the emperor was persuaded by Pelagius the Deacon, legate of Pope Vigilius, and by Mennas, patriarch of Constantinople, to order the condemnation of certain propositions, extracted by the Palestinian monks from the works of Origen and to anathematize their author. The condemnation of Origen was a severe mortification to Theodore, who, however, availing himself of this example of the anathematizing of the dead, prevailed on the emperor, by holding out to him the prospect of thereby reconciling the Monophysites to the church, to issue a libellus, condemning the three decisions "tria Capitula" of the Council of Chalcedon, which recognised the orthodoxy of Theodoret of Cyrus, of Theodore of Mopsuestia, and of the Epistle of Ibas of Edessa; and to anathematize Theodore of Mopsuestia, a prelate much reverenced by the opposite party. This condemnation of the tria Capitula excited great disturbances in the church; Pope Vigilius resisted the condemnation for a time, and issued an act of deposition and excommunication against Theodore, which was of no effect. The emperor persisted; bribery and persecution were freely employed to obtain ecclesiastical support for the imperial edict; and so great was the confusion that even Theodore himself is said to have publicly acknowledged that both he and his great opponent the deacon Pelagius, the pope's legate, deserved to be burnt alive for the scandals their struggle had occasioned. The disturbance was only ended by the assembling of the fifth general (or second Constantinopolitan) council A. D. 553. That council condemned Origen and his supporters on the one hand; and Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret, and Ibas on the other. Theodore Ascidas subscribed to these several anathemas. He died A. D. 558 at Constantinople; if, as is most likely, he is the bishop of Caesaraeia, whose death is noticed by Joannes Malalas, Chronographia, p. 234, ed. Oxford, p. 81, ed. Venice, p. 489, ed. Bonn. (Cyril. Scythopolit. Subae Vita, c. lxxxiii. &c. apud Coteler. Monumenta Eccles. Graec. vol. iii. p. 361, &c.; Evagrius, H. E. iv. 38; Liberat. Breviar. c. xxiii. xxiv.; Malalas, Chronographia, p. 234, ed. Oxford, p. 81, ed. Venice, p. 489, ed. Bonn; Concilia, vol. iii. pp. 1, &c. ed. Hardouin; Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, vol. i. col. 378, &c.) The Testimonium of Theodore and of Cethegus the Patrician as to the tergiversation of Vigilius in the matter of the tria Capitula was first published by Baluse in his Supplementum to the Concilia (Paris, 1683, and again 1707), and is given in the Concilia of Harduin, vol. iii. col. 184, and of Mansi, vol. ix. col. 363.

13. ASINAEUS (ὁ Ἀσιναῖος), a Neo-Platonic philosopher, a native of one of the towns which bore the name of Asine, probably of the Laconian Asine, on the coast, near the mouth of the Eurotas. He was a disciple of Porphyry, and one of the most eminent of the later Platonists. Proclus repeatedly mentions him in his commentaries on Plato (see the references in Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. ix. p. 443), and frequently adds to his name some laudatory epithet, ὁ μέγας "the great," ὁ θαυμαστός "the admirable," γενναῖος "the noble." He wrote a work on the soul, now lost. It is cited by Nemesius of Emesa [NEMESIUS, No. 1] in his De Natura Hominis, cap. ii. De Anima, under this title of Ὅτι ἡ ψυχὴ πάντα τὰ εἴδη ἐστί, Animam esse omnes species. (Proclus, Comment. passim; Damascius, Vita Isidori, apud Phot. Biblioth. Cod. 242; Brucker, Hist. Critica Philosoph. Period ii. Pars i. Lib. i. c. 2. § 4, vol. ii. pp. 232, 249, ed. Leipzig. 1766; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 190, vol. ix. p. 443, vol. x. p. 373.)

14. Of ATHENS, father of the orator Isocrates [ISOCRATES] according to Photius. (Biblioth. Cod. 260.) Theodorus was of the demos of Erchia, which was also the birth-place of the historian Xenophon.

15. The ATHEIST. [No. 32.]

16. BALSAMO. [BALSAMO.]

17. Of BYZANTIUM (1), a rhetorician or pleader of Byzantium. He is mentioned, but somewhat contemptuously by Plato (Phaedr. vol. iii. p. 266, ed. Steph. vol. i. pt. i. p. 81, ed. Bekker, p. 811, ed. Baiter, 4to. Züric. 1839) as "the most excellent tricker-out of a speech," τόν γε βέλτιστον λογοδαίδαλον. He appears to have written a treatise on rhetoric, as Plato, in the passage just cited, refers to the minute subdivisions of an oration mentioned by Theodore (comp. Rufinus, De Compositione et Metris Oratorum). Cicero (Brut. c. 12) describes him as excelling rather in the theory than the practice of his art, "in arte subtilior, in orationibus autem jejunior." He was apparently contemporary with Plato. Dionysius of Halicarnassus (De Antiq. Oratorib.; de Isaeo, c. 19) speaks of him as antiquated, careless and superficial. He is cursorily noticed by Quintilian (Institut. Orat. iii. 1) and Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 104). Suidas (s. v.) says he wrote Κατὰ Ἀνδοκίδου, Contra Andocidem, Κατὰ Θρασυβούλου, Contra Thrasybulum, and some other pieces, which are all now lost. (Diogenes Laërtius says (l. c.) there was another sophist Theodore, but does not mention whether he was a Byzantine or not. Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 139, vol. x. p. 382.)

18. Of BYZANTIUM (2), styled DIACONUS et RHETOR, a Monothelite of the time of Maximus the Confessor [MAXIMUS CONFESSOR]. He was Synodicarius (or representative in some synod) of Paul, patriarch of Constantinople, an appointment which indicates the esteem in which he was held. He was the author of two brief Ἀπορίαι, Dubitationes, which, with the Ἐπιλύσεις, Solutiones, of Maximus, are given by Combéfis in his edition of the works of that father. (Vol. ii. p. 116, &c. fol. Paris, 1675.)

19. Of CARA. [No. 2.]

20. Of CARIA, one of the supporters of Photius [PHOTIUS, No. 3] in his contest with Ignatius [IGNATIUS, No. 3] for the patriarchate of Constantinople, in the ninth century. He is noticed here only to guard against his being confounded, as he has been by some writers, with Theodore Abucara [No. 2].

21. Of CHIOS, a Stoic philosopher mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 104).

22. CORTONITA, a Greek Hymnographer, who wrote Canon in Joannem Euchaitorum Episcopum cognomento Mauropodem [JOANNES, No. 58], of which Allatius (Contra Hottinger. p. 180) makes some extracts. As Joannes lived in the middle of the eleventh century, and the Canon of Theodore was written on occasion of his death, we are enabled to fix the time at which Theodore lived.

23. Of COLOPHON, a Greek poet of unknown age, author of a song entitled ἀλῆτις, "the wandering," because sung at the Athenian festival called ἀλῆτις or αἰῶραι, instituted in commemoration of the wandering of Erigone, in search of her father Icarius. (Pollux iv. 7. § 55.) [ICARIUS] Aristotle, in his account of the constitution of Colophon (ἐν τῇ Κολοφωνίων πολιτείᾳ, apud Athen. xiv. p. 618) mentions a tradition that Theodore was a self-indulgent, luxurious person, which he thinks is apparent also from his poetry; and states that he perished by violence.

24. The COMEDIAN (ὁ κωμικός), mentioned by Hesychius as being surnamed, or rather nicknamed πελεθόβαψ, "dung-diver." According to some accounts he was a poet. Nothing is known of his time or country. (Hesych. s. v. Πελεθόβαψ.)

25. CONSTANTINI PORPHYROGENITI PAEDAGOGUS. Theodore, tutor to the emperor Constantine Porphyrogenitus [CONSTANTINUS VII.] enjoyed during the minority of that accomplished but weak prince, considerable influence in the palace. The attempt of Leo Phocas and his brother-in-law, the chamberlain Constantine, to depose the young emperor, and confer the purple on Leo, were defeated by the vigilance of Theodore, who prevailed on the emperor to summon to his assistance Romanus, afterwards colleague of Constantine in the empire; who, probably, from finding Theodore's fidelity an obstacle to his advancement, caused him and his brother Simeon to be banished from Constantinople to their estates in the Opsician thema, on the Asiatic side of the Bosporus. (Leo Grammaticus, Chronog. pp. 492—496, ed. Paris; Theoph. Continuat. lib. vi. De Constant. Porphyrog. cc. 11—16; Sym. Magist. De Constant. Porphyrog. cc. 12—16; Georg. Monach. De Constant. Porphyrog. cc. 20—34; Zonaras, Annales, xvi. 17; Cedrenus, Compend. pp. 614—619, ed. Paris, vol. ii. pp. 289—296, ed. Bonn.) To this Theodore Lambecius ascribes the authorship of five Λόγοι, Orationes, extant in MS. in the Imperial Library at Vienna. (Lambec. Commentar. de Biblioth. Caesaraea, lib. a. vol. iv. col. 22, &c., ed. Kollar, which he intended to publish. He has given some extracts. (Lambec. vol. iii. p. 147, and l. c.; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 920, vol. ii. p. 93; Oudin. De Script. Eccles. vol. ii. col. 428; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 384.)

26. Of CONSTANTINOPLE (1—2). The list of Patriarchs of Constantinople comprehends two Theodores: Theodore I., from A. D. 676 to 678, when he was deposed, on what account is not known. But on the death of George, who had been appointed to succeed him, he recovered his patriarchate, which he held only for a short time, probably from A. D. 683 to 686. Theodore II. was surnamed Irenicus or Copas; he had previously held the office of Summus Philosophorum, Ὕπατος τῶν φιλοσόφων, and Chartophylax of the Great Church at Constantinople; and was patriarch for sixteen months only, A. D. 1213—1215, while Constantinople was in the hands of the Latin invaders. (Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, vol. i. col. 232, 233, 277.)

28. CUTULA (ὁ Κουτάλα), the contemporary and friend of Nicephorus Gregoras, the Byzantine historian [GREGORAS, NICEPHORUS], and writer of a commendatory letter to Nicephorus, which is given by Boivin among the Elogia prefixed to his first volume of his edition of the works of that historian, fol. Paris, 1702. It is reprinted in Schopen's edition (2 vols. 8vo. Bonn, 1829-30), vol. i. col. lxxxviii. Comp. Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 655, vol. x. p. 385.

29. Of CYNOPOLIS, a Greek rhetorician of uncertain date. Allatius published under his name an Ethopoeia (Ἠθοποιΐα). The piece was, however, published by Gale among the Ethopoeiae of Severus [SEVERUS], to whom it is also assigned by Walz. (Gale, Rhetores Selecti, 8vo. Oxon. 1676, p. 219; Allatius, Exempla Varia Graecor. Rhetor. ac Sophistarum, 8vo. Rome, 1641, p. 235; Walz, Rhetores Graeci, vol. i. p. 540, Stuttgard, 1832.)

30. CYNULCUS (ὁ Κύνουλκος), one of the speakers in the Deipnosophistae of Athenaeus (Epit. lib. i. p. 1, d., iv. p. 156, a., p. 159, e., p. 160, d., viii. p. 347, d., &c., xv. p. 669, b. e., ed. Casaub.). He is represented as a Cynic philosopher, a native of Megalopolis, and as laying aside his true name of Theodore for the epithet Cynulcus. Whether he was a real or imaginary personage is not known. The epithet Cynulcus, "one whom the Cynics (κύνες) followed," was borne by other teachers of the Cynic philosophy, e. g. CARNEIUS.

31 Of CYRENE, a Pythagorean philosopher of the age of Pericles. According to Proclus (In Euclid. Element. Lib. I. Commentarius, lib. ii. p. 19, ed. Gryn. fol. Basil. 1533), he was a little younger than Anaxagoras [ANAXAGORAS], and was eminent as a mathematician. Apuleius (De Dogmate Platonis, lib. i. s. De Philos. Natural. haud longe ab init., and Diogenes Laërtius (iii. 6, comp. ii. 103) state that Plato went to Cyrene to study geometry under Theodore the mathematician, apparently the subject of this article. He is one of those enumerated by Iamblichus (De Pythag. Vita, c. ult.) in his catalogue of the eminent Pythagoreans. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 876, vol. x. p. 385.)

32. CYRENAICUS, a philosopher of the Cyrenaic school [ARISTIPPUS], to one branch of which he gave the name of "Theodorians," Θεοδώρειοι. He is usually designated by ancient writers ATHEUS (ὁ ἄθεος), the Atheist, a name for which that of THEUS (Θέος) was afterwards substituted. He was apparently a native of Cyrene (comp. Diog. Laërt. ii. 103), and was a disciple of the younger Aristippus (ib. ii. 86), who was grandson of the elder (Suidas, s. v. Ἀρίστιππος) and more celebrated Aristippus, by his daughter Arete [ARISTIPPUS; ARETE]. Theodore belonged to the age of Alexander and his successors, a circumstance which, as well as the opposite character of his opinions, distinguishes him from the subject of the preceding notice He heard the lectures of a number of philosophers beside Aristippus; as Anniceris [ANNICERIS], and Dionysius the dialectician (Laërt. ii. 98), Zeno of Citium, Bryson, and Pyrrhon (Suidas, s. v. Θεόδωρος); but not Crates, as Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 189) has from a hasty and inaccurate interpretation of a passage in Diogenes Laërtius (iv. 23) erroneously stated. Nor could he have been, as Suidas states (s. v. Σωκράτης), a hearer of Socrates. He was banished from Cyrene, but on what occasion is not stated (Laërt. ii. 103); and it is from the saying recorded of him on this occasion, "Ye men of Cyrene, ye do ill in banishing me from Cyrene to Greece" (ib.), as well as from his being a disciple of Aristippus, that we infer that he was a native of Cyrene. Of his subsequent history we have no connected account; but unconnected anecdotes of him show that he was at Athens, where he narrowly escaped being cited before the court of Areiopagus. The influence, however, of Demetrius Phalereus shielded him (ib. ii. 101); and this incident may therefore probably be placed during Demetrius' ten years' administration at Athens, B.C. 317—307 [DEMETRIUS, literary, No. 28]. As Theodore was banished from Athens, and was afterwards in the service of Ptolemy son of Lagus, first king of the Macedonian dynasty in Egypt, it is not unlikely that he shared the overthrow and exile of Demetrius. The account of Amphicrates cited by Laërtius (ii. 101), that he was condemned to drink hemlock and so died, is doubtless an error. While in the service of Ptolemy, Theodore was sent on an embassy to Lysimachus. whom he offended by the freedom of his remarks. One answer which he made to a threat of crucifixion which Lysimachus had used, has been celebrated by many ancient writers (Cic. Quaest. Tusc. i. 43; Senec. de Tranq. An. c. 14; Val. Max. vi. 2, extern. 3):—"Employ such threats to those courtiers of yours; for it matters not to Theodore whether he rots on the ground or in the air." From the court or camp of Lysimachus he returned apparently to that of Ptolemy (Diog. Laërt. ii. 102). We read also of his going to Corinth with a number of his disciples (ibid.): but this was perhaps only a transient visit during his residence at Athens. He returned at length to Cyrene, and lived there, says Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 103), with Marius. This Roman name is very questionable; and Grantmesnil (apud Menag. Obs. in Diog. Laërt. l. c.) not improbably conjectures that we should read Magas, who was stepson of Ptolemy the son of Lagus, and ruled over Cyrene for fifty years (from B.C. 308 to B.C. 258), either as viceroy or king. The account of Laërtius leads to the inference that Theodore ended his days at Cyrene. Athenaeus (xiii. p. 611, a) states that he died a violent death, but this is probably only a repetition of the erroneous statement of Amphicrates already noticed. Various characteristic anecdotes of Theodore are preserved by the ancients (especially by Laërtius, ii. 97—103, 116; Plutarch, De Animi Tranquill. Opp. vol. vii. p. 829, De Exsilio, Opp. vol. viii. p. 391, ed. Reiske; Val. Max. l. c.; Philo Jud. Quod omnis probus liber, c. 18, vol. ii. p. 465, ed. Mangey, p. 884, ed. Pfeiffer. s. Paris, vol. v. p. 295, ed. Richter, Leipsic, 1828; Suidas, s. v. Ἥρα), from which he appears to have been a man of keen and ready wit, unrestrained either by fear or a sense of decency.

It has been already noticed that Theodore was the founder of that branch of the Cyrenaic sect which was called after him "Theodorei" (Θεοδώρειοι), "Theodoreans." The general characteristics of the Cyrenaic philosophy are described elsewhere [ARISTIPPUS]. The opinions of Theodore, as we gather them from the perplexed statement of Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 98, foll.) partook of the lax character of the Cyrenaic school. He taught that the great end of human life is to obtain joy and avoid grief, the one the fruit of prudence, the other of folly; that prudence and justice are good, their opposites evil; that pleasure and pain are indifferent. He made light of friendship and patriotism, and affirmed that the world was his country. He taught that there was nothing really disgraceful in theft, adultery, or sacrilege; but that they were branded only by public opinion, which had been formed in order to restrain fools. But the great charge against him was atheism. "He did away with all opinions respecting the Gods," says Laërtius (ib.), but some critics doubt whether he was absolutely an atheist, or simply denied the existence of the deities of popular belief. The charge of atheism is sustained by the popular designation of Theodorus "Atheus," by the authority of Cicero (de Nat. Deor. i. 1), Laërtius (l. c.), Plutarch (De Placit. Philos. i. 7), Sextus Empiricus (Pyrrhon. Hypotyp. lib. iii. p. 182, ed. Fabric. 1718, p. 172, ed. Bekker, 1842), and some of the Christian Fathers; while some other authorities (e. g. Clem. Alex. Protrept. ad Gentes, p. 7, ed. Sylburg. pp. 20, 21, ed. Pott. vol. i, p. 20, ed. Klotz. Leipsic, 1831) speak of him as only rejecting the popular theology. The question is discussed and the authorities cited by Reimmann (Hist. Atheismi, sect. ii. c. xxiv. § 3), and Brucker (Hist. Crit. Philos. pars ii. lib. ii. c. iii. § 11)

Theodore wrote a book Περὶ Θεῶν, De Diis, which Laërtius who had seen it, says (ii. 97) was not to be contemned; and he adds that it was said to have been the source of many of the statements or arguments of Epicurus. According to Suidas (s. v. Θεόδωρος) he wrote many works both on the doctrines of his sect and on other subjects. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. pp. 189, 615, vol. x. pp. 373, 385.)

33. Daphnopates. [Daphnopates.]

34. Decapolita (ὁ Δεκαπολίτης), called also Patricius and Quaestor, lived under Constantine VII. Porphyrogenitus, several of whose Novellae were drawn up by our Theodore. (Codinus, De Originibus CPolitanis, p. 78, ed. Paris, p. 155, ed. Bonn. cum notis Lambecii; Lambec. De Biblioth. Caesaraea, vol. vi. pars i. col. 37.)

35. Of Edessa, was first a monk of that city, and then archdeacon (Cave says archbishop) of the Church there. Possin and Cave place him in the twelfth century; and Cave observes that the capture of Edessa by the Saracens prevents our placing him later. Ex Capitibus Theodori Edesseni L. were given in a Latin version subjoined to Pontanus's edition of the works of Symeon of St. Mamas [Symeon, No. 16], Ingoldstadt, 1603, and were reprinted in the Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. xii. pars i. p. 861, fol. Cologne, 1618; in the Bibliothecae Patrum, Supplementum of Morel, vol. i. Paris, 1639; and in the Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. xxii. p. 752, fol. Lyon, 1677. But they were given more fully, Capitula CII., and in the Greek original as well as in a Latin version, in the Thesaurus Asceticus of Possin, p. 345, 4to. Paris, 1684. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 387; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 1101, vol. ii. p. 185.)

36. Epigrammaticus Poeta (ποιητὴς ἐπιγραμμάτων), mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 104), but without any notice of time or country. Suidas and Eudocia (s. v.) mention a Theodore, a poet, author of various pieces, especially one addressed Εἰς Κλεοπάτραν, Ad Cleopatram. Pollux also (Onomasticon, iv. 7, 2) mentions a Theodore of Colophon, a poet; but whether these writers refer to the same individual is not certain. Two very short Epigrammata are assigned to "Theodorus Proconsul," Θεοδώρου ἀνθυπάτου (Anthol. Graec. Planudea, pp. 140, 220, ed. Stephan., pp. 203, 320, ed. Weichel.; Analecta, Brunck, vol. iii. p. 6, vol. iii. p. 227, ed. Jacobs), but we have no means of knowing whether he is one of those mentioned above. Jacobs identifies him with a Theodorus Illustris, twice proconsul, to whose bust or statue Agathias wrote an Epigramma Εἰς εἰκόνα Θεοδώρου Ἰλλουστρίου καὶ δὶς ἀνθυπάτου, Ad Imaginem Theodori Illustris et bis Proconsul. Antholog. Graec. vol. xiii. p. 618, ed. Jacobs), and whom, therefore, Jacobs (vol. xiii. p. 960) assigns to the age of Justinian I. These various Theodori are to be distinguished from Cyrus Theodorus, Κῦρος Θεόδωρος [No. 64], whose Epigrammata, in which all the chapters of the Old and New Testaments are enumerated, were published at Basel, A. D. 1636. (Jacobs, l. c.)

37. Of Gadara (Θεόδωρος Γαδαρεύς), an eminent rhetorician of the age of Augustus. His surname indicates his birth-place, Gadara, in the country east of the Jordan. (See also Strabo, Geogr. lib. xvi. p. 759, Casaub.) He is said to have been originally a slave (Suidas). He appears to have settled at Rhodes, where Tiberius, afterwards emperor, during his retirement (from B. C. 6 to A. D. 2) to that island, was one of his hearers. (Quintil. Instit. Orat. lib. iii. c. i. §§ 17, 18; comp. Seneca, Suasoria, iii. sub fin.) According to Suidas he was also settled at Rome, where he was the rival of Polemon and Antipater, the rhetoricians (Suidas, s. v. Θεόδωρος Γαδαρεύς). Whether his settlement at Rome preceded that at Rhodes is uncertain: it is likely that it did, and that Tiberius received instruction from him in rhetoric in his boyhood, as well as in maturer years, during his retreat at Rhodes. By this supposition we may reconcile the statement given above from Quintilian with the following remarkable passage from Suetonius (Tiber. c. 57): — "His (Tiberius's) cruel and sluggish temperament did not escape notice even in his boyhood; Theodore of Gadara, his teacher in rhetoric, seems to have been the first who sagaciously perceived and aptly expressed it by a comparison, calling him from time to time when reproving him (πηλὸν αἵματι πεφυρμένον), 'clay tempered with blood.'" Theodorus was one of the most eminent rhetoricians of his time (comp. Juvenal, Sat. vii. 177); and was in fact the founder of a certain school of rhetoricians who were called "Theodorei" (Quintil. l. c.; comp. Strab. Geog. lib. xiii. p. 625, Casaub.), as distinguished from the "Apollodorei," or followers of Apollodorus of Pergamus, who had been the tutor of Augustus Caesar at Apollonia. [Apollodorus, No. 22.] Hermagoras the rhetorician, surnamed Carion [Hermagoras, No. 2], was a pupil of Theodore. (Quintilian, l. c. § 19.) Theodore wrote many works. (Quintil. l. c. c. 18.) Suidas (s. v.) and Eudocia (apud Villoison. Anecdota Graec. vol. i. p. 230) mention the following: — 1. Περὶ τῶν ἐν φωναῖς ζητουμένων γ′, Libri tres de iis quae vocibus quaeruntur. 2. Περὶ ἱστορίας α′, De Historia Liber unus. 3. Περὶ θέσεως ἕν, De Thesi Liber unus. 4. Περὶ διαλέκτων ὁμοιότητος καὶ ἀποδείξεως β′, De Dialectorum Similitudine et Demonstratione Libri duo. 5. Περὶ πολιτείας β′, De Republica Libri duo. 6. Περὶ Κοίλης Συρίας α′, De Coele-Syria Liber unus. 7. Περὶ ῥήτορος δυνάμεως α′, De Facultate Oratoris Liber unus. He adds that he wrote others. The list shows that Theodore was a man of varied attainments. His works are all lost: a few fragments are preserved by Quintilian, whose frequent references to or citations from Theodore (Institut. lib. ii. c. xv. § 16, lib. iii. c. vi. §§ 2, 36, 51, c. xi. §§ 3, 26, lib. iv. c. i. § 23, lib. v. c. xiii. § 59) show the reputation he had attained. He is also cited by Longinus (De Sublim. c. 2), Theon (Progymnasmat. c. xii.), and perhaps by Demetrius, miscalled Phalereus (De Interpretatione, c. ccxxxvii.). Antonius, a son of Theodore of Gadara, became a senator in the time of Adrian (Suidas, l. c.). (Langbaine, ad Longin. c. ii. p. 24, ed. Oxford, 1638; Menag. ad Diog. Laërt. ii. 104; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 139, vol. x. p. 387.)

38. Gaza. [Gaza.]

39. Grammaticus. Athenaeus repeatedly cites either two works of this Theodore, or the same work under two somewhat different titles, Ἀττικαὶ γλῶσσαι, Atticae Glossae, and Ἀττικαὶ φωναί, Atticae Voces. (Athen. xi. p. 496, e., xiv. p. 646, c., xv. p. 677, b., p. 678, d., p. 691, c.) Of the age and country of Theodore nothing is known, except that, as he is, in one of the above places (xv. p. 677), cited on the authority of Pamphilus [Pamphilus, literary,

No. 4], who is thought to have lived in the first century after Christ, he must be placed in or before that time. (Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. x. p. 395.)

40. GRAPTUS. [GRAPTUS.]

41. Afterwards GREGORIUS THAUMATURGUS. [GREGORIUS THAUMATURGUS.]

42. Of HERACLEIA. Theodore, one of the leaders of the Arian party under Constantine the Great and Constantius, was a native of Heracleia (anciently Perinthus), on the Propontis, and bishop of the Church there. He advocated the Arian doctrine while yet a presbyter, and was raised to the episcopate by the favour of the Arian party. (Athanas. Ad Episcopos Aegypti et Libyae, c. 7, Opp. vol. i. p. 277, ed. Montfaucon.) He is mentioned by Theodoret (H. E. i. 28), as one of those who persuaded Constantine to summon the Council of Caesareia in Palestine, which was, however, countermanded. [ATHANASIUS.] He was probably afterwards present at the Council of Tyre, A. D. 336; for he was one of the delegates sent by that Council into Egypt, to investigate the charges against Athanasius. (Theodoret. H. E. i. 30; Athanas. Apolog. contra Arianos, c. 13, p. 135.) He was one of those who combined to raise Macedonius to the see of Constantinople. (Socrat. H. E. ii. 12.) In A. D. 342 he was one of the delegates sent to convey to the emperor Constans the Confession of Antioch. (Athanas. De Synod. c. 25; Socrat. H. E. ii. 18.) He was one of the Eastern bishops who, in A. D. 347, withdrew from the Council of Sardica, and formed the rival Council of Philippopolis; and was among those on whom the Council of Sardica passed sentence of condemnation and deposition. (Socrat. H. E. ii. 20; Sozomen. H. E. iii. 11, &c.; Theodoret. H. E. ii. 7, 8; Athanas. Apolog. contra Arianos, c. 36, Historia Arianor. c. 17; Hilar. Pictav. Ex Opere Historico Fragment. iii. 29.) He nevertheless appears to have retained his bishopric, the Council not being able to carry into effect the sentence which they had pronounced. He assisted at the Council of Sirmium and the deposition of Photinus, A. D. 351. (Hilar. Pictav. ibid. vi. 7, col. 1337, ed. Benedictin.) He appears to have died about A. D. 355 (Fabric. Tillemont, ubi infrà) or 358 (Cave, ubi infrà). After the development of the different sections of the Arian party Theodore acted with the Eusebians or Semi-Arians. In an ancient life of St. Parthenius of Lampsacus (apud Acta Sanctorum Februar. a. d. vii. vol. ii. pp. 41, 42), there is a Latin version of a curious account of the sickness, recovery, and subsequent death of Theodore (who, by an obvious error of the translator, is called Hypatius); in which account he is charged with avarice and extortion; yet, singular to say, no hint of his heresy is given.

Theodore of Heracleia was a man of eminent learning. He wrote, according to Theodoret (H. E. ii. 3), an exposition of the Gospels, Τῶν θείων εὐαγγελίων ἑρμηνεία, Expositio Sanctorum Evangeliorum, and other writings which Theodoret does not specify. Jerome (De Viris Illustr. c. 90) more exactly ascribes to him Commentarii in Matthaeum et in Joannem et in Apostolum (i. e. on the Acts and Apostolic Epistles) et in Psalterium. Corderius published, with his Expositio (s. potius Catena) Patrum Graecorum in Psalmos, an exposition which he had found ascribed in one MS. to Theodore of Heracleia (Θεοδώρου ἐπισκόπου Ἡρακλείας Θρᾴκης ἑρμηνεία εἰς τοὺς Ψαλμούς, Theodori Episcopi Heracleotae Expositio in Psalmos), and consequently published it as his. Lambecius, Cave, and Fabricius, joined Corderius in ascribing it to Theodore; but the identity of many parts of this commentary with that of Basil of Caesareia led Garnier to doubt whether it was correctly ascribed to Theodore; and, on further examination, it was found to be a compilation from various fathers, from Origen and Didymus downward. (Lambec. Commentar. de Biblioth. Caesaraea, vol. iii. col. 56, &c., ed. Kollar, especially Kollar's note on col. 59; Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. viii. p. 652, vol. ix. pp. 20, 319, alibi; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 334, vol. i. p. 202; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. vi. passim; Oudin, Commentarius de Scriptoribus Eccles. vol. i. col. 319.) [J. C. M.]

43. Of HERMOPOLIS, a Greek jurist. See below.

45. HYRTACENUS, a native probably not of Hyrtacus or Artacina in Crete, but of Artace, near Cyzicus, on the Propontis. He lived in the time of the emperor Andronicus the elder, and occupied at Constantinople the office of superintendent of the public teachers of rhetoric and belles lettres. He was well acquainted with the works of the ancient poets, as is abundantly testified by his extant writings, which are full of quotations from them, though these are not always of the most appropriate kind. The diction of his address to the Virgin is a close imitation of the hymn of Callimachus to Diana; and in his panegyric on Saint Anna he has introduced the fable of Niobe. There are still extant by him ninety-three letters to different persons; a congratulatory address to the emperor Andronicus the elder, on his return to Constantinople; three funeral orations, one on the emperor Michael Palaeologus the younger, who died A. D. 1320, another on the empress Irene, the second wife of Andronicus the elder, and the third on Nicephorus Chumnus, the historical value of which is greatly impaired by their rhetorical style. They contain a plentiful sprinkling of biblical and Homeric passages. His panegyric on the Virgin Mary, his oratorical description of the garden of Saint Anna near Nazareth, and a panegyric on Aninas Thaumaturgus, are still in MS. His letters were published by Laporte du Theil, in the Notices et Extraits des Manuscrits de la Bibl. du Roi, vol. v. p. 709, &c., vol. vi. p. 1. The four orations are printed in Boissonade's Anecdota Graeca, vol. i. p. 248—292. (Fabric Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 397; Schöll, Geschichte der Griech. Lit. vol. iii. p. 151.)

46. JACOBITA. More than one dignitary of the Jacobite sect or church bore this name. One was created bishop of Irta in A. D. 551. Another, patriarch of the Jacobites, died A. D. 665. (Assemann. Bibl. Orient. vol, i. p. 167; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 398.)

47. Bishop of ICONIUM, a letter by whom, on the martyrdom of St. Cericus and his mother Julitta, was published by Combefisius. (Lect. Triumph. Martyr. Christi, Paris, 1660; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 398; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 534.)

48. LECTOR. [No. 8.]

49. MALLIUS or MANLIUS, a contemporary of St. Augustin, who dedicated to him his work De Vita beata. He was consul in A. D. 399. A Latin work by him (De Rerum Natura) is still extant, though not published. A life of Theodorus, written by Albertus Ruberius, was published by Graevius (Ultraject. 1694.) Theodorus Manlius has been sometimes confounded with the poet Manilius.

50. MATHEMATICUS. [No. 31.]

51. MECHANICUS, a person of whom nothing more is known than that Proclus addressed to him his treatise De Providentia et Fato. There was a younger mechanician of this name who lived in the time of Justinian, and to whom Leontius dedicated his treatise on the sphere. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 400.)

52. MELITENIOTA, a native apparently of Melitene in Armenia, filled the offices of Sacellarius Magnus and Chief Teacher (διδάσκαλος τῶν διδασκάλων) in the great church at Constantinople towards the close of the twelfth century. He was the author of a work on astronomy, the introduction and first chapter of which were published by Ismael Bulloaldus, appended to his edition of Ptolemaeus, De judicandi Facultate et Animi Principatu, Paris, 1663, and reprinted by Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 401, &c.).

53. METOCHITA. [METOCHITA.]

54. Of MILETUS, a Stoic philosopher mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 104).

55. MONOTHELITA. [BYZANTIUS, PHARANITAS.]

56. MOPSUESTENUS, bishop of Mopsuestia, was born at Antioch, of distinguished and wealthy parents. Together with Joannes Chrysostomus he studied rhetoric under Libanius, and afterwards philosophy under Andragathus. At an early age he embraced the monastic life, after the example of his friend Chrysostom, by whom he was strengthened in his purpose of adhering to the monastic discipline, when he was on the point of marrying a lady named Hermione. Two of the letters of Chrysostom, addressed to Theodorus on this subject, are still extant. Theodorus studied sacred literature with great diligence under Flavianus of Antioch, Diodorus of Tarsus, and Craterius. From Antioch he removed to Tarsus, and about the year 394 succeeded Olympius, as bishop of Mopsuestia, in Cilicia. He was present at the council held in A. D. 394 at Constantinople, and subsequently at several others. He died in A. D. 429, after having filled the office of bishop for thirty-six years, and was succeeded by Meletius. For fifty years he had occupied a conspicuous position as a preacher and writer in the Eastern Church, and had distinguished himself as the opponent of the Arians, Apollinarists, and other heretics. His own theological position is a subject which has given rise to a great deal of discussion, into the details of which we cannot here enter. Even during his lifetime he was accused of favouring the heresy of Pelagius, and is said to have found it necessary to establish his reputation for orthodoxy, by a retractation of his suspicious expressions. He, at all events, remained unmolested in the communion of the Church. After his death, however, the Nestorians appealed to his writings in confirmation of their opinions, and at the fifth oecumenical council (A. D. 553) Theodorus and his writings were condemned. He found, however, many warm defenders, especially Facundus. [FACUNDUS.] Among those who most bitterly assailed him and his writings were Leontius, Cyril of Alexandria, Rabulas of Edessa and others. His works were held in great repute among the Syrian Churches, and many of them were translated into Syriac, Arabic, and Persian. His memory was revered among the Nestorians. Several distinguished ecclesiastics are mentioned as his disciples, as Nestorius, Joannes of Antioch, Andreas of Samosata, Maris the Persian, Theodoretus bishop of Cyrus, Rufinus the Syrian, and Barsumas the Persian. His brother Polychronius was bishop of Apamea.

Theodorus took an active interest in the Augustinian controversy, and wrote a work on the doctrine of original sin, directed especially against Jerome. (Photius, Cod. 177.) Though from his antagonism to the theology of Augustine he naturally approximated somewhat to that of Pelagius, his opinions differed from those of the latter in several most important respects, especially with respect to the necessity and effects of Christ's work. This he regarded as intended not so much to restore a ruined nature as to enable a created and imperfect nature to realise the true end of its existence: its new creation consisting in its being raised into a higher sphere, and rendered capable of a development overstepping the limits of finite nature, — a divine life exalted above temptation and change, through union with God. In this purpose he held that all intelligent beings were included, and therefore of course denied the eternity of future punishment, and, if he carried his principles out consistently, his scheme must have admitted of the restoration of the fallen angels. His view of Christ's nature bore an analogy to his conceptions of the destiny of man. He accepted the doctrine of the incarnation of the Divine Word, but looked upon the moral development of the human nature of Christ as progressive; that development being more certain and rapid than in men generally, from the indwelling Divine Word aiding his human will, though not superseding it. But the exaltation of Christ's humanity to divine perfection and immutability, while commencing from his birth, was not complete till his resurrection.

Theodorus was a somewhat voluminous writer. 1. One of his earliest works was that Περὶ ἐνανθρωπήσεως τοῦ μονογενοῦς, against the Arians, Eunomians and Apollinarists (Marius Mercator, ii. p. 259). 2. Facundus (iii. 2) quotes from the thirteenth book of a work which he entitles Mysticus. 3. Photius (Cod. 4. 177) mentions a work Ὑπὲρ Βασιλείου κατὰ Εὐνομίου. in twenty-five or twenty-eight books (unless, as some suppose, Photius speaks of two distinct works). 4. De adsumente et adsumto, fragments of which are extant (Collect. iv. Synodi v.). The preface is given by Facundus (x. 1). 5. Περὶ τῆς ἐν Περσίδι μαγικῆς (Phot. Cod. 81), in three books. 6. A work in five books, Πρὸς τοὺς λέγοντας φύσει καὶ οὐ γνώμῃ πταίειν τοὺς ἀνθρώπους, in which he especially attacked Jerome, and indirectly at least, Augustine (Photius, Cod. 177. From a misunderstanding of the expressions in Photius, Salmasius was led into the error of supposing that Theodorus prepared another Greek version of the Scriptures). 7. Theodorus was especially celebrated as a commentator on the Scriptures. In this department he seems to have begun to exert his powers at a very early age. (Leontius, lib. 3. cont. Nest. et Eut. p. 696.) In his expositions he aimed at educing the literal sense of passages, avoiding the allegorical interpretations of Origenes and his followers. He appears to have written upon almost all the books of the Bible, though he rejected the canonical authority of several (the Book of Job, the Canticles, the Epistle of James the Second and Third Epistles of John, and the Epistle of Jude). Fragments of these commentaries are preserved in the Acta of the fifth Council and elsewhere. His commentaries on the Twelve Minor Prophets are said to be still extant. Those on Jonah, Obadiah, Nahum, and the prefaces to those on Amos, Zachariah, Haggai and Hosea, were published by Angelo Mai (Script. veterum nova Collect. vol. i. sect. ii. p. 41—104). The fragments of the commentary on Luke, preserved in the Catenae, were published by Münter (1788). Photius (Cod. 381) mentions Theodorus's ἑρμηνεία τῆς κτίσεως, fragments of which are extant. 8. A work on the Nicene creed is quoted in the Acta of the fifth council (Collat. iv. p. 81). 9. A treatise addressed to candidates for baptism (Ibid.). 10. A confession of faith is extant (Act. VI. Concil. Ephes. tom. i. p. 1515, ed. Hard.) which is by some ascribed to Theodorus, by others to Nestorius. 11. A work against the allegorical interpretation of Scripture is mentioned by Ebed Jesu and Facundus (iii. 6). 12. Theodorus also compiled a liturgy, which was adopted by the Nestorians. 13. A few other treatises are mentioned by Ebed Jesu. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 346, &c.; Neander, Allgemeine Geschichte der Christlichen Religion und Kirche, vol. ii. Abt. ii. and iii.)

57. Neocaesariensis. [Gregorius Thaumaturgus.]

58. Son of Theodorus, bishop of Jerusalem, was pope from Nov. 3, A. D. 642, to April 20, A. D. 649. There is still extant a letter addressed by him to Paulus, Patriarch of Constantinople, in the matter of one Pyrrhus, a Monothelite; and likewise a letter addressed to the bishops who consecrated Paulus. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 427, vol. xii. p. 707).

59. Patriarcha. [No. 26.]

60. Of Perinthus. [No. 42.]

61. Bishop of Petra in Galilee, flourished in the sixth century, and was the author of a life of the archimandrite Theodosius, whose disciple he was. His Canonicon also is quoted by Nic. Comnenus. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. pp. 337, 428.)

62. Pharanites, bishop of Pharan, belonged to the Monothelite party. He was one of those condemned by the sixth oecumenical council, held at Constantinople. We find ascribed to him a treatise περὶ οὐσίας καὶ φύσεως, ὑποστάσεώς τε καὶ προσώπου, a λόγος πρὸς Σέργιον, and another εἰς τὰς ἑρμηνείας τῶν πατρικῶν χρήσεων, some fragments of which remain. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 428.)

63. Prodromus. There were two of this name. 1. A writer on canonical law, whose ἐξήγησις of the canons of the councils is repeatedly quoted by Nic. Comnenus and others. Nothing is known of his personal history, but that he seems to have lived a long time before Balsamo. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 428, vol. xii. p. 206.) There is some confusion in the notices contained in Fabricius. In vol. x. p. 429, and vol. xii. p. 206, he speaks of this Prodromus as τὸν τῶν ἱερῶν κανόνων πρῶτον σαφηνιστήν, and as the author of an exposition of the canones or hymns appropriated to the dominical festivals; while in vol. viii. p. 142, note h, that work is assigned to the following Theodorus Prodromus.

64. Prodromus (2), or, as he is sometimes called in the MSS., Theodorus Ptochoprodromus, a monk who lived in the first half of the twelfth century. On entering upon the monastic life he received the name of Hilarion. He was held in great repute by his contemporaries as a scholar and philosopher, and received the appellation of Κυρός (equivalent to κύριος in the Greek of the Middle Ages). He wrote upon a variety of subjects,— philosophy, grammar, theology, history, and astronomy, and in particular was a somewhat prolific poet. Several of his compositions have come down to us, and some have been published. The following are extant: 1. A metrical romance in nine books, on the loves of Rhodanthe and Dosicles. It is written in iambic metre, and exhibits no great ability. The reader would look in vain for any thing like a natural progress in the action, or unity in the characters. Not only are we introduced at once in medias res, but instead of narrating on suitable opportunities what had preceded, Dosicles is made to tell what had gone before, beginning at the end, and interweaving the preceding parts of the narrative into his story. There is only one edition of this poem, by Gilb. Gaulmin. (Paris, 1625.) Poor as the poem is, however, it found an imitator. There is extant an iambic poem, also in nine books, on the loves of Drosilla and Charicles, by Nicetas Eugenianus, which has been erroneously ascribed to Theodorus Prodromus. 2. A poem entitled Galeomyomachia, in iambic verse, on "the battle of the mice and cat," in imitation of the Homeric Batrachomyomachia. Victory declares itself on the side of the mice, the cat being killed by the fall of a beam. This piece is often appended to the editions of Aesop and Babrius. It has also been edited by K. D. Ilgen, in connection with the Homeric hymns. (Halle, 1796.) 3. Ἡ ἀπόδημος φιλία, a poem in iambic senarii. Friendship relates how Human Life, to whom she had been married, had repudiated her by the advice of his slave Folly, and given his hand to Enmity. After a long conversation, depicting the operation of Friendship in the world, the upshot is that Friendship marries the stranger to whom her narrative is addressed. This dialogue, with the translation of Conrad Gesner, has frequently been appended to the editions of Stobaeus. A separate edition was published by J. F. Morel. (Paris, 1549.) It is also edited by Honter and Guntius in the collection of the epigrams of Theodorus (Basel, 1536), and by J. Erard, with some other small poems by the same author. (Leipzig, 1598.) 4. A poem of above 1000 lines, divided into two books, in which Theodorus complains to the emperor Manuel Comnenus (who reigned from 1143 to 1180) of his extreme poverty, and begs him to withdraw him from the misery which he had to endure in his convent, while those placed over him indulged in debaucheries. About forty lines at the beginning and end of each book are written in old Greek, the remainder in a dialect resembling the modern Greek. The poem has been published by Koray, in the first volume of the Atakta (Paris, 1828). 5. Ἀμάραντος, ἢ γέροντος ἔρωτες, a dialogue in prose, published by Gaulmin, together with No. 1, and also by De la Porte du Theil (Notices et Extraits, vol. viii. 1810). 6. A Dissertation on Wisdom, being an invective against the saying ἡ πενίη σοφίην ἔλαχεν, published by F. Morell. (Paris, 1608.) 7. Epigrammata, described more fully as Τετράστιχα ἰαμβεῖα καὶ ἡρῷα εἰς τὰ κεφαλαιωδῶς ῥηθέντα ἐν τῇ γραφῇ, consisting of poetical summaries of the subject-matter of the books of the Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, the four books of Kings, the four Gospels, and the Acts of the Apostles. Published, first, at Basel (1536), and afterwards at Angers (Juliomagi, 1632). 8. Τετράστιχα ἰαμβεῖα καὶ ἡρῷα εἰς τὰ κεφαλαιωδῶς ῥηθέντα ἐν τῷ βίῳ Γρηγορίου τοῦ Θεολόγου, τοῦ μεγάλου Βασιλείου καὶ τοῦ ἁγίου Χρυσοστόμου. 9. Προσφωνητικοί, elegiac verses, in which he addresses the Apostle Paul, Gregorius Theologus, Basil, Chrysostom, Gregorius of Nyssa, and Nicolaus. 10. Ἴαμβοι σχετλιαστικοὶ εἰς τὴν πρόνοιαν; a poem on Providence. 11. An iambic poem against a man of the name of Barys, who had attempted to brand him as a heretic. 12. Εἰς εἰκονισμένον τῷ βίῳ (In imaginem vitae); some verses of a political kind. 13. Νουθετικοὶ κατὰ φθονούντων (iambi ad Invidos). 14. Some iambics without any heading (in hortum). The poems numbered 7—12 were published by Honter and Guntius (Basil. 1536) and by Erard (Lips. 1598). 15. Epistles, published in a miscellaneous collection by P. Lazeri (Rome 1754). 16. A piece consisting of 102 senarii κατὰ φιλοπόρνου γραός, erroneously ascribed by Birger Thorlacius to Manuel Philes, and published by him in Manueli Philae duo carmina anecdota (Copenhagen, 1813), and Opuscula Academica, vol. iii. p. 65. (ibid. 1815.) 17. Ἐξήγησις, or Exposition of the Canones or Hymns appropriated to the Dominical festivals. 18. An epitome of the commentaries of Theodoretus on the Psalms. 19. De Processione Spiritus sancti. 20. A lexicon, a treatise on the grammar of Moschopulus, and some other grammatical notes and treatises (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vi. p. 350). 21. An astronomical poem, addressed to the Sebastocratorissa Irene. 22. A poem of 128 hexameters, addressed to the emperor Joannes Comnenus, on the conquest of Kastamon (Germanicopolis) in Paphlagonia. 23. One hundred and eighteen hexameters, in which he sues for the favour of Anna Comnena (the wife of Nicephorus Bryennius). 24. A poem consisting of 100 lines Κατὰ μακρογενείου δοκοῦντος εἶναι διὰ τοῦτο σοφοῦ. 25. A description of the entry of Joannes Comnenus into Constantinople after the conquest of Kastamon, in 230 heroic verses. 26. A poem of 296 hexameters, addressed to Joannes Comnenus, on the reconquest of Kastamon, and the occupation of Gaugra. 27. A piece consisting of 50 hexameters, in which Theodorus, on his departure from Constantinople, complains of having met with no reward for his labours. (Nos. 20—26 are not mentioned by Fabricius. They exist in MS. at Paris. See La Porte du Theil, Notices et Extraits des MSS. de la Bibl. &c. vol. viii. pt. ii.) 28. In posteriora Analytica Aristotelis, and Περὶ ἐπιδεικτικῶν. 29. De pauco et multo, magno et parvo, quod non sint relativa sed contraria. 30. Various essays on matters of theology and ecclesiastical discipline. (Fabricius, l. c.; Schöll, Geschichte der Griech. Litteratur, vol. iii. p. 81, &c.)

65. Rhaithuensis, lived in the middle of the seventh century in the monastery of Rhaithu, near Elim, in Palestine. He was the author of a work on the incarnation of Christ, entitled, Προπαρασκευή τις καὶ γυμνασία τῷ βουλομένῳ μαθεῖν τίς ὁ τρόπος τῆς θείας ἐνανθρωπήσεως καὶ οἰκονομίας, καθ' ὃν πέπρακται καὶ τίνα τὰ πρὸς τοὺς ταύτην μὴ ὀρθῶς νοοῦντας λεγόμενα παρὰ τῶν τῆς ἐκκλησίας τροφίμων, the object of which was to defend the orthodox view against the heresies of Manes, Paul of Samosata, Apollinarius, Theodorus of Mopsuestia, Nestorius, and Eutyches. Combéfis considers Theodorus of Rhaithu to be the same with the monk Theodorus, to whose inquiries Maximus the Confessor wrote a reply. (Maximi opp. vol. ii. p. 151). It is also doubtful whether Theodorus of Rhaithu was identical or not with the Theodorus Presbyter, whose treatise to prove the genuineness of the writings attributed to Dionysius the Areopagite, is mentioned by Photius (Cod. 1). The treatise of Theodorus on the Incarnation was first published in the Latin translation of Godfr. Tilmann (Paris, 1566). It was first published in Greek by Theodorus Beza, in 1576. The best edition is that by Carpzov (Helmstad. 1779-80). Three of the smaller works of Theodorus Abucara have by some been erroneously attributed to Theodorus of Rhaithu. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 430; Cave, Hist. Litt. SS. Eccles. vol. i. p. 587.)

66. Of Samothrace, a writer from whom Ptolemaeus Hephaestion quotes the statement that Jupiter, after his birth, laughed for seven days continuously, and that hence seven came to be regarded as a perfect number. It is perhaps this Theodorus who is quoted by the scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius (iv. 264). Comp. Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 503.

67. Santabarenus, the contemporary and friend of Photius. For some account of him the reader is referred to the article Photius. [Vol. III. p. 350.] This Theodorus was also noted as a composer of hymns.

68. Bishop of Scythopolis, the author of a treatise against Origenes, presented to the emperor Justinian. This treatise was published by Montfaucon. (Catal. Bibl. Coislinianae, p. 94—96. Paris, 1715.)

69. Studita, abbot of the monastery of Studium, was born at Constantinople in A. D. 759. In 781 he entered the monastery of Sacudium, which was presided over by his uncle Plato; and on the resignation of the latter, succeeded him in 794. Theodorus was one of the most vehement opposers of the Iconoclasts, and his zeal procured him considerable reputation, especially with the monks. In 795, when the emperor Constantinus married Theodote, Theodorus took upon himself to anathematize that emperor, and to denounce the patriarch Tarasius, and in the following year was scourged and banished to Thessalonica. On the death of the emperor in 797, Theodorus was brought back to Constantinople with great pomp, and was regarded with great favour by Irene, to whom he offered the most abject flattery. In the following year, in consequence of the incursions of the Saracens, he removed to the monastery of Studium, within the city. In 806, when Nicephorus was made patriarch, and the abbot Josephus, who had sanctioned the marriage of Constantinus, was restored to the communion of the Church by a council held at Constantinople, the wrath of Theodorus was again excited, and he refused all communion with the patriarch. He was joined in his violent proceedings by a large number of monks, and, when reproved by the Pope Leo, replied in an insolent and angry tone. These proceedings led to his being again banished in 809, together with his brother Josephus and the abbot Plato, to an island near Byzantium. In 811, on making his submission to Nicephorus, he was set at liberty by Michael Rhangabe. Two years afterwards, when the emperor Leo the Armenian issued an edict against the worship of images, Theodorus, backed by a considerable number of monks, set the edict at defiance, openly celebrated processions of images, and incited the people to sedition. He was at first placed in gentle confinement; but as he did not cease to send out encyclical letters against the emperor, he was subsequently removed to various prisons, and at length taken to Smyrna, and there closely confined. In 821 he was set at liberty by the emperor Michael Balbus, and resumed his post at the head of his monastery. His imprisonments had not taught him moderation. His furious zeal for image worship soon broke out again. In 824, indignant that the emperor would not take strong measures against the Iconoclasts, he favoured the machinations of Thomas against the emperor, and when the attempts of Thomas were suppressed, found it necessary to retire from Constantinople. After wandering about in several places, he at length settled in the island Chalcite, where he died in 826, on the 11th of November. Those who wish for detailed information respecting the piety and miracles of Theodorus, may consult Baronius (Annales, vol. ix. a. 795—826), who derived his materials from a life of Theodorus by Joannes, or some other Greek writer. In one MS. this life is attributed to a monk of the name of Michaelis, and under his name it is published in the fifth volume of the works of Sirmondus (Paris, 1696), where also will be found the following literary remains of Theodorus.

1. An oration on behalf of images, delivered before the emperor Leo. 2. Διαθήκη, a confession of faith, written by Theodorus shortly before his death, and accompanied by various precepts respecting the monastic life, intended for the benefit and guidance of his successor in the office of abbot. 3. Βίβλος δογματική, ἐν ᾗ στεῤῥοὶ λόγοι γ´ καὶ ἀντιῤῥητικοί. Three discourses against the Iconomachi. 4. Ἔλεγχος καὶ ἀνατροπὴ τῶν ἀσεβῶν ποιημάτων, a refutation of certain iambic acrostichs composed by Joannes, Ignatius, Sergius, and Stephanus against the worship of images. 5. Προβλήματά τινα πρὸς εἰκονομάχους. 6. Κατὰ εἰκονομάχους κεφάλαια ἑπτά. 7. Ἐπιστολὴ πρὸς Πλάτωνα περὶ τῆς προσκυνήσεως τῶν σεπτῶν εἰκόνων. 8. Two books of epistles, comprising altogether 276. Almost twice as many however are extant. In one MS. of the Coislinian library there are 548. These letters form a collection of considerable historical value not only for the life of Theodorus, but with reference to the disputes which agitated the Church in his time. Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 439, &c.) has given a list of those to whom these letters are addressed, amounting to 284. 9. Ἴαμβοι εἰς διαφόρους ὑποθέσεις, epigrammatic poems in iambic metre on various subjects. The following are not published in the works of Sirmondus: 10. Δογματικὴ περὶ τιμῆς καὶ προσκυνήσεως τῶν ἁγίων εἰκόνων, published in the works of Damascenus (Basil. 1575, fol.). There is a Latin version in the Bibliotheca Patrum (Paris, 1589, 1644 and 1654, vol. iii.). 11. Ἐπιτάφιος εἰς Πλάτωνα τὸν ἑαυτοῦ πνευματικὸν πατέρα; published in Greek by Henschen and Papebroche (Acta Sanctorum, vol. i. April. p. xlvi., and in Latin, p. 366). Other Latin translations are also found. 12. Λόγος εἰς τὴν προσκύνησιν τοῦ τιμίου καὶ ζωοποιοῦ σταυροῦ ἐν τῇ μεσονηστίμῳ, published in Greek with the translation of J. Gretser, in the work of the latter De Cruce (vol. ii. p. 287). There is also a Latin translation in the Bibliotheca Patrum (vol. xiv. p. 900). 13. Κανὼν εἰς τὴν σταυροπροσκύνησιν, a hymn on the adoration of the cross, published by Gretser (ibid. vol. iii. p. 487). 14. Κανὼν ψαλλόμενος εἰς τὴν ἀναστήλωσιν τῶν ἁγίων εἰκόνων, published in Greek and Latin by Baronius (Annal. a. 842) and in Latin in the Bibl. Patrum (Lugd. vol. xiv. p. 898). It is questionable, however, whether this composition is authentic, as it indicates a much more peaceable recognition of the adoration of images than was the case in the time of Theodorus. It has been supposed therefore that it is the composition of a Theodorus of later date. 15. Ἡ μικρὰ λεγομένη Κατήχησις. A Latin version of this will be found in the Bibl. Patr. (Colon. vol. ix., Paris, vol. ii., Lugd. vol. xiv. p. 850.) 16. Ἐγκώμιον περὶ τοῦ ἁγίου Βαρθολομαίου. A Latin translation was published by Lucas Dacherius (Spicilegium, vol. ii. p. 13, Paris, 1659), and by Combéfis (Bibl. Concional. vol. vii. p. 755). 17. Ἐγκώμιον εἰς τὸν ἅγιον Ἀπόστολον καὶ Εὐαγγελιστὴν Ἰωάννην τὸν θεολόγον, published in a Latin version by Combéfis (ibid.). 18. Sermo brevis in Dominicam quartam Quadragesimae, in the version of Joannes Livineius, published together with the Catechesis. 19. Capitula quattuor de Vita ascetica, published in Greek and Latin by P. Possinus (Thesaurus Asceticus, Paris, 1684). 20. Ἐγκώμιον εἰς τὴν τρίτην εὕρεσιν τῆς τιμίας κεφαλῆς τοῦ ἁγίου προδρόμου, published with the version of Combéfis by Du Fresne (Traité historique du chef de S. Baptiste, Paris, 1666). 21. Τροπάρια, κανόνες, &c. published in the various Greek collections of such hymns. 22. Ἡ μεγάλη καλουμένη κατηχητική, divided into three parts, the κατήχησις, μηνολόγιον, and διδασκαλία. This work is yet unpublished. Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 449, &c.) has a notice of the MSS. in which it is extant, a list of the titles of the 217 discourses of which the work consists, and one of the discourses (the tenth) printed at full length. The reader is also referred to Fabricius (l. c. p. 471, &c.) for a list of various other unpublished works of Theodorus. (Baronius, l. c.; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. p. 8, &c.; Fabric. l. c. p. 434, &c.)

70. Tabennensis, abbot of Tabenna, was born about A. D. 314, at Latopolis in the Thebaid. He belonged to a Christian family of station and wealth. As his mother is frequently mentioned, but not his father, it would appear that she was left a widow while Theodorus was still young. He had two brothers, Macarius and Paphnutius, who were also monks at Tabenna. Macarius was older than Theodorus, and his half-brother. Theodorus appears to have addicted himself to ascetic rules of living at a very early age. When not more than thirteen or fourteen years old, he joined some recluses, and was soon afterwards introduced to Pachomius at Tabenna, by whom he was received with great favour, and under whom he is said to have made rapid advances in all monastic virtues. His example seems to have induced his mother to enter a convent which Pachomius had established. Notwithstanding his youth, Theodorus was employed by Pachomius to supply his place in instructing the other monks, and even the great master himself professed to derive edification from the discourses of his young disciple. He also took him with him, or sent him alone, to visit and inspect the other monasteries which looked to him as their superintendent. When he was about thirty years of age, Pachomius appointed him to supply his place in the monastery at Tabenna, while he himself retired to another. When his end approached, however, in order, as it is said, to try the humility of Theodorus, he appointed a man of the name of Petronius as his successor. Petronius died not long afterwards, appointing Orsisius as his successor. The latter soon found himself incapable of maintaining the discipline of the monastery with sufficient vigour, and appointed Theodorus in his room. There is extant a letter of Theodorus, translated into Latin by St. Jerome, inviting all the recluses of the order to assemble at a neighbouring monastery to celebrate the festival of Easter. Theodorus on various occasions had epistolary and personal communication with Athanasius, who is said to have manifested great regard for him. Theodorus died April 27, A. D. 367. He is regarded as a saint by the Greek Church; his memory being honoured on the 16th of May, in order to connect him with Pachomius. A large collection of somewhat dull stories about Theodorus will be found in Tillemont (Hist. Eccles. vol. vii. pp. 469—499).

72. THEUS. [No. 32.]

A great many more Theodori are met with, especially in ecclesiastical history. As they have not been thought worth inserting here, the reader is referred to the catalogue in Fabricius. (Bibl. Graec. vol. x. pp. 346—416, and Index.) A list of twenty of the name is given by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 104). [C. P. M.]

THEODO'RUS (Θεόδωρος), of Hermopolis, was a native of Hermopolis in the Thebaid. He was an advocate (σχολαστικός) at Constantinople, where he wrote his commentaries on the Digest, the Code, and the Novellae. In the Breviarium of the Novellae he is named at full length "Theodorus Scholasticus, a Theban of Hermopolis." This Theodorus was living as late as the reign of Mauricius, in whose time, it was affirmed, he composed his Breviarium after the collection of 168 Novellae, in which collection appear three Novellae of Tiberius, which Theodorus has not neglected. If Theodorus of Hermopolis wrote so late, it is hardly within the limits of probability that he was the Theodorus, professor at Constantinople, one of those to whom Justinian addressed his constitution on the course of law studies (Omnem reipublicae nostrae). There is a small number of fragments by Theodorus, which are placed in the Basilica under certain texts of the Digests; but whether he commented on the whole work is doubtful. The commentary on the Code was a Breviarium, consisting of abridgments or summaries of the Constitutions in the Code, with notices of similar passages in the Code or the Novellae. The Breviarium of the Novellae exists complete in a MS. of Mount Athos, the only one at present known. It has been published by Zachariae, Anecdota (pp. 1—163). (Mortreuil, Histoire du Droit Byzantin, vol. i.) [G. L.]

THEODO'RUS (Θεόδωρος), the name of two members of the family of the Asclepiadae, and of several physicians whom it is impossible to distinguish with any tolerable degree of certainty:—

1. The seventh in descent from Aesculapius, the son of Cleomyttades I., and the father of Sostratus II., who may be supposed to have lived in the ninth century B. C. (Jo. Tzetzes, Chil. vii. Hist. 155, in Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xii. p. 680, ed. vet.)

2. The eleventh in descent from Aesculapius. the son of Cleomyttades II., and the father of Sostratus III., who lived perhaps in the eighth and seventh centuries B. C. (Poeti Epist. ad Artax. in Hippocr. Opera, vol. iii. p. 770). John Tzetzes (loco cit.) makes him to be the son, not of Cleomyttades II., but of King Crisamis II.; and consequently not the eleventh, but the tenth of the family of the Asclepiadae.

3. A physician quoted by Pliny (H. N. xx. 40, xxiv. 120), who must therefore have lived in or before the first century after Christ. He may possibly have been the same person as the pupil of Athenaeus, who (if the Athenaeus in question be the founder of the sect of the Pneumatici) must have lived in the first century after Christ. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 8. § 104.)

4. THEODORUS PRISCIANUS. [PRISCIANUS.]

5. THEODORUS MOSCHION, whose fifty-eighth book (?) is quoted by Alexander Trallianus (i. 15. p. 156), must have lived in or before the sixth century after Christ, and is probably the same person whose second book (?) is quoted in the same chapter a few lines above. Fabricius (Bibl. Lat. iv. 12, vol. ii. p. 591) supposes him to have been the same person as Theodorus Priscianus; Haller (Bibl. Med. Pract. vol. i. p. 183) the same as the physician quoted by Pliny, and also the same person who is quoted by Aëtius (iv. 1. 46. p. 628).

6. The author of a short Latin work, entitled "Diaeta sive de Rebus Salutaribus Liber," which was first published in 1533. fol. Argent., with "Hildegardis Physica," and in a separate form in 1632. 8vo. Hal. ed. G. E. Schreiner. He is generally supposed to be the same as Theodorus Priscianus, which may be correct, but he appears to be called simply Theodorus in the MSS. and editions of his work. (Choulant's Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Medicin.)

7. The name is found in some other ancient authors; for instance in Aëtius in several places, in each of which the same person is probably intended. Now the person quoted by Aëtius (ii. 2. 91. p. 291) is the same who is quoted by Nicolaus Myrepsus (xxxvi. 138. p. 738), and called "Actuarius;" and as the title of "Actuarius" was only in use at the court of Constantinople (see Dict. of Ant. p. 748, b. 2d ed.), this Theodorus probably lived in the fifth century after Christ, and cannot therefore be (as Haller supposed) the physician quoted by Pliny.

8. A celebrated Christian physician at Níshápúr in Chorásán, where one of the Persian kings, either Shapúr (or Sapor) II. or Bahrám (or Varanes) IV., built at his request a Christian church in the fourth century after Christ. He wrote a work called "Pandectae Medicinae" (Ibn Abí Osaibi'ah, Fontes Relationum de Class. Medicor. xi. 1. (MS. Arab. in Bibl. Bodl.); Wüstenfeld, Gesch. der Arab. Aerzte, p. 6.)

9. A Jacobite Christian of Antioch, in the thirteenth century after Christ, who was well acquainted with the Syriac and Latin languages, and also with mathematics and other sciences. He went first to the court of 'Aláu-d-Dín, sultán of the Seljuks in the kingdom of Rúm, in order to become his physician; but not receiving from the prince the welcome he expected, he went on to Armenia, to the court of Constantine the father of King Hátem, and afterwards to one of the Latin emperors of Constantinople. Here he was loaded with riches and honours; but after a time he was seized with a great desire to revisit his friends and native country, and requested permission to return home. This was refused, so Theodorus took an opportunity of leaving the city by stealth, while the emperor was absent, and set sail for Acre. He was, however, compelled by stress of weather to put into a port where the emperor then happened to be, which had such an effect upon Theodorus that he poisoned himself. (Abú-l-Faraj, Hist. Dynast. p. 341; D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient.)

Haller by some confusion makes two physicians out of this last Theodorus. (Bibl. Med. Pract. vol. i. pp. 311, 406.) [W. A. G.]

THEODO'RUS (Θεόδωρος), artists. This name occurs in several passages of the ancient authors, in such a manner as to give rise to great difficulties. There existed, at an early period in the history of Grecian art, a school of Samian artists, to whom various works and inventions are ascribed in architecture, sculpture, and metal-work, and whose names are Rhoecus, Telecles, and Theodorus. The genealogical table of the succession of these artists, according to the views of Müller, given under RHOECUS, may be referred to as a key to the ensuing discussion of the ancient testimonies, which is necessary in order to make the subject at all intelligible.

First of all, a manifest error must be cleared away. Thiersch (Epochen, p. 50), following Heyne and Quatremère de Quincy, places this family of artists at the very beginning of the Olympiads, that is, in the eighth century, B.C. The sole authority for this date is a passage of Pliny which, besides being quite vague, contains a decided mistake. (H. N. xxxv. 12. s. 43.) He says that "some relate that the first who invented the plastic art (plasticen) were Rhoecus and Theodorus, in Samos, long before the Bacchiadae were expelled from Corinth," an event which is supposed to have occurred about the 30th Olympiad, B. C. 660; and he then proceeds to relate how, when Demaratus fled from that city into Italy, he was accompanied by the modellers (fictores) Eucheir and Eugrammus, and so the art was brought into Italy. Now, in the whole of this passage, Pliny is speaking of plastice in the literal sense of the word, modelling in clay, not in the secondary sense, which it often has in the Greek writers, of casting in metal; but it is quite in accordance with his mode of using his authorities, that he should have understood the statements of those writers who ascribed to Rhoecus and Theodorus the invention of plastice in the latter sense, as if they had been meant in the former. Having thus fallen into the mistake of making these artists the inventors of modelling, he was compelled to place them considerably earlier than Eucheir and Eugrammus, by whom that art was said to have been brought into Italy. Even if this explanation be doubted, the statement of Pliny cannot be received, inasmuch as it is inconsistent with other and better testimonies, and is entirely unconfirmed; for the passage in which Plato mentions Theodorus in common with Daedalus (Ion, p. 533, a.) has no chronological reference at all, but the names of eminent artists are there purposely taken at random. The blundering account of Athenagoras (Legat. pro Christ. 14. p. 60, ed. Dechair), that Theodorus of Miletus, in conjunction with Daedalus, invented the arts of statuary and modelling (ἀνδριαντοποιητικὴν καὶ πλαστικήν) scarcely deserves to be mentioned, except that it may perhaps be regarded as involving a tradition of some value, because it indicates the coast of Asia Minor as one scene of the artistic activity of Theodorus. We proceed therefore to the positive testimonies respecting these artists.

The most definitely chronological of these testimonies are the passages in which Herodotus mentions Theodorus as the maker of the silver crater which Croesus sent to Delphi (i. 51), and of the celebrated ring of Polycrates (iii. 41). Now we learn from Herodotus that the silver crater was already at Delphi when the temple was burnt, in Ol. 58. 1, B.C. 548; and Polycrates was put to death in Ol. 64. 3, B. C. 522. Again, with respect to his identity, for this, as well as his date, is a point to be ascertained; in both passages Herodotus makes Theodorus a Samian, and in the latter he calls him the son of Telecles; in both it is implied that he was an artist of high reputation; and, in the former, Herodotus expressly states that he believed the tradition which ascribed the crater to Theodorus, because the work did not appear to be of a common order (συντυχόν). Pausanias (viii. 14. § 5. s. 8) also mentions the ring of Polycrates as the work of Theodorus, whom he also calls a Samian and the son of Telecles, and to whom, in conjunction with Rhoecus, the son of Philaeus, he ascribes the first invention of the art of fusing bronze or copper, and casting statues (διέχεαν δὲ χαλκὸν πρῶτοι καὶ ἀγάλματα ἐχωνεύσαντο). There appears here to be a difficulty as to the distinct specific meaning of the two verbs: but the true meaning is, that Rhoecus and Theodorus invented the art of casting figures, and at the same time made improvements in the process of mixing copper and tin to form bronze; as we learn from another passage (x. 38. § 3. s. 6), in which Pausanias states that he has already, in a former part of his work (that is, in the passage just cited) mentioned Rhoecus, the son of Philaeus, and Theodorus, the son of Telecles, as those who invented the process of melting bronze more accurately, and who first cast it (τοὺς εὑρόντας χαλκὸν ἐς τὸ ἀκριβέστερον τῆξαι· καὶ ἐχώνευσαν οὗτοι πρῶτοι). In still another passage (iii. 12. § 8. s. 10) he makes the statement respecting the fusing and casting of metal, but in a slightly different form; namely, that Theodorus of Samos was the first who discovered the art of fusing iron, and of making statues of it (ὃς πρῶτος διαχέαι σίδηρον εὗρε καὶ ἀγάλματα ἀπ' αὐτοῦ πλάσαι). Here nothing is said of Rhoecus, nor of Telecles; and it is also worth while to observe that we have here an example of the use of πλάσαι in the sense which we supposed above to have misled Pliny.

There is another set of passages, in which various architectural works are attributed to those artists. Herodotus (iii. 60), speaking of the temple of Hera at Samos as the greatest known in his time, states that its architect was Rhoecus, the son of Phileas, a native of the island; and Vitruvius (vii. Praef. § 12), mentions Theodorus as the author of a work on the same temple. Pliny (H. N. xxxvi. 13. s. 19. § 3), in describing the celebrated Lemnian labyrinth, says that its architects were Smilis, Rhoecus, and Theodorus. (Comp. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 22, where the common reading places the labyrinth at Samos; but this is easily corrected by a change in the punctuation, proposed by Müller in his Aeginetica, p. 99, and adopted by Sillig, in his edition of Pliny; namely; Theodorus, qui labyrinthum fecit, Sami ipse ex aere fudit: it is, however, just as likely that the mistake is Pliny's own, or, that it was made by a copyist; see below). Another architectural work, ascribed to Theodorus, was the old Scias at Sparta, as we learn from the same passage in which Pausanias mentions him as the inventor of casting in iron (iii. 12. § 8. s. 10). He is also connected with the erection of the celebrated temple of Artemis at Ephesus by an interesting tradition, recorded by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 103), that Theodorus advised the laying down of charcoal-cinders beneath the foundation of the temple, as a remedy against the dampness of the site: here he is called a Samian, and the son of Rhoecus.

Lastly, the names of Theodorus and Telecles are connected with the history of the ancient wooden statues in a very curious manner. Diodorus (i. 98), in relating the various claims set up by the Egyptians to be considered the instructors of the Greeks in philosophy, science, and art, tells us that they asserted that the most celebrated of the ancient statuaries, Telecles and Theodorus, the sons of Rhoecus, lived a long time in Egypt; and that they told the following story respecting the wooden statue (ξόανον) of the Pythian Apollo, which those artists made for the Samians. Of this statue, Telecles made the one half in Samos, while the other half was made by his brother Theodorus at Ephesus; and, when the two parts were placed together, they agreed as exactly as if the whole body had been made by one person; a result which the Egyptians ascribed to the fact, that their rules of art had been learnt by Telecles and Theodorus. With this tradition we may connect one preserved by Pliny, that Theodorus of Samos was the inventor of certain tools used in working wood, namely, the norma, libella, tornus, and clavis. (Plin. H. N. vii. 56. s. 57.)

Now, in considering the conclusions which are to be drawn from all this evidence, it is as well first to exclude the assertion of Thiersch, that there were two artists of the name of Telecles, which rests on no other ground than the necessity of lengthening out the genealogy in order to suit the too early date which he has assumed for Rhoecus. He makes Rhoecus, with his sons Telecles and Theodorus, flourish at the beginning of the Olympiads, and then, nearly two centuries later, he comes to another Telecles, with his son Theodorus, the artist who lived in the time of Polycrates.

The real questions to be determined are these, Were Theodorus, the son of Rhoecus, and Theodorus, the son of Telecles, different persons, or the same? If the former, was the one Theodorus, namely, the son of Rhoecus, the same as Theodorus, the brother of Telecles, and was this Telecles the same as the father of the other Theodorus? If these questions be answered in the affirmative, little difficulty remains in adopting the genealogy of Müller, as given under RHOECUS.

If the first of these questions can be satisfactorily answered, the others are easily disposed of. And here, in the first place, the above testimonies can hardly be explained on any other supposition than that there existed distinct traditions respecting two different Samian artists of the name of Theodorus, the one the son of Rhoecus and the brother of Telecles, and the other the son of Telecles. For the former, we have the passages in Diogenes and Diodorus; for the latter, one passage of Herodotus and two of Pausanias; and besides these, there is one passage of Herodotus, one of Plato, one of Pausanias, one of Vitruvius, and four of Pliny, in which Theodorus is mentioned, without his father's name, but, in nearly every instance, as a Samian, and as closely connected with Rhoecus. Of course, the well-known facts, of the alternate succession of names, and the hereditary transmission of art, in Grecian families, must not be left out of the consideration. On the other hand, if we suppose only one Theodorus, we must assume that Diogenes has made one decided mistake, and Diodorus two, namely, in making Telecles and Theodorus sons of Rhoecus; or else we must have recourse to the still more arbitrary and improbable supposition, that this one and only Theodorus was the son of Telecles, and the grandson of Rhoecus. The conclusion adopted by Mr. Grote (History of Greece, vol. iv. p. 132), that there was only one Theodorus, namely, the son of Rhoecus, is the least probable of all, as it compels us to reject the positive statements, which make him the son of Telecles, and therefore, "the positive evidence does not enable us to verify" his theory, as he remarks of the genealogies of Müller and Thiersch. A positive argument for distinguishing the two Theodori has been derived from a comparison of the passage in which Pausanias speaks of the bronze statue of Night, ascribed to Rhoecus, as being of the rudest workmanship (x. 38. § 3. s. 6), with that in which Herodotus describes the crater made by Theodorus as a work of no common order (i. 51). Surely, it is argued, there could not be so great a difference in the works of the father and the son, and much less can it be accounted for, if we suppose Rhoecus and Theodorus to have been strictly contemporary. There is perhaps some force in this argument, but it can hardly be considered decisive.

It may also be observed that, in none of the passages, in which the architectural works of Theodorus are referred to, is he called the son of Telecles, while, on the other hand, the names of Rhoecus and Theodorus are closely associated in these works; facts which suggest the hypothesis that, while the elder Theodorus followed chiefly the architectural branch of his father's profession, the younger devoted himself to the development of the art of working in metal. Müller has attempted also to draw a positive conclusion respecting the dates of these artists from the buildings on which they are said to have been engaged. The Heraeum at Samos is referred to by Herodotus in such a way as to imply, not only that it was one of the most ancient of the great temples then existing, but also that it had been, at least in part, erected before the 37th Olympiad; and hence Müller places Rhoecus about Ol. 35, which agrees very well with the time at which his supposed grandson Theodorus flourished, namely, in the reigns of Croesus and Polycrates. This also agrees with the story told by Diogenes of the connection of the first Theodorus, the son of Rhoecus, with the laying of the foundation of the temple of Artemis at Ephesus, which was probably commenced about

B. C. 600. [CHERSIPHON.] The most probable conclusion, then, (for anything like certainty is clearly unattainable,) we think to be this: that the genealogy and dates given under Rhoecus are tolerably correct: that Rhoecus was the inventor of the casting of metals, and that this art was carried on by the family of which he was the head: that Rhoecus and his son Theodorus erected the Heraeum and the Lemnian labyrinth, and that the latter laid the foundation of the temple of Artemis: that the younger Theodorus devoted himself more especially to the task of perfecting the art of casting metals, and that this is the reason why he, rather than other members of the family, is mentioned, with Rhoecus, at the head of that branch of art; and that to this younger Theodorus should be ascribed the silver crater of Croesus and the ring of Polycrates. We are quite aware of some minor objections to this theory, which remain unanswered; but the subject, interesting as it is, both critically and historically, has already been pursued almost beyond the proper limits of this article.

Another question, important in the early history of Greek art, arises out of the statements respecting these Samian artists, namely, how far they were affected by foreign influence. The story told by the Egyptians, and repeated by Diodorus, must be received with great caution; but even those, who contend most strongly for the native origin of Greek art, admit that Telecles and Theodorus may have learnt some mechanical processes from the Egyptians. But the fact is, that the point involved in the story relates not so much to mechanical processes as to rules of proportion; for, in order to accomplish the result stated, the precise proportions of the human figure must have been settled by rule, as well as the precise attitude; and the question is, whether the Greeks, at this early period, had established such rules of proportion independently of the Egyptians. On the other hand, the statements with respect to the invention of metal-casting make it of purely native origin; whereas we know that it existed long before, among the Phoenicians, for the two bronze pillars and various vessels of Solomon's temple are expressly said to have been cast in earthen moulds by Phoenician artists. (1 Kings vii. 46.) Now, when we remember that an extensive commerce was carried on in very early times by the Phoenicians in the Levant and the Aegean, and also that Samos is said to have been the earliest Grecian maritime state in those parts, a strong probability is established, that arts already existing in Egypt and Phoenicia may have been transferred to Samos. The full discussion of these questions belongs to the general history of Greek art: we will here only add that we believe the Egyptian and Phoenician influence on Greece in early times to have been lately as much undervalued as it was formerly exaggerated.

It only remains to explain one or two points connected with the works ascribed to these artists.

Besides the silver crater presented by Croesus to the Delphians, there was a golden one found by Alexander among the treasures of the Persian kings, which was also said to be the work of Theodorus of Samos. (Amynt. ap. Ath. xiv. p. 515, a.)

With respect to the ring of Polycrates, it has been much disputed whether the stone in it was engraved or not. The words of Herodotus (iii. 41, σφρηγὶς ... χρυσόδετος, σμαράγδου μὲν λίθου ἐοῦσα, ἔργον δὲ κ. τ. λ.) will, we think, bear either meaning. Of course no great weight can be assigned to the statements of later writers, such as Strabo (xiv. p. 638), Pausanias (l. c.), Pollux (v. 100), and Clemens (Protrept. iii. p. 247, ed. Sylburg), who assert that it was engraved, any more than to that of Pliny, who says that it was not, and that the art of gem-engraving was invented many years later. (H. N. xxxvii. 4.) This last statement can be positively contradicted, so far as the East is concerned, by the account of Aaron's breast-plate (Exod. xxviii. 17—21), in which not only were the precious stones engraved, but they were "like the engravings of a signet;" and other evidence might be adduced to prove the very early use of engraved seal-rings in the East. Some evidence that the art was known in the islands of the Aegean, and particularly in Samos, even before the time of Polycrates, is furnished by the tradition that the father of Pythagoras was an engraver of seal-rings, δακτυλιογλύφος (Diog. viii. 1; MNESARCHUS), and there is another tradition which would prove that it had been introduced at Athens in the time of Solon. (Diog. i. 57.) Lastly, with respect to bronze statues by Theodorus, Pausanias expressly says that he knew of none such (x. 38. § 3. s. 6); but Pliny, on the contrary (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 22), tells us that the same Theodorus, who made the labyrinth, cast in bronze a statue of himself, which was equally celebrated for the excellence of the likeness and for its minute size. It held a file in the right hand, and a little quadriga in the left, the whole being so small as to be covered by the wings of a fly, which formed a part of the work (tantae parvitatis ut totam eam currumque et aurigam integeret alis simul facta musca). It is obvious that a work like this could not belong to the age of Croesus and Polycrates. Such productions of patient ingenuity were made at a later period, as by MYRMECIDES; and, considering how common a name Theodorus was, it seems very probable that there may have been, at some period, an artist of the name, who made such minute works, and that some thoughtless transcriber has introduced the words "qui labyrinthum fecit."

To sum up the whole, it seems probable that there were two ancient Samian artists named Theodorus, namely: —

1. The son of Rhoecus, and brother of Telecles, flourished about B. C. 600, and was an architect, a statuary in bronze, and a sculptor in wood. He wrote a work on the Heraeum at Samos, in the erection of which it may therefore be supposed that he was engaged as well as his father. Or, considering the time which such a building would occupy, the treatise may perhaps be ascribed to the younger Theodorus. He was also engaged, with his father, in the erection of the labyrinth of Lemnos; and he prepared the foundation of the temple of Artemis at Ephesus. We would also ascribe to him the old Scias at Sparta. In conjunction with his brother Telecles, he made the wooden statue of Apollo Pythius for the Samians, according to the fixed rules of the hieratic style.

2. The son of Telecles, nephew of the elder Theodorus, and grandson of Rhoecus, flourished about B. C. 560, in the times of Croesus and Polycrates, and obtained such renown as a statuary in bronze, that the invention of that art was ascribed to him, in conjunction with his grandfather. He also practised the arts of engraving metals (τορευ-τική, caelatura), and of gem-engraving; his works in those departments being the gold and silver craters mentioned above, and the ring of Polycrates. (For the different views of modern writers respecting these artists, see Sillig, Cat. Artif. s. vv. Telecles, Theodorus; Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst. §§ 35, n. 1, 55, n., 60, 70, n. 4, 80. n. i. 1, 97, n. 2, 159; Bähr, ad Herod. ll. cc.)

There were several later artists of the same name: —

3. An Argive sculptor, the son of Poros, made a statue of Nicis, the son of Andromidas, which was dedicated by the people of Hermione, as we learn from an extant inscription, the character of which as well as the nature of the work, an honorific statue of a private individual, lead to the conclusion that the artist lived at a comparatively late period. (Böckh, Corp. Inscr. No. 1197; Welcker, Kunstblatt, 1827, No. 83; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 415, 416, 2d ed.)

4. A sculptor or modeller, of unknown time, made the celebrated bas-relief, known as the Tabula Iliaca, as appears from an inscription on its back, which runs thus, ΘΕΟΔΩΡΗΟϚΗΙΤΕΧΝΗ, that is, Θεοδώρειος ἡ τέχνη. (Lehrs, Rhein. Mus. 1843, vol. ii. p. 355; Jahn, in Gerhard's Archäol. Zeitung, vol. i. p. 302; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 416, 2d ed.)

5. A Theban statuary, mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius, in his list of persons of the name (ii. 104). Nothing more is known of him, nor of the three other painters whose names are found in the same list.

6. A painter mentioned by Polemon (Diog. l. c.).

7. An Athenian painter, mentioned by Menodotus. (Diog. l. c.)

8. An Ephesian painter, mentioned by Theophanes, in his work on painting. (Diog. l. c.)

9. A painter, whose name is contained in Pliny's list of those who were primis proximi (H. N. xxxv. 8. s. 40. § 40), and who may very probably be identical with one of the three mentioned by Diogenes. Pliny ascribed to him the following works: — Se inungentem, which appears to mean an athlete anointing himself; the murder of Clytemnestra and Aegisthus by Orestes; the Trojan War, a composition on several panels, preserved at Rome in the portico of Philip; Cassandra, also at Rome, in the temple of Concord (comp. Welcker, ad Philostr. Imag. p. 459); Leontium Epicuri cogitantem, which ought perhaps to be read like the similar passage a little above (10. s. 36. § 19) Leontionem pictorem; and king Demetrius. This last work, if a portrait taken from life, would place the artist's date at, or a little before, B. C. 300.

10. A Samian painter, the disciple of Nicosthenes, mentioned by Pliny in his list of those painters who were non ignobiles quidem, in transcursu tamen dicendi. (H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 42.) [P. S.]

THEODO'SIUS. This able general, from whom descended a line of Roman emperors, after having acquired a great military reputation, was sent A. D. 367 by Valentinian I. to drive away the Picts and Scots, who were ravaging Britain. Theodosius crossed the straits from Boulogne with his troops of Heruli, Batavians, Jovii, and Victores, and landed at Sandwich. On his road to London he defeated several hordes of the barbarian invaders; and the citizens of London, who were despairing of their safety, gladly received him within their walls. After establishing order and confidence, he commenced his operations against the invaders, and in two campaigns cleared the province of its savage enemies, and repaired and strengthened the military positions. He drove the Caledonians to the northern part of the island, and formed a province or provincial division of Valentia, or Valentiniana, so named in honour of Valentinian. This tract composed the country between the wall of Severus and the rampart of Antoninus, which Theodosius recovered from the enemy. The history of these campaigns is recorded by Ammianus Marcellinus (xxvii. 8, xxviii. 3). Claudian leads us to infer that Theodosius also pursued the enemies of Rome on the stormy seas of the North; and the Orkneys and Thule were stained with the blood of the Picts and the Saxons. (In Quart. Cons. Honor. 31, &c.)

Theodosius, on his return from Britain A. D. 370, was rewarded for his services with the rank of master-general of the cavalry, and being stationed on the Upper Danube, he defeated the Alemanni. In A. D. 372, Firmus, a Moor, the son of Nabal or Nubal, the most powerful of the Moorish princes who professed obedience to the sovereignty of Rome, revolted against the Roman authority; and the natives, who were exasperated at the tyranny of Count Romanus, the governor of Africa, joined the standard of Firmus. The Moorish chieftain plundered Caesarea, on the site of the modern Algiers, and made himself master of Mauritania and Numidia; and he is said to have assumed the title of king. Romanus being unable to oppose this active enemy, Theodosius was sent to Africa about the close of 372 or the beginning of 373. He sailed from the Rhone and landed at Igilgilis, before the Moorish chief heard of his coming. The first step of Theodosius was to arrest Romanus, whose maladministration was considered to be the cause of the revolt. The campaign against Firmus is recorded by Ammianus (xxix. 5) in a long, most confused, and corrupt chapter, out of which Gibbon has extracted a narrative. Firmus had the cunning and treachery of Jugurtha, and Theodosius displayed all the talents of Metellus, in his negotiations with the Moor, and in pursuit of him through a country which presented unexpected difficulties to regular troops. Firmus at last fled to Igmazen, king of the Isaflenses, a people of whose position Ammianus gives no indication. Igmazen was summoned to surrender Firmus, and after having felt the Roman power, and the consequences of refusal, he determined to give him up. Firmus escaped by a voluntary death. He first made himself drunk, and while his guards were asleep, hanged himself by a rope, which he fixed to a nail in the wall. The dead body was given up to Theodosius, who led his troops back to Sitifis. In the reign of Valens, A. D. 376, Theodosius was beheaded at Carthage. The cause of his execution is unknown. (Gibbon, Decline and Fall, vol. iv. c. 25; Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. v., where all the authorities are referred to.) [G. L.]

THEODO'SIUS I., was the son of Theodosius, who restored Britain to the empire, and was beheaded at Carthage. The family of Theodosius was Spanish, and the future emperor was born in Spain, about A. D. 346, as some say at Italica, the birth-place of Trajan, though other authorities say that he was a native of Cauca in Gallicia. His panegyrists derive his descent from Trajan, but this lofty lineage seems not to have been discovered until Theodosius was invested with the imperial purple.

Theodosius received a good education; and he learned the art of war under his own father, whom he accompanied in his British campaigns. During his father's life-time he was raised to the rank of Duke (dux) of Moesia, where he defeated the Sarmatians (A. D. 374), and saved the province. On the death of his father (A. D. 376), he retired before court intrigues to his native country, where he cultivated his own lands, which probably lay near his native place between Segovia and Valladolid. At this time he was already married to a Spanish woman, Aelia Flacilla or Placilla, who is sometimes called Placidia, by whom he became the father of Arcadius, Honorius, and a daughter Pulcheria. From this peaceful retirement he was called in the thirty-third year of his age to receive the imperial purple. Valens, the colleague of Gratian, had recently lost his life at Hadrianople (A. D. 378), where the Roman army was completely broken by the Goths, and Gratian, feeling himself unable to sustain the burden of the empire, invited Theodosius to fill the place of Valens. Theodosius was declared Augustus by Gratian at Sirmium in Pannonia, on the 19th of January A. D. 379. He was intrusted with the administration of Thrace, Asia, and Egypt, which had been held by Valens, together with Dacia and Macedonia. The new emperor of the East had the conduct of the war against the Goths.

The history of Ammianus Marcellinus ends with the death of Valens, and the authorities on which the historian of the reign of Theodosius has to rely, are greatly inferior to Ammianus. Their character is well expressed by Gibbon in a few words, and they are referred to by Tillemont (Histoire des Empereurs, v.), with his usual diligence and accuracy.

The Romans were disheartened by the bloody defeat which they had sustained on the plains of Hadrianople, and the Goths were insolent in their victory. Theodosius was too prudent to lead dispirited troops against a successful enemy, and he formed his head quarters at Thessalonica, the capital of the diocese or division of Macedonia, from whence he could watch the movements of the Goths. In four years' campaigns (A. D. 379—382), of which the particulars are imperfectly recorded, Theodosius revived the courage of the Roman soldiers, and while he seems to have prudently kept aloof from any general engagement, he took all opportunities of attacking his enemy in detail, and securing for his men the advantage of victory without the danger of defeat. The Goths, who were not held together by any well-constituted authority, and only by the ability of their commander Fritigern, became disorganised by his death, and were split up into numerous bands which went about seizing all that they wanted, and destroying that which they had not the prudence to reserve for another time. Jealousy arose between the Ostrogoths and the Visigoths; and Theodosius by his agents added the inducement of money to those who were discontented. Modares, a chieftain of rank, went over to the Romans, among whom he obtained the rank of master-general, and he earned his reward by surprising and massacring a body of Goths, and carrying off a great number of captives with four thousand waggons (Zosimus, iv. 25). In A. D. 381, Athanaric was compelled to leave his forests, and to cross the Danube; and many of those who had formerly acknowledged Fritigern as their leader, and were weary of anarchy, now yielded obedience to this Gothic judge. Tillemont conjectures that Athanaric was expelled by Fritigern, Alatheus, and Saphrax; but Gibbon's narrative seems to signify (for seems is all the meaning that in many cases can be imputed to it) that Fritigern was already dead. However Athanaric was too old and too prudent to carry on war with the new emperor: he listened to proposals of peace, and he even went to Constantinople to visit the emperor. Theodosius left the city to meet him, and received him with the greatest respect. The Goth was struck with amazement at the magnificence of Constantinople, and exclaimed that the Roman emperor was an "earthly God." Athanaric fell ill at Constantinople, and died there. Theodosius gave him a splendid funeral, and erected a monument to his memory. This politic behaviour gained over the whole army of Athanaric; and the adhesion of so large a body of the Visigoths was followed by the submission of the rest. "The general or rather final capitulation of the Goths may be dated four years, one month, and twenty-five days after the defeat and death of the emperor Valens." (Gibbon; comp. Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. v. p. 216.)

The Ostrogoths, who had retired from the provinces of the Danube about four years ago, returned (A. D. 386) to the lower course of that river recruited by an army of Scythians, whom none of the inhabitants on the banks of the Danube had ever seen before (Zosimus, iv. 38). Promotus, the general on the Thracian frontier, who knew that he was a match for the invaders, thought it prudent to draw them over to the south bank, without letting them wait for their opportunity in the winter; and by his spies he encouraged them to hope that by secretly crossing the river, they might destroy the Roman army. The passage was made on a dark night in numerous canoes; but the Ostrogoths discovered their mistake when they found the south bank of the Danube guarded by a triple row of vessels through which they could not penetrate. At the same time the Roman galleys descending the river, swept before them the frail boats of the Ostrogoths, and Alatheus the king, and his bravest troops, were either drowned in the Danube or destroyed by the sword. Those who escaped sued for mercy to the Romans. It is uncertain whether Theodosius had personally any share in this victory. Zosimus says that after the victory Promotus sent for Theodosius, who was at no great distance. If the historian Zosimus unjustly deprives Theodosius of all merit, the poet Claudian made amends for it by flattery and exaggeration.

A treaty was made with the Goths, the precise date and terms of which do not appear to be known; but they were settled within the limits of the empire, in tracts which were neglected or unoccupied. A colony of Visigoths was established in Thrace, and the remains of the Ostrogoths were planted in Phrygia and Lydia. They were not scattered among the population of Thrace or Asia Minor, but they obtained whole districts in which they still lived as a Gothic people, acknowledging the emperor as their sovereign, but probably retaining jurisdiction in all disputes among themselves. The chieftains still governed their followers, but there was no kingly dignity. Forty thousand Goths were kept in the service of the Eastern empire, under the title of Foederati, and were distinguished from the other troops by golden collars, better pay, and more licence. But though the Goths were thus converted from enemies into dubious allies, their settlement within the limits of the empire is justly viewed as the immediate cause of the downfal of the western division. In the civil war against Maximus (A. D. 388), some of those barbarians who were in his army listened to the proposals of Maximus, but their treachery being discovered, they fled into the marshes and forests of Macedonia, where they were pursued by Theodosius and cut to pieces.

Maximus, a native of Spain, like Theodosius, was living in Britain in retirement or in exile. When this province revolted against Gratian, Maximus was chosen their leader, and he invaded Gaul with a powerful army. Gratian fled from Paris to Lyon, where he was overtaken by Andragathius, the commander of the cavalry of Maximus and put to death (A. D. 383). Maximus sent an envoy to Theodosius to explain and justify his conduct, to excuse the assassination of Gratian as having been accomplished without his orders, and to offer to the emperor of the East peace or war. A war with the fierce soldiers of the north would perhaps have been an unequal contest for Theodosius, whose dominions had recently suffered from the ravages of the Goths; and reluctantly, as we may conclude, he made a treaty with Maximus, whom he acknowledged emperor of the countries north of the Alps, but he secured to Valentinian the brother of Gratian, Italy, Africa, and western Illyricum. Thus the empire was divided into three parts; one of which, an empire won by usurpation, consisted of three rich countries, — Spain, Gaul, and Britain.

Theodosius was the son of a Christian father, whose ancestors acknowledged the creed of Nicaea; and next to Constantine he became the great glory of the Christian church. The merits of Gratian secured him from the orthodox Christians a rank equivalent to that of a saint; and after his death they found a worthy successor to his orthodoxy in the more vigorous emperor of the East. Theodosius was not baptized until the end of the first year of his reign, when he was admonished by a serious illness no longer to delay this ceremony. In A. D. 380, before he commenced operations against the Goths, he was baptized at Thessalonica by the archbishop Ascolius, in the orthodox faith of the Trinity; and his baptism was immediately followed by a solemn edict which fixed the faith of his subjects (Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. v. p. 198; Cod. Theod. 16. tit. 1. s. 2), and branded with the name of heretics all who dissented from the imperial creed. The edict declared "according to the discipline of the apostles, and the doctrine of the gospel, let us believe the sole deity of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, under an equal Majesty and a pious Trinity: we authorise the followers of this doctrine to assume the title of Catholic Christians; and as we judge that all others are extravagant madmen, we brand them with the name of heretics, and declare that their conventicles shall no longer usurp the respectable appellation of churches: besides the condemnation of divine justice, they must expect to suffer the severe penalties which our authority, guided by heavenly wisdom, shall think proper to inflict on them" (Gibbon, vol. v. c. 27). The faith which Theodosius so ardently embraced can hardly be supposed to be the result of a subtle inquiry into the metaphysical distinction between the sameness of substance or strict homoousian doctrine of Athanasius, and the similarity of substance in the Father and the Son, or the homoiousian doctrine in which some of the Arians sought refuge. A singular anecdote is told of Amphilochius, bishop of Iconium and afterwards a saint, who administered to Theodosius a practical lesson on the homoousian doctrine. It was in A. D. 383, just after Theodosius had raised his son Arcadius to the rank of Augustus, and the two emperors were seated on a throne to receive the homage of their subjects. Amphilochius saluted Theodosius with reverence; his son he addressed with the familiarity of an equal. The emperor, indignant at this rudeness, ordered the bishop to be dragged from his presence, when he exclaimed, "Such is the treatment, O emperor, which the King of heaven has prepared for those impious men who affect to worship the Father, but who refuse to acknowledge the equal majesty of his divine Son." Theodosius embraced the bishop, and never forgot the lesson. Arcadius was at this time about six years of age.

Constantinople was the head-quarters of Arianism at the time of the accession of Theodosius; but his baptism in the orthodox faith and his edict gave the Catholics hopes of their supremacy being re-established. The emperor entered Constantinople with his army, and offered Damophilus the Arian prelate the alternative of subscribing to the creed of Nicaea or of resignation. Damophilus resigned his dignities, and retired into exile and poverty. Gregory of Nazianzus, who had laboured hard to restore the Catholic faith at Constantinople, was placed on the archiepiscopal throne which Damophilus had left vacant. Early in A. D. 381, Theodosius declared his intention to expel from all the churches both bishops and clergy who should refuse to profess the creed of Nicaea; and Sapor, his lieutenant, was armed with full powers to effect a change, which was accomplished without disturbance in all the Eastern empire. In the month of May (A. D. 381) a meeting of one hundred and fifty bishops who formed the first general council of Constantinople, and the second of the oecumenical general councils, was assembled to confirm and complete the creed that had been established by the council of Nicaea. The council had to explain some things which were ambiguous, and to dispose of the sect of the Macedonians, who, to the heresy of homoiousianism, added that of a belief that the Holy Ghost was created (κτιστόν).* The council declared the equal divinity of the Holy Ghost, the third person in the Trinity, which doctrine has prevailed in the Eastern church without interruption to the present time. After the death of Meletius, Gregory of Nazianzus presided in this council, and he has left a picture of the turbulent and disorderly proceedings which characterised its close.

Theodosius, after establishing the supremacy of the Catholic faith by the council of Constantinople, proceeded to give it effect. In the course of fifteen years (A. D. 380—394) he published fifteen decrees against heretics, or those who were not of his own creed. The penalties were most particularly directed against those who rejected the doctrine of the Trinity; and they extended to ministers, assemblies, and the persons of heretics. It was about the time that the council was sitting that he deprived all persons who apostatised from Christianity to Paganism of the right which every Roman citizen had enjoyed at least from the time of the Twelve Tables, of disposing of his property by testament. In July (A. D. 381) he forbade the Arians and Eunomians to build any church; and the law appears to mean that every place of worship which they already possessed should be taken from them. The various enactments against heretics are contained in the Code of Theodosius (16. tit. 5. s. 6—23; and the commentary of Gothofredus): the Eunomians, whose guilt consisted in denying any resemblance between the two substances, and who were accordingly Anomoeans, were also deprived of the power of testamentary disposition, and of taking by testamentary gift: they seem, in fact, to have been deprived of all the rights of citizens. The Manichaean heresy was punishable with death; and the same penalty threatened the Audians or the Quartodecimans, who celebrated the festival of Easter on the wrong day. To the reign of Theodosius belonged the glory or the infamy of establishing Inquisitors of Faith, who seem to have been specially enjoined to look after the crime of the Quartodecimans. Though Theodosius thus established the principle of persecution, it is said that his rival Maximus was the first Christian prince "who shed the blood of his Christian subjects on account of their religious opinions." It is fortunate for the fame of Theodosius that there is not the same evidence of his giving effect to his own laws as there is for the severity of Maximus, under whose reign Priscillianus and others suffered death for heresy at Treves, A. D. 385.

In A. D. 387 Maximus, not content with the possession of Spain, Gaul, and Britain, aspired to wrest Italy from the feeble hands of Valentinian II., who as an Arian was disliked by his Catholic subjects of Italy, and was opposed in his heretical projects by the zeal of Ambrose, the Catholic archbishop of Milan. Maximus was in sight of Milan, before Valentinian and his mother Justina, who directed the administration, were aware of his hostile intentions; and he entered the city without resistance. Justina and her son embarked from one of the harbours in the north part of the Hadriatic and arrived in safety at Thessalonica. No resistonce was made to Maximus, except by the small town of Aemona, on the border of Italy. Theodosius visited Justina and her son at Thessalonica, and reminded Valentinian that his opposition to the faith of Nicaea was the cause of his own ruin and of the success of Maximus. Valentinian, it is said, acknowledged his errors, and returned to the true faith; and the orthodox emperor promised to restore him to his throne: but perhaps he was influenced by other motives than gratitude to Gratian, and zeal in support of the Catholic faith. Theodosius was a widower; and Valentinian had a sister Galla, young and beautiful. Tillemont would fix the marriage of Theodosius and Galla a year before the visit to Thessalonica at the close of A. D. 386; or he would make a compromise by admitting that Theodosius asked her in marriage in A. D. 386, but did not actually marry her till A. D. 387 (Histoire, &c. vol. v. p. 740): his desire was to protect the piety of Theodosius from the scandal of a sensual motive. But Zosimus (iv. 44) states that Justina, a woman of influence, who knew the amorous propensities of Theodosius, prevailed over the irresolution of the emperor by her daughter's tears and beauty. Theodosius saw her and was captivated: he asked her of her mother for his wife, but he only obtained her on condition of restoring Valentinian. Though Gibbon has preferred the authority of Zosimus, there is some evidence opposed to it; and yet the narrative of Zosimus is so precise and circumstantial that it is difficult not to give credit to it. There is nothing improbable in the fact of a passion for a woman determining a political question.

After Theodosius had decided on his course, his operations were rapid and vigorous. He found Maximus encamped near Siscia, in Pannonia, a city situated on the great river Save. Maximus had not talent equal to his ambition, and Theodosius had a force which confounded the soldiers of the usurper by a mode of attack to which they were unaccustomed. His Huns, Alans, and his Goths were mounted archers, who annoyed the heavy troops of Gaul and Germany by the irregularity of a Parthian attack. Maximus, after sustaining one defeat on the banks of the Save, and probably a second, fled across the Alps, and shut himself up in Aquileia, just before Theodosius reached the gates. But in spite of his Moorish guard, he was given up to Theodosius by his own soldiers and the people of Aquileia, with his hands tied behind him. Theodosius, according to his panegyrist Pacatus, was not indisposed to pardon; but his soldiers saved him the difficulty of a decision, by dragging Maximus from his presence and beheading him. Maximus had left his son Victor in Gaul, with the title of Caesar, or perhaps of Augustus. Arbogastes, the active general of Theodosius, seized the youth, and put him to death a short time after his father. Theodosius spent the winter at Milan, and in the following year (June 13th, 389) he entered Rome in triumph, accompanied by Valentinian and his own son Honorius.

Two events in the life of Theodosius may be brought into juxtaposition as evidence of his uncertain character and his savage temper. In A. D. 387, the city of Antioch complained of increased taxation, the necessary consequence of the wars in which the emperor had been engaged; and Antioch, as it had not suffered from an enemy whose ravages had been confined to Europe, was unwilling to bear its share of the expense of the Gothic campaigns. The complaints of the citizens were soon changed into active riot (February): the statues of the emperor, of his father, and of his wife Placilla, were thrown down; but these idle demonstrations were quickly suppressed by an armed force. The governor sent to the emperor at Constantinople an account of these riots, and the citizens of Antioch, in great alarm, despatched Flavian their bishop, and the senator Hilarius, to acknowledge their guilt and to pray for forgiveness. In March the judgment of the emperor was brought by Hellebicus and Caesarius, two of his officers, who declared that Antioch was degraded from the rank of a city, was stripped of its possessions and privileges, and reduced to the condition of a village dependent on Laodicea. The places of public amusement were shut up, and the usual distribution of corn was stopped, which was equivalent to a sentence of starvation against those who were accustomed to receive this pauper's allowance. A severe investigation was made into the circumstances of the riot, and those who were convicted by the extraordinary commissioners of the emperor lost their property, and were reduced to beggary. Some of the rioters, or of the accused, were put to death. The commissioners, however, suspended the complete execution of the emperor's sentence against the city, and Caesarius went to Constantinople to obtain a final answer from the emperor to the petition of the people and the prayers of the monks and hermits, who left their solitudes, and crowded to Antioch, to intercede for the metropolis of the East. The emperor had already relented at the entreaty of the bishop and the eloquent address of the senator; the senate of Constantinople had interceded for Antioch, and Theodosius pardoned the city, and all who had taken part in the riot. The property of those who had been convicted was restored, the poor got their allowance again, and Antioch resumed its former dignity and jurisdiction. Tillemont has collected all the circumstances of this affair of Antioch (Histoire, &c., vol. v. p. 261, &c.), at great length.

In A. D. 390, Thessalonica, the metropolis of the Illyrian provinces, was disturbed by a riot during the emperor's residence at Milan. Botheric, who commanded the soldiers there, had imprisoned one of the charioteers of the Circus, who had solicited a youth to a shameless intercourse. The populace in vain called for their favourite charioteer during the celebration of the games: the general kept him in the prison which his crime had merited. It seems that the populace was ready for insurrection; a trifling cause was enough to set them in motion, and the garrison was weak. Botheric and his officers were overpowered and assassinated by the people, and their bodies were dragged about the streets. An inquiry into the riot, and the punishment of the guilty, was necessary and just; but Theodosius punished a whole city, guilty and innocent together. It is said that his minister Rufinus prompted the emperor to issue his savage orders, notwithstanding the intercession of the bishops. An army of barbarians was sent to Thessalonica instead of a civil commission supported by a sufficient force. The people were invited to the games of the Circus, and they came without suspicion; but as soon as the place was full, the soldiers received the signal for a massacre. For three hours the spectators were indiscriminately exposed to the fury of the soldiers, and seven thousand of them, or, as some accounts say, more than twice that number, paid the penalty of the insurrection. The soldiers, it is said, were ordered to produce a certain number of heads, an order which aggravates the guilt of Theodosius, who, if not softened by the usual feelings of humanity, might have remembered the city in which he had so often resided. This massacre, unparalleled in history, is a stain on the name of Theodosius, an eternal brand of infamy. Tillemont, who has so minutely recorded the clemency of Theodosius in the affair of Antioch, observes, "that this year (A. D. 390) is celebrated for the cruelties which the order of Theodosius caused to be committed at Thessalonica, and still more celebrated for the penance which Theodosius performed to expiate so great a crime. We only touch, in a few words, on an event so illustrious and important, because we reserve it for the history of St. Ambrosius." The illustrious and important event was the penance, more illustrious and important in the eyes of the pious historian than the unpardonable crime of massacring thousands. It is singular, as Gibbon remarks, that Zosimus, who is certainly not partial to Theodosius, perhaps hardly just, and exposes his faults, does not mention the massacre of Thessalonica; and yet the fact is not doubtful.

Ambrosius, the archbishop of Milan, thought that the civil administration was an affair in which the clergy had an interest; and a riot at Callinicum on the Persian frontier, in which the fanatics of the place, at the instigation of their bishop, had burnt a place of worship of the Valentinians, and the synagogue of the Jews, found an apologist in the archbishop of Milan. The provincial magistrate had condemned the bishop to rebuild the synagogue, or to make good the damage, and the rioters to be punished; and the emperor confirmed this equitable and moderate sentence. But to tolerate difference of opinion was, in the archbishop's judgment, the same as to persecute the orthodox; and Theodosius was compelled, by the archbishop's monitions and lectures, to let the bishop and his turbulent flock go unpunished. "St. Ambrosius," says Tillemont, "thought that a prince who pardoned so many other similar acts, ought not to expose the Christian religion to the insults of its enemies by so rigorous an order." The massacre of Thessalonica was a trial for the firmness of Ambrosius: he who thought that the burning of a Jew synagogue ought not to be punished could hardly overlook the massacre of a Christian city. He retired from the emperor's presence, but he represented his crime to him in a letter, and he told him that penitence alone could efface his guilt. But the archbishop was prudent in his remonstrances, and to protect himself, he called in the aid of a vision, in which he said that he had been warned not to offer the oblation in the name of Theodosius, nor in his presence. When the emperor proceeded to perform his devotions in the usual manner in the great church of Milan, the archbishop stopped him at the door, and demanded a further acknowledgment of his guilt. The conscience-struck Theodosius humbled himself before the church, which has recorded his penance as one of its greatest victories. He laid aside the insignia of imperial power, and in the posture of a suppliant in the church of Milan, entreated pardon for his great sin before all the congregation. After eight months, the emperor was restored to communion with the church, at Christmas, A. D. 390.

Theodosius spent three years in Italy, during which he established Valentinian on the throne of the West, a measure for which his historians may claim the merit of generosity; for he probably would have had no difficulty in keeping the western empire, which he had wrested from the usurpation of Maximus. Theodosius returned to Constantinople early in November A. D. 391.

Valentinian II. did not long maintain his power.

Arbogastes, who had served Gratian with fidelity, and had contributed under Theodosius to the overthrow of Maximus, was appointed master-general of the forces in Gaul. But he aspired to govern a master who had not vigour enough to command obedience, and the emperor's authority gradually declined. In A. D. 392 Valentinian made a last effort to resume his power, and he personally announced to Arbogastes that he was dismissed from all his employments. The general received the announcement with contempt; and in a few days after Valentinian was found dead. It was believed that he had been strangled by order of Arbogastes. The barbarian, who did not think it prudent to assume the imperial purple, set up Eugenius, a rhetorician, and formerly his secretary, as emperor of the West. Theodosius received the ambassadors of Eugenius, who announced his elevation, with dissembled indignation, for he was ill disposed to renew a war in the west, which he had only just ended. But his own pride, and the tears of his wife Galla, the sister of Valentinian, urged him to punish the usurper. Two years were spent in the preparation for this war; but the emperor, with prudent precaution, imitating the example of those who consulted the god of Delphi in the times of heathenism, sent a favourite eunuch to ask the advice of John of Lycopolis, an Egyptian anchorite, whether he should make war on Eugenius, or wait till Eugenius attacked him. John declared that Theodosius would be victorious, but yet not without loss and bloodshed, as in the war with Maximus; that he would die in Italy after his victory, and leave to his son the empire of the west. "Thus Theodosius did not engage in this war any more than in the other, except by the order which God gave to him by his prophet." (Tillemont).

Theodosius prepared himself to fulfil the prophecy by recruiting his legions, with the aid of his two master-generals Stilicho and Timasius. Arbogastes, who commanded for Eugenius, posted himself on the border of Italy, but allowed Theodosius to pass the Julian Alps, and enter the plains which extend to Aquileia. Here he found the formidable army of Arbogastes, consisting of hardy Gauls and Germans. Theodosius attacked the enemy, but he was compelled to retire with great loss, particularly of his Gothic allies. Arbogastes now occupied the passes in his rear, and the emperor's position was most critical. But he was saved by the treachery of the generals of Eugenius, who sent to express their readiness to desert, if the rewards which they asked were granted. Theodosius accepted their conditions, and led his troops to a fresh attack on the camp of the enemy. A tempest, that rose during the battle, and blew full in the face of the troops of Eugenius, contributed to their discomfiture and the victory of Theodosius. The head of Eugenius was separated from his body, while he was suing for mercy at the feet of his conqueror; and Arbogastes, after wandering in the mountains, terminated his fortunes by his own sword. Theodosius received the submission of the west, and, at the intercession of Ambrosius, used his victory with moderation.

Theodosius died on the seventeenth of January A. D. 395, four months after the defeat of Eugenius, whether, as some say, in consequence of the fatigues of war, or, as others, in consequence of intemperate habits, it is not possible to decide. The two sons, Arcadius and Honorius, had already been elevated to the rank of Augusti, and it was arranged that the empire should be divided between them. Honorius was not in the war against Eugenius, but he came to Milan before his father died, and received from him the gift of the empire of the west. The arrival of Honorius was celebrated by the games of the Circus, at which the dying emperor assisted.

The formal destruction of paganism marks the reign of this orthodox emperor. "The ruin of paganism, in the age of Theodosius," says Gibbon, "is perhaps the only example of the total extirpation of any ancient and popular superstition, and may therefore deserve to be considered as a singular event in the history of the human mind." Without admitting the truth of this remark as to the total extirpation of paganism, we must assign to Theodosius the design to extirpate it. His rigorous steps towards the overthrow of the ancient religion are traced by Tillemont with minute diligence (vol. v. p. 229, &c.). In December 381 he prohibited sacrifices, either by day or by night, in the temples or out of the temples; and also he forbade the curious inquisition into futurity by the examination of the viscera of animals. Libanius, in his oration in defence of the temples, written probably about A. D. 384, says, that the laws of Theodosius at that time had not closed the temples, nor prohibited persons from going there, nor the burning of incense, but only the sacrifice of animals. But so long as the temples existed, the old religion would subsist; and therefore to destroy it the temples must be destroyed. Libanius complains that people, clothed in black (no doubt he means monks,) ran in bodies to the temples, overthrew the altars, pulled down the roofs and the walls, and sometimes killed the priests who resisted. He says, however, that soldiers were also employed in this work of demolition, and that in fact no temples were destroyed without the order of the emperor. Some few temples were converted into Christian churches, and thus preserved; "but in almost every province of the Roman world, an army of fanatics, without authority and without discipline, invaded the peaceful inhabitants; and the ruin of the fairest structures of antiquity still displays the ravages of those barbarians, who alone had time and inclination to execute such laborious destruction." (Gibbon.) The lands of the temples were probably given to the Christian churches as a general rule. (Tillemont.) Cynegius, the praetorian prefect of the East, was sent by Theodosius in 386 into Egypt, the seat of all monstrous superstitions, with a commission to prohibit idolatry, and to close the temples. It does not appear that he had any power to destroy them. It was probably not till 389 that the Christians obtained their great triumph over the idolatry of Egypt, by the destruction of the magnificent temple of Serapis at Alexandria. The fall of this great idol shook the popular belief of Egypt to its foundation. The emperor had given his orders to destroy the statue of Serapis; but the heathens believed that the deity would resent the slightest affront to his majesty. A soldier, bolder than the rest, encouraged by the archbishop Theophilus, dealt a blow against the cheek of Serapis with a ponderous axe, and the face of the idol fell to the ground. The deity silently submitted to his fate; the idol was broken in pieces, and dragged through the streets of Alexandria. The overthrow of the old religion, which was still practised, was accomplished by the last edict of Theodosius in 390 (Cod. Theod. 16. tit. 10. s. 12), which in harsh and intolerant terms, censured by a modern Christian writer, forbade, under severe penalties, in some cases extending to death, "the worship of an inanimate idol by the sacrifice of a guiltless victim." The spirit of the Theodosian edicts was that of the most bitter persecution; and while we commend his wishes to purge society of gross and debasing superstitions, we cannot reconcile the laws of the emperor with the religion which he professed, nor admit that persecution would have been so efficient a cure of idolatry as the inculcation of the doctrines of Christ, and the example of a practice conformable to them. But he who could order the massacre of Thessalonica was ill adapted to teach a faith which was contradicted by his practice.

The reign of Theodosius is one of the most important periods of the later empire. Gibbon has sketched it in a masterly manner, but too favourably for the character of Theodosius; who was probably a voluptuary, a sensualist, certainly a persecutor, cruel and vindictive. That he possessed some great qualities cannot be denied; and his natural temper may have been mild, but it was unequal and uncertain; it wanted sufficient consistency to entitle him to the name of a truly great and good man. Tillemont has, with unwearied industry which allows nothing to escape it, collected, in his dry, annalistic fashion, all the materials for the reign of Theodosius; and Gibbon has largely availed himself of the labours of the learned ecclesiastic. [G. L.]

COIN OF THEODOSIUS I.

THEODO'SIUS II., was the only son of the emperor Arcadius, who died on the first of May, A. D. 408. Theodosius was born early in A. D. 401, and was declared Augustus by his father in January A. D. 402. There is a story that Arcadius, by his testament, made Yezdigerd, king of Persia, the guardian of his son; but it hardly deserves notice, and certainly not refutation. On the death of Arcadius, the government was given to or assumed by the praefect Anthemius, the grandson of Philip, a minister of Constantius, and the grandfather of the emperor Anthemius. In A. D. 405 Anthemius was made consul and praetorian praefect of the East. He faithfully discharged his duty as guardian of the empire and the infant emperor. In the year in which Arcadius died, the Huns and the Scyrri entered Thrace under Uldin, who rejected all terms of accommodation, but, being deserted by some of his officers, he recrossed the Danube, after losing a great number of his Huns. The Scyrri, who loitered in his rear, were either killed or made prisoners, and many of the captives were sent to cultivate the lands in Asia. Anthemius strengthened the Illyrian frontiers, and protected Constantinople, by building what were called the great walls, probably in A. D. 413.

Theodosius had a sister, Pulcheria, born A. D. 399, who, in A. D. 414, became the guardian of her brother and the administrator of the empire, before she was sixteen years of age: she was declared Augusta on the fourth of July, A. D. 414. Pulcheria was undoubtedly a woman of some talent, though of a peculiar kind. She superintended the education of her brother, and directed the government at the same time; nor did her influence cease with the minority of Theodosius. [PULCHERIA.] She educated her brother after her own ascetic notions; and though his literary instruction was not neglected, nor the exercises proper to form his health and strengthen his body, his political education was limited to the observance of the forms and ceremonials of the court. It may be that Pulcheria, with some vigour of understanding, had no knowledge of the more important duties of a man who is at the head of a nation. Pulcheria and her sisters, Arcadia and Marina, had publicly dedicated themselves to the service of God and to a life of chastity; and the whole imperial household was regulated in conformity to this principle. "Pulcheria," says Tillemont, a great admirer of this saint, "accustomed Theodosius to pray incessantly, to visit the churches often, and to make them presents; to respect the bishops and other ministers of the altar, &c." But if the young emperor was carefully protected against the dangers to which a youth in an exalted station is exposed, he was not trained in those studies which befit a man and an emperor. To excel in mechanical occupations, to write a fine hand, which, in a private station, may give amusement, and are at least harmless, imply in a prince a want of taste and of talent for more important things, or an ill-directed education. Theodosius had, in fact, little talent, and his education was not adapted to improve it. He passed a blameless youth, for he was shut up in his palace, except when he went a hunting; and he possessed the negative virtues of a retired and austere life. The ecclesiastics extol him for his piety and his respect to the church; and he prosecuted the work which his grandfather commenced, by demolishing to their foundations the temples of idols, the monuments of the superstition and of the taste of the pagans. It was his ambition not to leave a vestige of the ancient religion behind him.

He published various edicts against heretics, and an edict specially directed against Gamaliel, the last patriarch of the Jews. By an edict of the 16th May, 415, he declared it incest for a widower to marry his wife's sister, and the children of such a marriage were made bastards. Constantius, in A. D. 355, had already enacted the same law, which, though enacted again in our own times, is protested against by the common understanding of mankind.

The great event of the life of an emperor who was a nullity, was his marriage, which was managed by his sister, who managed every thing. The woman whom his sister chose for his wife, and whom Theodosius married (probably in A. D. 421), was the accomplished Athenais, who, after her baptism, for she was a heathen, received the name of Eudocia. Her life from this time is intimately connected with the biography of her husband, and is told at length elsewhere. [EUDOCIA.]

About the close of A. D. 421 war broke out between the emperor of the East and Varanes or Bahram, the successor of Yezdigerd. A Christian bishop had signalized his zeal by burning a temple of the fire-worshippers at Susa, and this excess was followed by a persecution of the Christians by the Magi. This persecution, begun at the close of the reign of Yezdigerd, was continued under his successor; and some Christian fugitives crossed the frontiers into the Roman territories to seek protection. The Persian king claimed the fugitives, but his demand was refused; and this, added to other causes of dispute, kindled a war between the two empires. Theodosius was not a soldier, and the war was carried on for about two years by his general Ardaburius, with no important results. The defence of Theodosiopolis in Mesopotamia has immortalised the name of its warrior bishop Eunomus. The town had been besieged by the enemy for some time, but the bishop and his flock stoutly held out, and destroyed the wooden towers of the enemy. The obstinate resistance of the place provoked the blasphemy of a Persian prince, who threatened to burn the temple of God when he took the town. The bishop, shocked at his impious threats, pointed at him a balista, which bore the potent name of St. Thomas, and the formidable machine discharged a stone which struck the blasphemer dead. Upon this the king of Persia lost heart, and withdrew his troops. (Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, vol. vi. c. 13.)

Socrates, the chief authority for the history of the Persian war, says that Theodosius, notwithstanding his success in the war, was the first to propose terms of peace. A truce for one hundred years was concluded between the Persians and the Romans. The kingdom of Armenia, now extinguished, was divided between the Persians and the Romans, an arrangement which gave to the empire of the East a new and extensive province. The division of Armenia probably followed the conclusion of a second Persian war, A. D. 441. In A. D. 423 died Honorius the emperor of the West. Placidia, the sister of Honorius, had been sent away from Italy, with her sons Valentinian and Honorius, by the Western emperor, a short time before his death, and she took refuge at Constantinople. The throne of the West was usurped by Joannes, who declared himself emperor. Theodosius refused to acknowledge the usurper, and sent against him a force commanded by Ardaburius. The usurper was taken in Ravenna, and his head was cut off, A. D. 425. Theodosius was enjoying the games of the Circus at Constantinople when the news came, and he showed his piety, as Tillemont remarks, by stopping the entertainment, and inviting all the people to go to the church with him, to return thanks to God for the death of the tyrant. Whether Theodosius had no ambition to keep the empire of the West, or those who governed him determined his conduct, he resolved to confer it on his youthful cousin Valentinian. Eudocia, the daughter of Theodosius, was betrothed to the young emperor, and she was married to him in A. D. 437.

The reign of the younger Theodosius was not free from the religious troubles which had distracted the reign of his grandfather Theodosius. The great dispute which originated with Nestorius, who was made patriarch of Constantinople in A. D. 428, and ended in the Council of Ephesus, A. D. 431, is described at length under NESTORIUS.

The Huns had ravaged the eastern provinces in the reign of Arcadius, the father of Theodosius; and they were now the formidable neighbours of the empire on the frontier of the Danube. In A. D. 441 the Huns, under Attila and his brother Bleda, crossed the Danube, and took Viminiacum in Moesia; they broke through the Illyrian frontier, the fortresses of which offered only a feeble resistance, destroyed Sirmium, Singidunum (Belgrade), Sardica, and other towns, and extended their ravages into Thrace. Theodosius recalled the troops from Sicily which he had sent against Genseric king of the Vandals, and collected from Asia and Europe all the men that he could muster; but his generals were unable to direct this force efficiently, and after several defeats they retreated towards Constantinople, which alone, of all the cities between the Archipelago and the Euxine, remained for the protection of the emperor. The history of the ravages of Attila comprehends several years, and they were apparently interrupted by intervals of peace, for it was not till A. D. 447, the year of the great earthquake which destroyed part of the walls of Constantinople and threw down fifty-seven towers, that the Huns approached the capital, and peace was finally made. In A. D. 447 or 448 Theodosius concluded a disgraceful peace with the king of the Huns, to whom was given up a territory on the Danube extending from Singidunum to Novae, in the diocese of Thrace, and fifteen days' journey in breadth. The annual subsidy that had hitherto been paid to Attila, was increased from seven hundred pounds of gold to twenty-one hundred, and six thousand pounds of gold were to be paid on the spot. Theodosius had exhausted his treasury by extravagant expenditure, and his unfortunate subjects, who had been pillaged by the Huns, were pillaged again by this unwarlike and feeble emperor, to supply the demands of the barbarian conqueror. Attila also required all the deserters from his camp to be given up, and he claimed back, without any ransom, all his men who had been taken prisoners.

In A. D. 448 or 449 Theodosius sent an embassy to Attila, at the head of which was Maximin. The ambassador was accompanied by the historian Priscus, who has left a most interesting account of the domestic habits of Attila. [PRISCUS.] The proposed object of the embassy was to maintain the good understanding between the emperor of the East and the king of the Huns; but Theodosius had a private object to accomplish, the execution of which was entrusted only to Vigilius, the interpreter; and this was the assassination of Attila. The ambassador passed through Sardica, and crossed the Danube; and in some place north of this river he had his first interview with Attila, whom he was obliged to follow in his progress northwards before he could conclude the business on which he was sent. The narrative of Priscus leads us to infer that the place in which the king of the Huns gave his final reception to the ambassador was in the plains of northern Hungary. The proposal to assassinate Attila had been made at Constantinople by the eunuch Chrysaphius, who then reigned in the name of Theodosius, and made to Edecon, a chieftain of the Scyrri. Vigilius was the medium of communication between Chrysaphius and Edecon, who was to receive for his reward some of the wealth on which he had gazed with admiration at Constantinople. The scheme was communicated to the emperor, who approved of it. The emperor's conduct was rendered more disgraceful by the fact that Maximin, his ambassador, was exposed to all the danger of the discovery of this treachery, and, being kept in ignorance of it, had not even the choice of refusing to conduct the embassy. Edecon discovered the treachery to Attila, who, more generous than the Christian emperor, disdained to punish Vigilius, though he confessed his guilt; and looking at the affair as a matter of business, the barbarian took two hundred pounds of gold, instead of the life of Vigilius. But he sent two ambassadors to Constantinople, who boldly rebuked the emperor for his guilt, and demanded the head of Chrysaphius. Instead of directly refusing the demand, Theodosius sent a fresh embassy, loaded with presents, to deprecate the wrath of Attila, who preferring gold to vengeance, pardoned the emperor and his guilty associates: he even abandoned all claim to the country south of the Danube; but here his liberality was not great, for he had made it a desert.

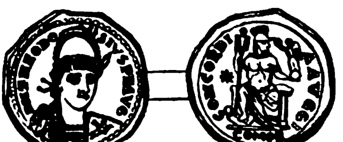
In June A. D. 450, Theodosius was thrown from his horse as he was hunting near Constantinople, and received an injury from which he died, in the fiftieth year of his age and the forty-second of his long and inglorious reign. His sister Pulcheria succeeded him, but prudently took for her colleague in the empire the senator Marcian, and made him her husband.

In the reign of Theodosius, and that of Valentinian III., who was emperor of the West from A. D. 425 to 455, was made the compilation called the Codex Theodosianus. In A. D. 429 the administration of the Eastern Empire declared that there should be formed a collection of the Constitutions of the Roman emperors from the time of Constantine to that date, after the model of the two collections of Gregorianus and Hermogenianus. The arrangement of the constitutions was to be determined by the matter to which they referred, and those which treated of several matters were to be divided, and each part placed under its appropriate title. Those constitutions which had been altered by subsequent constitutions were not always to be rejected, but the date of each constitution was to be given, and they were to be arranged in the order of time. Eight functionaries (illustres et spectabiles) and an advocate were appointed to compile this code. Nothing was done till A. D. 435, when a new commission was appointed with the same power as the former commission, and the additional power of making changes in the constitutions. The new commissioners were sixteen, part of whom were of the rank of Illustres, and part of the rank of Spectabiles. On the fifteenth of February, A. D. 438, the Code was published, and it was declared to be from the first of January, A. D. 439, the only authority for the "Jus Principale," or that law which was formed by imperial constitutions, from the time of Constantine. In the same year the Code was published at Rome, as law for the Western Empire also, by Valentinian.



The Code consists of sixteen books, which are divided into titles, with appropriate rubricae or headings; and the constitutions belonging to each title are arranged under it in chronological order. The first five books comprise the greater part of the constitution which relates to Jus Privatum; the sixth, seventh, and eighth books contain the law that relates to the constitution and administration; the ninth book treats of criminal law; the tenth and eleventh treat of the public revenue and some matters relating to procedure; the twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth and fifteenth books treat of the constitution and the administration of towns and other corporations; and the sixteenth contains the law relating to ecclesiastical matters.

The Theodosian Code has been preserved in an epitome contained in the Breviarium which was made by order of Alaric II., king of the Visigoths, in A. D. 506, but several constitutions and some entire titles are omitted in this epitome. It has also been preserved in the MSS. of the original Code, yet only in an incomplete form, and we have consequently to refer to the Breviarium for a considerable part of the Theodosian Code. The constitutions in the Code of Justinian, which belong to the period comprised in the Theodosian Code, are taken from the Code of Theodosius, but have undergone considerable alterations. After the edition of Cujacius, Paris, 1686, fol., the foundation for the text of the last eleven books of the Code was the MSS. of the original Code; but for the first five books and the beginning of the sixth book (tit. 1, and the beginning of title 2) the text of the epitome in the Breviarium was the foundation. The best of these editions, after the time of Cujacius, and that which is invaluable for the commentary, is that of J. Gothofredus. which was edited after his death by A. Marville, Lyon, 1665, 6 vols. folio; and afterwards by Ritter, Leipzig, 1736—1745, fol.

Recent discoveries have added to the last eleven books, and furnished considerable and most important additions to the first five books. The first discoveries which furnished materials for the text of the Code, were made by A. Peyron, at Turin, in a palimpsest: these discoveries have enabled us to make considerable additions to the first five books. These additions were published by Peyron in 1823. In 1820 Clossius discovered, in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, a MS. of the Breviarium, into which the copyist has transferred various pieces from a MS. of the original Code: they were published by Clossius in 1824. Wenck published in 1825, Leipzig, 8vo., the first five books of the Code, as we now possess them, with critical and explanatory notes.

The last and most complete edition of the text of the Theodosian Code is that by Hänel in the Corpus Juris Ante-justinianeum, published at Bonn, 1837.

The Theodosian Code, by its adoption in the Western Empire, established a uniformity of law in the East and the West. But as new laws would occasionally be necessary, and it was desirable to maintain this uniformity, it was agreed between the Eastern and the Western emperors, that future constitutions, which might be published in one part of the empire, should be forwarded to the other, and promulgated there also. The new constitutions were called Novellae Leges, or simply Novellae. In A. D. 447 Theodosius sent a number of such Novellae to Valentinian, who in the following year confirmed and promulgated them in the Western Empire. These Novellae form the first collection of Novellae which followed the compilation of the THEODO'SIUS III., was compelled, perhaps, against his will, to be proclaimed emperor of the East in A. D. 716, by the fleet, which also declared that Anastasius, his predecessor, was unfit to reign. Theodosius filled the unimportant office of a collector of the revenue when he was taken to Constantinople to be crowned Emperor of the East. In January 716, he was proclaimed emperor, and in the following year he prudently abdicated, and left the throne for Leo the Isaurian, who commanded the troops in the East. Theodosius spent the rest of his life in the tranquil retirement of a monastery. [G. L.]

THEODO'SIUS, literary. 1. Of Bithynia, a mathematician, who is referred to by Vitruvius (ix. 9. s. 8. § 1, Schneid.) as the inventor of a universal sun-dial (horologium πρὸς πᾶν κλῖμα). Strabo (xii. p. 566) mentions him among the eminent natives of Bithynia, and informs us that his sons were also mathematicians. He must have lived before the time of Augustus, and therefore he cannot be, as some have supposed, the same person as Theodosius of Tripolis, who appears to have flourished later than the reign of Trajan. (See No. 2.)

2. Of Tripolis, a mathematician and astronomer of some distinction, was a philosopher of the sect of the Sceptics, or, to speak more exactly, a follower of Pyrrhon, whose philosophy, Theodosius himself contended, ought not properly to be called sceptical (Diog. Laërt. ix. 70). Among other works of his, Suidas (s. v.) mentions a Commentary on the κεφάλαια of Theudas, who appears from another passage of Diogenes (ix. 116) to have lived not very long before the time of Sextus Empiricus, and therefore about the reign of Trajan. Suidas also enumerates σκεπτικὰ κεφάλαια among the works of Theodosius (s. v. and also s. v. Πυῤῥώνιος), and the same work is mentioned by Diogenes (ix. 70). Of the ancient mathematicians, Ptolemy does not refer to Theodosius, but his works are quoted by Theon, in his Commentary on Ptolemy, by Pappus, in his συναγωγή, and by Proclus, in his Hypotyposis Astronomica, p. 7.

Suidas mentions the following as his mathematical and astronomical works:—Σφαιρικὰ ἐν βιβλίοις τρισίν, Περὶ ἡμερῶν καὶ νυκτῶν δύο, ὑπόμνημα εἰς τὸ Ἀρχιμήδους Ἐφόδιον, Διαγραφὰς οἰκιῶν ἐν βιβλίοις γ΄, Ἀστρολογικά, Περὶ οἰκήσεων. Of these works, some have been printed.

The work on the Sphere, which is a treatise on the properties of the sphere, and of the circles described on its surface, was first published in an ancient Latin version, edited by John Vögelin, Paris, 1529, 4to.; and other Latin versions were published by F. Maurolycus, with the Sphaerica of Menelaus, and the work of Autolycus on the Sphere, Messanae, 1558, fol.; by Jos. Auria, with Autolycus, from six MSS. in the Vatican, 1588, 4to.; by Dr. Isaac Barrow, in his edition of Archimedes, Lond. 1675, 4to.; and by And. Celsius, Upsal. 1730, 12mo. The first edition of the Greek text was published by Joannes Pena, the royal mathematician of France, Bellov. 1558, 4to.: many of the demonstrations, which are defective in the work of Theodosius, were supplied by Pena from Euclid's Elements, and other geometrical works, both ancient and modern. Another edition, founded on that of Pena, with the further aid of some MSS. at Oxford, from which, however, no readings of consequence were obtained, was published by Joseph Hunt, Oxon. 1707. 8vo. There are also translations of the work into English, by Edward Sherbourne, as an appendix to his version of the Sphaerica of Manilius, Lond. 1675, fol., and into German, by E. Nizze, whose notes are of high value, Stralsund, 1826, 8vo.

His work περὶ ἡμερῶν καὶ νυκτῶν, de Diebus et Noctibus, was published from a MS. in the Vatican, in Latin only, with ancient Scholia, and figures, by Jos. Auria, Romae, 1591, 4to.; the propositions, without demonstrations, having been previously edited by Conrad Dasypodius, Argentorat. 1572, 8vo. Fabricius states that the book Περὶ οἰκήσεων was also published in Latin, by Jos. Auria, Romae, 1587, 4to.; but the edition is not mentioned in Hoffmann's Lexicon Bibliographicum. In the great collection of the works of the ancient mathematicians, planned by Edward Bernard, after whose death the synopsis of the intended edition was published by Thomas Smith, Lond. 1704, 8vo., the known works of Theodosius were to have had a place in the seventh volume. There are many MSS. of the above three works, in the principal libraries of Europe, in Greek, Latin, and Arabic. The other works of Theodosius appear to be entirely lost. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. pp. 21—23, 213; Menag. ad Diog. Laërt. ix. 70.)

3. Another native of Tripolis of this name, is mentioned by Suidas (s. v.) as the author of an heroic poem on the Spring, and of various other works (ἔγραψε δι' ἐπῶν εἰς τὸ ἔαρ, καὶ ἕτερα διάφορα). Eudocia (p. 229) identifies him with the preceding.

4. A Neo-Platonist, the disciple of Ammonius, and the father-in-law of Zethus, the disciple of Plotinus. (Porphyr. Vit. Plot. 7.)

5. Of Alexandria, a grammarian, whose Commentary on the τέχνη γραμματική of Dionysius Thrax, as well as a work by him περὶ ὅρου, and other grammatical works, and also a Commentary on Theodosius himself, by Georgius Choeroboscus, exist in MS. in various libraries. A full account of these MSS. is given by Fabricius and Harless (Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. pp. 301, 308, 350). He is supposed to have lived about the time of Constantine the Great. His chief grammatical work, the commentary on Dionysius, amplified by the additions of later Byzantine grammarians, was published by C. G. Göttling, under the title of Theodosii Alexandrini Grammatica, Lips. 1822, 8vo.; the Prooemium having been published before in Osann's Philemonis Grammatici quae supersunt, Berol. 1821, 8vo., and a portion of the work, under the title of Theodori Grammatici Alex. Canones de Declinatione Nominum et Conjugatione Verborum, by Imm. Bekker, in the third volume of his Anecdota, Berol. 1821, 8vo. (Hoffman, Lexicon Bibliograph. Scriptor. Graecorum.)

6. Respecting Theodosius, surnamed ὁ μικρός, a supposed Epitomator of Dion Cassius, but apparently in fact only a copyist, see Harless's additions to the notice of him by Fabricius. (Bibl. Graec. vol. v. p. 142.)

7. MELITINUS, a Byzantine historian, a MS. copy of whose Chronicon was brought from Constantinople to Tübingen by Stephen Gerlach, a fragment of which, respecting the marriage of the emperor

Theophilus with Theodora of Paphlagonia, in A. D. 830, was appended to the epitome of the Aethiopica of Heliodorus, published by Martin Crusius at Frankfort, 1584. The entire work has never been printed. There is also a MS. in the royal library at Munich. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 472; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 504, ed. Westermann; Tafel, de Theodosio Melitino, ineditae Historiae Byzantinae scriptore, ex Codice Tubingensi Notitia Literaria, Prog. Acad. Tubing. 1828, 4to.)

8. Another writer of the history of the later Roman empire, was a Syracusan monk, in the tenth century of our era. He wrote an account of the taking of Syracuse by the Spanish Arabs, in the form of a letter to Leo Diaconus, a Latin version of which, by the monk Joasaph, or Josaphat, has been published in a more or less complete form in the various collections of works on the history of Italy (Muratori, Script. Rer. Ital. vol. i. pt. ii. p. 257, a). The Greek text was first published, with a new Latin version and notes, by C. B. Hase, in his edition of Leo Diaconus, Paris, 1819, fol. (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 504, ed. Westermann; Hoffmann, Lexicon. Bibliograph. Scriptor. Graecorum, s. vv. Theodosius and Leo.)

9. DIACONUS, a third Byzantine historian, who appears to have lived about the same time as the preceding, was the author of five ἀκροάσεις in iambic verse, on the subject of the expedition of Nicephorus Phocas to Crete, in A. D. 961, which was first published in Greek and Latin by Fl. Cornelius, in his Creta Sacra, Venet. 1755, 4to.; again, by P. F. Fogginius, in his Nova Appendix Corporis Historiae Byzantinae, Romae, 1777, fol.; and lastly, with notes and a vocabulary of words peculiar to the author, by F. Jacobs, in his edition of Leo Diaconus, in the Corpus Script. Hist. Byzant. Bonn. 1828, 8vo. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 533; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. l. c.; Hoffmann, Lexicon, ll. cc.)

10. A monk, the titles of whose answer to the arguments against the resurrection of the body, and another work in refutation of John Philoponus, are given by Photius (Bibl. Cod. 22, comp. Cod. 22.) [P. S.]

THEODO'SIUS (Θεοδόσιος), a physician who must have lived in or before the fifth century after Christ, as he is quoted by Aëtius (ii. 2. 54, p. 276). He is perhaps the same person who is quoted by Rhazes. (See Haller's Bibl. Med. Pract. vol. i. p. 354.) [THEODOTIUS.] [W. A. G.]

THEO'DOTA (Θεοδότη), an Athenian courtezan, and one of the most celebrated persons of that class in Greece (Liban. vol. i. p. 582), is introduced as a speaker in one of the dialogues in Xenophon's Memorabilia (iii. 11), where some information is given respecting her. (Comp. Ath. v. p. 220, f.) She at last attached herself to Alcibiades, and, after his murder, she performed his funeral rites. (Ath. xiii. p. 574, f.; Cobet, Prosop. Xenoph. pp. 83, foll.) [P. S.]

THEODO'TIUS (Θεοδότιος), the author of a medical formula, quoted by Alexander Trallianus (xi. 1. p. 310), who is called by him ὁ Φιλόσοφος. He may perhaps be the same person who is called Theodosius. The word occurs in several other passages of Alexander Trallianus and of Aëtius, but probably in each it is the name of a medicine, and not of a man. (See Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. viii. p. 329, xii. 602, xiii. 433, ed. vet.) [SEVERUS, p. 802.] [W. A. G.]

THEO'DOTUS (Θεόδοτος), historical. 1. A Macedonian in the service of Antigonus, king of Asia. In B.C. 315 he commanded a fleet with which he was preparing to join Antigonus, when he was surprised by Polycleitus, the admiral of Ptolemy, on the coast of Lycia, all his ships captured, and he himself mortally wounded. (Diod. xix. 64.)

2. An officer who was entrusted by Lysimachus with the important charge of the citadel of Sardes, in which he for a time defied all the efforts of Seleucus. But that monarch, having at length proclaimed a reward of 100 talents for the head of Theodotus, rendered the latter so suspicious of his own followers, that he himself secretly opened the gates of the fortress to Seleucus. (Polyaen. iv. 9. § 4.)

3. A Rhodian to whose judicious advice in regard to the management of his elephants Antiochus I. king of Syria was mainly indebted for the great victory over the Gauls, to which he owed the security of his throne and kingdom (Lucian, Zeuxis, 9, 10; Droysen, Hellenism. vol. ii. p. 232.)

4. Surnamed HEMIOLIUS (Ἡμιόλιος, probably as suggested by Schweighäuser from his unusual stature), was a general in the service of Antiochus the Great, by whom he was sent in B. C. 222 together with Xenon against Molon, who had raised the standard of revolt in the eastern provinces of the monarchy [MOLON]. The two generals were however unable to cope with the rebel satrap, and withdrew within the walls of the cities, leaving him in possession of the open country. (Polyb. v. 42, 43.) After the final defeat of Molon by Antiochus himself, Theodotus was selected by that monarch to take the command in Coele Syria, while he himself undertook to reduce Seleucia. What Theodotus accomplished at this time we know not, but the next year (B. C. 219) we find him serving under the immediate command of Antiochus himself, and bearing an important share in the action against Nicolaus the general of Ptolemy, near Porphyreon, as well as shortly after at the siege of Rabbatamana. On both these occasions he was associated with Nicarchus, with whom he also shared in the command of the phalanx at the memorable battle of Raphia, B. C. 217. After that great defeat he was chosen by Antiochus as one of the ambassadors whom he sent to Ptolemy to sue for peace. (Id. v. 59, 68, 69, 71, 79, 83, 87.)

5. An Aetolian, who at the accession of Antiochus the Great (B. C. 223) held the command of the important province of Coele Syria for Ptolemy Philopator king of Egypt. He was an able general, and repulsed with ease the first attack made by the king of Syria upon his government, but instead of being rewarded by Ptolemy for his services, he was recalled to Alexandria, where he nearly fell a victim to the intrigues of some of the courtiers and favourites of the king. Disgusted with this treatment, and despising the vices and luxury of Ptolemy, when he was again suffered to resume the command in Coele Syria (B. C. 219) he conceived the design of betraying that province into the hands of Antiochus. His overtures were readily welcomed, and he surrendered the two important fortresses of Tyre and Ptolemaïs to the Syrian monarch, whom he immediately joined with the forces under his command. Nicolaus however prevented his design from taking full effect, and retained a part of the Syrian provinces under the allegiance of Egypt. (Polyb. v. 40, 46, 61, 62.) From this time Theodotus enjoyed a high place in the favour of the Syrian king. In the campaign of B. C. 217 we find him commanding a body of 10,000 select troops, and just before the battle of Raphia he gave a singular proof of daring by penetrating with only two companions into the heart of the Egyptian camp, in order to assassinate Ptolemy himself. Mistaking the king's tent, he slew his physician instead, but effected his escape in safety, and returned to the Syrian camp. (Id. v. 66, 79, 81.) Again in B. C. 215 we find him exhibiting equal audacity in supporting the daring project of Lagoras to scale the walls of the city of Sardes, the success of which seems to have been in great measure owing to his skill and ability. (Id. vii. 16—18.)

6. A Syracusan who joined in a conspiracy against the life of the tyrant Hieronymus. Being seized and put to the torture, he concealed the names of all his real accomplices, and accused Thrason, the leader of the opposite party, who was put to death in consequence. (Liv. xxiv. 7.) It is difficult to conceive that the life of Theodotus himself would be spared, but we find him (or another person of the same name) mentioned shortly after among the conspirators who assassinated Hieronymus at Leontini, B. C. 214. On that occasion he hastened with Sosis to Syracuse (Id. xxiv. 21), and his name is associated with the latter during the transactions that followed [SOSIS]. His subsequent fate is unknown.

7. A Thessalian of the city of Pherae, who was an exile from his native country and settled at Stratus in Aetolia. He was one of the deputies sent by the Aetolians to Rome in B. C. 198. (Polyb. xvii. 10.)

8. An Epeirot, who during the war between the Romans and Perseus, king of Macedonia, zealously espoused the cause of the latter, and in conjunction with Antinous succeeded in inducing his countrymen the Molossians to abandon the Roman alliance for that of Perseus. In B. C. 170 he conceived the design, which was only frustrated by accident, of intercepting the consul A. Hostilius Mancinus on his passage through Epeirus, and betraying him into the hands of the Macedonian king. After the defeat of Perseus, when the Roman praetor L. Anicius invaded the Molossian territories, Theodotus and Antinous shut themselves up in the fortress of Passaron, but finding the inhabitants disposed to surrender, they sallied forth, attacked the Roman outposts, and perished fighting bravely. (Polyb. xxvii. 14, xxx. 7; Liv. xlv. 26.)

9. A rhetorician of Samos, or, according to others, of Chios, who was the preceptor of the infant king of Egypt, Ptolemy XII. He appears to have exercised much political influence, and when after the battle of Pharsalia (B. C. 48), Pompey sought refuge in Egypt, it was Theodotus who was the first to suggest that the illustrious fugitive should be put to death. By this base advice he hoped to gain the favour of Caesar, and when the conqueror arrived in Egypt, hastened to meet him, bearing the head and signet ring of his rival. But Caesar turned from him with disgust, and would have put him to death, had he not succeeded in making his escape. At a subsequent period he was less fortunate, being apprehended and executed in Asia, by order of M. Brutus in B. C. 43. (Liv. Epit. cxiii.; Plut. Pomp. 77, 80; Appian. B. C. ii. 84, 90). [E. H. B.]

THEO'DOTUS I. and II., kings of Bactria. [DIODOTUS.]

THEO'DOTUS (Θεόδοτος), literary. 1. A disciple of Socrates, who, in his Defence, according to Plato, speaks of him as already dead. He was the son of Theozotides, and the brother of Nicostratus. (Plat. Apol. p. 33, e.)

2. A Phoenician historian, who lived before Josephus, and wrote a history of his native country, in the Phoenician tongue, which was translated into Greek by a certain Laetus, if we adopt the correction of Reinesius in the passage of Tatian, where the MSS. give Χαῖτος or Ἄσιτος (Tatian. adv. Graec. 58, p. 128, ed. Worth; Joseph. c. Apion. i. 23; Euseb. Praep. Ev. x. 11; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 504.)

3. A poet, from whose poem upon the Jews (ἐν τῷ περὶ Ἰουδαίων) some verses respecting the city of Sichem are quoted by Eusebius. (Praep. Ev. ix. 22.)

According to a scholiast on Ovid (Ib. 467) there was a poet of this name who was cruelly put to death by the tyrant Mnesarchus, and to whose fate Ovid alludes (l. c.); but this is evidently mere guess-work. (See Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 324, vol. x. p. 516.)

4. A sophist and rhetorician, who flourished under M. Aurelius Antoninus, by whom he is spoken of as ἀγωνιστὴς τῶν πολιτικῶν λόγων καὶ ῥητορικῆς ὄφελος. He was at first a hearer of Lollianus and Herodes Atticus, and afterwards their rival. He taught at Athens by the express appointment of M. Antoninus, from whom also he received 10,000 drachmae as his remuneration. His life is related by Philostratus. (Vit. Soph. ii. 2, pp. 566, foll.)

5. A grammarian, cited in the Etymologicum Magnum, s. v. Ὀρίγανον.

6. Of Byzantium, a tanner and heresiarch, in the second century of our era, from whom the sect of the Theodotiani took their name. The heresy of Theodotus related to the person of Christ. For particulars respecting him and his followers, see Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. pp. 124, foll., pp. 149, 180, vol. x. p. 515), Cave (Hist Litt. s. a. 192, p. 87, ed. Basil.), and the authors quoted by those writers.

7. Bishop of Antioch, from A. D. 423—427, celebrated by Theodoret (H. E. v. 38) as "the pearl of self-command," and distinguished in church history for his success in bringing back the majority of the Apollinarists to orthodoxy. He wrote a book against those heretics, entitled κατὰ Συνουσιαστῶν, of which a fragment exists in MS. (Cave, Hist. Litt. s. a. 423, p. 405; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ix. p. 281, vol. x. p. 515.)

8. Bishop of Ancyra, in Galatia, an ecclesiastic of some distinction in the fifth century. He was present at the council of Ephesus, in A. D. 431, and vehemently supported Cyril in his attacks upon Nestorius. He was the author of numerous homilies and controversial works, the titles of which it is not worth while to insert here; they are fully given by Fabricius. Of these works some are published in the Acts of the Councils, some exist in MS., and others are wholly lost. Cave praises the ease and clearness of his style, and his controversial powers. (Cave, Hist. Litt. s. a. 430, p. 415; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. pp. 512, foll.)

The above are the only persons of this name, who appeared of sufficient importance to be noticed here; but there are several others of less consequence, a list of whom is given by Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. vol. x. pp. 513, 515. [P. S.]

THEO'DOTUS (Θεόδοτος), the name of an oculist, who must have lived in or before the first century after Christ, as he is quoted by Celsus (vi. 6, p. 119).

2. A physician of Athens in the second century after Christ, mentioned several times as a contemporary by Aristides in his Sermones Sacri.

3. A physician, who afterwards succeeded Stephanus as bishop of Laodicea in Syria, in the early part of the fourth century after Christ. He is highly praised by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. vii. 32), who dedicated to him his Praeparatio Evangelica; but he appears to have embraced the Arian heresy, and to have been one of the most active of the Arian bishops. He excommunicated Apollinaris, both father and son, on account of their intimacy with the heathen sophist Epiphanius [EPIPHANIUS, § 10, p. 40]; and is said to have been instrumental in deposing Eustathius, bishop of Antioch. [EUSTATHIUS, § 1, p. 119]. He held the see of Laodicea for about thirty years, and was succeeded by Georgius [GEORGIUS, § 29, p. 251]. His name is inserted by some of the Martyrologies under the date of Nov. 2, from which it has been copied by Bzovius (Nomenclator Sanctor. Professione Medicor.) and C. B. Carpzov (De Medicis ab Ecclesia pro Sanctis habitis); but this appears to be by mistake, and his name will probably be omitted in the "Acta Sanctorum" when the volumes for November appear. For a further account of this matter the reader may consult Usuardi Martyrol. ed. Soller.; Valesius, De Martyrol. Rom. in his Annotationes in Euseb. Hist. Eccles. p. 317; Baronii Annal. Eccles. vol. iv.; Tillemont, Hist. Ecclés. vol. vi. [W. A. G.]

THEO'DOTUS, artists. 1. A medallist, whose name is found on some very interesting coins of Clazomenae, which have been recently discovered. They are of silver, of a small size, and of extremely beautiful workmanship, bearing a head of Apollo on the obverse, with the words in minute characters, in two lines, by the side of the head, ΘΕΟΔΟΤΟΣ ΕΠΟΙΕΙ. Their discovery was first published by Abeken, in the Bullet. dell' Instit. Archeol. for 1839, Nos 8 and 9, pp. 137, 138, and they afterwards came into the possession of the Duc de Luynes, by whom they were again published in the Nouv. Annal. de l'Instit. Archéol., pl. xxxv. Nos. 25, 26. In style and type they are closely similar to the medals of Mausolus II. prince of Caria, and there can be no doubt that they belong to the same age, namely the middle of the fourth century B. C. They are valuable as affording one among other proofs of the fact, which has been contested, that medallists were sometimes permitted to inscribe their names upon coins executed by them. For this reason, and on account of their great beauty, M. Raoul-Rochette pronounces the opinion that they "ought to be ranked among the most precious archaeological discoveries of our age." (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 73, 97, 98, 2d edition. An engraving of the best preserved of these medals is given on the title-page of R. Rochette's work, Vignette 3.)

2. A Greek painter, lived at Rome in the time of Naevius, who mentions him in the following lines of his comedy entitled Tunicularia, which are preserved by Festus (s. v. Penem antiqui codam vocabant, p. 250, ed. Müller, p. 204, ed. Lindemann): —

> "Theodotum appellas, qui aras Compitalibus
> Sedens in cella circumtectus tegetibus
> Lares ludentes peni pinxit bubulo."

These verses describe a rude picture of the Lares at play, painted on an altar at the meeting of two streets, with a rude instrument, a brush made from the tail of an ox. The painting must, therefore, have resembled the daubs which are seen on the outer walls of the houses in Pompeii and Herculaneum, and those to which Juvenal refers in the line (Sat. viii. 157): —

> "Eponam et facies olida ad praesepia pictas;"

and the artist may be classed with those painters of vulgar subjects whom the Greeks called ῥυπαρογράφοι or ῥωπογράφοι, or with our sign painters. (See PYREICUS, and Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Pictura, p. 912, a. 2d ed.; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 416, 417; and, especially, the full discussion of this comparatively unnoticed fragment of Naevius, by Panofka, in the Rhein. Mus. for 1846, vol. iv. pp. 133—138: there is no ground for Bothe's alteration of the painter's name to Theodorus.) [P. S.]

THEODUNUS, the name given by Pococke (in his Latin Version of Abú-l-Faraj, Hist. Dynast. p. 128) to a Greek physician in the service of Hajáj Ibn Yúsuf, the general of the chalíf 'Abdu-l-Malek Ibn Merwán, in the seventh century after Christ. He is called in Arabic ثاودون, which Wüstenfeld renders Theodun (Gesch. der Arab. Aerzte, p. 9), but neither Theodun nor Theodunus seems to be a genuine Greek name. He left behind him a sort of medical compendium which he compiled for the use of his son, and which is probably not extant in any European library. One of the anecdotes told by Ibn Abí Osaibi'ah of Theodocus is by Abú-l-Faraj referred to Theodunus. [W. A. G.]

THEO'GENES (Θεογένης). 1. An Athenian, who, in B. C. 425, was appointed together with Cleon to repair to Pylos, and investigate the truth of the tidings, which had been brought thence, as to the difficulties of the blockade of Sphacteria. Cleon, however, prudently persuaded the people to abandon the proposed inquiry. (Thuc. iv. 27) [CLEON.] It is possible that this Theogenes should be identified with the person who is mentioned by Aristophanes (Vesp. 1183), and who, the scholiast tells us, was an Acharnian (Arnold, ad Thuc. l. c.). A man of the same name is satirized also by Aristophanes (Pax, 894) for his swinish propensities. (See also Arist. Av. 822, 1127, 1295, Lys. 63, with the Scholia.)

2. One of the Athenian ambassadors who set forth on their way to Dareius Nothus, in B. C. 408, under promise of a safe conduct from Pharnabazus. The satrap however detained them in custody at the instance of Cyrus, and he could not obtain leave to release them till after the lapse of three years. (Xen. Hell. i. 3. §§ 8, 9, 13, 4. §§ 6, 7; Plut. Alc. 31.) [PHARNABAZUS.] Whether this was the same Theogenes who was appointed one of the 30 tyrants in B. C. 404 (Xen. Hell. ii. 3. § 2) we have no means of deciding. [E. E.]

THEOGNE'TUS (Θεόγνητος), an athlete of Aegina, who is recorded as having gained the boys' prize for wrestling at the Olympic games. His statue at Olympia is noticed by Pausanias, (Pind. Pyth. viii. 50; Paus. vi. 9.) [E. E.]

THEOGNE'TUS (Θεόγνητος). 1. Of Thessaly, a poet, of unknown date, to whom some of the ancients ascribed the ἱεροὶ λόγοι, which others attributed to Orpheus. (Suid. s. v. Ὀρφεύς; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 161.)

2. An Athenian comic poet of the New Comedy, whose plays, entitled Φάσμα ἢ Φιλάργυρος, Φιλοδέσποτος, and Κένταυρος, are mentioned by Suidas, on the authority of Athenaeus. (Comp. Eudoc. p. 232.) In Athenaeus himself we find no mention of the Κένταυρος, but we have a fragment of ten lines from the Φιλοδέσποτος (Ath. xiv. p. 616, a.), and one of four lines from the Φάσμα ἢ Φιλάργυρος. (Ath. iii. p. 104, b., xv. p. 671, a.) There is some reason to suppose that Plautus borrowed his Mostellaria from the latter play. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 500; Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. p. 487, vol. iv. p. 549.) [P. S.]

THEOGNIS (Θέογνις). 1. Of Megara, an ancient elegiac and gnomic poet, whose reputed works form the most extensive collection of gnomic poetry, that has come down to us under any one name; but, unfortunately, the form in which these remains exist is altogether unsatisfactory. Most of our information respecting the poet's life is derived from his writings.

He was a native of Megara, the capital of Megaris (Harpocrat. s. v.; Suid. s. v.), not of Megara Hyblaea, in Sicily; as Harpocration (l. c.) justly argues from a line of his poetry (v. 783), in which he speaks of his going to Sicily, evidently as to a country which was not his native land, and as appears also from other passages of his writings. (See especially vv. 773, foll.) Harpocration is, however, in error, when he charges Plato with having fallen into a mistake, in making Theognis a citizen of Megara in Sicily (Leg. i. p. 630, a.); for we can have no hesitation in accepting the explanation of the Scholiast on Plato, that Theognis was a native of Megara in Greece, but received also the citizenship as an honour from the people of Megara Hyblaea, whom he is known to have visited, and for whom one of his elegies was composed, as is proved by internal evidence. From his own poems also we learn that, besides Sicily, he visited Euboea and Lacedaemon, and that in all these places he was hospitably received (vv. 783, foll.). The circumstances which led him to wander from his native city will presently appear.

The time at which Theognis flourished is expressly stated by several writers as the 58th or 59th Olympiad, B. C. 548 or 544. (Cyrill. adv. Julian. i. p. 13, a., vii. p. 225, c.; Euseb. Chron.; Suid. s. v.). It is evident, from passages in his poems, that he lived till after the commencement of the Persian wars, B. C. 490. These statements may be reconciled, by supposing that he was about eighty at the latter date, and that he was born about B. C. 570. (Clinton, F. H. s. a. 544.) Cyril (l. c.) and Suidas (s. v. Φωκυλίδης) make him contemporary with Phocylides of Miletus.

Both the life and writings of Theognis, like those of Alcaeus, are inseparably connected with the political events of his time and city. The little state of Megara had been for some time before the poet's birth the scene of great political convulsions. After shaking off the yoke of Corinth, it had remained for a time under the nobles, until about the year B. C. 630, when Theagenes, placing himself at the head of the popular party, acquired the tyranny of the state, from which he was again driven by a counter revolution, about B. C. 600 [THEAGENES]. The popular party, into whose hands the power soon fell again, governed temperately for a time, but afterwards they oppressed the noble and rich, entering their houses, and demanding to eat and drink luxuriously, and enforcing their demand when it was refused; and at last passing a decree that the interest paid on money lent should be refunded (παλιντοκία, Plut. Quaest. Graec. 18, p. 295). They also banished many of the chief men of the city; but the exiles returned, and restored the oligarchy. (Arist. Polit. v. 4. § 3.) Several such revolutions and counter-revolutions appear to have followed one another; but we are not informed of their dates. (Grote, Hist. of Greece, vol. iii. p. 60.) Theognis was born and spent his life in the midst of these convulsions, to which a large portion of his poetry relates, most of that portion having evidently been composed at a time when the oligarchical party was oppressed and in exile. To this party Theognis himself belonged, and in its fates he shared. He was a noble by birth; and all his sympathies were with the nobles. They are, in his poems, the ἀγαθοί and ἐσθλοί, and the commons the κακοί and δειλοί, terms which, in fact, at that period, were regularly used in this political signification, and not in their later ethical meaning.*

It would seem that, in that particular revolution, from which Theognis suffered, there had been a division of the property of the nobles, in which he lost his all, and was cast out as an exile, barely escaping with his life, "like a dog who throws every thing away in order to cross a torrent;" and that he had also to complain of treachery on the part of certain friends in whom he had trusted. In his verses he pours out his indignation upon his enemies, "whose black blood he would even drink." He laments the folly of the bad pilots by whom the vessel of the state had been often wrecked, and speaks of the common people with unmeasured contumely. Amidst all these outbursts of passion, we find some very interesting descriptions of the social change which the revolution had effected. It had rescued the country population from a condition of abject poverty and serfdom, and given them a share in the government. "Cyrnus," he exclaims, "this city is still a city, but the people are others, who formerly knew nothing of courts of justice or of laws, but wore goat-skins about their ribs, and dwelt without this city, like timid deer. And now they are the good (ἀγαθοί); and those who were formerly noble (ἐσθλοί) are now the mean (δειλοί): who can endure to see these things?" (vv. 53—58, ed. Bergk.) The intercourse of common life, and the new distribution of property, were rapidly breaking down the old aristocracy of birth, and raising up in its place an aristocracy of wealth. "They honour riches, and the good marries the daughter of the bad, and the bad the daughter of the good, wealth confounds the race (ἔμιξε γένος). Thus, wonder not that the race of citizens loses its brightness, for good things are confounded with bad." (vv. 189—192.) These complaints of the debasement of the nobles by their intermixture with the commons are embittered by a personal feeling; for he had been rejected by the parents of the girl he loved, and she had been given in marriage to a person of far inferior rank (πολλὸν ἐμοῦ κακίων); but Theognis believes that her affections are still fixed on him (vv. 261—266). He distrusts the stability of the new order of things, and points to a new despotism as either established or just at hand.

* For a full illustration of the meanings of these words, see Welcker's Prolegomena ad Theogn., and an excellent note in Grote's History of Greece, vol. iii. p. 62:—"The ethical meaning of these words is not absolutely unknown, yet rare, in Theognis: it gradually grew up at Athens, and became popularized by the Socratic school of philosophers as well as by the orators. But the early or political meaning always remained, and the fluctuation between the two has been productive of frequent misunderstanding. Constant attention is necessary, when we read the expressions οἱ ἀγαθοί, ἐσθλοί, βελτιστοί, καλοκἀγαθοί, χρηστοί, &c., or on the other hand, οἱ κακοί, δειλοί, &c., to examine whether the context is such as to give to them the ethical or the political meaning." Mr. Grote also illustrates the similar use of boni, mali, optimates, and optimus quisque, from Sallust (Hist. Frag. i. p. 935, Cort.) and Cicero (De Rep. i. 34, pro Sext. 45).

Most of these political verses are addressed to a certain Cyrnus, the son of Polypas; for it is now generally admitted that the same Πολυπαΐδης, which has been sometimes supposed to refer to a different person, is to be understood as a patronymic, and as applying to Cyrnus. From the verses themselves, as well as from the statements of the ancient writers, it appears that Cyrnus was a young man towards whom Theognis cherished a firm friendship, and even that tender regard, that pure and honourable παιδεραστία, which often bound together men of different ages in the Dorian states (vv. 253, foll., 655, 820, 1051, foll.; Suid. s. v. Θέογνις; Phot. Lex. s. v. Κύρνος). From one passage (805, foll.) it appears that Cyrnus was old enough, and of sufficient standing in the city, to be sent to Delphi as a sacred envoy (θεωρός) to bring back an oracle, which the poet exhorts him to preserve faithfully. There is another fragment, also of a political character, but in a different tone, addressed to a certain Simonides; in which the revolution itself is described in guarded language, which indicates the sense of present danger; while in the verses addressed to Cyrnus the change is presupposed, and the poet speaks out his feelings, as one who has nothing more to fear or hope for.

The other fragments of the poetry of Theognis are of a social, most of them of a festive character. They "place us in the midst of a circle of friends, who formed a kind of eating society, like the philitia of Sparta, and like the ancient public tables of Megara itself." (Müller, p. 123.) All the members of this society belonged to the class whom the poet calls "the good." He addresses them, like Cyrnus and Simonides, by their names, Onomacritus, Clearistus, Democles, Demonax, and Timagoras, in passages which are probably fragments of distinct elegies, and in which allusion is made to their various characters and adventures; and he refers, as also in his verses addressed to Cyrnus, to the fame conferred upon them by the introduction of their names in his poems, both at other places, where already in his own time his elegies were sung at banquets, and in future ages. A good account of these festive elegies is given in the following passage from Muller:—"The poetry of Theognis is full of allusions to symposia: so that from it a clear conception of the outward accompaniments of the elegy may be formed. When the guests were satisfied with eating, the cups were filled for the solemn libation; and at this ceremony a prayer was offered to the gods, especially to Apollo, which in many districts of Greece was expanded into a paean. Here began the more joyous and noisy part of the banquet, which Theognis (as well as Pindar) calls in general κῶμος, although this word in a narrower sense also signified the tumultuous throng of the guests departing from the feast. Now the Comos was usually accompanied with the flute: hence Theognis speaks in so many places of the accompaniment of the flute-player to the poems sung in the intervals of drinking; while the lyre and cithara (or phorminx) are rarely mentioned, and then chiefly in reference to the song at the libation. And this was the appropriate occasion for the elegy, which was sung by one of the guests to the sound of a flute, being either addressed to the company at large, or (as is always the case in Theognis) to a single guest." (p. 124.) Schneidewin traces a marked distinction in the style and spirit of those portions of the poems of Theognis, which he composed in his youth and prosperity, and those which he wrote in his mature age, and when misfortunes had come upon him.

As to the form in which the poems of Theognis were originally composed, and that in which the fragments of them have come down to us, there is a wide field for speculation. The ancients had a collection of elegiac poetry, under his name, which they sometimes mention as ἐλέγεια, and sometimes as ἔπη, and which they regarded as chiefly, if not entirely, of a gnomic character. (Plat. Menon. p. 95, d.) Xenophon says that "this poet discourses of nothing else but respecting the virtue and vice of men, and his poetry is a treatise (σύγγραμμα) concerning men, just as if any one skilled in horsemanship were to write a treatise about horsemanship." (Xenoph. ap. Stob. Floruleg. lxxxviii.) To the same effect Isocrates mentions Hesiod, Theognis, and Phocylides, as confessedly those who have given the best advice respecting human life (καὶ γὰρ τούτους φασὶ μὲν ἀρίστους γεγενῆσθαι συμβούλους τῷ βίῳ τῷ τῶν ἀνθρώπων); and, from the context, it may be inferred that the works of these poets were used in Greek education (Isocrat. ad Nicocl. 42, p. 23, b). Suidas (s. v.) enumerates, as his works, an Elegy εἰς τοὺς σωθέντας τῶν Συρακουσίων ἐν τῇ πολιορκίᾳ (see Welcker, Prolog. p. xv.); Gnomic Elegies, to the amount of 2800 verses (γνῶμαι δι' ἐλεγείας εἰς ἔπη βω'); a Gnomology in elegiac verse, and other hortatory counsels, addressed to Cyrnus (καὶ πρὸς Κύρνον, τὸν αὐτοῦ ἐρώμενον, Γνωμολογίαν δι' ἐλεγείων καὶ ἑτέρας ὑποθήκας παραινετικάς). Suidas adds, that these poems were all of the epic form (τὰ πάντα ἐπικῶς), a phrase which can only be explained by taking the word epic in that wide sense, of which we have several other instances, one of which (Plat. Men. p. 95, d.) has been noticed above, as including poems in the elegiac verse; for all the remains of Theognis which we possess are elegiac, and there is no sufficient reason to suppose that he wrote any epic poems, properly so called, or even any gnomic poems in hexameter verse. Had he done so, the fact would surely have been indicated by the occasional appearance of consecutive hexameters in the gnomic extracts from his poems. The passage of Plato (l. c.), sometimes quoted to show that he wrote epic poetry, seems to us to prove, if anything, the very opposite. The poems, which have come down to us, consist of 1389 elegiac verses, consisting of gnomic sentences and paragraphs, of one or more couplets; which vary greatly in their style and subjects, and which are evidently extracted from a number of separate poems. Even in the confused account of Suidas we trace indications of the fact, that the poetry of Theognis consisted of several distinct elegies. In what state the collection was in the time of Suidas, we have not sufficient evidence to determine; but, comparing his article with his well-known method of putting together the information which he gathered from various sources, we suspect that the work which he calls Γνῶμαι δι' ἐλεγείας εἰς ἔπη βώ, was a collection similar to that which has come down to us, though more extensive, and with which Suidas himself was probably acquainted, and that he copied the other titles from various writers, without caring to inquire whether the poems to which they referred were included in the great collection. Xenophon, in the passage above cited, refers to a collection of the poetry of Theognis; though not, as some have supposed, to a continuous gnomic poem; and it is evident that the collection referred to by Xenophon was different from that which has come down to us, as the lines quoted by him as its commencement are now found in the MSS. as vv. 183—190.

The manner in which the original collection was formed, and the changes by which it has come into its present state, can be explained by a very simple theory, perfectly consistent with all the facts of the case, in the following manner.

Theognis wrote numerous elegies, political, convivial, affectionate, and occasional, addressed to Cyrnus, and to his other friends. In a very short time these poems would naturally be collected, and arranged according to their subjects, and according to the persons to whom they were addressed; but at what precise period this was done we are unable to determine: the collection may have been partly made during the poet's life, and even by himself; but we may be sure that it would not be left undone long after his death.

In this collection, the distinction of the separate poems in each great division would naturally be less and less regarded, on account of the uniformity of the metre, the similarity of the subjects, and—in the case especially of those addressed to Cyrnus—the perpetual recurrence of the same name in the different poems. Thus the collection would gradually be fused into one body, and, first each division of it, and then perhaps the whole, would assume a form but little different from that of a continuous poem. Even before this had happened, however, the decidedly gnomic spirit of the poems, and their popularity on that account (see Isocr. l. c.), would give rise to the practice of extracting from them couplets and paragraphs, containing gnomic sentiments; and these, being chosen simply for the sake of the sentiment contained in each individual passage, would be arranged in any order that accident might determine, without reference to the original place and connection of each extract, and without any pains being taken to keep the passages distinct. Thus was formed a single and quasi-continuous body of gnomic poetry, which of course has been subjected to the common fates of such collections; interpolations from the works of other gnomic poets, and omissions of passages which really belonged to Theognis; besides the ordinary corruptions of critics and transcribers. Whatever questions may be raised as to matters of detail, there can be very little doubt that the so-called poems of Theognis have been brought into their present state by some such process as that which has been now described.

In applying this theory to the restoration of the extant fragments of Theognis to something like their ancient arrangement, Welcker, to whom we are indebted for the whole discovery, proceeds in the following manner. First, he rejects all those verses which we have the positive authority of ancient writers for assigning to other poets, such as Tyrtaeus, Mimnermus, Solon, and others; provided, of course, that the evidence in favour of those poets preponderates over that on the ground of which the verses have been assigned to Theognis. Secondly, he rejects all passages which can be proved to be merely parodies of the genuine gnomes of Theognis, a species of corruption which he discusses with great skill (pp. lxxx. foll.). Thirdly, he collects those passages which refer to certain definite persons, places, seasons, and events, like the epigrams of later times; of these he considers some to be the productions of Theognis, but others manifest additions. His next class is formed of the convivial portions of the poetry; in which the discrimination of what is genuine from what is spurious is a matter of extreme difficulty. Fifthly, he separates all those paragraphs which are addressed to Polypaïdes; and here there can be no doubt that he has fallen into an error, through not perceiving the fact above referred to, as clearly established by other writers, that that word is a patronymic, and only another name for Cyrnus. Lastly, he removes from the collection the verses which fall under the denomination of παιδικά, for which Suidas censures the poet; but, if we understand these passages as referring to the sort of intercourse which prevailed among the Dorians, many of them admit of the best interpretation and may safely be assigned to Theognis, though there are others, of a less innocent character, which we must regard as the productions of later and more corrupt ages. The couplets which remain are fragments from the elegies of Theognis, mostly addressed to Cyrnus, and referring to the events of the poet's life and times, and the genuineness of which may, for the most part, be assumed; though, even among these, interpolations may very probably have taken place, and passages actually occur of a meaning so nearly identical, that they can hardly be supposed to have been different passages in the works of the same poet, but they seem rather to have been derived from different authors by some compiler who was struck by their resemblance.

The poetical character of Theognis may be judged of, to a great extent, from what has already been said, and it is only necessary to add that his genuine fragments contain much that is highly poetical in thought, and elegant as well as forcible in expression.

The so-called remains of Theognis were first printed in the Aldine collection, Venet. 1495, fol., mentioned under THEOCRITUS (p. 1034, b.), then in the several collections of the gnomic poets published during the 16th century. (See Hoffmann, Lex. Bibliogr. s. v.) Of several other old editions, the most important are, that of Jo. Lodov. Tiletanus, Paris, 1537, 4to.: that of El. Vinet. Santo, Paris, 1543, 4to.: that of Joachim Camerarius, who was the first to discover that the collection was not a single work by a single author, and whose edition is still very valuable for its critical and explanatory notes; its full title is, Libellus scolasticus utilis, et valde bonus, quo continentur, Theognidis praecepta, Pythagorae versus aurei, Phocylidae Praecepta, Solonis, Tyrtaei, Simonidis, et Callimachi quaedam Carmina, collecta et explicata a Joachimo Camerario Pabepergen, Basil. 1551, 8vo.: that of Melanchthon, with his Explicatio, or exposition of the author, delivered in his lectures at the University of Wittemberg, Witeberg, 1560, 8vo.; often reprinted, but without the Explicatio: that of Seber, who used three MSS. which had not been collated before, but whose edition is inaccurately printed, Lips. 1603, 8vo.; reprinted more accurately, 1620, 8vo., but this edition is very rare: that of Sylburg, with the other gnomic poets, Ultraject. 1651, 12mo.; reprinted, 1748, 12mo.: that of H. G. Just, Francof. et Lips. 1710, 8vo.: that of Fischern, with a German translation, Altenburg, 1739, 8vo.: that in the edition of Callimachus, the editorship of which is doubtful, Lond. 1741, 8vo. (see Hoffmann, s. v. Callimachus): and that of Bandini, with a metrical Italian version, Florent. 1766, 8vo. There are two standard modern editions; that of Imm. Bekker, who has preserved the order of the MSS., Lips. 1815, and 2d ed. 1827, 8vo.; and that of Welcker, who has re-arranged the verses in the manner explained above, Francof. 1826, 8vo.: there is also an edition of the text, with critical notes, by J. Casp. Orellius, Turic. 1840, 4to. The poems are also contained in several of the ancient collections of the Greek poets, besides those of the gnomic poets already referred to (see Hoffmann), and in the following modern collections: Brunck's Gnomici Poetae Graeci, Argentorat. 1784, 8vo., reprinted 1817, 8vo.; also reprinted, for the use of colleges and schools, by Schaefer, Lips. 1817, 12mo., and in the Tauchnitz Classics, 1815, 1829, 32mo.; Gaisford's Poetae Minores Graeci, Oxon. 1814—1820, Lips. 1823, 8vo.; Boissonade's Poetae Graeci Gnomici, Paris, 1823, 32mo.; Schneidewin's Delectus Poesis Graecorum, Gotting. 1838, 8vo.; and Bergk's Poetae Lyrici Graeci, Lips. 1843, 8vo. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 704, foll.; Welcker, Prolegomena ad Theognidem, comp. the Review by Geel, in the Bibl. Crit. Nov. vol. iv. pp. 209—245; Schneidewin, Theogn. Eleg. Philologie, 1844, vol. i. p. 41, in which periodical also will be found references to several recent papers in the German periodicals on matters relating to Theognis: for an account of other illustrative works, see Hoffmann, Lex. Bibliogr. s. v.)

2. A tragic poet, contemporary with Aristophanes, who mentions him only in three passages, but they are rich ones. In the first (Acharn. 11) Dicaeopolis mentions, as one of his miseries, that, when he was sitting in the theatre, gaping for a tragedy of Aeschylus, the crier shouted, "Theognis, lead in your chorus:" in another, illustrating the connection between the characters of poets and their works, Aristophanes says (Thesm. 168), and in the third, he describes the frigid character of his compositions by the witticism, that once the whole of Thrace was covered with snow, and the rivers were frozen, at the very time when Theognis was exhibiting a tragedy at Athens (Acharn. 138). This joke is no doubt the foundation for the statement of the scholiast that Theognis was so frigid a poet as to obtain the nickname of Χιών (Schol. ad Acharn. 11; copied by Suidas, s. v.). It would seem from a passage of Suidas (s. v. Νικόμαχος) that, on one occasion, Theognis gained the third prize, in competition with Euripides and Nicomachus. It is stated by the scholiast on Aristophanes, by Harpocration (s. v.), and by Suidas (s. v.), on the authority of Xenophon, in the 2d Book of the Hellenics, that Theognis was one of the Thirty Tyrants; and perhaps, therefore, the name Θεογένης, in the passage of Xenophon referred to (Hell. ii. 3. § 2), should be altered to Θέογνις. According to these statements Theognis began to exhibit tragedies before the date of the Acharnians, B. C. 425, and continued his poetical career down to the date of the Thesmophoriazusae, B. C. 411, and was still conspicuous in public life in B. C. 404.

Two lines are referred to by some writers, as quoted from a tragedy of Theognis, entitled Θυέστης, by Stobaeus (xcii. 5); but a careful examination of the passage shows that it refers to the Thyestes of Euripides. We have, however, one line from Theognis, quoted by Demetrius (de Eloc. 85):

Παρατίθεται τὸ τόξον, φόρμιγγ' ἄχορδον.

The metaphor in this line is referred to by Aristotle (Rhet. iii. 11), in conjunction with an equally bold one from Timotheus which Aristotle mentions also in other passages (Rhet. iii. 4; Poët. xxi. 12); whence Tyrwhitt, Hermann, and Ritter (ad Arist. Poët. l. c.) have fallen into the error of ascribing the former metaphor also to Timotheus, instead of Theognis. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 324; Welcker, die Griech. Trag. pp. 1006, 1007; Kayser, Hist. Crit. Trag. Graec. pp. 325, 326; Wagner, Frag. Trag. Graec. pp. 92, 93, in Didot's Bibliotheca Scriptorum Graecorum).

3. The author of a work περὶ τῶν ἐν Ῥόδῳ θυσιῶν, from the second book of which is a quotation made by Athenaeus (viii. p. 360, b.; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 504, ed. Westermann). [P. S.]

THEOGNOSTUS (Θεόγνωστος). 1. A Christian writer, a native of Alexandria, the author of a work entitled τοῦ μακαρίου Θεογνώστου Ἀλεξανδρέως καὶ ἐξηγητοῦ ὑποτυπώσεις. Photius, who speaks in very disrespectful terms of him, gives a brief account of the contents of the work. (Cod. 106.) It seems, from what he says, that Theognostus closely followed Origenes. The style is described by Photius as being of a very inferior description. Athanasius, however, speaks in much higher terms of Theognostus. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 709.)

2. A Byzantine grammarian, who lived at the beginning of the ninth century after Christ. He was the author of a work on prosody, which is still extant in manuscript, addressed to the emperor Leo, the Armenian. He also wrote a history of the reign of Michael II., surnamed the Stammerer, the successor of Leo. (Villoison, Anecd. Graec. vol. ii. p. 127; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 350.) [C. P. M.]

THEO'LYTUS (Θεόλυτος), of Methymna, in Lesbos, an epic poet of an unknown, but certainly not an early period, who is mentioned once by the Scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius, and twice by Athenaeus. The latter author, in one passage (vii. p. 296, a, b.) quotes three lines from his Βακχικὰ ἔπη, that is, an epic poem on the adventures of Dionysus, to whose contest with the sea-god Glaucus, his rival in the love of Ariadne, the lines quoted by Athenaeus refer. The other reference to Theolytus is a quotation from him, ἐν δευτέρῳ Ὥρων (Ath. xi. p. 470, c.), not Ὡρῶν, as the reading was before Schweighäuser, who shows that here, and in other references to similar works, the genitive is not that of ὥρα, but of ὧρος, a word of the same meaning as ὥρα, but used in the plural in the specific sense of Annals. (See Liddell and Scott, and Seiler and Jacobitz, s. v.) Another correction made by Schweighäuser in this latter passage is the restoration of the true form of the poet's name, which Casaubon had altered to Θεόκλυτος. (Plehn, Lesbiaca, p. 201.) [P. S.]

THEO'MEDON (Θεομέδων), a physician who accompanied Eudoxus the astronomer and physician in his first visit to Athens, about the year B. C. 386, and who supported him while he was attending Plato's lectures in that city. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 8. § 86.) [W. A. G.]

THEOMESTOR (Θεομήστωρ), a Samian, son of Androdamas, commanded a vessel in the Persian fleet at Salamis (B. C. 480), and for his services in that battle was made tyrant of Samos by Xerxes. (Herod. viii. 85, ix. 90.) [E. E.]

THEOMNASTUS, one of the instruments of Verres in his oppression of the Sicilians. (Cic. Verr. ii. 21, 51, iv. 66.)

THEOMNESTUS (Θεόμνηστος), one of the Greek writers on veterinary surgery, who may perhaps have lived in the fourth or fifth century after Christ. None of his works remain, but some fragments are to be found in the collection of writers on veterinary surgery, first published in Latin by John Ruellius, 1530, fol. Paris, and afterwards in Greek by Simon Grynaeus, 1537, 4to. Basil. [W. A. G.]

THEOMNESTUS (Θεόμνηστος), artists. 1. A statuary of Sardis, of unknown time, who made the statue of the Olympic victor Ageles of Chios. (Paus. vi. 15. § 2.) He may safely be identified with the Theomnestus mentioned by Pliny among those who made athletas et armatos et venatores sacrificantesque (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 34).

2. A sculptor, the son of Theotimus, flourished in Chios, under the early Roman emperors, as we learn from a Chian inscription, in which his name occurs as the maker, in conjunction with Dionysius, the son of Astius, of the monument erected to the memory of Claudius Asclepiades, a freedman of the emperor, by his wife, Claudia Tertulla. (Murator. vol. ii. p. mxiv. 11; Boeckh, Corp. Inscr. No. 2241, vol. ii. p. 210; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 417, 418, 2d ed.)

3. A painter, contemporary with Apelles. All that is known of him is contained in the statement of Pliny, that Mnason, the tyrant (of Elateia), gave him one hundred minae apiece for certain pictures, each of which represented a single hero. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 10. s. 36. § 21.) [P. S.]

THEON (Θέων). Of three of this name whose writings yet remain, two are mathematicians who are often confounded together. The first is Theon the elder, of Smyrna, best known as an arithmetician, who lived in the time of Hadrian. The second is Theon the younger, of Alexandria, the father of HYPATIA, best known as an astronomer and geometer, who lived in the time of Theodosius the elder. Both were heathens, a fact which the date of the second makes it desirable to state; and each held the Platonism of his period. The confusion would probably be avoided, if they were named after their leaders in science: they would then be called Theon the Pythagorean, and Theon the Ptolemaist.

The date of "Theon of Smyrna the philosopher," to quote in full the account which Suidas gives of him, depends upon the assumption (which there seems no reason to dispute) that he is the Theon whom Ptolemy and the younger Theon mention as having made astronomical observations in the time of Hadrian. Theon of Smyrna certainly wrote on astronomy. On the assumption just made, Ptolemy has preserved his observations of Mercury and Venus (A. D. 129—133). Bouillaud supposes that it is Theon of Smyrna to whom Proclus alludes as having written on the genealogies of Solon and Plato, and Plutarch as having written on the lunar spots. (See Bouillaud's preface, or the quotations in Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 35.)

All that we have left is a portion of a work entitled, Τῶν κατὰ μαθηματικὴν χρησίμων εἰς τὴν τοῦ Πλάτωνος ἀνάγνωσιν. The portion which now exists is in two books, one on arithmetic, and one on music: there was a third on astronomy, and a fourth Περὶ τῆς ἐν κόσμῳ ἁρμονίας. The work on arithmetic is of the same character as that of NICOMACHUS; and as both these writers name Thrasyllus, and neither names the other, it may be supposed that the two were nearly contemporary. The book on music is on the simplest application of arithmetic. The two books were published by Bouillaud, from a manuscript in De Thou's library, Paris, 1644, quarto (Gr. Lat.). The book on arithmetic has been recently published, with Bouillaud's Latin, various readings, and new notes, by Professor J. J. de Gelder, Leyden, 1827, 8vo: the preface is the fullest disquisition on Theon which exists. We may refer to it for an account of the bust which was found in Smyrna by Fouquier, with the inscription ΘΕΩΝΑΠΛΑΤΩΝ ΙΚΟΝΦΙΛΟϹΟΦΟΝΟΙΕΡΕΥϹΘΕΩΝΤΟΝΠΑΤΕΡΑ, now in the museum at Rome. There are scattered notices (for which see De Gelder) by which it seems that Theon had written other works: a manuscript headed θεολογούμενα is mentioned as attributed to him, which is probably only the work known under that name, with an assumed authorship. Bouillaud mentions an astronomical fragment which he found; and also the assertion of Isaac Vossius, made to him, that an astronomical treatise existed in the Ambrosian library at Milan.

Of the life of Theon of Alexandria, called the younger (described by Suidas as ὁ ἐκ τοῦ μουσείου), nothing is known except the melancholy history of his daughter HYPATIA. We shall now take the various writings to which his name is attached, in order.

1. Scholia on Aratus. Of these there are at least two sets, the second first printed by Buhle, in his edition, as emendatiora. Grotius is of opinion that the first are not the work of Theon, but of several hands: this he infers from their containing repetitions and contradictions, which is not a very safe premise for the conclusion. Kuster (Suidas, s. v.) attributes them, without reason given, rather to Theon the sophist. That they are unworthy of the astronomer, is true enough; but rejections made on such a ground are dangerous things. These scholia were printed in the Aldine* edition of Aratus, in that of Valder's collection [PTOLEMAEUS, p. 573], in Morell's edition, Paris, 1559, 4to., in Fell's, Oxford, 1672, 8vo, and also in Buhle's. Halma, in his edition (Gr. Fr.) Paris, 1822, 4to, has given selections, which his critics have asserted to be very ill chosen. (Hoffman, Lexic. Bibliogr. vol. i. p. 233).

2. Edition of Euclid. Of the manner in which Theon is asserted to have edited Euclid we have already said enough. [EUCLEIDES, pp. 68, b, 69, b, 70, a.]

3. Εἰς τὴν τοῦ Πτολεμαίου μεγάλην σύνταξιν ὑπομνημάτων βιβλία ια'. This is the great work of Theon, the commentary on the Almagest, addressed to his son Epiphanius. But the Almagest has thirteen books, while Theon's commentary is marked as having only eleven. The commentary on the third book has not come down to us with the name of Theon, but with that of Nicolas Cabacillas; and those on the tenth and eleventh books are joined together. The commentary on the later books is obviously mutilated by time; for a circumstance connected with that on the fifth book, see PAPPUS. On this commentary, Delambre (who has given a full account of it, Hist. Astron. Anc. vol. ii. pp. 550—616) passes the following judgment: "Theon commences by announcing that he will not follow the example of ordinary commentators, who show themselves very learned on passages which offer no difficulty, and are silent upon all which would give trouble to understand or to explain. He has not always kept this promise; I have often referred for information, and I have only found Ptolemy's words faithfully copied or slightly modified. It is a paraphrase which may give some explanation of methods, but which really presents nothing which a little attention would not find in the text, none of those lost traditions, which must then have existed at the Observatory of Alexandria, nothing new upon the instruments or the method of using them. Theon seems to know no one but Ptolemy and to have read nothing but the Syntaxis....... This commentary is not what could have been made then, nor even what could have been made now."

We have mentioned in the article PTOLEMAEUS all the editions of the commentary which accompany those of the text. The only separate edition (if it be right so to call it) is that of Halma, forming a continuation of the four volumes already mentioned in PTOLEMAEUS. It includes only the commentary on the first and second books (Gr. Fr.) in two volumes, quarto, Paris, 1821 and 1822.

4. Commentary on the manual tables of Ptolemy. Knowledge of this work is very recent, and as it involves a work of Ptolemy himself which we have not mentioned in its place, a few words of explanation will be necessary. It was long known that certain unpublished tables (as they were called) of Theon existed in manuscript: and there is in Fabricius and others a frequent confusion of these tables with the chronological table presently mentioned. Not but what accurate information might have been found. Kuster, speaking of an emendation of Suidas, who attributes to Theon a work εἰς τὸν Πτολεμαίου πρόχειρον κανόνα, says that Theon wrote a commentary on the canon of Ptolemy, which canon existed in manuscript in the Imperial library. Delambre found a manuscript in the Royal Library at Paris, which he has described (Hist. Astr. Anc. vol. ii. p. 616) under the head Θέωνος Ἀλεξανδρέως κάνονες πρόχειροι. Tables manuelles de Théon d'Alexandrie. This work was afterwards published by Halma, but under the title "Commentaire de Théon... sur les tables manuelles astronomiques de Ptolémée," in three parts, Paris, 1822, 1823, 1825, 4to. Having only very recently seen this last work, we have only as recently known that there is a distinct work of Ptolemy himself, the κάνονες πρόχειροι. Ptolemy's part is addressed to Syrus; Theon's to his son Epiphanius. The contents are, prolegomena, tables of latitude and longitude, and a collection of astronomical tables, somewhat more extensive than those in the syntaxis. The prolegomena are separately headed; one set is given to Ptolemy, another to Theon. But the tables themselves are headed Πτολεμαίου Θέωνος, καὶ Ὑπατίας πρόχειροι κάνονες. Dodwell had previously printed a fragment of the prolegomena in his "Dissertationes Cyprianae," Oxford, 1684, 8vo.

5. The continuation of the regal canon [PTOLEMAEUS, p. 572] down to his own time is attributed to Theon. In the manual tables it is carried down to the fall of the Eastern empire with the heading Πτολεμαίου, Θέωνος, κ. τ. λ. A very full dissertation on this canon is to be found in an anonymous work "Observationes in Theonis Fastos Graecos priores." Amsterdam 1735, quarto.

The list of works attributed to Theon of Alexandria by Suidas is Μαθηματικά, Ἀριθμητικά, Περὶ σημείων καὶ σκοπῆς ὀρνέων καὶ τῆς τῶν κοράκων φωνῆς, Περὶ τῆς τοῦ κυνὸς ἐπιτολῆς, Περὶ τῆς τοῦ Νείλου ἀναβάσεως, Εἰς τὸν Πτολεμαίου πρόχειρον κανόνα, εἰς τὸν μικρὸν Ἀστρολάβον ὑπόμνημα. In the last, Fabricius proposes to read ἀστρολόγον, taking the work to be a commentary on the collection of minor writers, which went by the name of the lesser Syntaxis. (Fabricius, Halma, Delambre, &c. opp. citt. edit. citat.) [A. De M.]

THEON (Θέων), literary. 1. A grammarian, who taught at Rome in the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius, and was succeeded by Apion. (Suid. s. v. Ἀπίων.) He was the author of a Lexicon to the Greek comedians (Κωμικαὶ λέξεις), which is quoted by Hesychius in the Prooemium to his Lexicon. (Also, s. v. Σιίταλοι: see Ruhnken, Praef. ad Hesych. pp. ix. foll.) It is doubtful whether he was the author of the comic lexicon quoted by the Scholiast to Apollonius Rhodius (iv. pp. 280, 305). He is one of the authors from whose works the

* This Aldine edition, Venice, 1499, folio, is not a separate work, but part of what is frequently catalogued as Scriptores Astronomici Veteres, containing Julius Firmicus, Manilius, &c. as well as Aratus.

Scholia to Aristophanes were derived. A Commentary on the Odyssey by a certain Theon is quoted in the Etymologicum Magnum (s. v. πέλος). In one of the Scholia on Aristophanes (Nub. 397), the genuineness of which, however, is doubtful (see Dindorf, Annot. ad loc.), Theon is mentioned as one of the commentators on Apollonius Rhodius. It is very possible, however, that one or both of these Commentaries on Homer and Apollonius, should be assigned to Aelius Theon, of Alexandria, No. 5, below. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 525, vol. ii. p. 500, vol. vi. p. 380.)

2. A later grammarian, the contemporary and friend of Plutarch, in whose Quaestiones Convivales he is often mentioned.

3. Of Alexandria, a Stoic philosopher, who flourished under Augustus, later than Areios, and wrote a Commentary on Apollodorus's Introduction to Physiology, τῆς Ἀπολλοδώρου φυσιολογικῆς εἰσαγωγῆς ὑπόμνημα, and three books on Rhetoric, περὶ τεχνῶν ῥητορικῶν βιβλία γ'. (Suid. s. v.)

4. Of Antioch, a Stoic philosopher, wrote a Defence of Socrates, Ἀπολογία Σωκράτους. (Suid. s. v.)

5. Aelius Theon, of Alexandria, a sophist and rhetorician, wrote a treatise on Rhetoric (τέχνη), a work περὶ προγυμνασμάτων (or, as some scholars read the text of Suidas, the words τέχνη περὶ προγυμνασμάτων form only one title), Commentaries on Xenophon, Isocrates, and Demosthenes, Rhetorical Themes (ῥητορικαὶ ὑποθέσεις), Questions respecting the Composition of Language (ζητήματα περὶ συντάξεως λόγου), and numerous other works (Suid. s. v.; Eudoc. p. 231). The Προγυμνάσματα is still extant. It is an excellent and useful treatise on the proper system of preparation for the profession of an orator, according to the rules laid down by Hermogenes and Aphthonius. It was first printed, in Greek only, by Angelus Barbatus, Romae, 1520, 4to; again, with an amended text and a Latin version, by Joachim Camerarius, Basil. 1541, 8vo; by Dan. Heinsius, from the Elzevir press, Lugd. Bat. 1626, 8vo; by Joan. Schefferus, with the Progymnasmata of Aphthonius, Upsal. 1670 or 1680, 8vo.; and recently, with the Scholia, Notes, and Indices, by C. E. Finckh, Stuttgard. 1834, 8vo. and also in Walz's Rhetores Graeci, vol. i. pp. 137, foll. Küster (ad Suid. s. v.) thinks that Aelius Theon was the author of the Commentary on Apollonius, mentioned above (No. 1), and also of the extant Scholia on Aratus, which others refer to the father of Hypatia. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. pp. 97, 98; Hoffmann, Lexicon Bibliogr. Scriptor. Graecorum, s. v.)

6. Valerius Theon, a sophist, who wrote a Commentary on Andocides (Suid. s. v.), from which the suspicion arises that he is the same person as the preceding, and that there is some confusion between the names Aelius and Valerius.

7. Of Sidon, a son of the sophist Gymnasius, and himself a sophist, taught in his native city, under Constantine the Great, who conferred upon him the dignities of consul and praefect. (Suid. s. v.)

8. A sophist and rhetorician, who was the instructor of Damascius in oratory. (Phot. Bibl. Cod. 181, p. 126, b. 40, ed. Bekker.) He must therefore have flourished at the end of the fifth and the beginning of the sixth centuries of our era. Some particulars respecting him are preserved, from Damascius, by Photius (Cod. 242, p. 339, b. 7), and by Suidas (s. v.), who tells us that Theon was the descendant of S. Marcella, and the son and pupil of Ecdicius. The passage of Damascius, quoted by Photius, is to the effect that Theon was naturally somewhat obtuse, but so fond of learning and so laborious was he, that he acquired the most perfect knowledge of the ancient poets and orators, and the most thorough technical acquaintance with the art of both; but he was never able, though very desirous, to reduce his knowledge to practice, and to write either poems or orations. His only work known to Suidas was a Treatise on Rhetoric, τέχνη ῥητορική.

A list of some other persons of this name is given by Fabricius. (Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. pp. 98, 99). [P. S.]

THEON (Θέων), the name of three physicians: — 1. A native of Alexandria (Galen, De San. Tu. iii. 3, vol. vi. p. 182), who was originally an athleta, and afterwards a gymnasta (ibid. ii. 4. p. 114); and who wrote two works on the subject of gymnastics, one entitled Περὶ τῶν κατὰ Μέρος Γυμνασίων, De Particularibus Exercitiis, the other Περὶ τῶν Γυμναστικῶν, De Gymnasticis (ibid. iii. 8. pp. 208, 209). These works are several times mentioned by Galen, but are not now extant. With respect to Theon's date, it can only be positively determined that he lived after Hippocrates (ibid. ii. 4. p. 105), and before Galen; but, as Galen does not speak of him as having lived shortly before his own time, he may perhaps be placed in the third or second century B. C.

2. A physician who acquired some reputation in Gaul in the latter half of the fourth century after Christ. (Eunap. Vit. Ionici.)

3. A physician of Alexandria, who wrote a comprehensive medical work entitled Ἄνθρωπος, "Man," in which he treated of diseases in a systematic order, beginning with the head, and descending to the feet, and also of pharmacy. As Photius calls him (Biblioth. § 220) by the title of "Archiater," he must have lived after the beginning of the Christian era; and as Galen does not mention him, he may be supposed to have lived later than the second century. If (as is not improbable) he is the same physician, one of whose medical formulae is quoted by Aëtius (i. 3. 58. p. 127), he must have lived before the sixth century. Haller places him in the reign of Theodosius, that is, in the fourth century (Bibl. Medic. Pract. vol. i. p. 287), which may be quite correct, but he does not state the reason for his assigning so precise a date.

Theon, the commentator on Nicander mentioned by Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Κοράνη), is reckoned as a physician by Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 434) and Haller (l. c. p. 138), but it is perhaps more probable that he was a grammarian by profession, as he appears to have written a commentary also on Apollonius Rhodius and on Lycophron. [W. A. G.]

THEON of Samos, is mentioned by Quintilian (xii. 10. § 6) as one of those painters who flourished from the time of Philip to that of the successors of Alexander, the age of Pamphilus and Melanthius, Apelles and Protogenes. The peculiar merit of Theon was his prolific fancy (concipiendis visionibus, quas φαντασίας vocant), a characteristic denoting that excessive refinement in which the decline of art was already commencing, and which is still more strongly exhibited in the description given by Aelian (V. H. ii. 44) of Theon's picture of a soldier rushing to the battle. If we may believe Aelian, Theon even transgressed the limits of his own art in his attempt to produce a striking effect; for he never exhibited the picture without first causing a charge to be sounded on trumpets, and when the excitement produced by the music was at its highest, he drew up the curtain, and showed the warrior as if he had suddenly started into the presence of the spectators. Pliny places Theon among the painters who were primis proximi, and mentions two of his works, namely, Orestis insania, and Thamyrus citharoedus (H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 40). The former picture is also mentioned in the treatise of the Pseudo-Plutarch, de Audiendis Poetis, p. 18, from which we learn, what might be inferred from Pliny's words, that it represented Orestes slaying his mother. (See further, respecting this picture, R. Rochette, Monum. Ined. p. 177.) [P. S.]

THEONDAS, the chief magistrate in Samothrace at the time of the defeat of Perseus, in B. C. 168. (Liv. xlv. 5.)

THEO'NOE (Θεονόη). 1. A daughter of Proteus and Psammathe, who is said to have been in love with Canobus, the helmsman of Menelaus, who died in Egypt, in consequence of the bite of a snake. She is also called Eido or Eidothea. (Eurip. Helen. 11; Aristoph. Thesm. 897; Plat. Cratyl. p. 407; Hom. Od. iv. 363.)

2. A daughter of Thestor. [THESTOR.] [L. S.]

THEO'PHANE (Θεοφάνη), a daughter of Bisaltes, who, in consequence of her extraordinary beauty, was beleaguered by lovers, but was carried off by Poseidon to the isle of Crinissa. As the lovers followed her even there, Poseidon metamorphosed the maiden into a sheep and himself into a ram, and all the inhabitants of the island into animals. As the lovers began to slaughter these animals, he changed them into wolves. The god then became by Theophane the father of the ram with the golden fleece, which carried Phrixus to Colchis. (Hygin. Fab. 188.) [L. S.]

THEO'PHANES (Θεοφάνης), literary. 1. A writer on painting, mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 104).

2. Of Byzantium, one of the writers of the Byzantine history, flourished most probably in the latter part of the sixth century of our era. He wrote, in ten books, the history of the Eastern Empire (ἱστορικῶν λόγοι δέκα), during the Persian war under Justin II., beginning from the second year of Justin, in which the truce made by Justinian with Chosroës was broken, A. D. 567, and going down to the tenth year of the war, which, according to Mr. Clinton, was not A. D. 577, but A. D. 581, because the war did not begin till A. D. 571, although the history of Theophanes may have commenced with A. D. 567.

Photius (Bibl. Cod. 64) gives an account of the work of Theophanes, and he repeats the author's statement that, besides adding other books to the ten which formed the original work, he had written another work on the history of Justinian. It well deserves mention that, among the historical statements preserved by Photius from Theophanes is the discovery, in the reign of Justinian, of the fact that silk was the production of a worm, which had not been before known to the people of the Roman empire. A certain Persian, he tells us, coming from the land of the Seres, brought to Constantinople "the seed" (τὸ σπέρμα, the eggs, of course) of the silk-worm, and these "seeds" being hatched in the spring, and the worms fed with mulberry leaves, they spun their silk, and went through their transformations.

The Excerpta of Photius from the ten books of the history of Theophanes were printed in Greek, with a Latin version by Andr. Schottus, and notes by Ph. Labbe, in Valesius's edition of the Excerpta de Legationibus, from Dexippus and others, Paris, 1648, fol.; reprinted in the Venetian collection of the Byzantine historians, Venet. 1729, fol.: they are also printed in the volume of Niebuhr's Corpus Scriptorum Hist. Byzant., containing Dexippus, &c., Bonn. 1829, 8vo. (Cave, Hist. Litt. s. a. 580, vol. i. p. 537, ed. Basil.; Hankius, Byz. Rer. Script. ii. 4, pp. 674, foll.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. pp. 459, 541, 543; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. pp. 327, 328, ed. Westermann; Clinton, Fasti Romani, s. aa. 567, 568, 571.)

3. ISAURUS, also surnamed Isaacius*, from his father's name, and also Confessor, or Confessor Imaginum, from his sufferings in the cause of image worship, but more celebrated now as the author of a Chronicon in continuation of that of Syncellus, lived during the second half of the eighth century of our era, and the first fifteen years of the ninth.

He was of noble birth, his parents being Isaacius, the praefect of the Aegeopelagitae, and Theodota. He was born in A. D. 858, and soon after, by the death of his father, he became a ward of the emperor Constantinus Copronymus. While quite a youth, he was compelled by Leo the patrician to marry his daughter; but, on the wedding-day, Theophanes and his wife agreed that the marriage should not be consummated; and, on the death of Leo, in A. D. 780, his daughter retired into a convent, and her husband Theophanes, who had in the meantime discharged various public offices, entered the monastery of Polychronium, near Singriana, in lesser Mysia. He soon left that place, and went to live in the island of Calonymus, where he converted his paternal estate into a monastery. After a residence of six years there, he returned to the neighbourhood of Singriana, where he purchased an estate, called by the simple name of Ager (ἄγρος), and founded another monastery, of which he made himself the abbot. In A. D. 787, he was summoned to the second Council of Nicaea, where he vehemently defended the worship of images. We have no further details of his life until A.D. 813, when he was required by Leo the Armenian to renounce the worship of images, and, upon his refusal, though he was extremely ill, and had been bed-ridden for five years, he was carried to Constantinople, and there, after a further period of resistance to the command of the emperor to renounce his principles, he was cast into prison, at the close of the year 815 or the beginning of 816; and, after two years' imprisonment, he was banished to the island of Samothrace, where he died, only twenty-three days from his arrival. His firmness was rewarded by his party, not only with the title of Confessor, but also with the honours of canonization.

Theophanes was the personal friend of Georgius

* There appears to be no authority for calling him, as Vossius does, Georgius. The mistake probably arose from some accidental confusion of his name with that of Georgius Syncellus.

Syncellus, by whose desire he continued the Chronicon, which was broken off by the death of Syncellus. The work of Theophanes, which is still extant, begins at the accession of Diocletian, in A. D. 277, and embraces a period of 524 years, down to A. D. 811, that is, almost up to the very period when the career of Theophanes was ended by his imprisonment. It consists, like the Chronica of Eusebius and of Syncellus, of two parts, a history arranged according to years, and a chronological table, of which the former is very superior to the latter. We possess the original Greek, and an ancient Latin translation, badly executed, by Anastasius Bibliothecarius. It has been published, with an improved Latin Version, and with the Notes of Goar and Combéfis, in the Parisian and Venetian Collections of the Byzantine writers, Paris, 1655, fol., Venet. 1729, fol., and in Niebuhr's Corpus Script. Hist. Byz. Bonn. 2 vols. 8vo. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. pp. 459, foll.; Cave, Hist. Litt. s. a. 792, vol. i. p. 641, ed. Basil.; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 340, ed. Westermann; Hankius, Byz. Rer. Script. i. 11, pp. 200, foll.).

4. CERAMEUS. [CERAMEUS, THEOPHANES.]

Some less important writers and ecclesiastics of this name are noticed by Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. pp. 218—222.

There is one epigram in the Greek Anthology, under the name of Theophanes, but its authorship is very uncertain. (See Jacobs, Bibl. Graec. vol. xiii. p. 958.) [P. S.]

THEO'PHANES GRAPTUS. [GRAPTUS.]

THEO'PHANES NONNUS. [NONNUS.]

THEO'PHANES, CN. POMPEIUS, of Mytilene in Lesbos, a learned Greek, was one of the most intimate friends of Pompey, whom he accompanied in many of his campaigns, and who frequently followed his advice on public as well as private matters. (Caes. B. C. iii. 18; Strab. xiii. p. 617.) He was not a freedman of Pompey, as some modern writers have supposed (Burmann, ad Vell. Pat. ii. 18); but the Roman general appears to have made his acquaintance during the Mithridatic war, and soon became so much attached to him that he presented to the Greek the Roman franchise in the presence of his army, after a speech in which he eulogised his merits. (Cic. pro Arch. 10; Val. Max. viii. 14. § 3.) This occurred in all probability about B. C. 62, and Theophanes must now have taken the name of Pompeius after his patron. Such was his influence with Pompey, that, in the course of the same year, he obtained for his native city the privileges of a free state, although it had espoused the cause of Mithridates, and had given up the Roman general M'. Aquillius to the king of Pontus. (Plut. Pomp. 42.) Theophanes came to Rome with Pompey after the conclusion of his wars in the East. There he adopted, before he had any son, L. Cornelius Balbus, of Gades, a favourite of his patron. (Cic. pro Balb. 25; Capitol. Balbin. 2.) He continued to live with Pompey on the most intimate terms, and we see from Cicero's letters, that his society was courted by many of the Roman nobles, on account of his well-known influence with Pompey. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 5, 12, 17, v. 11.) On the breaking out of the civil war he accompanied Pompey to Greece, who appointed him commander of the Fabri, and chiefly consulted him and Lucceius on all important matters in the war, much to the indignation of the Roman nobles. (Plut. Cic. 38; Caes. B. C. iii. 18; Cic. ad Att. ix. 3, 11.) After the battle of Pharsalia Theophanes fled with Pompey from Greece, and it was owing to his advice that Pompey went to Egypt. (Plut. Pomp. 76, 78.) After the death of his friend and patron, Theophanes took refuge in Italy. He was pardoned by Caesar, and was still alive in B. C. 44, as we see from one of Cicero's letters (ad Att. xv. 19). After his death the Lesbians paid divine honours to his memory. (Tac. Ann. vi. 18.) Theophanes wrote the history of Pompey's campaigns, in which he represented the exploits of his hero in the most favourable light, and did not hesitate, as Plutarch more than hints, to invent a false tale for the purpose of injuring the reputation of an enemy of the Pompeian family. (Plut. Pomp. 37, et alibi; Strab. xi. p. 503, xiii. p. 617; Cic. pro Arch. l. c.; Val. Max. l. c.; Capitol. l. c.)

Theophanes left behind him a son, M. POMPEIUS THEOPHANES, who was sent to Asia by Augustus, in the capacity of procurator, and was at the time that Strabo wrote one of the friends of Tiberius. The latter emperor, however, put his descendants to death towards the end of his reign, A. D. 33, because their ancestor had been one of Pompey's friends, and had received after his death divine honours from the Lesbians. (Strab. xiii. p. 617; Tac. Ann. vi. 18; comp. Drumann, Geschichte Roms, vol. iv. pp. 551—553; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. pp. 190, 191, ed. Westermann.)

THEOPHILISCUS, a Rhodian, who commanded the fleet sent by his countrymen to the assistance of Attalus, king of Pergamus, against Philip, king of Macedonia, B. C. 201. He bore an important part in the great sea-fight off Chios, which was brought on by his advice, and in which he mainly contributed to the victory, both by his skill and personal valour. But having been led by his ardour too far into the midst of the enemy's fleet, his own ship was assailed on all sides, and he extricated her with great difficulty, having lost almost all his crew, and himself received three wounds, of which he died shortly after. The highest honours were paid to his memory by the Rhodians. (Polyb. xvi. 2, 5, 9.) [E. H. B.]

THEO'PHILUS (Θεόφιλος), emperor of Constantinople A. D. 829—842, was the son and successor of Michael II. Balbus, with whom he was associated in the government as early as 821 (Eckhel, vol. viii. p. 240.) He was engaged in war with the Saracens during the greater part of his reign, but notwithstanding his valour and energy he was generally unsuccessful against these formidable foes, and hence obtained the surname of the Unfortunate. At the end of his fifth campaign he had the mortification of seeing the city of Amorium in Phrygia, which was the birth-place of his father, and which he and his father had adorned with public buildings, levelled to the ground by the caliph Motassem. Like most of the other Byzantine emperors, Theophilus took part in the religious disputes of his age. He was a zealous iconoclast, and persecuted the worshippers of images with the utmost severity; but notwithstanding his heresy, the ancient writers bestow the highest praise upon his impartial administration of justice. He died in 842, and was succeeded by his infant son Michael III., who was left under the guardianship of his mother, the empress Theodora. [MICHAEL III.] (Zonar. xv. 25—29; Cedrenus, pp. 513—533; Continuator Theoph. lib. iii.; Ducange, Fa- miliac Byzantinae, pp. 132, 133; Gibbon, Decline and Fall, cc. xlviii. and lii.)

THEO'PHILUS (Θεόφιλος), literary. 1. An Athenian comic poet, most probably of the Middle Comedy, as Meineke shows from the extant titles and fragments of his plays. In a passage of Pollux (ix. 15), in which he is represented as one of the poets of the New Comedy, most of the MSS. have the name of Diphilus, instead of Theophilus. The following titles of his plays are preserved by Athenaeus (passim) and Suidas (s. v.), except the first, which is quoted by the Scholiast to Dionysius Thrax (p. 724. 26): Ἀπόδημοι, Βοιωτία, Ἐπιδαύριος, Ἰατρός, Κιθαρῳδός (Meineke, vol. iii. p. 628, retracts the doubt which he had raised as to this being a true title of a drama), Νεοπτόλεμος, Παγκρατιαστής, Προιτίδες, Φίλαυλος. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 500, 501; Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 434, 435, vol. iii. pp. 626—632; Editio Minor, pp. 816—818.)

2. An historian and geographer, if at least the passages about to be quoted refer to one and the same person. He is mentioned by Josephus (c. Apion. i. 23) among those writers, who had noticed the Jews. The third book of his work on Italy (Ἰταλικά), and the second of that on the Peloponnesus (Πελοποννησιακά), are quoted by Plutarch (Parallela Minora, 13, 32, pp. 309, a., 313, d). Ptolemy (Geogr. i. 9. § 3) quotes a statement from some geographical work by Theophilus, the title of which he does not mention, but which is no doubt the same as the Περιήγησις, the eleventh book of which is referred to by Stephanus of Byzantium (s. v. Παλική). Plutarch also (de Fluv. 24) cites the first book of a work of Theophilus περὶ λίθων. (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 504, ed. Westermann.)

3. A writer on agriculture, whom Varro (R. R. i. 1. § 9), and Columella (i. 1. § 11) mention in their lists of authorities, but about whom they give us no further information.

4. Bishop of Antioch, in the latter part of the second century of our era, and the author of one of the early apologies for Christianity which have come down to us. The common opinion concerning his time, derived from Eusebius, Jerome, and Nicephorus, has been elaborately canvassed by Dodwell and others, whose arguments are fully examined, and satisfactorily answered by Cave (Hist. Litt. s. a. 168), and Harless (ad Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 102). In the eighth (Hieron. Chron. s. a. 2184) or tenth (Euseb. Chron. s. a. 2186; Syncell. p. 352, d.) year of Marcus Antoninus (A. D. 16⅞ or 17⅞), he succeeded Eros in the see of Antioch, of which he was the sixth bishop (Euseb. H. E. iv. 20; Hieron. de Vir. Ill. 25), or, including S. Peter, the seventh (Hieron. Algas. vol. iii. p. 318; Niceph. Chron. p. 417, c.); and he held that office for thirteen years, that is, till A. D. 181 or 183 (Niceph. l. c.). Having been originally a heathen*, as he tells us himself (Ad Autolyc. i. p. 78), he was converted to Christianity by the study of the sacred Scriptures, and, besides other religious works, he wrote an apology for the Christian faith, in the form of a letter to a friend, named Autolycus, who was still a heathen, but a man of extensive reading and great learning, and an earnest lover of truth (Theoph. ad Autolyc. i. p. 69, b., iii. pp. 119, a., 127, b., 138, d.). This work must have been written, or, at least, finished, shortly before the death of Theophilus, for there is an allusion towards the close of it, which fixes the composition of that part after the death of Marcus Antoninus, in A. D. 180; and, according to the preceding testimonies, Theophilus did not live later than A. D. 183, or perhaps than A. D. 181. The work is cited by various titles, either simply πρὸς Αὐτόλυκον βιβλία γ', or with the addition περὶ τῆς τῶν Χριστιανῶν πίστεως, or, as Eusebius has it (H. E. iv. 24), τρία τὰ πρὸς Αὐτόλυκον στοιχειώδη συγγράμματα, implying that the object of the work was to teach Autolycus the elements of Christian truth; and again, in a MS. in the Paris library, the title is given with an addition which states the object of the work to be, to prove "that the divine oracles in our possession are more ancient and more true than the statements of Egyptian and Grecian and all other historians." It is quoted by Lactantius (ii. 23), by the title of De Temporibus, and it is mentioned by Gennadius (33) who erroneously ascribes it to Theophilus of Alexandria. The work shows much learning and more simplicity of mind; in its general structure, it resembles the works of Justin Martyr and the other early apologists; but it contains a more detailed examination of the evidence for Christianity derived both from Scripture and from history. Some of the arguments are fanciful, not to say puerile, in the extreme; for example, he interprets ἐν ἀρχῇ, in Genesis i. 1, as meaning by Christ. He indulges much in allegorical interpretations: thus, the three days, preceding the creation of the sun and moon, are typical of the Trinity of God and his Word and his Wisdom; a passage, by the way, which is believed to contain the earliest instance of the use of the word Trinity in the writings of the Fathers. The work, however, contains much valuable matter; and its style is clear and good.

The three books of Theophilus to Autolycus were first published in the collection of the monks Antonius and Maximus, entitled Sententiarum sive Capitum, Theologicorum praecipue, ex sacris et profanis libris, Tomi tres, and containing, besides the work of Theophilus, the Centuriae of Maximus, and the Oratio ad Graecos of Tatian, edited by Conrad Gesner, Tiguri, 1546, fol.: again with the Latin version of Conrad Clauser, in the collections of the Scriptores Sacri, or Orthodoxographi, published in 1555 and 1559, fol. (see Hoffmann, Lex. Bibliogr.): with the editions of Justin Martyr, 1615, 1636, 1686, 1742, 1747, fol.: with notes by Fronto Ducaeus, in the Auctuar. Biblioth. Patrum, Paris, 1624, fol.: with a revised text and notes, by John Fell, bishop of Oxford, Oxon. 1684, 12mo.: the most complete edition is that of Jo. Christoph. Wolf, Hamb. 1724, 8vo. It has been translated into English by Joseph Betty, Oxf. 1722, 8vo., and into German by G. C. Hosmann, Hamb, 1729, 8vo.

Theophilus was the author of several other works, which were extant in the times of Eusebius and Jerome (Euseb. Chron. Arm. l. c.; Hieron. Chron. l. c.; Sync. l. c.) Among these, were works against the heresies of Marcion and Hermogenes, in the latter of which the Apocalypse was quoted. (Euseb. H. E. iv. 24; Hieron. de Vir. Illust. 25.) Jerome also mentions a Commentary on the Gospels, which seems to have been a sort of harmony, and of which he made use in his own Commentaries, but which he thinks not equal in style to the other works of Theophilus. (V. I. l. c.; Praef. in Matt.; Algas. vol. iii. p. 318.) There are still extant, in Latin only, under the name of Theophilus, four books of allegorical commentaries on various passages of the Gospels, which the best critics pronounce to be undoubtedly an original Latin work, of a period much subsequent to the time of Theophilus, although very probably his commentary may have been used in its compilation. This commentary is published in the Bibliothecae Patrum, Paris, 1575, 1598, 1609, 1654, Colon. 1618, Ludg. 1677. Eusebius further mentions certain catechetical works by him (καὶ ἕτερα δέ τινα κατηχητικὰ αὐτοῦ βιβλία, H. E. iv. 24; breves elegantesque tractatus ad aedificationem ecclesiae pertinentes, Hieron. V. I. l. c.); and Jerome (l. c.) refers to his Commentaries on the Proverbs, in connection with his Commentaries on the Gospels, and with the same qualification as to their style. (Cave, Hist. Litt. s. a. 168, pp. 69—71; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. pp. 101—106; Lardner, Credibility; Mosheim, Eccles. Hist. Murdock's Note, vol. i. p. 155, Engl. ed.; Clinton, Fasti Rom. s. aa. 171, 181.)

5. A bishop of Caesareia in Palestine, who presided over the council of Caesareia, and signed the letter of that council, which appears to have been drawn up by himself, on the Paschal controversy, A. D. 198. (Euseb. H. E. v. 23; Hieron. V. I. 43; Cave, Hist. Litt. s. a. 198, p. 87; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 107, vol. ix. p. 255, vol. xii. p. 363.)

6. Bishop of Alexandria, in the latter part of the fourth and the beginning of the fifth centuries of our era, is distinguished for his persecutions of the Origenists, for his hostility to Chrysostom, and as being altogether one of the most violent and unscrupulous even among the ecclesiastics of the fifth century. His life belongs rather to ecclesiastical than to literary history, and therefore only a very brief account of it is required here. He succeeded Timotheus, as bishop of Alexandria, in A. D. 385 (Socrat. H. E. v. 12; not 387, as the date is given by Theophanes, p. 60, b., and Sozomen, H.E. vii. 14; see Clinton, Fasti Rom. s. a. 387). Soon after his elevation to the episcopal throne, he secured the favour of the emperor by a most characteristic manoeuvre. When the fate of the empire was suspended on the battle which was to decide between Maximus and Theodosius, A. D. 388, he sent his legate, Isidorus, to Rome, provided with letters to both, the one or the other of which he was to deliver, with certain presents, according to the issue of the battle (Sozom. H. E. viii. 2). He also emulated the zeal of Theodosius against heathenism; and having in A. D. 391 obtained the emperor's permission to take severe measures with the pagans in his diocese, he proceeded to destroy their temples, and to seize their property, until, after Alexandria had been troubled with insurrections and bloodshed, most of them were driven out of Egypt (Socrat. H. E. v. 16). How little this religious zeal proceeded from the dictates of conscience or of calm judgment may be seen by the pains which Theophilus afterwards took to force the bishopric of Cyrene upon Synesius, in spite of his avowed devotion to the heathen Greek philosophy. [SYNESIUS.]

His behaviour to the different sects, into which the Christians of his diocese were divided, was marked by the same unscrupulous inconsistency. He appears to have passed a part of his early life among the monks of Nitria, who were divided among themselves upon the chief controversy of the day, some being Origenists, and others Anthropomorphites. The ignorance of the latter party he must therefore have well known, and he was far too strong-minded to share their prejudices; while, on the other hand, he was quite capable of appreciating the works of Origen, with which it is evident that he was well acquainted. At first, he declared himself decidedly against the Anthropomorphites, and in opposing them he sided openly with the Origenists, and drew his arguments from the works of Origen. When, however, it became evident that the majority of the Egyptian monks were Anthropomorphites, and when that party had shown their strength by the tumults which they stirred up, about A. D. 399, Theophilus went over to their side, condemned the writings of Origen, and commanded all his clergy to condemn them, and commenced a cruel persecution of the monks and others who opposed the Anthropomorphites; and all this, while he himself continued to read the works of Origen with admiration. In A. D. 401, he issued a violent paschal or encyclical letter, in which he condemned the writings of Origen, and threatened his adherents; and in the following year he sent forth another letter of the same character, to the unbounded delight of Jerome, who had been long intimate with Theophilus, and who writes to him on the occasion in terms of exultation and flattery, which are absolutely disgusting (Epist. 57, ed. Mait., 86, ed. Vallars.). By these proceedings, and by his general character, Theophilus well earned the name of Ἀμφαλλάξ, which we find applied to him (Pallad. ap. Montfauc. vol. xiii. p. 20). The persecuted monks of the Origenist party fled for refuge to Constantinople, where they were kindly received by Chrysostom, against whom Theophilus already had a grudge, because Chrysostom had been made bishop of Constantinople in spite of his opposition. The subsequent events, the call of Theophilus to Constantinople by the empress Eudoxia, and his success in procuring the deposition and banishment of Chrysostom (A. D. 403), are related under CHRYSOSTOMUS [Vol. I. p. 704, a.] During the tumult which followed the deposition of Chrysostom, Theophilus made his escape secretly from Constantinople, and returned to Alexandria, where, in the following year (A. D. 404) he issued a third paschal letter against the Origenists, and where he closed his turbulent career in A. D. 412.

The works of Theophilus mentioned by the ancient writers are:—one against the Origenists, which is quoted by Theodoret (Dial. 2, p. 191), under the title of προσφωνητικὸν πρὸς τοὺς φρονοῦντας τὰ Ὠριγένους, and which Gennadius (33) calls Adversus Origenem unum et grande volumen; a Letter to Porphyry, bishop of Antioch, quoted in the Acta Concil. Ephes. pt. i. c. 4; the three Paschal Letters, or episcopal charges, already mentioned, and one more; and some other unimportant orations, letters, and controversial works. The Paschal Letters are still extant in a translation by Jerome, and are published in the Antidot. contra divers. omnium seculorum haeresias, Basil. 1528, fol.; and the whole of his extant remains are contained in Gallandii Biblioth. Patr. vol. vii. pp. 603, foll.; Socrat. H. E. vi. 7—17; Sozom.

Hist.* vol. i. pp. 364—367, Davidson's transl.; Clinton, Fast. Rom. s. aa. 385, 387, 401, 402, 404.)

7. A chronographer, of unknown time, frequently cited by John Malala. (Cave, Hist. Litt., Dissert. i. vol. ii. p. 19; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. pp. 110, 444; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 505, ed. Westermann.)

8. Presbyter, the author of a Commentary on the Oracula de Urbe Constantinopolitana, of the emperor, Leo Sapiens. (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. pp. 504, 505, ed. Westermann; Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 111.)

An account of several other less important persons of this name is given in Fabricius. (Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. pp. 111—114.) [P. S.]

THEO'PHILUS (Θεόφιλος), was one of the lawyers of Constantinople who were employed by Justinian on his first Code, on the Digest and on the composition of the Institutes (De Novo Codice faciendo, § 1, De Justinianeo Codice conformando, § 2, De Confirmatione Digestorum, Tanta, &c, § 9, Instit. D. Justiniani Prooemium, § 3). In A. D. 528 Theophilus was comes sacri consistorii and juris doctor at Constantinople. In A. D. 529 he was ex magistro and juris doctor at Constantinople; and in A. D. 532 he had the titles of Illustris, Magister and Juris peritus at Constantinople. This Theophilus is the author of the Greek translation or paraphrase of the Institutes of Justinian, a fact which is now universally admitted, though some of the older critics supposed that there were two Theophili, one the compiler of the Institutes, and the other the author of the Greek version.

The Greek paraphrase was made perhaps shortly after the promulgation of the Institutes A.D. 533; and it was probably in A.D. 534 that, as professor of law at Constantinople, Theophilus read upon the Latin text of the Institutes, the commentary in Greek entitled "a Greek Paraphrase of the Institutes," and which was intended for the first year's course of legal studies. It may have been about the same time that Theophilus explained to his class the first part, or first four books (πρῶτα), of the Digest, some fragments of which are preserved in the scholia on the Basilica: this explanation completed the first year's course of study. We also infer from the same scholia that, in A. D. 535, Theophilus explained to his class the second part, or the seven books (De Judiciis), for the same scholia have preserved passages from his commentary on this part of the Digest. There are also fragments of his commentary on the third division (De Rebus). His labours, apparently, did not extend beyond A. D. 535, and he may have died in A. D. 536, as it is conjectured. Thalelaeus, one of his colleagues, in the school of Constantinople, speaks of him as dead; and probably Thalelaeus wrote about A. D. 537.

The title of the paraphrase of Theophilus is Ινστιτοῦτα Θεοφίλου Ἀντικένσωρος, Instituta Theophili Antecensoris. It became the text for the Institutes in the East, where the Latin language was little known, and entirely displaced the Latin text. It maintained itself as a manual of law until the eighth and tenth centuries, though others were subsequently published by the Greek emperors. This text was employed, as we see, on all occasions where the Institutes were used, even to the time of the Hexabiblos of Harmenopulus, the last Greek jurisconsult. It is conjectured, however, that there was a literal Greek version of the Institutes, for in some of the scholia (Basil. ed. Heimbach, i. p. 611, schol. 2) the text of the Institutes, which is cited several times, is not that of Theophilus. It is also conjectured that Theophilus was not the editor of his own paraphrase, but that it was drawn up by some of his pupils, after the explanation of the professor; and the ground for this opinion is that certain barbarous expressions are found in it, that the variations of the manuscripts are very numerous, and that several passages are repeated. The paraphrase is, however, of great use for the study of the text of the Institutes, many passages in which would be unintelligible without it.

The first edition of the paraphrase was by Viglius Zuichemus, Basle, 1531, fol.; and it was followed by several others, among which that of Fabrot was the best. But the most complete edition is that by G. O. Reitz, Haag, 1751, 2 vols. 4to. There is a German translation by Wüstemann, 1823, 2 vols. 8vo. (Mortreuil, Histoire du Droit Byzantin, &c., Paris, 1843.) [G. L.]

THEO'PHILUS (Θεόφιλος), physicians. 1. Apparently a contemporary of Galen in the second century after Christ, who gives an account of his delirium during an illness. (De Symptom. Differ. c. 3, vol. vii. p. 60.)

2. A "Comes Archiatrorum," mentioned by St. Chrysostom in a letter to Olympias (vol. iii. p. 571, ed. Bened.), written about A. D. 407, as having attended on himself. He may possibly be the same person who is quoted by Aëtius (see No. 3).

3. The author of one or two medical formulae quoted by Aëtius (ii. 3. 41, 42, 110, pp. 318, 319, 356), must have lived some time in or before the sixth century after Christ. It is not known whether he is the same person who is quoted by Rhazes (Cont. i. 3, p. 6, ed. 1506), and who appears to have written a work De Membris Dolentibus (id. ibid. v. 1, p. 100).

4. Theophilus Protospatharius (Πρωτοσπαθάριος), the author of several Greek medical works, which are still extant, and of which it is not quite certain whether some do not belong to Philaretus [Philaretus] and Philotheus [Philotheus]. Every thing connected with his titles, the events of his life, and the time when he lived, is uncertain. He is generally called "Protospatharius," which seems to have been originally a military title given to the colonel of the body-guards of the emperor of Constantinople (Spatharii, or Σωματοφύλακες); but which afterwards became also a high civil dignity, or was at any rate associated with the government of provinces and the functions of a judge. (See Dr. Greenhill's Notes to Theoph., or Penny Cyclopedia, art. Theophilus, and the references there given.)

With respect to the personal history of Theophilus, if, as is generally done, we trust to the titles of the MSS. of his works, and so endeavour to trace the events of his life, we may conjecture that he lived in the seventh century after Christ; that he was the tutor to Stephanus Atheniensis [Stephanus, p. 907]; that he arrived at high professional and political rank; and that at last he embraced the monastic life. All this is, however, quite uncertain; and with respect to his date, it has been supposed that some of the words which he uses belong to a later period than the seventh century; so that he may possibly be the same person who is addressed by the title "Protospatharius" by Photius (Epist. 123, 193, pp. 164, 292, ed. Lond. 1651) in the ninth. He appears to have embraced in some degree the Peripatetic philosophy; but he was certainly a Christian, and expresses himself on all possible occasions like a man of great piety: in his physiological work especially he everywhere points out with admiration the wisdom, power, and goodness of God as displayed in the formation of the human body.

Five works are attributed to him, of which the longest and most interesting is an anatomical and physiological treatise in five books, entitled Περὶ τῆς τοῦ Ἀνθρώπου Κατασκευῆς, De Corporis Humani Fabrica. It contains very little original matter, as it is almost entirely abridged from Galen's great work, "De Usu Partium Corporis Humani," from which however Theophilus now and then differs, and which he sometimes appears to have misunderstood. In the fifth book he has inserted large extracts from Hippocrates "De Genitura," and "De Natura Pueri." He recommends in several places the dissection of animals, but he does not appear ever to have examined a human body: in one passage he advises the student to dissect an ape, or else a bear, or, if neither of these animals can be procured, to take whatever he can get, "but by all means," adds he, "let him dissect something." (v. 11. § 3.) The work was first published in a Latin translation by J. P. Crassus, Venet. 1536, 8vo., together with Hippocrates "De Medicamentis Purgantibus." This translation was several times reprinted, and is inserted by H. Stephens in his "Medicae Artis Principes," Paris, 1567, fol. The MS. which Crassus used is probably lost, as none of those which are now known to exist agrees with his translation. The original text was first published by Guil. Morell, without Latin translation, preface, or notes, Paris, 1555, 8vo., from a MS. at Paris, which appears to be more defective than that used by Crassus, though even that was not quite complete Morell's edition is now become scarce, and was inserted by Fabricius in the twelfth vol. of his "Bibliotheca Graeca," together with the Latin translation by Crassus. Two long passages which were missing in the fourth and fifth books were published from a MS. at Venice by Andr. Mustoxydes and Demetr. Schinas in their collection, entitled Συλλογὴ Ἀποσπασμάτων Ἀνεκδότων Ἑλληνικῶν, Venet. 1817. 8vo. The last and most complete edition is that by Dr. Greenhill, Oxon. 1842, 8vo., containing a corrected text, the Latin version by Crassus, various readings, notes, and indices.

II. His treatise Περὶ Οὔρων, De Urinis, in like manner contains little or nothing that is original, but is a good compendium of what was known on the subject by the ancients, and was highly esteemed in the Middle Ages. It first appeared in a Latin translation by Pontius (or Ponticus) Virunius (or Virmius) in several early editions of the collection known by the name of the "Articella." It was first published in a separate form in a new Latin translation by Albanus Torinus, Basil. 1533, 8vo., together with the treatise "De Pulsibus," which version was reprinted in 1535, Argent. 8vo., and is inserted by H. Stephens in his "Medicae Artis Principes." The Greek text was first published without the name of Theophilus, under the title of "Iatrosophistae De Urinis Liber Singularis," Paris, 1608, 12mo., with a new Latin translation by Fed. Morell; which edition was inserted entire by Chartier in the eighth vol. of his edition of Hippocrates and Galen. The best edition is that by Thom. Guidot, Lugd. Bat. 1703 (and 1731) 8vo., containing an improved text, a new Latin version by the editor, and copious and learned prolegomena and notes. The Greek text only, from Guidot's edition, is inserted by J. L. Ideler in the first volume of his "Physici et Medici Graeci Minores," Berol. 1841, 8vo.

III. A short treatise Περὶ Διαχωρημάτων, De Excrementis Alvinis, was first published by Guidot in Greek with a Latin translation by himself, at the end of his edition of the "De Urinis;" and the Greek text alone is republished by Ideler in his "Phys. et Med. Graeci Min."

IV. A Commentary on the "Aphorisms" of Hippocrates, which is sometimes attributed to a person named Philotheus, is noticed under that name, p. 331.

V. A short treatise Περὶ Σφυγμῶν, De Pulsibus, was first published by F. Z. Ermerins in his "Anecdota Medica Graeca" (Lugd. Bat. 1840, 8vo.), with a Latin translation by the editor, various readings, and a few notes. It appears to be quite different from the work on the same subject by Philaretus, which has been sometimes attributed to Theophilus [PHILARETUS]. (See Penny Cyclop. art. Theophilus, and the references there given, from which work the present article has been abridged.) [W. A. G.]

THEO'PHILUS, an artist in metal, was the maker of the celebrated iron helmet of Alexander, which glittered like polished silver, and the neck-chain of which was studded with precious stones. (Plut. Alex. 32.) Plutarch does not expressly tell us that the helmet was chased, but it can hardly be supposed that its magnificence consisted only in its polish; and therefore we do not hesitate to place Theophilus among the most distinguished of the Grecian caelatores. (Comp. Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Caelatura, 2d ed.; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 418, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

THEOPHRASTUS (Θεόφραστος), the Greek philosopher, was a native of Eresus in Lesbos. (Strabo, xiii. p. 618; Diog. Laërt. v. 36, &c.) Before he left his native city the bent of his mind was directed towards philosophy by Leucippus or Alcippus, a man of whom we know nothing further. Leaving Eresus, he betook himself to Athens, where he attached himself at first to Plato, but afterwards to Aristotle. (Diog. Laërt. l. c.) The story that the latter changed the name of this, his favourite pupil, from Tyrtamus to Theophrastus (for the purpose, as is stated, of avoiding the cacophony, and of indicating the fluent and graceful address of the young man; Strabo, l. c.; Diog. Laërt. v. 38, ib. Menag.), is scarcely credible. Nor can we place more reliance on the accounts that this change of name took place at a later period. (He is already called Theophrastus in Aristotle's will; see Diog. Laërt. v. 12, &c.) The authorities who would lead us to suppose this express themselves very indistinctly. (Cic. Orat. 19; Siquidem et Theophrastus divinitate loquendi nomen invenit; Quintil. Inst. Orat. xi. 1, in Theophrasto tam est eloquendi nitor ille divinus ut ex eo nomen quoque traxisse dicatur.) It is much more likely that the proper name itself, which occurs elsewhere (Steph. Thesaur. Ling. Graec. ed. nov. Paris), suggested attempts to connect it with the eloquence which so eminently distinguished the Eresian. To prove the love of Aristotle for Theophrastus we do not need to betake ourselves to the above story, or to the doubtful expression of the former with respect to the latter, that "he needed the rein, not the spur," an expression which Plato is also said to have made use of with respect to Aristotle (Diog. Laërt. v. 39, ib. Menag.); it is proved in a much more indubitable manner by the will of the Stagirite, and by the confidence which led him, when removing to Chalcis, to designate Theophrastus as his successor in the presidency of the Lyceum (Diog. Laërt. v. 36; comp. A. Gell. Noct. Att. xiii. 5). It is not unlikely, moreover, that Theophrastus had been the disciple of Aristotle during the residence of the latter in Stageira, while engaged in the education of Alexander: at all events Theophrastus, in his will, mentions an estate that he possessed at Stageira (Diog. Laërt. v. 52), and was on terms of the most intimate friendship with Callisthenes, the fellow-pupil of Alexander (Diog. Laërt. v. 44, ib. Menag.). Two thousand disciples are said to have gathered round Theophrastus, and among them such men as the comic poet Menander. (Diog. Laërt. v. 37, 36.) Highly esteemed by the kings Philippus, Cassander, and Ptolemaeus, he was not the less the object of the regard of the Athenian people, as was decisively shown when Agonis ventured to bring an impeachment against him, on the ground of impiety (l. c. 37; comp. Aelian, V. H. iv. 19). Nevertheless, when, according to the law of Sophocles (Ol. 118. 3), the philosophers were banished from Athens, Theophrastus also left the city, until Philo, a disciple of Aristotle, in the very next year, brought Sophocles to punishment, and procured the repeal of the law. (Diog. Laërt. v. 38, ib. Menag.; comp. C. G. Zumpt, Ueber den Bestand der philosophischen Schulen in Athen, &c., Berlin, 1843, p. 17.) Whether Theophrastus succeeded Aristotle without opposition, and also came into possession of the house and garden where the former taught in the Lyceum (not far from the present royal palace in Athens), is uncertain. In the will of Aristotle no express directions were left on this point. Still there is nothing at variance therewith in the statement that Theophrastus, after the death of Aristotle, with the assistance of Demetrius Phalereus, obtained a garden of his own. (The words of Diogenes Laërtius, v. 39, are very obscure; the καὶ in the words λέγεται δ' αὐτὸν καὶ κῆπον σχεῖν μετὰ τὴν Ἀριστοτέλους τελευτήν, Δημητρίου τοῦ Φαληρέως .... τοῦτο συμπράξαντος, appears rather to refer to a previous possession than to exclude it.) That the executor of the will of Aristotle instituted a sale of the estate, respecting which no directions had been left in the will, and that Demetrius interposed, in order to secure a permanent possession for the head of the school, we cannot, with Zumpt (l. c. p. 8), conclude from the above words. The garden, provided with houses, colonnades, walks, &c., whether it was exclusively the private property of Theophrastus, or was, at least, inherited in part by him from Aristotle, is made over by the former in his will to Strato and his other friends, provided they had a mind to philosophize together, as a common and inalienable possession (Diog. Laërt. v. 51, &c.). A similar testamentary disposition of the property was made by Strato and Lycon, the succeeding heads of the school. (Diog. Laërt. v. 61, &c., 70.)

Theophrastus reached an advanced age; whether that of eighty-five years (Diog. Laërt. v. 40) or more (Hieronymus, Epist. ad Nepotian. even speaks of 107 years), we leave undecided. But the statement contained in the letter to Polycles, prefixed to his Characteres, according to which this book was composed in the ninety-ninth year of the author, although Tzetzes (Chil. ix. 941) already read it so, may very well rest on a clerical error (comp. Casaubon. ad Theophr. Charact. Prolog. p. 85); and if Theophrastus was the head of the school for thirty-five years (Diog. Laërt. v. 36, 58), he would, even had he only reached his hundredth year, have been older than Aristotle. If he reached the age of eighty-seven, he was ten years younger, and was born Ol. 101. 3. Theophrastus is said to have closed his life, which was devoted to restless activity (Diog. Laërt. v. 36; comp. Suid.), with the complaint respecting the short duration of human existence, that it ended just when the insight into its problems was beginning. (This complaint, expressed in different forms, we read in Cicero, Tusc. iii. 28; Hieron. l. c.; Diog. Laërt. v. 41.) The whole people took part in his funeral obsequies. (Diog. Laërt. l. c.) His faithful affection for Aristotle, which he had transferred to Nicomachus, the son of the latter and his own disciple, expresses itself in the directions contained in his will respecting the preparation and preservation of the statues or busts of the Stagirite and his son (Diog. Laërt. v. 51, 52); and still more in the way in which he exerted himself to carry out the philosophical endeavours of his teacher, to throw light upon the difficulties contained in his books, to fill up the gaps in them, and, with respect to individual dogmas, to amend them.

II. The preceding statement finds its confirmation in the list of the writings of the Eresian given us, though with his usual haste, by Diogenes Laërtius, but probably borrowed from authorities like Hermippus and Andronicus (Schol. at the end of the Metaphysics of Theophrastus), and the statements respecting them contained in other writers, which Menage has already, at least in part, collected in his notes. Thus Theophrastus, like Aristotle, had composed a first and second Analytic (Diog. Laërt. v. 42, ib. Menag.), and, at least in the case of the former, had connected his treatise with that of his great predecessor, in the manner indicated above (see below, section III.). He had also written books on Topics (Diog. Laërt. v. 42, 45, 50), and on the confutation of fallacies (ib. 42, 45); the former again, at all events, with a careful regard to the Topica of Aristotle. The work of Theophrastus "On Affirmation and Denial" (περὶ καταφάσεως καὶ ἀποφάσεως, Diog. Laërt. v. 44) seems to have corresponded to that of Aristotle "On Judgment" (περὶ ἑρμηνείας). To the books of Aristotle on the "Principles of Natural Philosophy" (Physica Auscultatio), on Heaven, and on Meteorological Phenomena, Theophrastus had had regard in corresponding works. (Diog. Laërt. v. 42, 50, 47.) Further, he had written on the Warm and the Cold (Diog. Laërt. v. 44, ib. Menag.), on Water, Fire (Diog. Laërt. v. 45), the Sea (ib.), on Coagulation and Melting (περὶ πήξεως καὶ τήξεως), on various phenomena of organic and spiritual life (Diog. Laërt. v. 45, ib. Menag., 43, 46, 49, 43, 44); on the Soul and Sensuous Perception (ib. 46), not without regard to the corresponding works of Aristotle, as may at least in part be demonstrated. In like manner we find mention of monographies of Theophrastus on the older Greek physiologians Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, Empedocles, Archelaus (Diog. Laërt. v. 42, 43), Diogenes of Apollonia, Democritus (ib. 43), which were not unfrequently made use of by Simplicius; and also on Xenocrates (ib. 47), against the Academics (49), and a sketch of the political doctrine of Plato (ib. 43), which shows that the Eresian followed his master likewise in the critico-historical department of inquiry. That he also included general history within the circle of his scientific investigation, we see from the quotations in Plutarch's lives of Lycurgus, Solon, Aristides, Pericles, Nicias, Alcibiades, Lysander, Agesilaus, and Demosthenes, which were probably borrowed from the work on Lives (περὶ βίων γ, Diog. Laërt. v. 42). But his principal endeavours were directed to the supplementation and continuation of the labours of Aristotle in the domain of natural history. This is testified not only by a number of treatises on individual subjects of zoology, of which, besides the titles, but few fragments remain, but also by his books on Stones and Metals, and his works on the History, and on the Parts of Plants, which have come down to us entire. In politics, also, he seems to have trodden in the footsteps of Aristotle. Besides his books on the State, we find quoted various treatises on Education (ib. 42, 50), on Royalty (ib. 47, 45), on the Best State, on Political Morals, and particularly his works on the Laws, one of which, containing a recapitulation of the laws of various barbaric as well as Grecian states (Νόμων κατὰ στοιχεῖον κδ', Diog. Laërt. v. 44, ib. Menag.), was intended to form a pendant to Aristotle's delineation of Politics, and must have stood in close relation to it. (Cic. de Fin. v. 4.)

Of the books of Theophrastus on oratory and poetry, almost all that we know is, that in them also Aristotle was not passed by without reference. (Cic. de Invent. i. 35.)

Theophrastus, without doubt, departed farther from his master in his ethical writings (ib. 42, 48, 44, 45, 47, 49, 50), as also in his metaphysical investigations respecting motion, the soul, and the Deity. (Ib. 47, 48.)

Besides the writings belonging to the above-mentioned branches of science, Theophrastus was the author of others, partly of a miscellaneous kind, as, for instance, several collections of problems, out of which some things at least have passed into the Problems which have come down to us under the name of Aristotle (Diog. Laërt. v. 45, 47, 48; comp. Plin. H N. xxviii. 6; Arist. Probl. xxxiii. 12), and commentaries (Diog. Laërt. v. 48, 49; comp. 43), partly dialogues (Basil. Magn. Epist. 167), to which probably belonged the Ἐρωτικός (Diog. Laërt. v. 43; Athen. xii. 2, xiii. 2), Megacles (Diog. Laërt. 47), Callisthenes (ἢ περὶ πένθους, Diog. Laërt. v. 44; Cic. Tusc. iii. 10; Alex. Aphrod. de Anima ii. extr.), and Μεγαρικός (Diog. Laërt. v. 44), and letters (Diog. Laërt. v. 46, 50), partly books on mathematical sciences and their history (ib. 42, 46, 48, 50).

Besides the two great works on botany (περὶ φυτῶν ἱστορία, in ten books, written about Ol. 118; see Schneider, Theoph. Opp. iv. p. 586; and αἴτια φυσικά, in six books), we only possess some more or less ample fragments of works by Theophrastus, or extracts from them, among which the ethical characters, that is, delineations of character, and the treatise on sensuous perception and its objects (περὶ αἰσθήσεως [καὶ αἰσθητῶν]) are the most considerable, the first important as a contribution to the ethical history of that time, the latter for a knowledge of the doctrines of the more ancient Greek philosophers respecting the subject indicated. With the latter class of works we may connect the fragments on smells (περὶ ὀσμῶν), on fatigue (περὶ κόπων), on giddiness (περὶ ἰλίγγων), on sweat (περὶ ἱδρώτων), on swooning (περὶ λειποψυχίας), on palsy (περὶ παραλύσεως), and on honey (περὶ μέλιτος). To physics, in the narrower sense of the word, belong the still extant sections on fire (περὶ πυρός), on the winds (περὶ ἀνέμων), on the signs of waters, winds, and storms (περὶ σημείων ὑδάτων καὶ πνευμάτων καὶ χειμώνων καὶ εὐδιῶν, probably out of the fourth book of the Meteorology of Theophrastus: περὶ μεταρσίων: see Plut. Quaest. Gr. vii.; comp. Schneider, iv. p. 719, &c.) To the zoology belong six other sections. Also the treatise on stones (περὶ λίθων, written Ol. 116. 2, see Schneider, l. c. iv. p. 585), and on metaphysics (τῶν μετὰ τὰ φυσικά), are only fragments, and there is no reason for assigning the latter to some other author because it is not noticed in Hermippus and Andronicus, especially as Nicolaus (Damascenus) had already mentioned it (see the scholia at the end of the book). But throughout the text of these fragments and extracts is so corrupt that the well-known story of the fate of the books of Aristotle and Theophrastus [ARISTOTELES] might very well admit of application to them. The same is the case with the books on colours, on indivisible lines, and on Xenophanes, Gorgias, and Melissus, which may with greater right be assigned to Theophrastus than to his master, among whose works we now find them. (Respecting the first of these books — περὶ χρωμάτων — see Schneider, l. c. iv p. 864; respecting the second, Diog. Laërt. v. 42, ib. Menag.) Much superior to the older editions of Theophrastus (Aldina, 1498, Basileensis, 1541, Camotiana, Venet. 1552, that of Daniel Heinsius, 1613, &c.) is that by J. G. Schneider (Theophrasti Eresii quae supersunt opera, Lips. 1818–21. 5 vols.), which, however, still needs a careful revision, as the piecemeal manner in which the critical apparatus came to his hands, and his own ill health compelled the editor to append supplements and corrections, twice or thrice, to the text and commentary. Fried. Wimmer has published a new and much improved edition of the history of plants, as the first volume of the entire works of Theophrastus. (Theophrasti opera quae supersunt omnia emendata edidit cum apparatu critico Fr. Wimmer, Tomus primus historiam plantarum continens, Vratislaviae, 1842. 8vo.)

For the explanation of the history of plants considerable contributions were made before Schneider by Bodaeus a Stapel (Amstelod. 1644, fol.) and J. Stackhouse. (Theophr. Eres. de historia plantarum libri X. graece cum syllabo generum et specierum glossario et notis, curante Joh. Stackhouse, Oxon. 1813. 2 vols. 8vo.)

III. How far Theophrastus attached himself to the Aristotelic doctrines, how he defined them more closely, or conceived them in a different form, and what additional structures of doctrine he formed upon them, can be determined but very partially owing to the scantiness of the statements which we have, and what belongs to this subject can be merely indicated in this place. In the first place, Theophrastus seems to have carried out still further the grammatical foundation of logic and rhetoric, since in his book on the elements of speech (ἐν τῷ περὶ τοῦ λόγου στοιχείῳ, l. ἐν τῷ περὶ τῶν τοῦ λόγου στοιχείων), respecting which again others had written, he distinguished the main parts of speech from the subordinate parts, and again, direct (κυρία λέξις) from metaphorical expressions, and treated of the affections (πάθη) of speech (Simpl. in Categ. 8, Basil.), and further distinguished a twofold reference of speech (σχέσις) — to things (πράγματα), and to the hearers, and referred poetry and rhetoric to the latter (Ammon. de Interpr. 53; Schol. in Arist. p. 108. 27). In what he taught respecting judgment (ἐν τῷ περὶ καταφάσεως [καὶ ἀποφάσεως] — de affirmatione et negatione) he had treated at length on its oneness (Alex. in Anal. Pr. f. 128, 124; Schol. in Arist. p. 184. 24. 183, b. 2; Boëth. de Interpr. pp. 291, 327), on the different kinds of negation (Ammon. in Arist. de Interpr. 128, b. 129, 134; Schol. in Arist. p. 121. 18), and on the difference between unconditioned and conditioned necessity (Alex. l. c. f. 12. 6; Schol. in Arist. p. 149. 44). In his doctrine of syllogisms he brought forward the proof for the conversion of universal affirmative judgments, differed from Aristotle here and there in the laying down and arranging the modi of the syllogisms (Alex. l. c. 14, 72, 73, 82. 22, b, 35; Boëth. de Syll. categ. ii. 594. 5, f. 603, 615), partly in the proof of them (Alex. l. c. 39, b), partly in the doctrine of mixture, i. e. of the influence of the modality of the premises upon the modality of the conclusion (Alex. l. c. 39, b. &c. 40, 42, 56, b. 82, 64, b. 51; Joh. Ph. xxxii, b. &c.). Then in two separate works he had treated of the reduction of arguments to the syllogistic form (ἀνηγμένων λόγων εἰς τὰ σχήματα) and on the resolution of them (περὶ ἀναλύσεως συλλογισμῶν. Alex. 115); further, of hypothetical conclusions (Alex. in Arist. Anal. Pr. 109, b. &c. 131, b.; Joh. Phil. lx. &c. lxxv.; Boëth. de Syll. hypoth. p. 606). For the doctrine of proof, Galenus quotes the second Analytic of Theophrastus, in conjunction with that of Aristotle, as the best treatises on that doctrine (de Hippocr. et Plat. Dogm. ii. 2. p. 213, Lips. 253, Basil.) In different monographies he seems to have endeavoured to expand it into a general theory of science. To this too may have belonged the proposition quoted from his Topics, that the principia of opposites (τῶν ἐναντίων) are themselves opposed, and cannot be deduced from one and the same higher genus. (Simpl. in Categ. f. 5; Schol. p. 89. 15; comp. Alex. in Metaph. p. 342. 30, Bonitz.) For the rest, some inconsiderable deviations from the Aristotelic definitions are quoted from the Topica of Theophrastus. (Alex. in Top. 5, 68, 72, 25, 31.) With this treatise, that upon ambiguous words or ideas (περὶ τοῦ ποσαχῶς, π. τ. πολλαχῶς. Alex. ib. 83, 189), which, without doubt, corresponded to the book E of Aristotle's Metaphysics, seems to have been closely connected.

Theophrastus introduced his Physics with the proof that all natural existence, being corporeal, that is composite, presupposes principia (Simpl. in Phys. f. 1, 6, in Schneider v. 7), and before everything else, motion, as the basis of the changes common to all (ib. 5, 6; Schneid. ib. 6). Denying the subsistence of space, he seems to have been disposed, in opposition to the Aristotelic definition, to regard it as the mere arrangement and position (τάξις and θέσις) of bodies (Simpl. l. c. 149, b. 141; Schneid. p. 213, f. 9, 8). Time he designated as an accident of motion, without, as it seems, conceiving it, with Aristotle, as the numerical determination of motion. (Simpl. f. 87, b; Joh. 213. 4.) He departed more widely from his master in his doctrine of motion, since on the one hand he extended it over all categories, and did not limit it to those laid down by Aristotle (Simpl. in Categ. Schneid. p. 212; comp. Simpl. in Phys. 94, 201, 202, l. Schneid. 214. 10); and on the other hand, while he conceived it, with Aristotle, as an activity, not carrying its own end in itself (ἀτελής), of that which only exists potentially (Simpl. l. c. and f. 94, l. Schneid. 11), and therefore could not allow that the activity expended itself in motion, he also recognised no activity without motion (Simpl. in Categ. Schneid. 212. 2), and so was obliged to refer all activities of the soul to motion, the desires and affections to corporeal motion, judgment (κρίσεις) and contemplation to spiritual motion. (Simpl. in Phys. 225; Schneid. 215. 13.) The conceivableness of a spirit entirely independent of organic activity, must therefore have appeared to him very doubtful; yet he appears to have contented himself with developing his doubts and difficulties on the point, without positively rejecting it (Themist. in Arist. de An. 89, b. 91, b; Schneid. 215. 15). Other Peripatetics, as Dicaearchus, Aristoxenus, and especially Straton, more unreservedly and unconditionally gave a sensualistic turn to the Aristotelic doctrine. Theophrastus seems, generally speaking, where the investigation overstepped the limits of experience, to have shown more acuteness in the development of difficulties than in the solution of them, as is especially apparent in the fragment of his metaphysics. In a penetrating and unbiassed conception of phenomena, in acuteness of reflection and combination respecting them and within their limits, in compass and certainty of experimental knowledge, he may have stood near Aristotle, if he did not come quite up to him: the incessant endeavour of his great master to refer phenomena to their ultimate grounds, his profundity in unfolding the internal connections between the latter, and between them and phenomena, were not possessed by Theophrastus. Hence even in antiquity it was a subject of complaint that Theophrastus had not expressed himself with precision and consistency respecting the Deity, and had understood thereby at one time Heaven, at another an (enlivening) breath (πνεῦμα, Clem. Alex. Protrept. p. 44. b; Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 13); that he had not been able to comprehend a happiness resting merely upon virtue (Cic. Acad. i. 10, Tusc. v. 9), or, consequently, to hold fast by the unconditional value of morality, and, although blameless in his life, had subordinated moral requirements to the advantage at least of a friend. (A. Gell. N. A. i. 3. § 23), and had admitted in prosperity the existence of an influence injurious to them. (In particular, fault was found with his expression in the Callisthenes, vitam regit fortuna non sapientia, Cic. Tusc. iii. 10; comp. Alex. Aphrod. de Anima, ii. extr.) That in the definition of pleasure, likewise, he did not coincide with Aristotle, seems to be indicated by the titles of two of his writings, one of which treated of pleasure generally, the other of pleasure, as Aristotle had defined it (Diog. Laërt. v. 44, περὶ ἡδονῆς ὡς Ἀριστοτέλης); and although, like his teacher, he preferred contemplative (theoretic), to active (practical) life (Cic. ad Att. ii. 16), he was at the same time disposed to set the latter free from the fetters of family life, &c. in a manner of which the former would not have approved (Hieron. adv. Jovinian. i, 189, Bened.) Respecting Theophrastus's treatment of botany in his two chief works, see J. G. Schneider, "de Auctoritate, Integritate, Argumento, Ordine, Methodo et Pretio Librorum, de Historia et Causis Plantarum" (Theophr. Opp. v. p. 227—264.) Comp. R. Sprengel, Geschichte der Botanik, vol. i. p. 52, &c. [CH. A. B.]

THEOPHYLACTUS (Θεοφύλακτος). 1. SIMOCATTA (ὁ Σιμοκάττης, Σιμόκαττος, Σιμοκάτης, or Σιμοκάτος, for all these forms of the name are found), was an Egyptian by descent, but a Locrian by birth; and flourished at Constantinople, where he held some public offices (ἀπὸ ἐπάρχων καὶ ἀντιγραφεύς, Phot.) under Heraclius, about A. D. 610—629, though it is evident that he was writing before this period, probably in retirement. His chief work was a history of the reign of the emperor Maurice, in eight books, from the death of Tiberius II. and the accession of Maurice, in A. D. 582, down to the murder of Maurice and his children by Phocas in A. D. 602. There are various indications in the work itself, that Theophylact was living and writing in retirement during the reign of Phocas, and it seems probable that he had been personally acquainted with Maurice. Thus, he contrasts the depressed state of literature under Phocas with the favour it enjoyed under Heraclius, in a Dialogue between Philosophy and History, which is prefixed to his work. After the death of Phocas in A. D. 610, he read in public from an elevated position the passage of his history describing the death of Maurice, and the people were moved to tears by the recital. This statement, which we have on the authority of Theophylact himself (viii. 12) proves that his work was partly written during the reign of Phocas; while on the other hand, he mentions in the same chapter the conclusion of the Persian war, by the death of Chosroes II. in A. D. 628, so that the work could not have been completed till that year or the next, in which Theophylact appears to have died. The history of Theophylact, which is known by the Latin title of Historiae Mauricii Tiberii Imperatoris Libri VIII., seems to be the same work which is quoted by Eustathius (ad Dionys. Perieg. 730) by the title of ἱστορία οἰκουμενή, which seems to refer to the fact, that it was not confined to the affairs of Constantinople, but contained notices of events occurring in all parts of the known world. Besides the work itself, we have an epitome of it by Photius (Bibl. Cod. 65), who relates some particulars respecting the author, and characterises his style very minutely, as being not destitute of grace, but often frigid and puerile through the frequent occurrence of figures and allegorical turns of expression, and tiresome from the interruptions of moral reflections inserted out of season. The other works of Theophylact are (2) Eighty-five Letters, consisting of the three classes of Morales, twenty-nine in number, Rusticae, twenty-eight, and Amatoriae, twenty-eight; and (3) Problems in Physics (Ἀπορίαι Φυσικαί, Quaestiones Physicae), respecting the nature of animals, and especially of man.

There is no complete edition of Theophylact's works. The edition of A. Schottus, with a Latin Version by Kimedoncius, Antverp. 1598, 1599, 8vo., comprising all his then known works, does not contain the History, but only the Epitome of it by Photius. The account of embassies in this edition is no distinct work, but a collection of extracts from the History. The History was first published, from a MS. in the library of Maximilian of Bavaria, with a Latin version, by Jac. Pontanus, Ingolst. 1604, 4to.; revised, and with a Glossary of the low Greek words, by C. Annib. Fabrotti, Paris, 1648, fol.; reprinted in the Venice collection of Byzantine historians, 1729, fol.: it has also been edited by Imm. Bekker, in the Corpus Script. Hist. Byzant. Bonn, 1834, 8vo. The Letters were published in the Epistolae Graecae of Aldus, 1499, 4to. and of Cujacius, 1606, fol., and, in Latin only, by Haller, Cracov. 1509, 4to. The Quaestiones Physicae were published, with the similar work of Cassius Iatrosophista, by Rivinus, Lips. 1653, 4to. The Letters and Physical Questions were published together, Lugd. Bat. 1596, 12mo., with the works of Cassius Iatrosophista; again, with the Quaestiones of Cassius, and the Letters of Julian, Gallus, Basil, and Gregory of Nazianzus, by Bonaventura Vulcanius, Lugd. Bat. 1597, 12mo.; and, lastly, with the Latin version of Kimedoncius, and critical notes, by Boissonade, Paris, 1835, 8vo. There is a French translation of the Quaestiones Physicae, by F. Morel, Paris, 1603, 12mo. (Cave, Hist. Litt. s. a. 611, p. 575; Hankius, de Byzant. Rer. Scriptor. pt. i. pp. 186—194; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. pp. 329, 330, ed. Westermann; Fabric. *Bibl. 2. ARCHBISHOP OF BULGARIA, flourished about A. D. 1070 and onwards, and is celebrated for his commentaries on the Scriptures, and some other works. There are scarcely any particulars of his life worth recording. He appears to have been a native of Constantinople, and a deacon in the principal church there, and to have been appointed to the archbishopric of Bulgaria, the chief city of which was Acris, between A. D. 1070 and 1077. Here he suffered much from the uncivilised state of the people of his province, and tried in vain to lay down his office. He appears to have lived down to A. D. 1112, or later.

His Commentaries upon the Gospels, the Acts, the Epistles of Paul, and the Minor Prophets, are founded on the commentaries of Chrysostom, and are of considerable value. He also wrote a treatise on royal education (Παιδεία Βασιλική, Institutio Regia) for the use of the prince Constantinus Porphyrogennetus, the son of Michael VII.; seventy-five Letters; some Homilies and Orations, and a few other small treatises. A splendid edition of all his works in Greek and Latin was published by J. F. Bernard Maria de Rubeis, Venet. 1754—1763, 4 vols. folio, with a Preliminary Dissertation, containing all that is known of the life and writings of Theophylact, with an elaborate analysis of his works and his opinions. (See also Cave, Hist. Litt. s. a. 1077, p. 153; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. pp. 586—598; Schröckh, Christ. Kirchengeschichte, vol. xxviii. pp. 313, foll.; for an account of several editions of portions of his works, see Hoffmann, Lexicon Bibliogr. Script. Graec.)

THEOPOMPUS (Θεόπομπος), king of Sparta, and 9th of the Eurypontidae. His name is connected with two important but obscure events in Spartan history, viz. the establishment of the power of the ephors, and the first Messenian war. With respect to the former, it was about 130 years, according to Plutarch, after the legislation of Lycurgus, that the popular party obtained the ephoralty from Theopompus, as a check on the oligarchy; on which occasion he was reproached by his wife for his tameness in surrendering so large a portion of the royal prerogative, and defended himself by alleging that its limitation would ensure its continuance. (Plut. Lyc. 7; Aristot. Pol. v. 11, ed. Bekk.) From Plutarch, however, we also learn that Theopompus and his colleague Polydorus gave additional stringency to the Rhetra, which enjoined that the popular assembly should simply accept or reject the measures proposed by the senate and the kings, without introducing any amendment or modification of them; and from the oligarchical character of this act of Theopompus, Müller argues that the extended political power of the ephors could not have originated in his time. More satisfactory, however, is the explanation of Plitner and Arnold, that the people obtained the institution of ephors by way of compensation for the Rhetra in question, and that "the king was obliged to confirm those liberties, which he had vainly endeavoured to overthrow." (Plut. Lyc. 6, comp. Cleom. 10; Müller, Dor. iii. 5. § 8, 7. § 2; C. F. Hermann, Pol. Ant. ch. 2. § 43; Arnold, Thuc. vol. i. App. 2; G. C. Lewis, in the Philol. Museum, vol. ii. pp. 51, 52.) As to the first Messenian war, thus much appears from Tyrtaeus, that Theopompus was mainly instrumental in bringing it to a successful issue, though the inference of Pausanias, that he lived to complete the actual subjugation of Messenia, is more than the words of the poet warrant. They are, however, inconsistent with the date which Eusebius assigns to the death of Theopompus, viz. B. C. 740. Clinton gives, for the duration of his reign, about B. C. 770—720. But we can arrive at no certainty in the chronology of this period. According to the Messenian account, Theopompus was slain, not long before the end of the war, by Aristomenes, while the Spartan tradition was, that he was only wounded by him. We are accustomed, indeed, to regard Aristomenes as the hero of the second war; but this, after all, is a doubtful point. (Paus. 4, 6, &c.; Plut. Agis. 21; Müller, Dor. App. ix.; Clint. F. H. vol. ii. App. ch. 3; Grote's Greece vol. ii. pp. 558, 559.) [E. E.]

THEOPOMPUS (Θεόπομπος), literary. 1. An Athenian comic poet, of the Old, and also of the Middle Comedy, was the son of Theodectes or Theodorus, or Tisamenus. (Suid. s. v.; Aelian. ap. Suid. ib. and s. vv. Παρίας λίθου, Φθόη). According to Suidas, he was contemporary with Aristophanes; but the fragments and titles of his plays give evidence that he wrote during the latest period of the Old Comedy, and during the Middle Comedy, as late as B. C. 380. Of his personal history we have no information, except a story, of a fabulous appearance, about his being cured of a disease by Aesculapius, which Suidas (ll. cc.) copies from Aelian, with a description of a piece of statuary in Parian marble, which was made in commemoration of the cure, and which represented Theopompus lying on a couch, by the side of which the god stood, handing medicine to the poet; there was also a boy standing by the couch.

The number of dramas exhibited by Theopompus is differently stated at seventeen (Anon. de Com. p. xxiv.) and twenty-four (Suid., Eudoc.). We possess twenty titles, namely, Ἄδμητος, Ἀλθαία, Ἀφροδίσια, Βατύλη, Εἰρήνη, Ἡδυχάρης, Θησεύς, Κάλλαισχρος, Καπηλίδες, Μῆδος, Νεμέα, Ὀδυσσεύς, Παῖδες, Παμφίλη, Πανταλέων, Πηνελόπη, Σειρῆνες, Στρατιώτιδες, Τισάμενος, Φινεύς. Three other plays, besides those which are merely variations of the above titles, are erroneously ascribed to Theopompus, namely, Ἐποποιοί, Πόλεις, Τρικάρανος. The extant fragments of Theopompus contain examples of the declining purity of the Attic dialect. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 501—503; Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 236—244, vol. ii. pp. 792—823; Editio Minor, pp. 441—457; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. Introd. pp. xlvii., xlviii).

2. Of Sinope, the author of a work on earthquakes, quoted by Phlegon (de Reb. Mirab. 19).

3. Of Colophon, an epic poet, whose book entitled ἁρμάτιον is quoted by Athenaeus (iv. p. 183, b.; comp. Fulgent. Mythol. p. 36; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iv. 57; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 40, ed. Westermann, in whose note two or three other persons of the name are mentioned). [P. S.]

THEOPOMPUS (Θεόπομπος), of Chios, the historian, was the son of Damasistratus and the brother of Caucalus, the rhetorician. He accompanied his father into banishment, when the latter was exiled on account of his espousing the interests of the Lacedaemonians, but was restored to his native country in the forty-fifth year of his age, after the death of his father, in consequence of the letters of Alexander the Great, in which he exhorted the Chians to recal their exiles (Phot. Cod. 176, p. 120, b. ed. Bekker). But as these letters could not have been written at the earliest till after the battle of Granicus, we may place the restoration of Theopompus in B. C. 333, and his birth in B. C. 378. Suidas assigns a much earlier date to Theopompus, stating that he was born at the same time as Ephorus, during the anarchy at Athens in the 93d Olympiad, that is in B. C. 404; but as we know that Theopompus was alive in B. C. 305, we may safely conclude that Suidas is in error, and that the date in Photius is the correct one. In what year Theopompus quitted Chios with his father, can only be matter of conjecture; and the various suppositions of the learned on the point are not worth repeating here. We know, however, that before he left his native country, he attended the school of rhetoric which Isocrates opened at Chios, and he profited so much by the lessons of his great master, that he was regarded by the ancients as the most distinguished of all his scholars. (Plut. Vit. dec. Orat. p. 837, b; Phot. Cod. 260; Dionys. Ep. ad Cn. Pomp. c. 6.) Ephorus the historian was a fellow-student with him, but was of a very different character; and Isocrates used to say of them, that Theopompus needed the bit and Ephorus the spur. (Cic. Brut. 56, ad Att. vi. 1. § 12.) In consequence of the advice of Isocrates, Theopompus did not devote his oratorical powers to the pleading of causes, but gave his chief attention to the study and composition of history. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 13, 22.) Like his master Isocrates, however, he composed many orations of the kind, called Epideitic by the Greeks, that is, speeches on set subjects delivered for display, such as eulogiums upon states and individuals, and similar subjects. He himself tells us that there was no important city of Greece, in which he had not remained some time, and where he had not obtained great glory by the public exhibition of his oratorical powers. One instance of the kind is recorded. In B. C. 352 he contended at Halicarnassus with Naucrates and his master Isocrates for the prise of oratory, given by Artemisia in honour of her husband, and gained the victory (Gell. x. 18; Plut. Vit. dec. Orat. p. 838, b; Euseb. Praep. Ev. x. 3.) The other places which he visited are not mentioned; but it appears from his own account, to which we have already referred, that he spent the greater part of the time of his exile in travelling, and in the acquisition of knowledge. He was able to pursue this mode of life in consequence of his possessing a large fortune, which released him from the necessity of working for his livelihood, like Isocrates, by writing speeches for others, and giving instruction in oratory. (Phot. Cod. 176; Dionys. Ep. ad Cn. Pomp. c. 6; Athen. iii. p. 85, b.) On his return to his native country in B. C. 333, Theopompus, from his eloquence, acquirements and wealth, naturally took an important position in the state; but his vehement temper, haughty bearing, and above all his support of the aristocratical party, which he had inherited from his father, soon raised against him a host of enemies. Of these one of the most formidable was the sophist Theocritus, who had also been a pupil of Isocrates, and who likewise attacked Alexander and Aristotle in the bitterest manner. (Strab. xiv. p. 645.) As long as Alexander lived, his enemies dared not take any open proceedings against Theopompus; and even after the death of the Macedonian monarch, he appears to have enjoyed for some years the protection of the royal house. But when he lost this support, he was expelled from Chios as a disturber of the public peace. He fled to Egypt to king Ptolemy. (Phot. l. c.) Ptolemy did not assume the title of king till B. C. 306, and consequently if the expression of Photius is to be taken literally, we may place the arrival of Theopompus in Egypt in B. C. 305, when he was seventy-five years of age. Photius adds that Ptolemy not only refused to receive Theopompus, but would even have put him to death as a dangerous busybody, had not some of his friends interceded for his life. Of his further fate we have no particulars, but he probably died soon afterwards.

The following is a list of the works of Theopompus, none of which have come down to us.

1. Ἐπιτομὴ τῶν Ἡροδότου ἱστοριῶν, An Epitome of the History of Herodotus. This work is mentioned by Suidas, and in a few passages of the grammarians; but it has been questioned by Vossius whether it was really drawn up by Theopompus, on the ground that it is improbable that a writer of his attainments and skill in historical composition would have engaged in such a task. It has therefore been supposed that it was executed by some later writer, who prefixed to it the well-known name of Theopompus. It is, however, not impossible that Theopompus may have made the Epitome at an early period of his life as an exercise in composition.

2. Ἑλληνικαὶ ἱστορίαι or Σύνταξις Ἑλληνικῶν, A History of Greece, in twelve books, was a continuation of the history of Thucydides. It commenced in B. C. 411, at the point where the history of Thucydides breaks off, and embraced a period of seventeen years down to the battle of Cnidus in B. C. 394 (Diod. xiii. 42, xiv. 84; Marcellin. Vit. Thucyd. 45). Only a few fragments of this work are preserved.

3. Φιλιππικά, also called Ἱστορίαι (κατ' ἐξοχήν), The History of Philip, father of Alexander the Great, in fifty-eight books, from the commencement of his reign B. C. 360, to his death B. C. 336. (Diod. xvi. 3; Phot. Cod. 176.) Schweighaeuser supposed that the Hellenics and the Philippics formed one work, which was called the History of Theopompus, but this opinion has been satisfactorily refuted by Clinton. (Fasti Hell. vol. ii. pp. 374, 375, 2d ed.) Wherever the History of Theopompus is quoted by the ancient writers without any distinguishing name, the Philippics are always meant, as this was the more important work; when the Grecian history is meant, it is cited by the title of Hellenics. Moreover, as Clinton justly remarks, these two works cannot be said to form one corpus historicum; they did not proceed in one unbroken series, for the first work terminated in B. C. 394, and the second began in B. C. 360, thus leaving a space of thirty-four years between them, which did not belong to either. The great length of the Philippics was not so much owing to the minute account which it gave of the life and reign of Philip, as to the numerous digressions of all kinds with which it abounded. For as it was the original intention of Theopompus to write a history of the whole of Greece (comp. Polyb. viii. 13), he eagerly availed himself of every opportunity that occurred to give an account of other Greek states. Such a digression sometimes occupied several books, as we learn from Diodorus (xvi. 71), who informs us that the 41st, 42d, and 43d books were devoted to the history of Sicily. Moreover in these digressions Theopompus did not confine himself to contemporaneous events, but frequently ascended to fabulous times. The digressions in fact formed by far the larger part of the work; and Philip V. king of Macedonia, was able, by omitting them and retaining only what belonged to the proper subject, to reduce the work from fifty-eight books to sixteen. (Phot. l. c.) Fifty-three of the fifty-eight books of the original work were extant in the ninth century of the Christian aera, and were read by Photius, who has preserved an abstract of the twelfth book. (Phot. l. c.) The five books lost in the time of Photius were the 6th, 7th, 9th, 20th, and 30th, and these were, without doubt, the same five books, which were missing as early as the time of Diodorus (xvi. 3). The Hellenics probably perished earlier, as they were less celebrated: Photius, at least, appears not to have read them. The two works, the Hellenics and Philippics, contained together, according to Theopompus's own statement, 150,000 lines (Phot. l. c.) The Philippics are constantly quoted by the ancient writers, and many fragments of them are preserved.

4. Orations, which were chiefly Panegyrics, and what the Greeks called Συμβουλευτικοὶ λόγοι. Besides the Panegyric on Mausolus, which has been already alluded to, Theopompus wrote Panegyrics on Philip and Alexander (Theon, Progymn. pp. 9, 103; Suidas, s. v. Ἔφορος). Of his Συμβουλευτικοὶ λόγοι, one of the most celebrated was addressed to Alexander on the state of Chios, and is variously cited by the ancients under the titles of Συμβουλαὶ πρὸς Ἀλέξανδρον (Athen. vi. p. 230, f.), Συμβουλευτικὸν πρὸς Ἀλεξάνδρον (Cic. ad Att. xii. 40), and Ἐπιστολὴ πρὸς Ἀλέξανδρον (Athen. xiii. p. 595).

5. Κατὰ Πλάτωνος διατριβή (Athen. xi. p. 508, c; Diog. Laërt. iii. 40), was perhaps a digression in his Philippics; and the same appears to have been the case with his work which is cited under the title of

6. Περὶ εὐσεβείας (Schol. ad Aristoph. Av. 1354; Porphyr. de Abstin. ii. 16).

The work which Anaximenes published under the name of Theopompus, in order to injure his rival, is spoken of in the life of the former. [Vol. I. p. 166, b.]

Theopompus is praised by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (l. c.) as well as by other ancient writers for his diligence and accuracy; but he is at the same time blamed by most writers for the extravagance of his praises and censures. He is said, however, to have taken more pleasure in blaming than in commending; and many of his judgments respecting events and characters were expressed with such acrimony and severity that several of the ancient writers speak of his malignity, and call him a reviler (Corn. Nep. Alcib. c. 11; Clem. Alex. i. p. 316; Lucian, Quomodo Histor. conscrib. c. 59; Plut. Lysand. c. 30; Polyb. viii. 12). It would seem that the vehemence of the temper of Theopompus frequently overcame his judgment, and prevented him from expressing himself with the calmness and impartiality of an historian. The ancients also blame Theopompus for introducing innumerable fables into his history (Cic. de Leg. i. 1; Aelian, V. H. iii. 18).

The style of Theopompus was formed on the model of Isocrates, and possessed the characteristic merits and defects of his master. It was pure, clear, and elegant, but deficient in vigour, loaded with ornament, and in general too artificial. It is praised in high terms by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (l. c.), but is spoken of in very different language by other critics. (Longin. de Subl. c. 43; Demetr. Phal. περὶ ἑρμην. § 75; Plut. Praec. ger. Reip. c. 6, p. 803, b.)

The fragments of Theopompus have been published by Wichers, under the title of Theopompi Chii Fragmenta, collegit, disposuit et explicavit, &c. R. H. Eyssonius Wichers, Lugd. Bat. 1829, and by C. and Theod. Müller in the Fragmenta Historicorum Graecorum, Paris, 1841. (The life of Theopompus prefixed to the collections of Fragments by Wichers and Müller; Aschbach, Dissert. de Theopomp. Francof. 1823; Pflugk, De Theopomp. Vita et Scriptis, Berol. 1827; Vossius, De Historicis Graecis, p. 59, foll., ed. Westermann; Clinton, Fasti Hellenici, vol. ii. p. 374, foll. 2nd ed.)

THEOPOMPUS, artist. [THEOPROPUS.]

THEO'PROPUS (Θεόπροπος), a statuary of Aegina, who made a bronze bull, which was dedicated by the Corcyreans at Delphi, as a tithe of their profits from a shoal of fish, which they discovered by means of a bull, according to the story related by Pausanias (x. 9. § 2. s. 3, 4). The reading of the name is doubtful: the common text has Θεοπρόπου, but other MSS. give Θεοπρεποῦς and Θεοπόμπου, the latter of which readings is approved by Schubart and Walz, and adopted by Thiersch. (Epochen, p. 197.) [P. S.]

THEOSE'BIA (Θεοσεβία), the writer of an epigram in the Greek Anthology upon the physician Ablabius, was the sister of the philosopher Zosimus of Thebes, who dedicated to her his work on chemistry, and who appears to have lived under Theodosius II., about A. D. 420. (Suid. s. v. Ζώσιμος; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 497, new ed., and vol. xii. p. 753, old ed.; Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 450; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 156, vol. xiii. p. 961.) [P. S.]

THEOSTERICTUS, a Greek monk in Bithynia, lived in the reigns of Michael II. Balbus (A. D. 820—829) and of his son Theophilus (A. D. 829—842). He wrote the life of his master Nicetas the Confessor, which is published by Surius, vol. ii. d. 3. April. (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 343, ed. Westermann; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 719.)

THEOTI'MUS (Θεότιμος), a Greek writer of unknown date, wrote upon Italy (Plut. Parall. min. c. 8), Cyrene (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iv. 61, v. 33), and the Nile (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. vii. 33). Athenaeus (xiii. p. 611, b.) speaks of a stoic philosopher of the name of Theotimus, but in that passage Diotimus ought probably to be substituted. [DIOTIMUS, No. 5.] (Comp. Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 505, ed. Westermann.)

THEOTYCHUS. [THEODOTUS.]

THEO'XENA (Θεόξενα). 1. The last wife of Agathocles, king of Syracuse, to whom she bore two children. She is called by Justin an Egyptian princess, but her parentage is unknown. Droysen, however, conjectures that she was a daughter of Berenice by her first husband. According to Justin, Agathocles, when he felt his death approaching, sent away Theoxena and her two children to Egypt, but the whole of his narrative is subject to grave difficulties. (Justin. xxiii. 2 Droysen, Hellenism. vol. i. pp. 560, 602.)

2. A daughter of Herodicus, a noble Thessalian, who had been put to death by Philip V. king of Macedonia. Many years afterwards, the increasing suspicions and cruelty of that monarch having led him to contemplate the destruction of the children of all those whom he had previously executed, Theoxena sought to make her escape by sea with her husband Poris and her two nephews, whom she had adopted; but the ship being driven back, in order to avoid falling into the hands of the king's emissaries, she slew her nephews with her own hand, and then threw herself with her husband into the sea. (Liv. xl. 4.) [E. H. B.]

THEOXE'NIUS (Θεοξένιος), a surname of Apollo and Hermes. (Paus. vii. 27. § 2; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. ix. 146, Nem. x. 32.) Respecting the festival of the Theoxenia, see Dict. of Antiq. s. v. [L. S.]

THEO'XENUS (Θεόξενος), commanded the Achaean troops, who assisted the Rhodians in B. C. 197. (Liv. xxxiii. 18.)

THEO'XOTUS, the maker of a very beautiful painted vase, found at Vulci, and now in the collection of M. Durand. It is painted black, with decorations in white and violet, and bears the inscription ΘΕΟΞΟΤΟΣ ΜΕΠΟΕΣΕ, that is, Θεόξοτός με ἐποίησε, according to the interpretation of De Witte (Cab. Durand. No. 884), and Raoul-Rochette (Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 60, 2d ed.); but Panofka prefers to read the name Θεοζότος, or its equivalent Θεόσδοτος, comparing the form with the kindred name Θεοσδοτίδης, which occurs in Plato and Demosthenes. (Rhein. Mus. 1846, vol. iv.

pp. 135, 136; Pape, Wörterbuch d. Griech. Eigennamen.) [P. S.]

THERA'MENES (Θηραμένης). 1. A Lacedaemonian, was sent in B. C. 412 to conduct to Astyochus (the Spartan admiral on the coast of Asia) a reinforcement of 55 ships from the Peloponnesians and the Sicilian Greeks. This armament by its opportune arrival saved Miletus, which the Athenians were preparing to besiege; and it then assisted Tissaphernes in the reduction of Iasus, and the capture of Amorges. After this it returned to Miletus, where, in the disputes with Tissaphernes about the amount of pay which he was to furnish, Theramenes, as not being admiral, seems to have been far too compliant. A second treaty, however, more stringent than the former, was made with the satrap, after which Theramenes delivered up the fleet to Astyochus, and sailed away in a small vessel; and the language of Thucydides seems to mean that he was drowned on the voyage. (Thuc. viii. 26—29, 31, 36, 38, 43; Arnold, ad Thuc. viii. 38; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. iv. p. 22, note 1.)

2. An Athenian, son of Hagnon, and of the demus of Steiria in the tribe Pandionis. According, however, to other statements, he was a native of Cos, and Hagnon only adopted him (Plut. Nic. 2; Schol. ad Arist. Ran. 541, 968; Suid. s. v. Δεξιός). It is doubtful also whether the Hagnon in question was the same as the Athenian founder of Amphipolis; but he must have been at any rate a man of high repute, since we find it mentioned (Xen. Hell. ii. 3. § 30), that Theramenes first acquired notice and respect from the character of his father. In B. C. 411, he became prominent as an oligarchical revolutionist, and a leading member of the new government of the 400 (Thuc. viii. 68; Xen. Hell. l. c.). In this, however, he does not appear to have occupied as eminent a station as he had hoped to fill, while at the same time the declaration of Alcibiades and of the army at Samos against the oligarchy made it evident to him that its days were numbered. Acting accordingly with Aristocrates and others, each of whom, like himself, hoped for the foremost place in a restored democracy, he withdrew from the more violent aristocrats and began to cabal against them; professing however to desire, not the overthrow of the existing constitution, but its full establishment, and demanding therefore that the promised assembly of the 5000 should be no longer a name, but a reality. Of this opposition, in fact, Theramenes was the life. He exclaimed against the fortification by the oligarchs of Eetioneia (the mole at the mouth of the Peiraeeus), as part of a design for admitting the enemy into the harbour; for a confirmation of his suspicions he pointed to the fact that the oligarchical ambassadors who had been sent to negotiate peace with Sparta, had returned without having come to any agreement that could be openly avowed; and he insisted that a Peloponnesian fleet, which made its appearance not long after in the Saronic gulf, professedly on its way to help Euboea, was connected with the plot that he was denouncing. He seems also to have instigated the mutiny of the soldiers, who were employed on the works at Eetioneia, and when charged with this by his colleagues in the council, he stoutly denied it, and offered to go down himself and quell the tumult. On his arrival at the scene of disturbance he affected at first to rebuke the mutineers; but, when they called upon him to declare whether he considered the fortification to be for the public good, he consented to its destruction. In the subsequent deposition of the 400, Theramenes of course took a prominent part, and in particular came forward as the accuser of Antiphon and Archeptolemus, who had been his intimate friends, but whose death he was now the mean and cowardly instrument in procuring (Thuc. viii. 89—98; Lys. c. Erat. p. 126; Diod. xiii. 38). In B. C. 410, Theramenes was sent with 30 ships to prevent the construction of the moles and the bridge, which the Euboeans and Boeotians were building over the Euripus, to connect Euboea with the mainland, and so to render it more defensible against the Athenians. He was unable, however, to interrupt this work; and he then proceeded to cruise among the islands, where he exacted contributions, strengthened the democratic factions, and overthrew the oligarchical government at Paros (Diod. xiii. 47; comp. Strab. ix. pp. 400, 403, x. p. 407). In the same year he went with a squadron to aid Archelaus, king of Macedonia, in the reduction of Pydna [ARCHELAUS]; but, the siege lasting a long time, he sailed away to Thrace to join the fleet under Thrasybulus, and they then cruised about and levied money until they were called away by a despatch from the Athenian navy at Cardia. The great battle of Cyzicus followed, in which Theramenes commanded one of the three divisions of the Athenian force, the other two being under Alcibiades and Thrasybulus respectively (Xen. Hell. i. 1. §§ 12, &c.; Diod. xiii. 49—51). Theramenes also shared in the further successes of Alcibiades, and early in B. C. 408, in particular, he took a main part in the siege of Chalcedon, and the reduction of Byzantium. (Xen. Hell. i. 3. §§ 2, &c.; Diod. xiii. 64, 66, 67.)

At the battle of Arginusae, in B. C. 406, Theramenes held a subordinate command in the right wing of the Athenian fleet, and he was one of those who, after the victory, were commissioned by the generals to repair to the scene of action and save as many as possible of the disabled galleys and their crews. A storm, it is said, rendered the execution of the order impracticable; yet, instead of trusting to this as his ground of defence, Theramenes thought it safer to divert the popular anger from himself to others, and accordingly came prominently forward to accuse the generals of the neglect by which so many lives had been lost; and it appears to have been chiefly through his machinations that those of their number who had returned to Athens, were condemned to death. In his notice of this transaction, Diodorus tells us that the victorious generals endeavoured in the first instance to fix the blame on Theramenes, and thus incurred his enmity; and Theramenes himself, when taxed afterwards by Critias with his base treachery in the matter, is reported by Xenophon to have excused his conduct by a similar allegation. A truly wretched apology at the best; but even the statement on which it rests is contradicted by Xenophon's narrative, and it seems quite possible (according to bishop Thirlwall's suggestion) that, over and above the cowardly motive of self-preservation, Theramenes may have been, throughout the whole affair, the agent of an oligarchical conspiracy to get rid of some of the most eminent and formidable opponents of that faction. (Xen. Hell. i. 6. § 35, 7. §§ 4, &c. ii. 3. §§ 32, 35; Diod.

xiii. 98, 101; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. iv. p. 138.) From this time certainly up to the establishment of the thirty tyrants, we find him the unscrupulous confederate of the oligarchs, and from Lysias (c. Agor. p. 130), we learn that the people on one occasion rejected him from the office of general on the ground of his being no friend to the democratic government. This would probably be early in B. C. 405, when three new commanders were appointed (Xen. Hell. ii. 1. § 16) as colleagues to Conon, Adeimantus, and Philocles. But during the siege of Athens by Lysander in the same year, and after the failure of the Athenian embassy, which had proposed to capitulate on condition of keeping their walls and the Peiraeeus, Theramenes offered to go himself to Lysander and learn the real intentions of the Lacedaemonians, promising at the same time to obtain peace without the necessity of giving hostages, or demolishing the fortifications, or surrendering the ships; while he held out vague and mysterious hopes besides of some further favour to be obtained from the enemy by his means. His offer, after some considerable opposition, was accepted, and he set forth on his mission, determined not to return till his countrymen should be so weakened by famine as to be ready to assent to any terms that might be imposed on them. After an absence accordingly of three months in the Lacedaemonian camp, he again presented himself in Athens, and declared that Lysander, having detained him so long, had at length desired him to go to Sparta with his proposals, as he himself had no authority to settle any thing. To Sparta therefore the traitor was sent, with nine colleagues, and the terms which they brought back with them, and which the Athenians had now no alternative but to accept, were such as to lay their country prostrate at the feet of Lacedaemon (Xen. Hell. ii. 2. §§ 16, &c.; Lys. c. Erat. p. 126, c. Agor. pp. 130, 131; Plut. Lys. 14). In the following year, B. C. 404, Theramenes took the foremost part in obtaining the decree of the assembly for the destruction of the old constitution and the establishment of the Thirty, in the number of whom he was himself included. The measure indeed was not carried without opposition, but this was overborne by the threats of Lysander, whose presence Theramenes had taken care to secure. The whole transaction is grossly misrepresented by Diodorus, who, choosing to be the panegyrist of Theramenes, informs us that he protested against the innovation in the government, but was obliged to give way to the menaces of Lysander, and that the people then elected him one of the Thirty, in the hope that he would check the violence of his colleagues (Xen. Hell. ii. 3. §§ 1, 2; Lys. c. Erat. pp. 126, 127, c. Agor. p. 131; Plut. Lys. 15; Diod. xiv. 3, 4). As a matter of fact, indeed, he did endeavour to do so; for, if not virtuous enough to abhor the reign of terror which they introduced, he had sufficient sagacity to perceive that their volence would be fatal to the permanence of their power. His remonstrances, however, and his opposition to their tyrannical proceedings had no effect in restraining them, but only induced the desire to rid themselves of so troublesome an associate, whose former conduct moreover had shown that no political party could depend on him, and who had earned, by his trimming, the nickname of Κόθορνος,—a boot which might be worn on either foot. He was therefore accused by Critias before the council as a traitor, and an enemy of the oligarchy, and when his nominal judges, favourably impressed by his able defence. exhibited an evident disposition to acquit him, Critias introduced into the chamber a number of men armed with daggers, and declared that, as all who were not included in the privileged Three Thousand might be put to death by the sole authority of the Thirty, he struck the name of Theramenes out of that list, and condemned him with the consent of all his colleagues. Theramenes then rushed to the altar, which stood in the council-chamber, but was dragged from it and carried off to execution. When he had drunk the hemlock, he dashed out the last drops from the cup as if he were playing the game of the Κότταβος, exclaiming, "This to the health of the lovely Critias!" Diodorus tells us that Theramenes was a disciple of Socrates, and that the latter strove to prevent the eleven from dragging him away to death, which seems to be merely a different version of the story in the Pseudo-Plutarch (Vit. X. Or. Isocr. ad init.), that Isocrates, who was a pupil of Theramenes in rhetoric, was the only person who stood up to help him in his extremity, and desisted only on Theramenes saying that it would increase his distress, should any of his friends involve themselves in his calamity. Both Xenophon and Cicero express their admiration of the equanimity which he displayed in his last hour; but surely such a feeling is sadly out of place when directed to such a man. (Xen. Hell. ii. 3; Diod. xiv. 4, 5; Cic. Tusc. Quaest. i. 40; Arist. Ran. 541, 965—968; Suid. s. v. Θηραμένης; Val. Max. iii. 2. Ext. 6; Hinrichs, de Theram. Crit. et Thrasyb. rebus et ingenio.) [E. E.]

THERAPNE (Θεράπνη), a daughter of Lelex and Peridia, from which the town of Therapne in Laconia derived its name. (Paus. iii. 19. § 9; Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 615.) [L. S.]

THERAS (Θήρας), a son of Autesion, grandson of Tisamenus, who led Lacedaemonians and Minyans of Lemnos (i. e. descendants of the Argonauts by Lemnian women) from Sparta to the island of Thera, which had before been called Callisto, but was now named after him Thera. (Herod. iv. 147; Paus. iii. 1. § 6, iv. 3. § 3, vii. 2. § 2; Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1764; Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iv. 88.) [L. S.]

THE'RICLES (Θηρικλῆς) was, according to Athenaeus (xi. pp. 470—472), Lucian (Lexiph. 7), Pliny (H. N. xvi. 40. s. 76), and the lexicographers (Etym. Mag., Suid., s. v. Θηρίκλειον), a Corinthian potter, whose works obtained such celebrity that they became known throughout Greece by the name of Θηρίκλεια (sc. ποτήρια) or κύλικες Θηρικλεῖαι (or -αι), and these names were applied not only to cups of earthenware, but also to those of wood, glass, gold, and silver. Athenaeus quotes numerous passages from the Athenian comic poets, in which these "Thericleian works" are mentioned; and these, with the other testimonies on the subject, have been most elaborately discussed by Bentley, in his Dissertations on Phalaris, and by Welcker, in the Rheinisches Museum for 1839, vol. vi. pp. 404, foll. These two great scholars, however, come to widely different results, the former fixing the date of Thericles at the time of Aristophanes; the latter denying the existence of Thericles altogether, and contending that the name of these vases is a descriptive one, derived from the figures of animals (θῆρια) with which they were adorned: vases thus decorated are frequently referred to by ancient authors, and numerous specimens of them have been discovered. It is quite impossible, within the limits of this article, to state even the leading arguments on the two sides of the question; and no opinion ought to be expressed upon it without a pretty full statement of the reasons for the conclusions come to. We must, therefore, be content to refer readers, who are curious in such archaeological minutiae, to the treatises above mentioned, only adding an important observation made by another great scholar upon Welcker's arguments — "Welckerus iis usus est argumentis, quae, ut mihi quidem videtur, labefactari possunt tantum non omnia." (Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. iii. p. 221.) [P. S.]

THERI'MACHUS (Θηρίμαχος), was the Spartan harmost at Methymna in Lesbos, when the city was attacked by Thrasybulus, the Athenian, in B. C. 390. Therimachus gave battle to the enemy, and was defeated and slain. These events are placed by Diodorus in B. C. 392. (Xen. Hell. v. 8. §§ 28, 29; Diod. xiv. 94.) [E. E.]

THERI'MACHUS, a painter and statuary, flourished at Ol. 107, B. C. 352, with Echion, who also practised both arts. No works of his are mentioned. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19, xxxv. 10. s. 36. § 9.) [P. S.]

THERMUS, MINU'CIUS. 1. Q. MINUCIUS Q. F. L. N. THERMUS (Fasti Capit.), served under Scipio as tribunus militum in the war against Hannibal in Africa in B. C. 202, was tribune of the plebs B. C. 201, curule aedile B. C. 197, and in the same year was appointed one of the triumviri for founding six colonies on the coast of Italy (Appian, Pun. 36, 44; Liv. xxx. 40, xxxii. 27, 29, xxxiv. 45). In the following year, B. C. 196, he was praetor, and received the province of Nearer Spain, where he carried on the war with great success, and received in consequence the honour of a triumph on his return to Rome in B. C. 195 (Liv. xxxiii. 24, 26, 44, xxxiv. 10; Appian, Hisp. 39). In B. C. 193 he was consul with L. Cornelius Merula. He obtained Liguria as his province, where a formidable insurrection had just broken out. He made Pisae his head-quarters, and carried on the war with vigour; but in consequence of his inferiority to the enemy in numbers, he was obliged to remain on the defensive and was twice in great peril during the campaign. In the following year B. C. 192, his imperium was prolonged, and he received additional troops, by means of which he was able to assume the offensive, and to gain a decisive victory over the Ligurians. Next year his imperium was again prolonged, and he again gained a victory over the Ligurians, who had made an unexpected attack upon his camp in the night. He returned to Rome in B. C. 190, and sued for a triumph, but it was refused him, chiefly through the influence of M. Cato, who delivered on the occasion his two orations intitled De decem Hominibus and De falsis Pugnis. Cato accused him of having unjustly put to death ten freemen in his province, and of having in his petition for the triumph invented many false battles, and exaggerated the number of the enemy that had been slain (Liv. xxxiv. 54, 55, xxxv. 3, 11, 20, 21, xxxvi. 38, xxxviii. 46; Gell. x. 3, xiii. 24; Meyer, Oratorum Romanorum Fragmenta, pp. 40—44, 2d ed.). There was also an oration of Cato intitled De suis Virtutibus contra Thermum, which is cited by Festus (pp. 182, 234), and other grammarians. Meyer (Ibid. p. 45, foll.) supposes that Cato accused Thermus in B. C. 189, and that this oration was spoken in this year; but this is improbable, as we know that Thermus served under Scipio Asiaticus in this year in the war against Antiochus. He and his brother Lucius were sent by Scipio to receive the oath of Antiochus to the treaty which was concluded at the end of the war. In the course of the same year he was nominated by the senate one of the ten commissioners to settle the affairs of Asia. He was killed in the following year, B. C. 188, while fighting under Cn. Manlius Vulso against the Thracians. (Appian, Syr. 39; Polyb. xxii. 26; Liv. xxxvii. 55, xxxviii. 41, 46.)

2. L. MINUCIUS THERMUS, brother of the preceding, served under Scipio Asiaticus, and along with his brother received the oath of Antiochus to the treaty concluded in B. C. 189. In B. C. 178 he served as legatus under the consul A. Manlius Vulso, in Istria. (Polyb. xxii. 26; Liv. xli. 8.)

3. MINUCIUS THERMUS, accompanied the consul L. Valerius Flaccus into Asia, in B. C. 86, and was there left by him in command of the troops in the following year. He was, however, deprived of the command by Fimbria shortly afterwards. (Appian, Mithr. 52; Dion Cass. Fragm. 129, p. 52. 31, ed. Reimar.)

4. M. MINUCIUS THERMUS, propraetor in B. C. 81, accompanied L. Murena, Sulla's legate, into Asia. Thermus was engaged in the siege of Mytilene, and it was under him that Julius Caesar served his first campaign, and gained his first laurels (Suet. Caes. 2). [CAESAR, p. 539, b.]. This Thermus has frequently been confounded with No. 3; but it must be observed that they were in Asia at different times, and moreover that No. 3 must have been an adherent of Marius, while No. 4 belonged to Sulla's party. (Comp. Drumann, Geschichte Roms, vol. iii. p. 132, note 96.)

5. A. MINUCIUS THERMUS, was twice defended by Cicero in B. C. 59, and on each occasion acquitted. It is not stated of what crime he was accused. (Cic. pro Flacc. 39; comp. Drumann, Geschichte Roms, vol. v. p. 619.) As Cicero says that the acquittal of Thermus caused great joy among the Roman people, we may conclude that he had previously filled some public office, and thus he may be the same as the Thermus who, when curator viae Flaminiae, sued for the consulship in B. C. 65. (Cic. ad Att. i. 1.)

6. Q. MINUCIUS THERMUS, was propraetor B. C. 51 and 50 in Asia, where he received many letters from Cicero, who praises his administration of the province (ad Fam. xiii. 53—57, comp. ad Att. v. 13, 20, 21. § 14, vi. 1. § 13). On the breaking out of the civil war he espoused the side of Pompey, and was sent with five cohorts to occupy Iguvium; but on the approach of Curio with three cohorts, he fled from the town. In B. C. 43 he was sent by M. Lepidus as ambassador to Sex. Pompeius. He appears afterwards to have followed the fortunes of Sex. Pompeius, for he is mentioned among the distinguished adherents of Pompeius, who deserted the latter in B. C. 35, and went over to Antonius. (Caes. B. C. i. 12; Cic. ad Att. vii. 13, Phil. xiii. 6; Appian, B. C. v. 139.)

7. MINUCIUS THERMUS, was a friend of Sejanus, and on the fall of the latter was put to death by Tiberius in A. D. 32. (Tac. Ann. vi. 7.)

8. MINUCIUS THERMUS, a man of praetorian rank, was sacrificed by Nero in A. D. 66, to the hatred of Tigellinus. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 20.)

The following coin of the Minucia gens has on the obverse a woman's head, and on the reverse two men fighting over a third who has fallen. The legend, which is partly effaced in the specimen figured below, is Q. THERM. M. F. The subject of the reverse evidently refers to the preservation of the life of a Roman citizen in battle; and hence it has been conjectured with some probability that this coin may have been struck by the son of M. Thermus [No. 4], in order to commemorate the youthful exploit of Caesar, who saved the life of a Roman citizen while fighting under Thermus.

COIN OF Q. MINUCIUS THERMUS.

THERO (Θηρώ). 1. The nurse of Ares, from whom he was believed to have received the surname of Thereitas, though Pausanias thinks that this name arose from the fierceness of the god. A sanctuary of Ares Thereitas stood on the road from Sparta to Therapne, with a statue which the Dioscuri were said to have brought from Colchis. (Paus. iii. 19. § 8.)

2. A daughter of Phylas, became by Apollo the mother of Chaeron. (Paus. ix. 40. § 3.) [L. S.]

THERON (Θήρων), tyrant of Agrigentum in Sicily, was the son of Aenesidemus, and descended from one of the most illustrious families in his native city. According to Pindar, they traced their descent from Cadmus, but his more immediate ancestors were Rhodians who had been among the colonists that founded Gela; and his great grandfather Telemachus had distinguished himself as a leader of the revolution which overthrew the power of Phalaris. (Pind. Ol. ii. iii.; and Schol. ad loc.) It is therefore certain that Theron inherited a leading place among his countrymen of Agrigentum, but of the steps by which he rose to the sovereign power we have no accurate information. Polyaenus indeed tells us (vi. 51), that having been appointed by the state to superintend the erection of some extensive public buildings, he applied the money furnished him for this purpose to his own objects, and raised a body of mercenary guards, by whose assistance he established himself on the throne. Whatever credit be due to this story, we learn that he had assumed the government of his native city as early as B. C. 488, and retained it from that time, without interruption, till his death. (Diod. xi. 53.) It is probably to the early period of his rule that we may refer the attempt of his kinsmen Capys and Hippocrates to overthrow his power, which was frustrated by their defeat at the river Himera. (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. ii. 173.) The next event of which we find mention is his expulsion of Terillus from Himera [TERILLUS], which took place probably as early as B. C. 482. (Herod. vii. 165.) While he by this means united Himera to his own dominions, and thus ruled over two of the most powerful cities of Sicily, he was in close alliance with Gelon, ruler of Syracuse and Gela, to whom he had given his daughter Demarete in marriage. (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. II. init.) Their combined strength was soon called forth to resist the formidable Carthaginian armament under Hamilcar which landed in Sicily in B. C. 480, with the professed object of restoring Terillus. Theron himself had occupied Himera with a large force, but terrified at the magnitude of the Carthaginian army, he shut himself up within the walls of the city, and sent to Gelon for assistance. In the great victory which followed, the Syracusan king appears to have borne by far the greatest part [GELON]; but Theron derived a large share of its advantages, and was not only left in undisputed possession of Himera, but received so large a number of prisoners as his share of the spoil, that by employing these in public works at Agrigentum, he raised that city to an unprecedented state of grandeur and magnificence. (Diod. xi. 20—25.)

His friendly relations with Syracuse continued unaltered until the death of Gelon, B. C. 478: but on that event the disputes between Hieron and his brother Polyzelus brought about a rupture between the former and Theron. Polyzelus had married Demarete, the widow of Gelon, and thus succeeded to the connection of the latter with the Agrigentine prince: in addition to which it appears that Theron himself was married to a daughter of Polyzelus: hence when the latter was driven into exile by the jealousy and intrigues of Hieron [POLYZELUS], he naturally sought refuge at the court of Theron. That monarch espoused his cause, and raised an army for the purpose of reinstating him, but hostilities were prevented, and a peace concluded between the two sovereigns. According to Timaeus, this was effected by the mediation of Simonides, who prevailed on Theron to give his sister in marriage to Hieron. Diodorus, on the contrary, relates that the citizens of Himera, who were oppressed by the government of Thrasydaeus, the son of Theron, having made overtures for assistance to Hieron, the latter betrayed their application to Theron, and induced him in return for this benefit to abandon the cause of his brother Polyzelus. (Timaeus ap. Schol. ad Pind. Ol. ii. 1, 29, 37; Diod. xi. 48.) Theron had been much alarmed at the threatened revolt of Himera, and he now proceeded to establish his power in that city by the greatest severities against the disaffected party, many of whom he put to death, while he drove others into banishment. Having thus gradually thinned the population of the city, he repeopled it with settlers from all quarters, but especially of Dorian origin. (Diod. xi. 48, 49.) From this period Theron appears to have reigned without dispute over both Agrigentum and Himera until his death in B. C. 472; and notwithstanding his cruelties towards the Himeraeans, he is praised for the general mildness and equity of his government. It is certain that Agrigentum enjoyed great prosperity under his rule, and that it was then adorned not only with splendid buildings, but with public works of a more useful character, such as reservoirs and conduits for water on a most stupendous scale. (Diod. xi. 25.) Like his contemporary rulers at Syracuse, he also displayed much favour towards artists and poets, and the victories he obtained at the Olympic games were immortalised by Pindar. The praises of the poet are confirmed by the more impartial testimony of Diodorus. (Pind. Ol. ii. iii.; Diod. xi. 3, x. Exc. Vales. p. 558.) A magnificent monument was erected to him in the neighbourhood of Agrigentum, at which heroic honours were paid to his memory. (Diod. l. c. and xiii. 86.) [E. H. B.]

THERON (Θήρων), a Boeotian statuary, who made the statue of the Olympic victor, Gorgus the son of Eucletus, a Messenian. (Paus. vi. 14. § 5. s. 11.) [P. S.]

THERSANDER (Θέρσανδρος). 1. A son of Sisyphus, and father of Haliartus and Coronus. (Paus. ix. 34. § 5.)

2. A son of Agamididas, and the father of Lathria and Anaxandra, at Sparta. (Paus. iii. 16. § 5.)

3. A son of Polyneices and Argeia, and one of the Epigoni; he was married to Demonassa, by whom he became the father of Tisamenus. After having been made king of Thebes, he went with Agamemnon to Troy, and was slain in that expedition by Telephus. His tomb was shown at Elaea in Mysia, and sacrifices were offered to him there. (Paus. iii. 15. § 4, vii. 3. § 1, ix. 5. § 7, x. 10. § 2; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. ii. 76; Dict. Cret. ii. 2; Herod. iv. 147; Apollod. iii. 7. § 2.) Virgil (Aen. ii. 261) enumerates Thersander among the Greeks concealed in the wooden horse. Homer does not mention him. [L. S.]

THERSI'TES (Θερσίτης), a son of Agrius, the most ugly and most impudent talker among the Greeks at Troy. Once, when he had spoken in the assembly in an unbecoming manner against Agamemnon, he was chastised by Odysseus. (Hom. Il. ii. 212, &c.; Apollod. i. 8. § 6.) According to the later poets he pulled the eyes out of the dead body of Penthesileia, the queen of the Amazons, who had been killed by Achilles, and also calumniated Achilles, for which, however, the latter slew him. (Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 999.) In the Lesche of Delphi he was represented by Polygnotus in the act of playing at dice with Palamedes. (Paus. x. 31. § 1; Soph. Philoct. 442.) [L. S.]

THESEUS (Θησεύς), the great legendary hero of Attica, is one of those mythological personages, whose legends it is by no means easy to disentangle, and represent in their original shape. The later belief of the Athenians, adopted and strengthened by writers of authority, represented him as a very much more historical person than he really was; and, in consequence, the rationalistic mythologists took considerable pains to draw up a narrative of his life in which the supernatural should be kept as much as possible in the back ground, and the character in which the Athenians loved to regard him, as the founder of Attic nationality, be exhibited in as prominent a light as the received traditions allowed. This was avowedly the method upon which Plutarch proceeded.

According to the commonly received traditions Theseus was the son of Aegeus, king of Athens, and Aethra, the daughter of Pittheus, king of Troezen [AEGEUS]. Other legends, however, maintained their ground, which represented him as the son of Poseidon by Aethra. (Plut. Thes. 6; Diod. iv. 59; Paus. i. 17. § 3; comp. AETHRA.) When he reached maturity, Theseus, by his mother's directions, took the sword and sandals, the tokens which had been left by Aegeus, and proceeded to Athens. Eager to emulate Hercules, he went by land, displaying his prowess by destroying the robbers and monsters that infested the country. Periphetes, Sinis, Phaea the Crommyonian sow, Sciron, Cercyon, and Procrustes fell before the invincible hero. Arrived at Cephisus, he was purified by the Phytalidae. At Athens he was immediately recognised by Medea, who laid a plot for poisoning him at a banquet to which he was invited. By means of the sword which he carried, Theseus was recognised by Aegeus, acknowledged as his son, and declared his successor. The sons of Pallas, thus disappointed in their hopes of succeeding to the throne, attempted to secure the succession by violence, and declared war; but, being betrayed by the herald Leos, were destroyed. The capture of the Marathonian bull was the next exploit of Theseus [comp. HECALE]. It was this same enterprise in which Androgeos, the son of Minos, had perished. When the occasion returned on which the Athenians had to send to Minos their tribute of seven youths and seven maidens, Theseus voluntarily offered himself as one of the youths, with the design of slaying the Minotaur, or perishing in the attempt. When they arrived at Crete, Ariadne, the daughter of Minos, became enamoured of Theseus, and provided him with a sword with which he slew the Minotaur, and a clue of thread by which he found his way out of the labyrinth. Having effected his object, and rescued the band of victims, Theseus set sail, carrying off Ariadne. (For the variations in the story, given by Cleidemus, the reader is referred to Plut. Thes. 19.) There were various accounts about Ariadne [ARIADNE], but most of them spoke of Theseus as having either lost or abandoned Ariadne on the island of Naxos. He was generally believed to have had by her two sons, Oenopion and Staphylus. As the vessel in which they sailed approached Attica, they neglected to hoist the white sail, which was to have been the signal that the expedition had had a prosperous issue. The neglect led to the death of Aegeus [AEGEUS]. A vessel was in existence up to the time of Demetrius Phalereus, which it was pretended was the very ship in which Theseus had sailed to Crete. It was this vessel which was sent every year to Delos with the sacred envoys. It is worth noting, that although Homer mentions Ariadne as having been carried off by Theseus from Crete (Od. xi. 321), he says nothing about the Minotaur. All that part of the story is probably a later addition. The expedition to Crete was probably, in its original form, only one of the somewhat numerous amatory adventures of Theseus, several of which are noticed by Plutarch (Thes. 29). Soon after he landed, Theseus is said to have instituted the festival termed Oschophoria (Dictionary of Antiquities, s. v. Oschophoria). The origin of the Pyanepsia, and the reinstitution of the Isthmian games, were also ascribed to Theseus.

One of the most renowned of the adventures of Theseus was his expedition against the Amazons. He is said to have assailed them before they had recovered from the attack of Hercules, and to have carried off their queen Antiope. The Amazons in their turn invaded Attica, and penetrated into Athens itself, the final battle in which Theseus overcame them having been fought in the very midst of the city. Of the literal truth of this fact

Plutarch (Thes. 27) finds evidence in the names of the localities and the tombs of the fallen Amazons. Cleidemus pretended even to point out the precise position of the contending forces and the fluctuations of the combat. (Compare the remarkable passage of Aeschylus, Eumen. 685.) By Antiope Theseus was said to have had a son named Hippolytus or Demophoon, and after her death to have married Phaedra [HIPPOLYTUS, PHAEDRA]. Theseus figures in almost all the ancient heroic undertakings. He was one of the Argonauts (the anachronism of the attempt of Medea to poison him does not seem to have been noticed); he joined in the Calydonian hunt, and aided Adrastus in recovering the bodies of those slain before Thebes. He contracted a close friendship with Peirithous, and aided him and the Lapithae against the Centaurs. Aided by Peirithous he carried off Helen from Sparta while she was quite a girl, and placed her at Aphidnae under the care of Aethra. In return he assisted Peirithous in his attempt to carry off Persephone from the lower world. Peirithous perished in the enterprise, and Theseus was kept in hard durance until he was delivered by Hercules. Later writers endeavoured to turn this legend into history by making Peirithous attempt to carry off Core, the daughter of Aidoneus, a king of the Molossians. (Plut. c. 31.) Meantime Castor and Pollux invaded Attica, and carried off Helen and Aethra, Academus having informed the brothers where they were to be found [ACADEMUS]. Menestheus also endeavoured to incite the people against Theseus, who on his return found himself unable to re-establish his authority, and retired to Scyros, where he met with a treacherous death at the hands of Lycomedes. The departed hero was believed to have appeared to aid the Athenians at the battle of Marathon. In B. C. 469 a skeleton of large size was found by Cimon in Scyros [CIMON], and brought to Athens. It was believed to be that of Theseus, in whose honour a temple was erected, in which the bones were deposited. A considerable part of this temple still remains, forming one of the most interesting monuments of Athens. A festival in honour of Theseus was celebrated on the eighth day of each month, especially on the eighth of Pyanepsion. Connected with this festival were two others: the Connideia, in memory of Connidas, the guardian of Theseus; and the Cybernesia, having reference to his voyage. (Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Theseia.)

There can be little question that Theseus is a purely legendary personage, as thoroughly so as his contemporary Hercules. Nevertheless, in later times the Athenians came to regard him as the author of a very important political revolution in Attica. Before his time Attica had been broken up into a number of petty independent states or townships (twelve is the number generally stated) acknowledging no head, and connected only by a federal union. Theseus, partly through persuasion, partly by force, abolished the separate council chambers and governments, did away with all separate political jurisdiction, and erected Athens into the capital of a single commonwealth. The festival of the Synoecia was celebrated in commemoration of this change. The festival which was called Athenaea was now reinstituted and termed the Panathenaea (Thucyd. ii. 15). Theseus is said to have established a constitutional government, retaining in his own hands only certain definite powers and functions. The citizens generally he is said to have distributed into the three classes of Eupatridae, Geomori, and Demiurgi (Plut. Thes. 24—26). That this consolidation took place some time or other, there can be no doubt. Whether it was accomplished by Theseus is another question. The authority of Thucydides has usually been allowed to settle the matter. Thucydides, however, did but follow the prevailing opinion of his countrymen; and if his belief raises Theseus to the rank of an historical king, it must also make the Trojan war a matter of history. It is a vain task now to attempt to decide whether there is any historical basis for the accounts of Theseus that were handed down, and still more so to endeavour to separate the historical from the legendary in what has been preserved. The Theseus of the Athenians was a hero who fought the Amazons, and slew the Minotaur, and carried off Helen. A personage who should be nothing more than a wise king, consolidating the Athenian commonwealth, however possible his existence might be, would have no historical reality. It has been urged that we have no ground for denying the personality of Theseus. In matters of this kind the question is rather "Have we any ground for affirming it?" And for this we find nothing but the belief of the Athenians. The connection of Theseus with Poseidon, the national deity of the Ionic tribes, in various ways (the name Aegeus points to Aegae, the sanctuary of Poseidon), his coming from the Ionic town Troezen, forcing his way through the Isthmus into Attica, and establishing the Isthmia as an Ionic Panegyris, rather suggest that Theseus is, at least in part, the mythological representative of an Ionian immigration into Attica, which, adding perhaps to the strength and importance of Ionian settlers already in the country, might easily have led to that political aggregation of the disjointed elements of the state which is assigned to Theseus. It was probably from the relation in which he stood to the Athenian commonwealth as a whole, that his name was not connected with any particular phyle. (Plut. Theseus; Diod. l. c.; Grote, Hist. of Greece, vol. i. p. 281, &c., vol. ii. p. 29, vol. iii. p. 91; Wachsmuth, Hellenische Alterthumskunde, § 40. vol. i. p. 351, &c., § 128. vol. ii. p. 488.) [C. P. M.]

THESEUS (Θησεύς), a Greek historian of unknown date, wrote the lives of illustrious men (βίοι ἐνδόξων) in five books, and a work on Corinth (Κορινθιακά) in three books, in which he gave an account of the establishment of the Isthmian games. (Suidas, s. v.; Etymol. M. s. v. Ἄρνη; Stobaeus, Floril. vii. 67, 70; Schol. ad Lycophr. 644.)

THESI'MENES. [TLESIMENES.]

THE'SMIA or THESMO'PHOROS (Θεσμία, Θεσμοφόρος), that is, "the law-giver," a surname of Demeter and Persephone, in honour of whom the Thesmophoria were celebrated at Athens in the month of Pyanepsion (Herod. ii. 171, vi. 16; Aristoph. Thesm. 303), and to whom sanctuaries were also erected at Megara, Troezene, Pheneos, and other places. (Paus. i. 42. § 7, ii. 32. § 7, viii. 15. § 1, ix. 16. § 3, x. 33, in fin.) [L. S.]

THESPEIA (Θέσπεια), a daughter of Asopus, from whom the town of Thespiae in Boeotia derived its name. (Paus. ix. 26. § 4.) [L. S.]

nected from the history of his art, and it is therefore considered unnecessary to repeat here what has already been said with sufficient fulness respecting him, under TRAGOEDIA, in the Dictionary of Antiquities.

2. Of Thebes, a player of the cithara, whom Lucian mentions as a competitor at one of the musical contests in the Pythian games. There is nothing to determine his time. (Lucian. adv. Indoct. 9, vol. iii. p. 108.)

The scholiast on a passage in which Aristophanes mentions Thespis (Vesp. 1470, comp. Suid. s. v.), states that the Thespis here meant was the citharoedic musician, not the tragic poet; but Bentley maintains that this is an error. (Second Dissert. on Phalaris, p. 265, or p. 190, ed. 1777.)

3. A flute-player, at the court of Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, of whom nothing is known except the little anecdote in Lucian. (Prometh. 4, vol. i. p. 30.) [P. S.]

THE'SPIUS (Θέσπιος), a son of Erectheus, who, according to some, founded the town of Thespiae in Boeotia. (Paus. ix. 26. § 4; Diod. iv. 29; comp. Schol. ad Hom. Il. ii. 948; Apollod. ii. 7. § 8.) His descendants are called Thespiades (Apollod. ii. 4. § 10; Senec. Herc. Oet. 369), which name is also given to the Muses. (Ov. Met. v. 310.) [L. S.]

THESSALONI'CE (Θεσσαλονίκη), a Macedonian princess, was a daughter of Philip, son of Amyntas, by his wife or concubine, Nicesipolis of Pherae. (Athen. xiii. p. 557, c.; Paus. ix. 7. § 3.)

Thessalonice appears to have been brought up by her stepmother Olympias, to whose fortunes she attached herself when the latter returned to Macedonia in B. C. 317, and with whom she took refuge in the fortress of Pydna, on the advance of Cassander. (Diod. xix. 35; Justin. xiv. 6.) The fall of Pydna threw her into the power of Cassander, who embraced the opportunity to connect himself with the ancient royal house of Macedonia by marrying her; and he appears to have studiously treated her with the respect due to her illustrious birth. This may have been as much owing to policy as to affection: but the marriage appears to have been a prosperous one; she became the mother of three sons, Philip, Antipater, and Alexander; and her husband paid her the honour of conferring her name upon the city of Thessalonice, which he founded on the site of the ancient Therma, and which soon became, as it continues down to the present day, one of the most wealthy and populous cities of Macedonia. (Diod. xix. 52; Paus. viii. 7. § 7; Strab. vii. fr. 24, p. 81, ed. Kramer; Steph. Byz. s. v. Θεσσαλονίκη.) After the death of Cassander, Thessalonice appears to have at first retained much influence over her sons, but at length Antipater, becoming jealous of the superior favour which she showed to his younger brother Alexander, barbarously put his mother to death, B. C. 295. (Paus. ix. 7. § 3; Diod. xxi. Exc. Hoesch. p. 490.) [E. H. B.]

THE'SSALUS (Θέσσαλος). 1. A son of Haemon, from whom Thessaly was believed to have received its name. (Strab. x. p. 443.)

2. A son of Jason and Medeia, and the ancestor of the Thessalian race. He was educated at Corinth, and afterwards succeeded Acastus on the throne of Iolcus. (Diod. iv. 55.)

3. A son of Heracles and Chalciope, was the father of Pheidippus and Antiphus. (Hom. Il. ii. 679; Apollod. ii. 7. § 8.) [L. S.]

THE'SSALUS (Θεσσαλός), a son of Peisistratus by Timonassa. [PEISISTRATUS, pp. 172, b, 174, a.]

THE'SSALUS (Θεσσαλός), an eminent tragic actor, in the time of Alexander the Great, whose especial favour he enjoyed, and whom he served before his accession to the throne, and afterwards accompanied on his expedition into Asia. (Plut. Alex. 10, 29; Ath. xii. p. 538; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 325.) [P. S.]

THE'SSALUS (Θεσσαλός), the name of two physicians: —

1. A son of Hippocrates, brother of Dracon I., and father of Gorgias*, Hippocrates III. (Jo. Tzetzes, Chil. vii., Hist. 155, in Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xii. p. 682, ed. vet.; Suid. s. v. Ἱπποκράτης; Galen. Comment. in Hippocr. "De Humor." i. 1, vol. xvi. p. 5), and Dracon II. (Suid. s. v. Δράκων) He lived in the fifth and fourth centuries B. C., and passed some of his time at the court of Archelaus, king of Macedonia, who reigned B. C. 413—399. (Galen, Comment. in Hippocr. "De Nat. Hom." i. prooem. vol. xv. p. 12.) He was one of the founders of the sect of the Dogmatici (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Dogmatici), and is several times highly praised by Galen, who calls him the most eminent of the sons of Hippocrates (Comment. in Hippocr. "Epid. III." ii. prooem. vol. xvii. pt. i. p. 579), and says that he did not alter any of his father's doctrines (Comment. in Hippocr. "De Nat. Hom." i. prooem. vol. xv. p. 12). It is supposed, however, that in performing the difficult task of preparing some of the writings of Hippocrates for publication after his death he made some additions of his own (Galen, De Diffic. Respir. iii. 1, vol. vii. p. 890, Comment. in Hippocr. "De Humor." i. prooem. vol. xvi. p. 4; Comment. in Hippocr. "Epid. VI." i. prooem. vol. xvii. pt. i. p. 796), which were sometimes not quite worthy of that honour. (Pallad. Schol. in Hippocr. "Epid. VI." p. 3, ed. Dietz.) He was also supposed by some of the ancient writers to be the author of several of the works that form part of the Hippocratic Collection, which he might have compiled from notes left by his father; viz. "De Humoribus" (Galen. Comment. in Hippocr. "De Humor." i. prooem. vol. xvi. p. 3), "De Officina Medici" (id. Comment. in Hippocr. "De Offic. Med." i. 5, vol. xviii. pt. ii. p. 666), the first book of the "Praedictiones" or "Prorrhetica" (id. Comment. in Hippocr. "Praedict. I." ii. 54, vol. xvi. p. 625), and the second, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh books of the "Epidemia," or "De Morbis Popularibus" (id. De Diffic. Respir. ii. 8, vol. vii. p. 855); but this point is considered by modern critics to be very uncertain Among the Letters, &c. attributed to Hippocrates, there is one which professes to be addressed by him to Thessalus (vol. iii. p. 822), which contains no internal marks of a spurious origin, but which is perhaps hardly likely to be authentic if all the other pieces are apocryphal. There is also an oration, Πρεσβευτικός (vol. iii. p. 831), supposed to be spoken by Thessa-

* So it is stated by Meibomius (Comment. in Hippocr. "Jusjur." p. 7) and other modern authors, but the Writer has hitherto been unable to find any ancient author who says that Thessalus had a son named Gorgias.

lus to the Athenians, in which he implores them not to continue the war against Cos, his native country; but this is undoubtedly spurious (see Littré's Oeuvres d'Hippocr. vol. i. p. 432). The epitaph of Thessalus is preserved in the Greek Anthology. (vii. 135, ed. Tauchn.) His name occurs in several other passages of Galen's writings, but chiefly in reference to the authorship of the different books "De Morbis Popularibus."

2. A native of Tralles in Lydia, and one of the founders of the medical sect of the Methodici (Galen, Introd. c. 4, vol. xiv. p. 684.). He lived at Rome in the reign of the emperor Nero, A. D. 54—68 (Plin. H. N. xxix. 5), to whom he addressed one of his works (Galen, De Meth. Med. i. 2, vol. x. pp. 7, 8); and here he died and was buried, and his tomb was to be seen in Pliny's time on the Via Appia, with the arrogant title of Ἰατρονίκης, it having been his constant boast during his life that medicine surpassed all other arts, and that he surpassed all other physicians. (Galen, ibid. p. 11.) He was the son of a weaver, and followed the same employment himself during his youth. (Galen, ibid. p. 10.) This, however, he soon gave up, and, though he had had a very imperfect general education, he embraced the medical profession, by which he acquired for a time a great reputation, and amassed a large fortune. He adopted the principles of the Methodici (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Methodici), but modified and developed them so much that he attributed to himself the invention of them, and indeed is always considered as one of the founders of the sect. In fact he appears to have endeavoured on all occasions to exalt himself at the expense of his predecessors (Pliny, l. c.); lavishing upon the ancients the most insulting epithets, asserting that none of them had contributed any thing to the advance of medical science (Galen, ibid. p. 8), and boasting that he could himself teach the art of healing in six months. (pp. 4, 5.) He is frequently mentioned by Galen, but always in terms of contempt and ridicule (De Meth. Med. i. 1, &c., vol. x. p. 4, &c.; Adv. Julian. c. 1, &c. vol. xviii. pt. i. p. 247, &c.); probably this was well deserved, as it agrees with what is said of him by Pliny (l. c.), but still the gross personal abuse in which Galen indulges goes beyond all bounds, and is quite unworthy of so great a man. An account of the opinions of Thessalus may be found in Le Clerc's Hist. de la Méd., Haller's Biblioth. Medic. Pract. vol. i., and Sprengel's Hist. de la Méd. vol. ii. Perhaps it need only be noticed here that he was the inventor of what he called μετασύγκρισις (rendered by Caelius Aurelianus, De Morb. Acut. ii. 38, p. 173, "recorporatio"), a method which still forms our principal and most essential corporeal means in the treatment of insanity. His object was, in obstinate chronic cases, where other remedies failed, or were not indicated, to effect a thorough commotion in the fundamental constitution of the organism (σύγκρισις). To this end he commenced by the application, both internally and externally, of strong vegetable remedies, to the use of which, together with the strictest regimen and emetics administered at intervals, a period of three days was devoted. This treatment was preparatory to a system of fasting, and concluded with a course of restoratives. (See Feuchtersleben's Medical Psychology, chap. 2, p. 38.) He wrote several medical works, of which only the titles and a few sentences remain: 1. Κάνων, "Canon." (Gal. De Meth. Med. iv. 4, vol. x. p. 268; De Simplic. Medicam. Temper. ac Facult. v. 25, vol. xi. p. 783.) 2. Περὶ τῶν Κοινοτήτων, "De Communitatibus" (id. De Meth. Med. i. 2, vol. x. p. 7.) 3. Περὶ Χειρουργίας, "De Chirurgia," (id. ibid. iv. 4. p. 250). 4. Συγκριτικά (id. ibid. p. 7), probably the work called "Comparatio" by Caelius Aurelianus. (De Morb. Acut. iii. 17, p. 247.) 5. A Letter to the Emperor Nero. (Gal. l. c. p. 7.) 6. "De Regulis," which might have been considered to be the same work as the "Canon" mentioned above, but that Caelius Aurelianus quotes it as the book "De Regulis, quas Graeci Diaetas vocant" (De Morb. Acut. iii. 17, p. 247); it is therefore possibly the same work which this author elsewhere quotes as "Liber Diaeteticus" (ibid. i. 1. p. 11) or as "Liber Regularis" (De Morb. Chron. praef. p. 268), or perhaps the whole work may have been called "Canon," of which the second book was the "Liber Diaeteticus." (id. ibid. ii. 8. p. 387.) The reputation of Thessalus does not seem to have been very lasting, as, with the exception of Galen and Pliny, Caelius Aurelianus and Soranus (De Arte Obstetr. pp. 128, 210, 212), both of whom belonged to the sect of the Methodici, are perhaps the only ancient authors who mention him.

Fabricius mentions (Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 436, ed. vet.) a third physician of the name of Thessalus, and refers to Justin, xii. 13; but the true reading in that passage is "Medius Thessalus," not Medicus; and Medius, not Thessalus, is the proper name. [MEDIUS, § 2.] [W. A. G.]

THE'STIUS (Θέστιος), a son of Ares and Demonice or Androdice, and, according to others, a son of Agenor and a grandson of Pleuron, the king of Aetolia. He was the father of Iphiclus, Euippus, Plexippus, Eurypylus, Leda, Althaea, and Hypermnestra. His wife is not the same in all traditions, some calling her Lycippe or Laophonte, a daughter of Pleuron, and others Deïdameia. (Apollod. i. 7. §§ 7, 9, 16, iii. 10. § 5; Paus. iii. 13. § 5; Hygin. Fab. 14; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 146, 201.) His daughters Leda and Althaea are sometimes designated by the patronymic Thestias (Eurip. Iph. Aul. 49; Aeschyl. Choeph. 606), and his son Iphiclus by the name Thestiades. (Apollon.Rhod. i. 261.) [L. S.]

THESTOR (Θέστωρ). 1. A son of Idmon and Laothoë (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 139), though some ancients declare that Idmon (the knowing) was only a surname of Thestor. He was the father of Calchas, Theoclymenus, Leucippe, and Theonoë. (Hom. Il. i. 69; Hygin. Fab. 128.) His daughter Theonoë was carried off by pirates, and sold to king Icarus in Caria. Thestor, who went out in search of her, suffered shipwreck, and was taken as a prisoner to Caria. His other daughter Leucippe then consulted the Delphic oracle about her absent father and sister, and was directed to travel through all countries in the attire of a priest of Apollo. In this manner she came to Caria, where her own sister fell in love with her, and as the love was not returned, Theonoë ordered her to be killed. Thestor received the order to kill her, but when he was on the point of executing it, he recognised his children, and with presents from Icarus Thestor with his daughters returned home. (Hygin. Fab. 190.)

2. A Trojan, son of Enops, who was slain by Patroclus. (Hom. Il. xvi. 401.) [L. S.]

THETIS (Θέτις), one of the daughters of Nereus and Doris, was the wife of Peleus, by whom she became the mother of Achilles. (Hom. Il. i. 538, xviii. 35, &c., 52, &c.; Hes. Theog. 244.) Later writers describe her as a daughter of Cheiron (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 558). According to others, Peleus married Philomela, the daughter of Actor, but his friend Cheiron, wishing to render Peleus celebrated, spread the report that he was married to Thetis. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iv. 816.) Being a granddaughter of Poseidon, Catullus (64. 28) calls her Neptunine. As a marine divinity, she dwelt like her sisters, the Nereids, in the depth of the sea, with her father Nereus. (Hom. Il. i. 358, xviii. 36, xx. 207.) She there received Dionysus on his flight from Lycurgus, and the god, in his gratitude, presented her with a golden urn. (Hom. Il. vi. 135, Od. xxiv. 75; comp. Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 273.) When Hephaestus was thrown down from heaven, he was likewise received by Thetis. She had been brought up by Hera (Il. xxiv. 60), and when she reached the age of maturity, Zeus and Hera gave her, against her own will, in marriage to Peleus. Poseidon and Zeus himself are said by some to have sued for her hand (Pind. Isthm. viii. 58), but when Themis declared that the son of Thetis would be more illustrious than his father, both suitors desisted. (Pind. l. c. viii. 70; Ov. Met. xi. 225, xv. 856, xi. 350, &c.; Aeschyl. Prom. 767; Hygin. Fab. 54; Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. vi. 42.) Others state that Thetis rejected the offers of Zeus, because she had been brought up by Hera (Hom. Il. xxiv. 60; Apollon. Rhod. iv. 793); and the god, to revenge himself, decreed that she should marry a mortal. Cheiron then informed his friend Peleus how he might gain possession of her, even if she should metamorphose herself; for Thetis, like Proteus, had the power of assuming any form she pleased, and she had recourse to this means of escaping from Peleus, but the latter did not let her go, until she again assumed her proper form. (Apollod. iii. 13. § 5; Pind. Nem. iii. 60; Paus. viii. 18. § 1.) Others again relate, that a marine divinity appeared to Peleus on Mount Pelion, and testified her love to him, but without revealing herself to him. Peleus, however, who saw her playing with dolphins, recognised the goddess, and henceforth shunned her presence. But she encouraged him, reminding him of the love of Eos to Tithonus, of Aphrodite to Anchises, &c., and promised to present him with a son who should be more illustrious than any mortal. (Philostr. Her. 19. 1.) The wedding of Peleus was honoured with the presence of all the gods. (Hom. Il. xxiv. 62.) After she had become the mother of Achilles, she bestowed upon him the tenderest care and love. (Hom. Il. i. 359, 500, &c., viii. 370, xviii. 73, 457; comp. ACHILLES.) Her prayers to Zeus for him were listened to, because at one time, when Zeus was threatened by the other gods, she induced Briareus or Aegaeon to come to his assistance. (Hom. Il. i. 396, &c.) Thetis had a temple (Thetideion) between Old and New Pharsalus in Thessaly (Strab. ix. p. 431), and in Sparta and Messenia she was likewise worshipped. (Paus. iii. 14. § 4, 22. § 2.) [L. S.]

THEUDAS or THEIO'DAS or THE'ODAS (Θευδᾶς or Θειώδας or Θεοδᾶς), a physician belonging to the sect of the Empirici (Galen, De Meth. Med. ii. 7, vol. x. p. 142), who is perhaps the person mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (ix. § 116), as being a native of Laodiceia, a pupil of Antiochus of Laodiceia, and a contemporary of Menodotus, about the beginning of the second century after Christ.

2. The physician quoted by Andromachus (ap. Galen. De Compos. Medicam. sec. Gen. vi. 14. vol. xiii. p. 925), must be a different person, who lived in the first century after

THIMBRON or THIBRON (Θίμβρων, Θίβρων). 1. A Lacedaemonian, was sent out as harmost in B. C. 400, with an army of about 5000 men, to aid the Ionians against Tissaphernes, who wished to bring them into subjection. On Thimbron's arrival in Asia he collected reinforcements, among which the most important was the mass of the Cyrean Greeks at Pergamus, and he succeeded in gaining over or capturing several cities. But meanwhile he allowed his troops to plunder the country of their allies, and he was therefore superseded by Dercyllidas, and obliged to return to Sparta, where he was brought to trial, and fined. It would appear that he was unable to pay the penalty, and went into exile. But in B. C. 392 (for there is no reason to suppose this a different person) we again find him sent by the Lacedaemonians into Asia to command against STRUTHAS. He seems, however, to have been still, as before, careless of his duties and neglectful of discipline, while he was addicted also to convivial pleasures. One day, accordingly, Struthas purposely sent some Persian cavalry to commit depredations within sight of Thimbron. The latter sallied forth in a disorderly manner to check them, and Struthas suddenly came up with a superior force, by which Thimbron was defeated and slain. (Xen. Anab. vii. 6. § 1, 8. § 24, Hell. iii. 1. §§ 4—8, iv. 8. §§ 17—19; Diod. xiv. 36—38; Isocr. Paneg. p. 70, d; Polyaen. ii. 19.)

2. A Lacedaemonian, was a confidential officer of Harpalus, the Macedonian satrap of Babylon under Alexander the Great. According to one account it was Thimbron who murdered Harpalus in Crete, in B. C. 324. [HARPALUS, No. 1.] He then possessed himself of his late master's treasures, fleet, and army, and, ostensibly espousing the cause of some Cyrenaean exiles, sailed to Cyrene with the intention of subjugating it. He defeated the Cyrenaeans in a battle, obtained possession of their harbour, Apollonia, together with the treasures he found there, and compelled them to capitulate on condition of paying him 500 talents, and supplying him with half of their war-chariots for his expeditions. This agreement, however, they were soon induced to repudiate by Mnasicles, one of Thimbron's officers, who had deserted his standard, and gone over to the enemy. Under the able direction of Mnasicles, the Cyrenaeans recovered Apollonia, and, though Thimbron was aided by the Barcaeans and Hesperians, and succeeded in taking the town of Teucheira, yet, on the whole, his fortunes declined, and he met besides with a severe disaster in the loss of a great number of his men, who were slain or captured by the enemy, and in the almost total destruction of his fleet by a storm. Not discouraged, however, he collected reinforcements from the Peloponnesus, defeated the Cyrenaeans (who were now aided by the Libyans and Carthaginians), and closely besieged Cyrene. Pressed by scarcity, the citizens quarrelled among themselves, and the chiefs of the oligarchical party, being driven out, betook themselves partly to Ptolemy Lagi, king of Egypt, and partly to Thimbron. Ptolemy thereupon sent a large force against Cyrene under Ophellas, to whom the exiles, who had taken refuge with Thimbron, endeavoured to escape, but were detected, and put to death. The Cyrenaean people then made common cause with Thimbron against the new invader; but Ophellas defeated him, and he was obliged to seek safety in flight. He fell, however, into the hands of some Libyans, and was by them delivered up to Epicydes, an Olynthian, whom Ophellas, having taken Teucheira, had made governor of the town. The citizens of Teucheira, with the sanction of Ophellas, sent Thimbron to Apollonia, the scene of much of his violence and extortion, to be crucified, B. C. 322. (Diod. xvii. 108, xviii. 19—21; Arr. ap. Phot. cod. 92; Strab. xvii. p. 837; Just. xiii. 6, 8; Oros. iii. 23.) [E. E.]

THISBE (Θίσβη). 1. A beautiful maiden at Babylon, was beloved by Pyramus. The lovers living in adjoining houses, often secretly conversed with each other through an opening in the wall, as their parents would not sanction their marriage. Once they agreed upon a rendezvous at the tomb of Ninus. Thisbe arrived first, and while she was waiting for Pyramus, she perceived a lioness who had just torn to pieces an ox, and took to flight. While running she lost her garment, which the lioness soiled with blood. In the mean time Pyramus arrived, and finding her garment covered with blood, he imagined that she had been murdered, and made away with himself under a mulberry tree, the fruit of which henceforth was as red as blood. Thisbe, who afterwards found the body of her lover, likewise killed herself. (Ov. Met. iv. 55—165; comp. Anthol. Lat. i. p. 106, &c. ed. Burm.)

2. A Boeotian nymph, from whom the town of Thisbe derived its name. (Paus. ix. 32. § 2.) [L. S.]

THOAS (Θόας). 1. A son of Andraemon and Gorge, was king of Calydon and Pleuron, in Aetolia, and went with forty ships against Troy. (Hom. Il. ii. 638, iv. 529, vii. 168, xiii. 216, xv. 281; Paus. v. 3. § 5; Hygin. Fab. 97; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 780, 1011; comp. Strab. vi. p. 255; Paus. x. 38. § 3.)

2. A son of Dionysus and Ariadne. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iii. 997; Stat. Theb. iv. 769.) He was king of Lemnos and married to Myrina, by whom he became the father of Hypsipyle and Sicinus. (Hom. Il. xiv. 230; Diod. v. 79; Schol. ad Apollon. i. 601; Hygin. Fab. 15, 120; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 1374.) When the Lemnian women killed all the men in the island, Hypsipyle saved her father Thoas, and concealed him. (Apollod. i. 9. § 17.) Afterwards, however, he was discovered by the other women, and killed (Apollod. iii. 6. § 4), or he escaped to Tauris (Hygin. Fab. 15), or to the island of Oenoe near Euboea, which was henceforth called Sicinus. (Schol. ad Apollon. i. 624.)

3. A son of Icarius and Periboea, and a brother of Penelope. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 6.)

4. A son of Borysthenes, and king of Tauris, into whose dominions Iphigenia was carried by Artemis, when she was to have been sacrificed. He was killed by Chryses. (Anton. Lib. 27; Hygin. Fab. 121; Eurip. Iphig. Taur.)

5. A son of Ornytus or Ornytion. (Paus. ii. 4. § 3; Schol. ad Eurip. Or. 1087.)

6. A Trojan who was slain by Menelaus. (Hom. Il. xvi. 311.) [L. S.]

THOAS (Θόας), an Aetolian, who was praetor of that nation in B. C. 193, and at a council held at Naupactus, took a prominent part in urging his countrymen to war with Rome, and advised them to send embassies to Philip and Antiochus. These, however, produced no effect for the moment, and the following year (B. C. 192) we find Thoas engaging on his own account in an unsuccessful attempt to reduce the important fortress of Chalcis. But circumstances now caused Antiochus to lend a more favourable ear to his overtures, and having repaired in person to join the king in Asia, he obtained great influence over his mind, and, by his magniloquent promises, was mainly instrumental in persuading him to pass over in person with his army into Greece. Here also he readily induced the Aetolians, who were assembled in council at Lamia, to conclude an alliance with Antiochus, and place themselves under his command. We do not, however, hear any thing of the services which he rendered to the king during the war that followed; while by the advice which he had given at the commencement, he had prevented Antiochus from availing himself of the important assistance of Hannibal. After the defeat of the Syrian monarch the Romans made the surrender of Thoas one of the conditions of the peace which they granted him: but though this demand was complied with, they were induced to set him at liberty at the intercession of Nicander and Pantaleon. At a subsequent period, however (B. C. 169), having again taken an active part against these last partizans, he fell a victim to the popular indignation, being assailed with stones by the assembly of the people. (Liv. xxxv. 12, 37, 38, 42, 45, xxxvii. 45, xxxviii. 38; Polyb. xxi. 14, xxii. 26, xxviii. 4; Diod. xxix. Exc. Legat. p. 621, Exc. Vat. p. 71.) [E. H. B.]

THOMAS (Θωμᾶς). 1. Magister, a rhetorician and grammarian, who flourished about A. D. 1310. He appears to have been a native of Thessalonica, and to have lived at the court of the emperor Andronicus Palaeologus I., and to have held the offices of marshal (Magister Officiorum) and keeper of the archives (Chartophylax); but he afterwards retired to a monastery, where he assumed the name of Theodulus, and devoted himself to the study of the ancient Greek authors. His chief work was a Lexicon of Attic Words (κατὰ Ἀλφάβητον ὀνομάτων Ἀττικῶν Ἐκλογαί), compiled from the works of the elder grammarians, such as Phrynichus, Ammonius, Herodian, and Moeris; but with very little judgment. The work has some value on account of its containing much from the elder grammarians, which would otherwise have been lost; but, when Thomas deserts his guides, he often falls into the most serious errors. He wrote Scholia upon Pindar, Euripides, and Aristophanes, the remains of which are merged in the collections of ancient scholia, and also lives of those authors, which are prefixed to some of the editions of their works. His other writings consist of letters and orations, the latter being partly scholastic essays in imitation of the ancient orators, partly encomiums on the great men of former days, such as that upon Gregory of Nazianzus, partly laudatory addresses to his contemporaries, and partly relating to passing events.

His Attic Lexicon was first published by Zach. Caliergus, Rom. 1517, 8vo.; and soon after by Fr. Asulanus, who had not seen the former edition, in the Aldine collection of Greek Lexicographers, entitled Dictionarium Graecum, Venet. 1524, fol.; reprinted 1525, fol.; then by Michael Vascosanus, with the Attic Lexicons of Phrynichus and Moschopulus, Lutet. 1532, 8vo.; the next edition was that of Nicolas Blancard, who made many rash changes in the text; a very excellent edition, enriched with a body of notes by Dan. Heinsius, J. Chr. Wolf, and many other scholars, was published by Johan. Steph. Bernard, Lugd. Bat. 1757, 8vo.; and, lastly, the work has been recently re-edited by Ritschl, with valuable Prolegomena, under the following title:—Thomae Magistri sive Theoduli Monachi Ecloga Vocum Atticarum. Ex Recensione et cum Prolegomenis Friderici Ritschelii. Halis Sax. 1831, 1832, 8vo. An edition of the Orations and Epistles, which were then known, was published in Greek and Latin, Upsal. 1693, 4to., by Laurentius Norrmann, who had edited the Laudatio Gregorii alone two years before, Upsal. 1691, 4to.; and two other orations, namely that to Andronicus Palaeologus de Regis Officiis, and the fellow to it, de Subditorum erga Regem Officiis, have been published in the Nova Collectio Veterum Scriptorum of Angelo Maio (vol. iii. pp. 145, foll., pp. 173, foll. 1827, 4to.), who gives the titles of several unedited letters and orations of Thomas, which he promises to publish. Some Excerpta from Thomas Magister are printed in the Anecdota of L. Bachmann, vol. ii. 1828, 8vo.

(Cave, Hist. Litt. s. a. 1311, Appendix, p. 15, ed. Basil.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. pp. 181, foll.; Schröckh, Christl. Kirchengesch. vol. xxx. p. 298; Schöll, Gesch. d. Griech. Litt. vol. iii. pp. 152, 207; Hoffmann, Lex. Bibliogr. Script. Graec.)

2. Thomas, a monk of Crete, whose selection from the Lexicon of Suidas exists in MS. in several libraries, appears to be a different person from Thomas Magister. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. vi. p. 417.)

3. A patrician and marshal of the Byzantine circus (πατρίκιος καὶ λογοθέτης τοῦ δρόμου), wrote an epitaph on a certain Anastasius, who had gained many victories in the horse-races; which is preserved in the Anthology of Planudes. (Anth. Planud. p. 408, Steph., p. 543, Wechel.; Brunck, Anal. vol. iii. p. 124; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iv. p. 94, vol. xiii. p. 961.)

4. The Planudean Anthology also contains an epigram in praise of Demosthenes, Thucydides, and Aristeides, as the three greatest of Greek rhetoricians, by a certain Thomas Scholasticus, the same person, perhaps, as Thomas Magister, with whom Planudes was contemporary. Nay, it is possible that Thomas Patricius (No. 3) may also have been identical with Thomas Magister, who may have held the office in the circus before his retirement to the monastery. (Anth. Plan. p. 376, Steph., p. 514, Wechel.; Brunck, l. c. p. 125; Jacobs, l. c. p. 95; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 497.)

A few other insignificant persons of the name are mentioned by Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. pp. 719, 720. [P. S.]

THOMAS (Θωμᾶς), a physician of the emperor Justinian, who was also a privy counsellor (ἀσηκρήτοις, or a secretis), and stood high in his favour. He was put to death for the part he took in the riots at Constantinople called Νίκα, A. D. 532. (Chron. Pasch. pp. 338, 340.) [W. A. G.]

THOON (Θόων). 1. One of the Gigantes, was killed by the Moerae. (Apollod. i. 6. § 2.)

2. A Trojan who was killed by Odysseus. (Hom. Il. xi. 422.)

3. A son of Phaenops, who, with his brother Xanthus, was slain by Diomedes. (Hom. Il. v. 152.) A Phaeacian of this name occurs in the Odyssey (viii. 113). [L. S.]

THORA'NIUS, or TORA'NIUS. 1. A legate of Q. Metellus Pius in Spain, was defeated and slain by Sertorius about B. C. 77. He is called Thorius by Florus. (Plut. Sertor. 12; Flor. iii. 22. § 6.)

2. One of the Pompeian party, who was in exile in B. C. 45, and to whom Cicero addressed two letters of consolation, which are extant (ad Fam. vi. 20, 21, where the name is usually written Toranius or Torannius.)

3. C. Thoranius or Toranius, was the tutor or guardian of Octavianus, and the colleague of his father in the aedileship, but was nevertheless proscribed by the triumvirs in B. C. 43, at the request of his son, who was anxious to obtain possession of his property. His son soon dissipated the inheritance which he had acquired by parricide, was convicted of theft, and died in exile. (Appian, B. C. iv. 12, 18; Suet. Octav. 27; Val. Max. ix. 11. § 5; Oros. vi. 18.)

4. Thoranius, tribune of the plebs in B. C. 25, placed his father by his side in the seat assigned to the tribunes in the theatre, although his father was at the time a freedman. (Dion Cass. liii. 27.)

5. Thoranius, or Toranius, a celebrated mango or slave-dealer in the time of Antony and Augustus. He is called Toranius Flaccus by Macrobius. (Plin. H. N. vii. 10. s. 12; Macrob. Sat. ii. 4; Suet. Octav. 69.)

THORAX (Θώραξ). 1. Of Larissa in Thessaly, and one of the powerful family of the Aleuadae. Thorax and his brothers, wishing to confirm or to increase their power, were among those who urged Xerxes to invade Greece, and promised him their assistance in the enterprise. In the Persian king's retreat, after the battle of Salamis, Thorax formed one of his escort, after which he still continued to show his zeal in the cause of the invaders, and was present with Mardonius at the battle of Plataea, B. C. 479. When the Persians had been finally driven from Greece, Leotychides, king of Sparta, led an army into Thessaly to punish those who had sided with the barbarians, but the Aleuadae purchased his forbearance with bribes. (Herod. vi. 72, vii. 6, ix. 1, 58.) [Leotychides, No. 2.]

2. A Lacedaemonian, is mentioned by Diodorus (xiii. 76) as acting under Callicratidas during his operations in Lesbos, in B. C. 405, and as having been commissioned by him, after the capture of Methymna, to conduct the heavy-armed troops to Mytilene. In the following year we again find Thorax in command of the land-force which cooperated with the fleet under Lysander in the storming of Lampsacus (Xen. Hell. ii. 1. § 18; Plut. Lys. 9); and he was left at Samos as harmost by Lysander, when the latter was on his way to Athens after the battle of Aegospotami. (Diod. xiv. 3.) According to Plutarch, when the satrap Pharnabazus sent to Sparta to complain of ravages committed in his territory by Lysander, the Lacedaemonian government put Thorax to death, as he was a friend and colleague of the accused admiral, and they had found money in his possession. (Plut. Lys. 19.) The date and circumstances of this, however, are very doubtful. (See Thirlwall's Greece, vol. iv. App. iv.) [E. E.]

THORISMOND or TORISMOND, king of the Visigoths, A.D. 451—452. He succeeded his father Theodoric I., who fell at the battle of Châlons, in which Attila was defeated. Thorismond was also present at this battle, and distinguished himself greatly by his personal courage. Anxious to revenge the death of his father, and to follow up the advantages the Roman and Gothic army had already gained, Thorismond proposed an attack upon the king of the Huns in his camp; but Aëtius, the Roman general, fearing that the extirpation of the Huns would make the Visigoths the masters of the Roman dominions, dissuaded Thorismond from his purpose, by representing to him the danger of absence from his capital at the commencement of his reign, since he had ambitious brothers who might seize both his treasures and his crown. These arguments easily persuaded the youthful monarch to return to Toulouse. In the following year (A. D. 452), if we may believe Jornandes, he defeated Attila, who had attacked the Alani after his return from Rome; but Gregory of Tours speaks simply of the conquest of the Alani by Thorismond, without making any mention of Attila. At the close of the same year Thorismond was murdered by his brothers Theodoric and Frederic, the former of whom succeeded him on the throne. (Jornandes, de Reb. Get. 41—43; Idatius, Chron.; Greg. Tur. ii. 7; Sidon. Apoll. Ep. vii. 12; Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. vi.)

THO'RIUS BALBUS. [BALBUS.]

P. THRA'SEA PAETUS*, one of those distinguished Romans in the reign of Nero who were disgusted with the tyranny and corruption of the times in which they lived, and endeavoured to carry into practice the severer virtues of the Stoic philosophy. He was a native of Patavium (Padua), and was probably born soon after the death of Augustus. Nothing is related of his early years, and we only know that he was of a noble family, and inherited considerable wealth from his ancestors. In his youth he devoted himself with ardour to the study of the Stoic philosophy, and he appears at an early period of his life to have made the younger Cato his model, of whose life he wrote an account. (Plut. Cat. Min. 25, 37.) At what period he settled at Rome, is uncertain, but there he became acquainted with the best spirits of his age. His house and gardens were the place in which the lovers of liberty and virtue were accustomed to assemble, and he himself became the counsellor and friend of them all, and was regarded by them with the utmost veneration and love. In his marriage he sought a wife of congenial principles. He married Arria, the daughter of the heroic Arria, who showed her husband Caecina how to die [ARRIA]; and his wife was worthy of her mother and her husband. At a later period he gave his own daughter in marriage to Helvidius Priscus, who trod closely in the footsteps of his father-in-law. Thus he was strengthened in his pursuit of high and noble objects by his domestic connections as well as by the friends with whom he constantly associated.

The first time that the name of Thrasea is mentioned in connection with public affairs, is in A. D. 57, when he had already acquired considerable reputation. In that year he gave the most active support to the Cilicians, in their accusation of their late governor Cossutianus Capito, who, in consequence, gave up his intention of defending himself, and was condemned, and who thus became one of Thrasea's bitterest enemies. (Comp. Tac. Ann. xiii. 33, with xvi. 21, sub fin.) In the following year (A. D. 58) Thrasea spoke in the senate on a matter trifling in itself, but which is recorded by the historian (Ann. xiii. 49) on account of the censure which Thrasea received in consequence from the friends of the court. Shortly after this, in March, A. D. 59, Thrasea acted in a manner far more offensive to the emperor. In this year the tyrant had killed his mother Agrippina, to whom he owed the throne, and sent a letter to the senate, informing them that she had conspired against his life, and had received the punishment that was her due. The obsequious senators forthwith proceeded to vote to the matricide all kinds of honours. This was more than the noble spirit of Thrasea could endure. He had been accustomed to give his assent in silence or with a few words to the former acts of adulation displayed by the senate towards their imperial master; but now, as soon as he had heard the emperor's letter, he rose from his seat and quitted the house without waiting till it came to his turn to give his opinion. Nero took no public notice of the conduct of Thrasea at the time, but he did not forget it, and only waited for a convenient opportunity to gratify his revenge.

In A. D. 62 Thrasea gave another instance of courage in the senate. The praetor Antistius had been accused of writing libellous verses against Nero, and the consul elect, to please the emperor, had proposed that the offender should be put to death. Thrasea, on the contrary, maintained that this punishment was too severe, and proposed in its place confiscation of property and banishment to an island. The freedom of Thrasea broke the spell of slavery. The majority of the senate voted in favour of his proposition; and although Nero expressed his displeasure at the sentence, Thrasea would not yield, and the senate followed his noble example. In the course of the same year Thrasea spoke in the senate on occasion of the trial of Claudius Timarchus, of Crete, with great applause, denouncing some of the causes of the evils of the provincial administration, and pointing out their remedy.

In A. D. 63 Thrasea received a public expression of Nero's hatred. At the beginning of that year the senate went in a body to Antium, to congratulate Nero upon his wife Poppaea having recently given birth to a daughter; but Thrasea alone was forbidden to enter the imperial presence, an intimation of his approaching fate which he received with his usual calmness, for he had often been ac-

* The gentile name of Thrasea is not mentioned by any ancient writer, and has given rise to some dispute. Lipsius (ad Tac. Ann. xvi. 21) suspected that it might be Valerius, because we find in an inscription, a L. Valerius Messalla Thrasea, who was consul in A. D. 196, but we have no evidence that this person was a descendant of Thrasea Paetus, and the name of Thrasea occurs in other gentes. It has been conjectured, with more probability, by Haase (in Ersch and Gruber's Encyklopädie, art. Pätus), that Fannius was the gentile name of our Thrasea, since his daughter was called Fannia, and not Arria, like her mother and grandmother.

customed to say in the language of the Stoic school, "Nero can kill me, but cannot injure me." He did not, however, court his fate. During the next three years he retired almost entirely from public life, and was hardly ever seen in the senate. But Nero could neither forget nor forgive him; and accordingly, after he had put to death so many distinguished men on occasion of Piso's conspiracy, he resolved, to use the words of Tacitus (Ann. xvi. 21), to murder Virtue herself, by the execution of Thrasea and his friend Barea Soranus. The accusation, condemnation, and death of Thrasea, are related by Tacitus, with more than his usual power; and we must refer our readers for the details of the tragic scene to the masterly pages of the great historian. The accusation against Thrasea was placed in the hands of his old enemy Cossutianus Capito, and of Eprius Marcellus. One of his friends, Arulenus Rusticus, who was then tribune of the people, offered to put his veto upon the decree of the senate, but Thrasea would not allow him thus to sacrifice his life. On the day of his impeachment the temple of Venus, where the senate assembled, was surrounded by soldiers, and bodies of troops were stationed in all the public buildings and open places of the city. The senators had no alternative but submission or death. They gratified the wishes of the emperor by condemning Thrasea and Barea Soranus to death, and Helvidius Priscus, Thrasea's son-in-law, to banishment. Thrasea was allowed the choice of his own death. It was late in the day when the senate pronounced its sentence; and the consul forthwith sent his quaestor to carry the fatal news to Thrasea. He was in his gardens conversing with his friends, and was at that moment more particularly engaged in conversation with the Cynic philosopher Demetrius; and the subject of their discussion, as far as could be gathered from the few words that were overheard, appeared to be the immortality of the soul. The conversation was interrupted by the arrival of Domitius Caecilianus, one of Thrasea's most intimate friends, who informed him of the senate's decision. Thrasea forthwith dismissed his friends, that they might not be involved in the fate of a condemned person; and when his wife wished to follow the example of her mother, and die with her husband, he entreated her to preserve her life for the sake of their daughter. He then went into a colonnade, where he awaited the arrival of the quaestor. When the latter had delivered to him the decree of the senate, he retired into his chamber with Demetrius and Helvidius Priscus, and there had the veins of both his arms cut. As the blood gushed forth, he said "Let us offer a libation to Jupiter the Deliverer," and then, addressing a few words to the quaestor, he calmly awaited the approach of death. His last words were spoken to Demetrius, but these, unfortunately, are not preserved, as the existing MSS. of the Annals of Tacitus break off at this point. Thrasea perished in A. D. 66, two years before the death of Nero. His panegyric was written by his friend and admirer, Arulenus Rusticus, who was in consequence put to death by Domitian. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 49, xiv. 12, 48, 49, xv. 20—22, xvi. 21—35, Hist. ii. 91, iv. 5, Agric. 2; Dion Cass. lxi. 15. lxii. 26; Suet. Ner. 37, Dom. 10; Plin. Ep. vii. 19, viii. 22; Plut. Praecep. Reip. Gerend. c. 14, p. 810, a.; Arrian, Dissert. i. 1. § 26; Mart. i. 9; Juv. v. 36.)

THRA'SEA PRISCUS, a man of noble birth and great acquirements, was slain by Caracalla in A. D. 212. (Dion Cass. lxxvii. 5.) We learn from the Fasti that his full name was L. Valerius Messalla Thrasea Priscus, and that he was consul along with C. Domitius Dexter in A. D. 196, under Septimius Severus.

THRA'SIUS (Θράσιος). 1. A soothsayer who is also called Phrasius. (Hygin. Fab. 56; Ov. Art. Am. i. 649; Apollod. ii. 5. § 11.)

2. A Trojan who was killed by Achilles. (Hom. Il. xxi. 210.) [L. S.]

THRASON, a statuary, mentioned by Strabo (xiv. p. 641), who saw several of his works in the temple of Artemis at Ephesus, and, among them, statues of Penelope and Eurycleia. He is probably the same artist whose name occurs in Pliny's list of those who made athletas et armatos et venatores sacrificantesque. (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 34.)

There is an extant inscription in which mention is made of a statue dedicated to Artemis, the work of Straton of Pellene. From the form of the letters of the inscription, Böckh supposes its date to be not earlier than the reign of Trajan or of Hadrian, in which case, of course, the artist must have been a different person from the Thrason mentioned by Strabo and Pliny. (Böckh, C. I. No. 1823, vol. ii. p. 9; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 418, 2d. ed.) [P. S.]

THRASO'NIDES (Θρασωνίδης), a Stoic philosopher, whose conduct on a certain occasion is quoted by Diogenes Laërtius, in illustration of the definition of love given by the Stoics. (Diog. vii. 130; copied by Suidas, s. v. Ἔρως.) [P. S.]

THRA'SYAS (Θρασύας), an eminent herbalist, a native of Mantineia in Arcadia, the tutor of Alexias, who is said to have been able to drink hellebore with impunity. He lived shortly before the time of Theophrastus, and therefore probably about the middle of the fourth century B. C. (Theophrast. Hist. Plant. ix. 16. § 8; 17. §§ 1, 2.)

It is uncertain whether he is the same person who was the author of some medical formulae mentioned by Scribonius Largus (De Compos. Medicam. c. 208 (78)), and Aëtius (ii. 4. 57, iii. 1. 65, pp. 415, 426). [W. A. G.]

THRASYBU'LUS (Θρασύβουλος). 1. Tyrant of Miletus, was a contemporary of Periander and Alyattes, the king of Lydia. We do not learn when he became tyrant, but from the expression of Herodotus (i. 22) it rather seems that he was tyrant during the whole of the eleven years' war carried on by Sadyattes, and Alyattes against Miletus. It was in the twelfth year of that war that the temple of the Assesian Athene was burnt down, after which Alyattes fell sick, and the Delphic oracle, when consulted by him, refused to give a response till the temple was rebuilt. Periander, who was intimately connected with Thrasybulus, got to know the reply that had been given, and sent word to Thrasybulus, who, when the herald of Alyattes came to demand a truce till the temple should be rebuilt, gave directions that the greatest possible ostentation of plenty should be made, to induce the belief that the Milesians had still abundance of provisions. The stratagem produced the desired effect. Alyattes, who had expected to find the people reduced to the last extremity, hastily concluded a peace, B. C. 612. (Herod. i. 20—22.)

According to Herodotus (vi. 92) his intercourse with Thrasybulus had an injurious effect upon the character and policy of Periander, rendering him cruel and suspicious. For the story of the mode in which Thrasybulus gave his advice to Periander as to the best means of securing his power, the reader is referred to the article PERIANDER [Vol. II. p. 190]. A different version of the story is given by Aristotle (Pol. iii. 13, v. 10), according to whom the advice was given by Periander to Thrasybulus.

2. An Athenian, the son of Thraso. He was an enemy of Alcibiades, and after the battle of Notium, went to Athens, for the purpose of laying accusations against Alcibiades, in consequence of which the latter was removed from his command. (Plut. Alc. 36.)

3. An Athenian, the son of Lycus, of the deme Steiria. He was zealously attached to the democratic party, and was a warm friend of Alcibiades. The first occasion on which we find him mentioned is in B. C. 411, when he was in command of a galley in the Athenian fleet at Samos, and took an active part in the suppression of the oligarchical conspiracy (Thuc. viii. 73). When the news arrived of the establishment of the Four Hundred at Athens, Thrasybulus and Thrasyllus were among the most active in urging resistance to the oligarchy, and exacted a solemn oath from the Athenians of the fleet that they would maintain the democracy, and persevere in the war with the Peloponnesians. In an assembly held soon after in the camp, some of the suspected generals were removed, and others appointed in their room. Among the latter was Thrasybulus. Through the influence of Thrasybulus a decree was passed by the camp-assembly, by which Alcibiades was pardoned and recalled. Thrasybulus himself sailed to fetch him from the court of Tissaphernes. Shortly afterwards he set out towards the Hellespont with five galleys, when news arrived of the revolt of Eresus. After his junction with Thrasyllus was fought the battle of Cynossema, in which Thrasybulus commanded the right wing, and by a sudden attack upon the Peloponnesians, who had gained a partial success, turned the fortune of the day. (Thuc. viii. 75, 76, 81, 100, 104, &c.) Just before the battle of Cyzicus Thrasybulus joined Alcibiades with twenty galleys, having been despatched on an expedition to collect money from Thasos and other places in that quarter. (Xen. Hellen. i. 1. § 12.) In 407 he was sent with a fleet of thirty ships to the coast of Thrace, where he reduced most of the revolted cities to submission. (Xen. Hellen. i. 4. § 9; Demosth. adv. Lept. p. 474; Diod. xiii. 72.) He was about the same time elected one of the new generals, together with Alcibiades. While engaged in fortifying Phocaea, he received a visit from Alcibiades, who had left his fleet at Notium. (Xen. l. c. i. 5. § 6.) After the unfortunate battle of Notium took place, he was involved in the disgrace of Alcibiades, and was superseded in his command, but still continued to serve in the fleet. He was one of the subordinate officers at the battle of Arginusae, and was one of those charged with the duty of taking care of the wrecks. (Xen. i. 6. § 35.) He is said to have had a dream before the battle, which portended the victory and the death of the generals (Diod. xiii. 97). On the establishment of the Thirty Tyrants he was banished, and was living in exile at Thebes when the rulers of Athens were perpetrating their excesses of tyranny. Being aided by the Thebans with arms and money, he collected a small band, and seized the fortress of Phyle, where he was rapidly reinforced, and after repulsing an attack made upon the fortress, he defeated the forces placed to check the incursions of the garrison. Four days afterwards he descended with a body of 1000 men and marched into Peiraeus, taking up a strong position on the hill of Munychia, where he was joined by most of the population of Peiraeus. The forces of the tyrants were immediately despatched against them, but were defeated, though with no great loss. The Ten, who were appointed in place of the Thirty, however, showed no less disposition to overpower Thrasybulus and his party, who strengthened themselves as much as possible, and made foraging excursions every day from Peiraeus. In consequence of the application of the oligarchs Lysander and Libys were sent to blockade Peiraeus. The exiles however were delivered from their perilous position through the machinations of Pausanias. After they had sustained a severe defeat, Pausanias secretly sent to them, directing them to send an embassy to him, and suggesting the kind of language that they should hold. An armistice was concluded with them, and deputies were despatched by them to plead their cause at Sparta. The issue was a general reconciliation, accompanied by an amnesty, and the exiles entered the city in triumph, and offered a sacrifice to Athene on the Acropolis. Soon afterwards the oligarchical exiles at Eleusis, who were preparing to renew the civil war, were overpowered, and a new act of amnesty was passed with respect to them, the credit of which seems to have belonged to Thrasybulus and his friends. (Xen. Hellen. ii. 4. §§ 2—43; Diod. xiv. 32, 33; Paus. i. 29. § 3, iii. 5. § 1; Plut. Lys. 27.) In B. C. 395 we find Thrasybulus moving the decree for an alliance between Thebes and Athens, when the former was menaced by Sparta, and leading an army to the help of the Thebans (Paus. iii. 5. § 4; Xen. Hellen. iii. 5. § 16, &c). In B. C. 390 Thrasybulus was sent with forty ships to aid the democratical Rhodians against Teleutias. Not finding that he could be of any service at Rhodes, he sailed away to Thrace, where he reconciled two Odrysian princes, Amadocus and Seuthes, and brought them to enter into alliance with Athens. Seuthes offered to give him his daughter in marriage. He then proceeded to Byzantium, where by the aid of Archebius and Heracleides he established the democratical party, and restored the Athenian interest. He also brought Chalcedon into alliance with Athens. In the island of Lesbos he reduced Methymna and some other towns. From Lesbos he sailed southwards, and having anchored in the Eurymedon near Aspendus, the inhabitants of this place fell upon him in the night and killed him in his tent. (Diod. xiv. 94, 99; Xen. Hellen. iv. 8. § 25, &c.; Demosth. adv. Lept. p. 475.) His tomb was on the road leading to the Academy, near those of Pericles, Chabrias, and Phormion. (Paus. i. 29. § 3.)

4. Son of the preceding, had for some offence or other a fine of ten talents inflicted on him. (Demosth. de fals. Leg. p. 431.)

5. An Athenian, a native of the deme Colyttus, was one of the companions of Thrasybulus the Steirian at Phyle and Peiraeus. In B. C. 388 he was in command of eight ships off the coast of Thrace. We learn that nevertheless he was twice condemned and thrown into prison. (Xen. Hellen. v. 1. § 26; Demosth. adv. Timocr. p. 742.)

6. An Elean, the son of Aeneas. He was a soothsayer, in which capacity he foretold to the Mantineans their victory over Agis and the Lacedaemonians, and himself took part in the battle. (Paus. vi. 2. § 4, viii. 10. § 5; comp. vi. 13. § 11, vi. 14. § 9.)

7. Brother of Gelon, tyrant of Syracuse. On the death of Hieron, Thrasybulus succeeded him in the government. It does not appear distinctly whether he assumed the tyranny because the son of Gelon was not yet old enough, or, as the language of Aristotle (Polit. v. 8) indicates, though called tyrant, and possessing the substance of power, was in fact little more than the minister or favourite of his nephew, whom he is said to have corrupted, that he might afterwards supplant him. Aristotle's version of the matter also represents the resistance offered by the friends of the rightful heir, as leading to the overthrow of the dynasty. It is possible enough, as Dr. Thirlwall suggests (Hist. of Greece, vol. iii. p. 224), that Thrasybulus became the guardian of his nephew on the death of Polyzelus, and before the death of Hieron; and that, having rendered the youth odious and contemptible, he found no difficulty, when Hieron died, in setting him aside, and usurping his authority. This supposition, however, still leaves unexplained Aristotle's statement about the expulsion of the dynasty, which is one of the most important features of his account. Little, therefore, is gained by any endeavour to reconcile the two versions. According to the more detailed narration of Diodorus (xi. 67), Thrasybulus directly succeeded Hieron, and soon provoked a revolt by his rapacity and cruelty. With the aid of foreign mercenaries, and some troops from Aetna and Catana, amounting altogether to 15,000 men, he maintained his ground for some time in Acradina and the Island. The Syracusans entrenched themselves in the quarter called Tyche, and sent for assistance to Gela, Agrigentum, Selinus, Himera, and the inland cities of Sicily. They readily lent their aid, and Thrasybulus was decisively defeated both by sea and by land. He thereupon entered into a negotiation with his revolted subjects, and was allowed to abdicate his authority and retire into exile. He withdrew to Locri, in Italy, and there ended his days. His dynasty ended with him.

8. Son of Xenocrates, and nephew of Theron tyrant of Agrigentum. He is mentioned on more than one occasion by Pindar. (Pyth. vi., Isthm. ii., Fragm. 89. 1.) [C. P. M.]

THRASYBU'LUS (Θρασύβουλος), a friend and contemporary of Galen, in the latter half of the second century after Christ. Galen addressed two of his works to him, viz. De Optima Secta (vol. i. p. 106) and Utrum Medicinae sit an Gymnastices Hygieine (vol. v. p. 806); but it does not seem certain that he was a physician. [W. A. G.]

THRASYDAEUS (Θρασυδαῖος). 1. A citizen of Elis, and leader of the democratic party there. When the Spartans under Agis invaded the Elean territory, in B. C. 400, the oligarchs of Elis, led by Xenias, made an attempt to overpower their political adversaries, and killed, among others, a man, whom, from the likeness between the two, they mistook for Thrasydaeus. The democratic party were hereupon much disheartened, but the mistake was soon discovered, and Thrasydaeus, who, at the beginning of the outbreak, was sunk in sleep from the influence of wine, put himself at the head of the people, and completely conquered the oligarchs. Agis, however, when he retired from Elis, left a Lacedaemonian garrison in Epitalium, and the Eleans were so harassed by the ravages it committed, that Thrasydaeus, in the following year (B. C. 399), was compelled to sue to Sparta for peace, and to purchase it by absolute submission. (Xen. Hell. iii. 2. §§ 27—30; Paus. iii. 8.) We may perhaps identify with the subject of the present article the Thrasylaeus of Elis, who is mentioned as having been persuaded by his friend Lysias, the orator, to supply two talents to the Athenian patriots under Thrasybulus, in aid of their enterprise against the Thirty Tyrants, B. C. 403 (Pseudo-Plut. Vit. X. Orat. Lys.)

2. Of Elis, an eunuch, who, instigated by a private injury, murdered Evagoras, king of Salamis in Cyprus, in B. C. 374. (Theopomp. ap. Phot. p. 120, a, b; comp. Arist. Pol. v. 10, ed. Bekk.; Diod. xv. 47; Wess. ad loc.) [EVAGORAS, No. 1.] [E. E.]

THRASYDAEUS (Θρασυδαῖος), tyrant of Agrigentum, was the son and successor of Theron. Already during his father's lifetime he had been appointed to the government of Himera, where, by his violent and arbitrary conduct, he alienated the minds of the citizens, so that they were on the point of breaking out into revolt. But having applied for support to Hieron of Syracuse, that ruler betrayed their application to Theron, who, in consequence, put to death the leaders of the disaffected party, and effectually re-established his authority. (Diod. xi. 48.) Whether Thrasydaeus retained his position at Himera after this, we know not: but on the death of Theron he succeeded without opposition in the sovereignty of both cities. His tyrannical and violent character soon displayed itself, and rendered him as unpopular at Agrigentum as he had been at Himera. But his first object was to renew the war with Hieron, against whom he had already taken an active part during his father's lifetime. (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. ii. 29.) He therefore assembled a large force of mercenaries, besides a general levy from Agrigentum and Himera, and advanced against Hieron, but was defeated after an obstinate and sanguinary struggle; and the Agrigentines immediately took advantage of this disaster to expel him from their city. He made his escape to Greece, but was arrested at Megara, and publicly executed. (Diod. xi. 53.) Diodorus assigns the whole of these events to the year B. C. 472, in which Theron died, but there are some difficulties in this chronology. (See Böckh, ad Pind. vol. iii. p. 209; and Brunet de Presle, Recherches sur les Etablissemens Grecs en Sicile, p. 145, note.) [E. H. B.]

THRASYLLA ENNIA. [ENNIA.]

THRASYLLUS or THRASYLUS (Θράσυλλος, Θράσυλος). 1. An Argive, was one of the five generals of the commonwealth when Argolis was invaded by the Lacedaemonians under Agis II., in B. C. 418. Agis succeeded in placing a division of his army between the Argive forces and Argos, thus cutting them off from their city, while their flank and rear were threatened by his two other divisions. Thrasyllus perceived the danger of this position, and, together with Alciphron (one of his fellow-citizens and a proxenus of Lacedaemon), obtained an interview with Agis, and induced him by the hope of a permanent peace to grant them a truce for four months. Thrasyllus and Alciphron, however, had taken this step without being authorized; and the Argives, who imagined that they had been on the point of gaining an easy victory over the Lacedaemonians, shut in as the latter were between them and the city, were highly exasperated, and began to stone Thrasyllus in the military court which was always held just outside the walls of Argos after an expedition. He saved his life only by taking refuge at an altar, and he was punished by the confiscation of his property. (Thuc. v. 59, 60.)

2. An Athenian, was serving as a hoplite in the army at Samos, in B. C. 411, and was one of those who persuaded the soldiers and sailors to aid the Samian people against the expected attempt of the oligarchical conspirators to put down democracy in the island. The consequence was the defeat of the revolutionists. Shortly after, when CHAEREAS had brought to Samos an exaggerated account of the tyranny and violence of the 400 at Athens, Thrasyllus and Thrasybulus bound the army by an oath to be faithful to democracy, zealous in the war with the Peloponnesians, and ever hostile to the revolutionary government at home; and, in the lection of new generals which ensued, these two were included in the number. In the same year, B. C. 411, Thrasyllus commanded the left wing of the fleet at the battle of Cynossema, in which the Athenians defeated the Peloponnesians; and somewhat later, after the victory gained by the Athenians over the Lacedaemonian fleet near Abydus, he was despatched to Athens to bear the good news and to ask for supplies. Some time after his arrival, Agis having, in a foray from Deceleia, advanced too near the walls of the city, Thrasyllus led out the Athenians against him and obtained a slight advantage, in consequence of which his countrymen the more readily voted him a reinforcement both of men and ships. With these he sailed early in B. C. 409 to Samos, whence he proceeded to the coast of Asia and attacked the town of Pygela without success. Within a few days, however, Colophon surrendered to him, and he then advanced into Lydia, and having ravaged the country, proceeded by sea against Ephesus, but here he was defeated and driven back to his ships by the forces of the Ephesians, united with those of Tissaphernes and the Syracusans; and after sailing to Notium where he buried his dead, he steered his course for Lesbos. Here, while anchoring at Methymna, he observed the Syracusan squadron sailing by, whereupon he attacked it, captured four ships with their crews, and chased the rest back to Ephesus. He then continued his voyage to Sestus, where he joined the force under Alcibiades, and the whole fleet crossed over together to Lampsacus; but the troops of Alcibiades, who had not sustained any defeat, refused to serve in the same ranks with those of Thrasyllus, conquered as they had been at Ephesus; nor was this feeling removed till their common success in the ensuing winter against Pharnabazus near Abydus. In B. C. 408 Thrasyllus was engaged with Alcibiades in the successful operations at Chalcedon, which induced Pharnabazus to accept terms of accommodation from the Athenians. He probably shared also in the siege and reduction of Byzantium in the same year, and in B. C. 407 he led home to Athens a portion of the triumphant armament. Not long after, he was one of the generals who were appointed to supersede Alcibiades after the battle of Notium, and was present in that capacity at Arginusae in B. C. 406. After the battle it was he who proposed to leave 47 galleys behind to save the men from the wrecks, while the main body of the fleet should sail against the ships of the enemy, which were blockading Mytilene. He was also among the six generals who returned to Athens and were shamefully put to death by the people through the intrigues of Theramenes. It should be observed that Diodorus, in his account of several of the above events, substitutes, by an error, the name of Thrasybulus for that of Thrasyllus. (Thuc. viii. 73, 75, 76, 104, 105; Xen. Hell. i. 1. §§ 8, 33, 34, 2. §§ 1—17, 3. §§ 4, &c., 14, &c., 4. § 10, 5. § 16, 6. § 30, 7. §§ 2, 29, 34; Plat. Theag. p. 129; Plut. Alc. 29—31; Diod. xiii. 64, 66, 74, 101, 102; Palm. and Wess. ad Diod. xiii. 74.) [E. E.]

THRASYLLUS (Θράσυλλος), a musician of Phlius, is mentioned by Plutarch (de Mus. 21, p. 1137, f.), in connection with Tyrtaeus of Mantineia and Andreas of Corinth, as having purposely abstained from many of the artificial refinements which were introduced at an early period into Greek music. From the way in which he is mentioned by Plutarch, he seems to have lived in the early part of the fifth century B. C. [P. S.]

THRASYLLUS, was a celebrated astrologer at Rhodes, with whom Tiberius became acquainted during his residence in that island, and ever afterwards held in the highest honour. It was said that Tiberius had intended to kill him after consulting him respecting his future destinies; but that Thrasyllus, when he had predicted the empire to Tiberius, said that he perceived from the observation of the stars that his own death was near at hand, by which announcement he so convinced Tiberius of the truth of his art, that Tiberius not only gave up his intention of murdering him, but admitted him to his intimate friendship. Thrasyllus accompanied Tiberius to Rome, when he was recalled by Augustus, and appears to have always lived with him. He died in A. D. 36, the year before Tiberius, and is said to have saved the lives of many persons whom Tiberius would otherwise have put to death by falsely predicting for this very purpose that the emperor would live ten years longer. (Tac. Ann. vi. 20—22; Dion Cass. lv 11, lvii. 15, lviii. 27; Suet. Aug. 98, Tib. 14, 62, Cal. 19; Schol. ad Juv. vi. 576; Julian. Ep. ad Themist. p. 265, Spanh.) The son of this Thrasyllus succeeded to his father's skill, and is said to have predicted the empire to Nero. (Tac. Ann. vi. 22, comp. xiv. 9; Dion Cass. lxi. 2.)

THRASY'MACHUS (Θρασύμαχος), a native of Chalcedon, was a sophist, and one of the earliest cultivators of the art of rhetoric. He was a contemporary of Gorgias. (Cic. Orat. 12, 13, 52; Quintil. iii. 1. § 10.) He is introduced by Plato as one of the interlocutors in the Politeia, and is referred to several times in the Phaedrus. Like Prodicus and Protagoras, he discoursed and wrote on subjects of natural philosophy (Cic. de Orat. iii. 32. § 128); Plutarch (Symp. p. 616, d.) mentions a work by him on Illustrious Men (Ὑπερβάλλοντες). Quintilian speaks of him as one of the first who wrote on common places (probably in the ἀφορμαὶ ῥητορικαί mentioned by Suid. s. v. Θρασ.) He seems to have been particularly fond of making his syllables fall into paeons (Quintil. ix. 4. § 87). Suidas, who very stupidly makes him a disciple of Plato and Isocrates, mentions as his works — 1. Orations (συμβουλευτικοί). 2. Τέχνη ῥητορική. 3. Παίγνια. 4. Ἀφορμαὶ ῥητορικαί. Athenaeus (x. p. 416) quotes from one of his introductions. The following epitaph was placed upon his monument at Chalcedon:

Τοὔνομα Θῆτα, ῥῶ, ἄλφα, σάν, ὖ, μῦ, ἄλφα, χῖ, οὖ, σάν.
Πατρὶς Χαλκηδών· ἡ δὲ τέχνη σοφίη.

(Athen. x. p. 454.) [C. P. M.]

THRASYME'DES (Θρασυμήδης), a son of the Pylian Nestor and Anaxibia, accompanied his father on the expedition against Troy, and returned with him to Pylos. (Hom. Il. ix. 81, xiv. 10, xvi. 321, xvii. 378, 705, Od. iii. 39, 414, 442, &c.) According to Philostratus (Her. iii. 2), he did not go to Troy. He was the father of Sillus, and his tomb was shown at Pylos in Messenia. (Paus. ii. 18. § 7, iv. 36. § 2.) [L. S.]

THRASYME'DES (Θρασυμήδης), the son of Arignotus of Paros, was the maker of the chryselephantine statue of Asclepius, in his temple at Epidaurus. Pausanias (ii. 27. § 2) describes the statue as being about half the size of that of the Olympian Zeus at Athens. The god was seated on a throne, holding a staff in one hand, and with the other hand held over the dragon's head, and with a dog lying by his side. The throne itself was adorned with sculptures, representing the Argive heroes, Bellerophon slaying the Chimaera, and Perseus holding the severed head of Medusa.

From the reference in this passage to the chryselephantine statue of Zeus Olympius at Athens, which was made at the expense of Hadrian (Paus. i. 18. § 6), it has been conjectured that the Epidaurians were indebted for the statue of their patron deity to the munificence of the same emperor, or of Antoninus Pius, who expended large sums on the decoration of that city (Paus. ii. 27. § 7); but it seems improbable that, if this were the case, Pausanias should not have stated the fact in so many words. (Siebelis, ad loc., and Hirt, Gesch. d. bild. Künste bei den Alten, p. 190.) [P. S.]

THRIAE (Θριαί), the name of three prophetic nymphs on Mount Parnassus, by whom Apollo was reared, and who were believed to have invented the art of prophecy by means of little stones (θριαί), which were thrown into an urn. (Hom. Hymn. in Merc. 552; Schol. ad Callim. Hymn. in Apoll. 45; comp. Lobeck, Aglaoph. p. 814.) [L. S.]

THU'CLES or THE'OCLES (Θουκλῆς, Θεοκλῆς), a citizen apparently of Chalcis in Euboea, who, having been cast by storms on the coast of Sicily, took notice of the fertility of the soil, and of the probable ease with which it might be won from the Sicel inhabitants. On his return home he made a report of these things, and was commissioned by the Chalcidian state to lead forth a body of colonists, Chalcidian and Naxian. With these he proceeded to Sicily, where he occupied as a strong-hold the hill Taurus, overlooking the sea on the eastern coast — a place remarkable as the spot where Grecian conquest in the island first began, and as the site of the later city of Tauromenium,— and from this eminence, having now obtained possession of the land, he founded in the immediate neighbourhood the town of Naxos, about B. C. 736. (Thuc. vi. 3; Ephor. ap. Strab. vi. p. 267; Hellanic. ap. Steph. Byz. s. v. Χαλκίς; comp. Grote's Greece, vol. iii. pp. 477, 478.) [E. E.]

THUCY'DIDES (Θουκυδίδης), historical. 1. An Athenian, of the demos Alopece, son of Melesias, and related to Cimon, to whom he is said to have been inferior in military talent, though he possessed more skill as a political tactician. After the death of Cimon, in B. C. 449, Thucydides became the leader of the aristocratic party, which he concentrated and more thoroughly organized in opposition to Pericles. With all his ability, however, and all his family influence, he was no match for his great adversary either in eloquence or address; and this he is said to have acknowledged himself, when king Archidamus II. of Sparta asked him whether he or Pericles was the better wrestler. "When I throw Pericles," was the answer, "he always contrives to make the spectators believe that he has had no fall." The line of attack also, which Plutarch represents Thucydides as adopting, does not appear to have been the most judicious, for he inveighed against the profuse expenditure of Pericles in public works, by no means the least popular feature in the great statesman's administration, and not long after this the struggle came to an end by the ostracism of Thucydides in B. C. 444. (Plut. Per. 6, 8, 11, 14, 16.) From an allusion in Aristophanes (Vesp. 947) we learn that, when he was in danger of this banishment, and rose to make his defence, he utterly broke down and was unable to open his mouth. According to the scholia on the same passage of Aristophanes, the historian Philochorus assigned as the cause of his exile some alleged misconduct during a command which he held in Thrace; while Idomeneus related that he was not ostracised merely, but sentenced to perpetual banishment with confiscation of his property, and that he fled to Artaxerxes, king of Persia. Here, however, the scholiast appears to have confounded Thucydides with Themistocles. [IDOMENEUS.] (Comp. Arist. Ach. 668, 673.) That he retired to Sparta is in itself probable enough, and is in some measure confirmed by the anecdote, above related, of his conversation with Archidamus. But the usual term of ostracism, viz. ten years, seems to have been abridged in his case, since we hear of him in B. C. 440 (at least there is good reason to suppose it the same person) as united with Hagnon and Phormion in the command of forty ships, which were sent to reinforce Pericles, then engaged in the siege of Samos. The arrival of these vessels, together with other reinforcements, compelled the Samians to capitulate (Thuc. i. 117; comp. Thirlwall's Greece, vol. iii. p. 53, note 1). Aristotle, according to Plutarch (Nic. 2) classed Thucydides with Nicias and Theramenes as an excellent citizen and distinguished by an hereditary feeling of good will towards the people. He left two sons, Melesias and Stephanus; and a son of the former of these, named Thucydides after his grand-father, was a pupil of Socrates. (Plat. Men. p. 94, Theag. p. 130, Lach. p. 179; Athen. vi. p. 234, e.)

2. A Pharsalian, was a proxenus of the Athenians and happened to be at Athens in B. C. 411, during the usurpation of the Four Hundred. When the tumult against the government broke out in the Peiraeeus, and Theramenes had gone thither with the promise of quelling it, Thucydides with some difficulty restrained the adherents of the oligarchs in the city from marching down to attack the rioters, representing the mischief attendant on civil discord while the Lacedaemonians were so close at hand. (Thuc. viii. 92.)

3. A lieutenant of Martius Verus, by whom he was sent to establish Soaemus on the throne of Armenia, in the reign of M. Aurelius Antoninus. Thucydides accomplished his mission. (Suid. s. v. Μάρτιος; see above, Vol. I. p. 363, a.) [E. E.]

THUCY'DIDES (Θουκυδίδης), the historian, belonged to the demos Halimus, and Halimus belonged to the phyle Leontis. He simply calls himself an Athenian (Thuc. i. 1). His father's name was Olorus (iv. 104). Marcellinus, and some other later writers, say that the name was Orolus. The two forms are easily confounded, and we assume the true name to be Olorus. Herodotus (vi. 39) mentions a Thracian king called Olorus, whose daughter Hegesipyle married Miltiades, the conqueror of Marathon, by whom she became the mother of Cimon. The ancient authorities speak of consanguinity between the family of Cimon and that of Thucydides, and the name of the father of Thucydides is some presumption of a connection with this Thracian king. The mother of Thucydides was also named Hegesipyle, though Marcellinus is the only authority for his mother's name. It is conjectured that Hegesipyle may have been a granddaughter of Miltiades and Hegesipyle, but there is no evidence to show who the mother of Thucydides was, nor how his father was connected with the family of Miltiades. It is also said that there was consanguinity between the family of Thucydides and the Peisistratidae; but this also cannot be satisfactorily explained.

A statement by Pamphilus, which is preserved by Gellius (xv. 23), makes Thucydides forty years of age at the commencement of the Peloponnesian war or B. C. 431, and accordingly he was born in B. C. 471. The historian says that he lived to see the end of the war, and the war ended in B. C. 404. Krüger attempts to show, on the authority of Marcellinus, that Thucydides was only about twenty-five years of age at the commencement of the war; but he relies too much on his own interpretation of certain words of Thucydides, which are by no means free from ambiguity (v. 26, αἰσθανόμενος τῇ ἡλικίᾳ). There is a story in Lucian's Herodotus or Aetion of Herodotus having read his History at the Olympic games to the assembled Greeks; and Suidas (s. v. Θουκυδίδης) adds that Thucydides, then a boy, was present, and shed tears of emulation; a presage of his own future historical distinction. This story was first doubted by Bredow, and has since been critically discussed by others, and most completely by Dahlman (Herodot, &c.) who rejects it as a fable. The truth of the story is maintained at great length, and with greater tediousness, by Krüger. It is of little importance what any man thinks of the story: it is enough to remark that the direct evidence in support of it is very weak, and there are many plausible objections to be urged against it. Krüger has collected in his essay on Thucydides all that he could say in support of the story.

Antiphon of Rhamnus, the most distinguished orator of the time, is said to have been the master of Thucydides in the rhetorical art; and as Antiphon was a contemporary of Thucydides and older, there is no internal improbability in the statement. But the evidence for it, as Krüger shows, is really nothing more than this, that Caecilius in his life of Antiphon conjectures that Thucydides must have been a pupil of Antiphon's, because he praises Antiphon. Cicero, in his Brutus (c. 12), speaks of the eloquence of Antiphon, and cites Thucydides as evidence, and it seems very unlikely that, if he knew Thucydides to have been a pupil of Antiphon, he would not have mentioned it. Anaxagoras also is named by Marcellinus, on the authority of Antyllus, as one of the teachers of Thucydides, as to which we may observe that it is possible that he was, for Anaxagoras was some time at Athens, and Thucydides might have had the advantage of his instruction.

That Thucydides, an Athenian, of a good family, and living in a city which was the centre of Greek civilisation, must have had the best possible education, may be assumed; that he was a man of great ability and cultivated understanding his work clearly shows. He informs us that he possessed gold mines in that part of Thrace which is opposite to the island of Thasos, and that he was a person of the greatest influence among those in that part of Thrace (iv. 105). This property, according to some accounts, he had from his ancestors: according to other accounts he married a rich woman of Scaptesyle, and received them as a portion with her. Krüger has a conjecture that Cimon, who took these mines from the Thasians, got an interest in them, and gave a part to that branch of his family to which Thucydides belonged.

Suidas says that Thucydides left a son, called Timotheus; and a daughter also is mentioned, who is said to have written the eighth book of the History of Thucydides. Thucydides (ii. 48) was one of those who suffered from the great plague of Athens, and one of the few who recovered.

We have no trustworthy evidence of Thucydides having distinguished himself as an orator, though it is not unlikely that he did, for his oratorical talent is shown by the speeches that he has inserted in his history. He was, however, employed in a military capacity, and he was in command of an Athenian squadron of seven ships, at Thasus, B. C. 424, when Eucles, who commanded in Amphipolis, sent for his assistance against Brasidas, who was before that town with an army. Brasidas, fearing the arrival of a superior force, offered favourable terms to Amphipolis, which were readily accepted, for there were few Athenians in the place, and the rest did not wish to make resistance. Thucydides arrived at Eion, at the mouth of the Strymon, on the evening of the same day on which Amphipolis surrendered; and though he was too late to save Amphipolis, he prevented Eion from falling into the hand of the enemy (iv. 102, &c.).

In consequence of this failure, Thucydides became an exile, probably to avoid a severer punishment, that of death, for such appears to have been the penalty of such a failure as his, though he may have done the best that he could. According to Marcellinus, Cleon, who was at this time in great favour with the Athenians, excited popular suspicion against the unfortunate commander. Thucydides (v. 26) simply says that he lived in exile twenty years after the affair of Amphipolis, but he does not say whether it was a voluntary exile or a punishment. If it was voluntary, we may assume that he did not return to Athens, because he knew what fate awaited him. There are various untrustworthy accounts as to his places of residence during his exile; but we may conclude that he could not safely reside in any place which was under Athenian dominion, and as he kept his eye on the events of the war, he must have lived in those parts which belonged to the Spartan alliance. His own words certainly imply that, during his exile, he spent much of his time either in the Peloponnesus or in places which were under Peloponnesian influence (v. 26); and his work was the result of his own experience and observations. His minute description of Syracuse and the neighbourhood leads to the probable conclusion that he was personally acquainted with the localities; and if he visited Sicily, it is probable that he also saw some parts of southern Italy, and an anonymous biographer speaks of Thucydides having been at Sybaris. But it is rather too bold a conjecture to make, as some have done, that Olorus and his son Thucydides went out in the colony to Thurii, B. C. 443, which was joined by Herodotus and the orator Lysias, then a young man. Timaeus, as quoted by Marcellinus, says that Thucydides during his exile lived in Italy; but if he means during all the time of his exile, his statement cannot be accepted, for it would contradict the inference which may be fairly derived from a passage in Thucydides that has been already referred to. Timaeus, and other authorities also, affirmed that Thucydides was buried at Thurii; as to which Krüger ingeniously argues, that if he lived there for some time, there is nothing strange in a story being invented of his having been buried there, especially as he might have had a tomb built with the intention of occupying it.

Thucydides says that he lived twenty years in exile (v. 26), and as his exile commenced in the beginning of B. C. 423, he may have returned to Athens in the beginning of B. C. 403, and therefore at or about the time when Thrasybulus liberated Athens. (Xen. Hellen. ii. 4. §§ 22—38.) It may accordingly be conjectured that Thucydides joined Thrasybulus, and in company with him effected his return to his native country. Pausanias indeed (i. 23. § 9) states that Thucydides was recalled by a psephisma proposed by Oenobius, but this account creates some difficulty, because it appeared from a critical enumeration of the authorities cited by Marcellinus, that there was a general permission for all the exiles to return after the conclusion of peace with the Laedaemonians, B. C. 404. Thucydides himself says that he was twenty years in exile, and therefore he did not return till B. C. 403, unless we assume that his "twenty years" was merely a round number used to signify nineteen years and somewhat more; or unless we assume that he did not return as soon as he might have done, but a few months later, so that the full term of twenty years was completed.

There is a general agreement among the ancient authorities that Thucydides came to a violent end; Zopyrus and Didymus, quoted by Marcellinus, affirm this; and Plutarch (Cimon 4), and Pausanias (i. 23. § 9) tell the same story. But there is a great diversity of evidence as to the place where he died; and it is doubtful whether it was Thrace or Athens. Plutarch says, it is reported that he was killed in Scaptesyle in Thrace, but that his remains were carried to Athens, and his tomb is pointed out in the burial-place of Cimon, by the side of the tomb of Elpinice, the sister of Cimon. Pausanias, who was well acquainted with Athens, says that his tomb was then not far from the Pylae Melitides; and that he was assassinated after his return (ὡς κατῄει), words which seem to imply that he did not long survive his restoration. Marcellinus, on the authority of Antyllus, quotes the inscription on his tomb at Athens:

Θουκυδίδης Ὀλόρου (Ὀρόλου) Ἁλιμούσιος (ἔνθαδε κεῖται).

We cannot doubt that there was a tomb of Thucydides at Athens, and he probably died there· the testimony of Timaeus that he died in Italy, is of little value.

The question as to the time of the return of Thucydides to Athens, and of the place of his death and interment, is discussed by Krüger with a wearisome minuteness, and with uncertain results. As to the time of the death of Thucydides, he concludes that it could not be later than the end or about the middle of the 94th Olympiad, that is, in any event not later than B. C. 401. His own direct testimony (v. 26) simply shows that he was living after the war was ended (B. C. 404). Dodwell argues that the third eruption of Aetna, which Thucydides (iii. 116) alludes to was the eruption of B. C. 399 or the 95th Olympiad; but Thucydides means to say that the eruption, of which he does not fix the date, was prior to the two eruptions (B. C. 425 and 475) of which he does fix the dates. There is no doubt about the true interpretation of this passage.

The time when he composed his work is another matter of critical inquiry. He was busy in collecting materials all through the war from the beginning to the end (i. 22); but we do not know from his own evidence whether he wrote any portion of the work, as we now have it, during the continuance of the war, though he would certainly have plenty of time during his exile to compose the earlier part of his history. Plutarch says that he wrote the work in Thrace; and his words mean the whole work, as he does not qualify them (τὸν πόλεμον τῶν Πελοποννησίων καὶ Ἀθηναίων ἐν Θράκῃ περὶ τὴν Σκαπτὴν ὕλην), and this is consistent with Plutarch's statement that he died in Thrace. Marcellinus says that he gave the work its last polish in Thrace; and that he wrote it under a plane tree: this is very particular, and it is not improbable that he might write under a shady tree in fine weather, but such particularities are very suspicious. The most probable opinion is that he was engaged on the work till the time of his death. In the very beginning of his history (i. 18) he mentions the end of the war in a passage which must have been written after B. C. 404. A passage in the first book (i. 93), when rightly interpreted, shows that it was written after the wall round the Peiraeeus was pulled down (Xen. Hellen. ii. 2). In the second book (ii. 65) he speaks of the Sicilian expedition, and the support which Cyrus gave to the Lacedaemonians, and of the final defeat of the Athenians in this war; all which passages consequently were written after the events to which they refer. A passage in the fifth book also (v. 26), mentions the end of the war, the duration of which, he says, was twenty-seven years. Thucydides undoubtedly was collecting his materials all through the war, and of course he would register them as he got them; but the work in the shape in which we have it, was certainly not finished until after the close of the war.

A question has been raised as to the authorship of the eighth and last book of Thucydides, which breaks off in the middle of the twenty-first year of the war (B. C. 411); and with the remark that, "when the winter which follows this summer shall have ended, the one and twentieth year of the war is completed." It differs from all the other books in containing no speeches, a circumstance which Dionysius remarked, and it has also been supposed to be inferior to the rest as a piece of composition. Accordingly several ancient critics supposed that the eighth book was not by Thucydides: some attributed it to his daughter, and some to Xenophon or Theopompus, because both of them continued the history. The words with which Xenophon's Hellenica commence (μετὰ δὲ ταῦτα) may chiefly have led to the supposition that he was the author, for his work is made to appear as a continuation of that of Thucydides: but this argument is in itself of little weight; and besides, both the style of the eighth book is different from that of Xenophon, and the manner of treating the subject, for the division of the year into summers and winters, which Thucydides has observed in his first seven books, is continued in the eighth, but is not observed by Xenophon. The rhetorical style of Theopompus, which was the characteristic of his writing, renders it also improbable that he was the author of the eighth book. It seems the simplest supposition to consider Thucydides himself as the author of this book, since he names himself as the author twice (viii. 6, 60). Cratippus, a contemporary of Thucydides, who also collected what Thucydides had omitted, ascribes this book to Thucydides, remarking at the same time that he has introduced no speeches in it. (Dionys. De Thucyd. c. 16, ed. Hudson.) Marcellinus and the anonymous author of the life of Thucydides also attribute the last book to him. The statement of Cratippus, that Thucydides omitted the speeches in the last book because they impeded the narrative and were wearisome to his readers, is probably merely a conjecture. If Thucydides, after writing speeches in the first seven books, discovered that this was a bad historical method, we must assume that if he had lived long enough, he would have struck the speeches out of the first seven books. But this is very improbable; a man of his character and judgment would hardly begin his work without a settled plan; and if the speeches were struck out, the work would certainly be defective, and would not present that aspect of political affairs, and that judgment upon them, which undoubtedly it was the design of the author to present. Some reasons why there should be no speeches in the eighth book, in accordance with the general plan of Thucydides, are alleged by Krüger; and the main reason is that they are not wanted. Whatever may be the reason, the only conclusion that a sound critic can come to is, that the eighth book is by Thucydides, but that he may not have had the opportunity of revising it with the same care as the first seven books.

A saying (λέγεται) is preserved by Diogenes that Xenophon made the work of Thucydides known (εἰς δόξαν ἤγαγεν), which may be true, as he wrote the first two books of his Hellenica, or the part which now ends with the second book, for the purpose of completing the history. The statement in Diogenes implies that the work of Thucydides might have been lost or forgotten but for Xenophon's care; and if the statement is true, we may conclude that the manuscript of Thucydides in some way came into his possession, and probably the materials which the author had collected for the completion of his history.

The work of Thucydides, from the commencement of the second book, is chronologically divided into summers and winters, and each summer and winter make a year (ii. 1). His summer comprises the time from the vernal to the autumnal equinox, and the winter comprises the period from the autumnal to the vernal equinox. The division into books and chapters was probably made by the Alexandrine critics. In the second book he says at the beginning of the 47th chapter, "such was the interment during this winter, and after the winter was over, the first year of the war was ended." He then goes on to say:—"now in the commencement of the summer," which is evidently the beginning of a new year, and of a new division, if he made any division in his history. Again, at the end of the eightieth chapter, he mentions the end of the second year of the war; and again in the last chapter of the second book he mentions the conclusion of the third year of the war. The third book begins just in the same manner, "In the following summer," as the eighty-first chapter of the second book. There is, then, nothing in the work itself which gives the least intimation that the division into books was part of the author's design; and in fact, the division into books is made in a very arbitrary and clumsy way. The seventh book ought to end with the sixth chapter of the eighth book; and the seventh chapter of the eighth book ought to be the first. We may conclude from the terms in which Cratippus alludes to the eighth book (τὰ τελευταῖα τῆς ἱστορίας) that the division into books was not then made; but it existed in the time of Dionysius (De Thucyd. c. 16, 17, &c.), and when Diodorus wrote (xii. 37, xiii. 42).

There was a division of the work also into nine books (Diod. xii. 37); and a still later division into thirteen books. The title of the work, as well as the division into books, is also probably the work of the critics or grammarians. The titles vary in the MSS., but the simple title Ξυγγραφή is that which is most appropriate to the author's own expression, Θουκυδίδης Ἀθηναῖος ξυνέγραψε τὸν πόλεμον, &c. (i. 1).

The history of the Peloponnesian war opens the second book of Thucydides, and the first is introductory to the history. He begins his first book by observing that the Peloponnesian war was the most important event in Grecian history, which he shows by a rapid review of the history of the Greeks from the earliest period to the commencement of the war (i. 1—21). His remarks on the remote periods of Grecian history, such as Hellen and his sons, the naval power of Minos, and the war of Troy, do not express any doubt as to the historical character of these events; nor was it necessary for the author to express his scepticism; he has simply stated the main facts of early Grecian history in the way in which they were told and generally received. These early events are utterly unimportant, when we view history, as the author viewed the object of his history, as matter for political instruction (i. 22). He designed his work to be "an eternal possession," and such it has proved to be. After his introductory chapters (i. 1—23) he proceeds to explain the alleged grounds and causes of the war: the real causes were, he says, the Spartan jealousy of the Athenian power. His narrative is interrupted (c. 89—118), after he has come to the time when the Lacedaemonians resolved on war, by a digression (ἐκβολή) on the rise and progress of the power of Athens; a period which had been either omitted by other writers, or treated imperfectly, and with little regard to chronology, as by Hellanicus in his Attic history (c. 97). He resumes his narrative (c. 119) with the negotiations that preceded the war; but this leads to another digression of some length on the treason of Pausanias (c. 128—134), and the exile of Themistocles (c. 135—138). He concludes the book with the speech of Pericles, who advised the Athenians to refuse the demands of the Peloponnesians; and his subject, as already observed, begins with the second book. Mr. Clinton, in his Fasti, has a chapter "On the Summary of Thucydides," or that part of his first book which treats of the period between B. C. 478 and 432. The Peloponnesian war began B. C. 431.

A history which treats of so many events, which took place at remote spots, could only be written, in the time of Thucydides, by a man who took great pains to ascertain facts by personal inquiry. In modern times facts are made known by printing as soon as they occur; and the printed records of the time, newspapers and the like, are often the only evidence of many facts which become history. When we know the careless way in which facts are now reported and recorded by very incompetent persons, often upon very indifferent hearsay testimony, and compare with such records the pains that Thucydides took to ascertain the chief events of a war, with which he was contemporary, in which he took a share as a commander, the opportunities which his means allowed, his great abilities, and serious earnest character, it is a fair conclusion that we have a more exact history of a long eventful period by Thucydides than we have of any period in modern history, equally long and equally eventful. We are deceived as to the value of modern historical evidence, which depends on the eye-sight of witnesses, by the facility with which it is produced and distributed in print. But when we come to examine the real authority for that which is printed, we seldom find that the original witness of an important transaction is a Thucydides; still less seldom do we find a man like him who has devoted seven and twenty years to the critical enumeration of the events of as many years. A large part of the facts in Thucydides were doubtless derived from the testimony of other eye-witnesses, and even in some cases not directly from eye-witnesses; and that is also true of all modern histories, even contemporary histories; but again, how seldom have we a Thucydides to weigh the value of testimony either direct or indirect (i. 22). His whole work shows the most scrupulous care and diligence in ascertaining facts; his strict attention to chronology, and the importance that he attaches to it, are additional proof of his historical accuracy. His narrative is brief and concise: it generally contains bare facts expressed in the fewest possible words, and when we consider what pains it must have cost him to ascertain these facts, we admire the self-denial of a writer who is satisfied with giving facts in their naked brevity without ornament, without any parade of his personal importance, and of the trouble that his matter cost him. A single chapter must sometimes have represented the labour of many days and weeks. Such a principle of historical composition is the evidence of a great and elevated mind. The history of Thucydides only makes an octavo volume of moderate size; many a modern writer would have spun it out to a dozen volumes, and so have spoiled it. A work that is for all ages must contain much in little compass.

He seldom makes reflections in the course of his narrative: occasionally he has a chapter of political and moral observations, animated by the keenest perception of the motives of action, and the moral character of man. Many of his speeches are political essays, or materials for them; they are not mere imaginations of his own for rhetorical effect; they contain the general sense of what was actually delivered as nearly as he could ascertain, and in many instances he had good opportunities of knowing what was said, for he heard some speeches delivered (i. 22). His opportunities, his talents, his character, and his subject all combined to produce a work that stands alone, and in its kind has neither equal nor rival. His pictures are sometimes striking and tragic, an effect produced by severe simplicity and minute particularity. Such is the description of the plague of Athens. Such also is the incomparable history of the Athenian expedition to Sicily, and its melancholy termination.

A man who thinks profoundly will have a form of expression which is stamped with the character of his mind; and the style of Thucydides is accordingly concise, vigorous, energetic. We feel that all the words were intended to have a meaning, and have a meaning· none of them are idle. Yet he is sometimes harsh and obscure; and probably he was so, even to his own countrymen. Some of his sentences are very involved, and the connection and dependence of the parts are often difficult to seize. Cicero, undoubtedly a good Greek scholar, found him difficult (Orator. c. 9): he says that the speeches contain so many obscure and impenetrable sentences as to be scarcely intelligible; and this, he adds, is a very great defect in the language of political life (in oratione civili).

The first thing that is requisite in reading Thucydides is to have a good text established on a collation of the MSS., and this we owe to I. Bekker. Those who were accustomed to read Thucydides in such a text as Duker's, can estimate their obligations to Bekker. For the understanding of the text, a sound knowledge of the language and the assistance of the best critics are necessary; and perhaps nearly all has been done in this department that can be done. But after all, a careful and repeated study of the original is necessary in order to understand it. For the illustration of the text a great mass of geographical and historical knowledge is necessary; and here also the critics have not been idle. To derive all the advantage from the work that may be derived for political instruction, we must study it; and here the critics give little help, for Politik is a thing they seldom meddle with, and not often with success. Here a man must be his own commentator; but a great deal might be done by a competent hand in illustrating Thucydides as a political writer.

The Greek text was first published by Aldus, Venice, 1502 fol., and the Scholia were published in the following year. The first Latin translation, which was by Valla, was printed before 1500, and reprinted at Paris, 1513, fol., and frequently after that date. The first edition of the Greek text accompanied by a Latin version, was that of H. Stephens, 1564, fol.: the Latin version is that of Valla, revised by Stephens. This well printed edition contains the Scholia, the Life of Thucydides by Marcellinus, and an anonymous Life of Thucydides. The edition of I. Bekker, Berlin, 1821, 3 vols. 8vo. forms an epoch in the editions of Thucydides, and, as regards the text, renders it unnecessary to consult any which are of prior date. Among other editions are that of Poppo, Leipzig, 10 vols. 8vo., 1821—1838, of which two volumes are filled with prolegomena; of Haack, with selections from the Greek Scholia and short notes, Leipzig, 1820, 2 vols. 8vo.; of Göller, 2 vols. 8vo., Leipzig, 1826; and of Arnold, 3 vols 8vo., Oxford, 1830—1835.

The translations into modern languages are numerous. It was translated into French by Claude Seyssel, Paris, 1527, fol. The English version of Thomas Nicolls, London, 1550, fol. was made from the version of Seyssel. The Biographie Universelle mentions an anonymous English version, published at London in 1525. The English version of Hobbes appears to be mainly founded on the Latin versions, as a comparison of it with them will show. Hobbes translated it for the political instruction which it contains. Thucydides was afterwards translated by W. Smith, 1753, whose translation is generally exact; and again by S. T. Bloomfield, London, 1829. The most recent German translation is by H. W. F. Klein, Munich, 1826, 8vo. Thucydides was translated into French by Levesque, Paris, 1795, 4 vols. 8vo.; and by Gail, 1807, &c. Gail published the Greek text of Thucydides, the Scholia, the variations of thirteen manuscripts of the Bibliothèque du Roi, a Latin version corrected, and the French version already mentioned, with notes historical and philological. The French version of Gail has been printed separately, 4 vols. 8vo.

The authorities for the Life of Thucydides have been generally referred to, and they are all mentioned and criticised in the Untersuchungen über das Leben des Thucydides, Berlin, 1832, by K.W. Krüger. The "Annales Thucydidei et Xenophontei," &c. of Dodwell, Oxford, 1702, 4to., may also be consulted. The criticism of Dionysius of Halicarnassus on Thucydides has itself been much criticised: most of his censure will not receive the approbation of just criticism. [G. L.]

THUDIPPUS (Θούδιππος), a contemporary of Phocion, of whom Plutarch relates one or two particulars. (Phoc. cc. 35, 36.)

THUGE'NIDES (Θουγενίδης), a comic poet of unknown age, whose name is only found in a few passages of the grammarians, in most of which it has been corrupted into Thucydides. The remains of his poetry consist of one title, Δικασταί, one complete line, and a few words (Suid. s. v. τριαχθῆναι, and perhaps s. v. ἀνέσπακεν; Phot. Lex. s. vv. μὴ νόμισον, τριαχθῆναι; Pollux, vi. 38; Zonar. Lex. s. v. Λειβήθριοι; Antiatt. p. 114. 22; Pierson, ad Moerin, p. 334; Porson, ad Eurip. Hecub. 1166; Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. p. 499, vol. iv. pp. 593, 594; Editio Minor, p. 1183). Fabricius has wrongly made Thugenides a tragic poet. (Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 325.) [P. S.]

THURO (Θουρώ), a daughter of Phylas, became by Apollo the mother of Chaeron, the founder of Thurium. (Paus. ix. 40. § 3.) [L. S.]

THYAS (Θυάς), a name of the female followers of Dionysus, is the same as Θυιάς. (Lycoph. Cass. 143, 305; Ov. Fast. vi. 514; Catull. 64. 392; comp. THYIA.) [L. S.]

THYESTES (Θυέστης), a son of Pelops and Hippodameia, was the brother of Atreus and the father of Aegisthus. (Hom. Il. ii. 107; Aeschyl. Agam. 1242; Eurip. Or. 1008; comp. ATREUS; PELOPS; AGAMEMNON.) [L. S.]

THYIA (Θυία). 1. A daughter of Castalius or Cephisseus, became by Apollo the mother of Delphus. (Paus. x. 6. § 2; Herod. vii. 178.) She is said to have been the first to have sacrificed to Dionysus, and to have celebrated orgies in his honour. Hence the Attic women, who every year went to Mount Parnassus to celebrate the Dionysiac orgies with the Delphian Thyiades, received themselves the name of Thyades or Thyiades. (Paus. l. c. x. 4. § 2, 22. § 5; comp. 29. § 2; Lobeck, Aglaoph. p. 285.)

2. A daughter of Deucalion, and, by Zeus, the mother of Macedon. (Hes. Fragm. 26, ed. Göttling; Steph. Byz. s. v. Μακεδονία.) [L. S.]

THYLACUS. [ONAETHUS.]

THYMBRAEUS (Θυμβραῖος). 1. A surname of Apollo, derived from a place in Troas called Thymbra, where he had a temple in which Achilles was wounded, or from a neighbouring hill of the same name. (Strab. xiii. p. 598; Steph. Byz. s. v. Θύμβρα; Eurip. Rhes. 224; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 85; Hom. Il. x. 430.)

2. A Trojan who was slain by Diomedes. (Hom. Il. xi. 320.) [L. S.]

THY'MELE, a celebrated mima or female actress in the reign of Domitian, with whom she was a great favourite. She frequently acted along with Latinus. (Juv. i. 35, vi. 66, viii. 197.) [LATINUS.]

THY'MILUS (Θυμίλος), a statuary or sculptor, whose group of Eros and Dionysus standing together was seen by Pausanias in the temple of Dionysus at Athens. (i. 20. § 1.) [P. S.]

THYMO'CHARES or THYMO'CHARIS (Θυμοχάρης, Θυμόχαρις), an Athenian, was placed in command of the squadron which was sent in haste to Euboea to oppose the Peloponnesian fleet under Hegesandridas, the appearance of which off the coast had excited so much alarm at Athens. Thymochares was defeated near Eretria, and the whole of Euboea, except Oreus, revolted to the enemy, B. C. 411. (Thuc. viii. 95.) [HEGESANDRIDAS.] Later in the same year, soon after Hegesandridas had sailed from Euboea to act in concert with Mindarus in the north, Thymochares was sent from Athens in the same direction with a few ships. A battle ensued between the squadron of Hegesandridas and the portion of the Athenian navy to which Thymochares had brought reinforcements, and the Peloponnesians proved victorious. (Xen. Hell. i. 1. § 1.) [E. E.]

THY'MOCLES (Θυμοκλῆς), the author of a single epigram in the Greek Anthology, which is taken from the Musa Puerilis of Straton. (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 259; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. ii. p. 235, vol. xiii. p. 961.) [P. S.]

THYMOETES (Θυμοίτης). 1. One of the elders of Troy. (Hom. Il. iii. 146.) A soothsayer had predicted, that on a certain day a boy should be born, by whom Troy should be destroyed. On that day Paris was born to Priam, and Munippus to Thymoetes. Priam ordered Munippus and his mother Cylla to be killed. Hence Aeneas, in Virgil (Aen. ii. 31), says, that it was doubtful whether Thymoetes, in order to revenge himself, advised to draw the wooden horse into the city.

2. An Athenian hero, believed to have been a son of Oxyntas, and king of Attica. One of the Attic demes (Thymoetiadae or Thymaetiadae) derived its name from him. (Suid. s. v.; Paus. ii. 18. § 7.)

3. A Trojan and a companion of Aeneas, who was slain by Turnus. (Virg. Aen. xii. 364.) [L. S.]

THYMONDAS (Θυμώνδας), a son of MENTOR the Rhodian, and nephew of MEMNON. In B. C. 333, he was sent down into Lycia by king Dareius to commission Pharnabazus to succeed Memnon in the command of the fleet. [PHARNABAZUS, No. 3.] The land-force, consisting apparently of Greek mercenaries, Thymondas was himself to receive from Pharnabazus, and to lead up to Syria to meet the king.

At the battle of Issus, in the same year, Thymondas with his mercenaries occupied the centre of the Persian army, and did good service. After the battle, together with Aristomedes, Amyntas, and Bianor, and a large body of troops, he made his way over the mountains to Tripolis in Phoenicia. Here they found the ships which had conveyed their men over from Lesbos, and, having launched as many as they needed and burnt the rest, they sailed for Cyprus, and thence crossed over to Egypt. Whether Thymondas took part there in the attempt of Amyntas to possess himself of the sovereignty, we have no means of deciding. (Arr. Anab. ii. 2, 8—10, 13; Curt. iii. 8, iv. 1.) [AMYNTAS, No. 5.] [E. E.]

THYO'NE (Θυώνη), the name of Semele, under which Dionysus fetched her from Hades, and introduced her among the immortals. (Hom. Hymn. v. 21; Apollod. iii. 5. § 3; Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 23; Pind. Pyth. iii. 99; Diod. Sic. iv. 25; Apollon. Rhod. i. 636.) [L. S.]

THYO'NEUS (Θυωνεύς). 1. A surname of Dionysus which has the same meaning as Thyone, both being formed from θύειν, "to be inspired." (Ov. Met. iv. 13; Horat. Carm. i. 17. 23; Oppian, Cyneg. i. 27; Hesych. s. v. Θυωνίδης.)

2. A son of Dionysus in Chios, and father of Thoas. (Acron, ad Horat. Carm. i. 17. 23.) [L. S.]

THYPHEI'TIDES, the maker of a painted vase discovered at Vulci, and now in the collection of M. Durand, under each handle of which is the inscription, ΕΠΟΙΕΣΕΝ ΘΥΦΕΙΤΙΔΕΣ. (Cab. Durand. No. 893; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 60, 61, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

THYRSUS (Θύρσος), a freedman of Octavian, whom the latter sent to Cleopatra at Alexandria, after the battle of Actium. Dion Cassius relates that Octavian made love to Cleopatra by means of Thyrsus, to induce her to betray Antony; but Plutarch simply states that Thyrsus, through his frequent interviews with Cleopatra, excited the suspicions of Antony, who seized and whipped him, and sent him back to Octavian. (Dion Cass. li. 8, 9; Plut. Ant. 73.)

THYUS or THYS (Θύος, Θῦς), a prince of Paphlagonia, who rebelled against Artaxerxes II. (Mnemon.) Datames, who was his first cousin, endeavoured to persuade him to return to his allegiance; but this had no effect, and on one occasion, when Datames had sought a friendly conference with him, Thyus laid a plot for his assassination. Datames escaped the danger through a timely warning given him by his mother, and, on his return to his own government, declared war against Thyus, subdued him, and made him a prisoner together with his wife and children. He then arrayed him in all the insignia of his royal rank, dressed himself in hunter's garb, and, having fastened a rope round Thyus, drove him before him with a cudgel, and brought him in this guise into the presence of Artaxerxes, as if he were a wild beast that he had captured. Cornelius Nepos describes Thyus as a man of huge stature and grim aspect, with dark complexion, and long hair and beard. Aelian notices him as notorious for his voracity, while Theopompus related that he was accustomed to have 100 dishes placed on his table at one meal, and that, when he was imprisoned by Artaxerxes, he continued the same course of life, which drew from the king the remark that Thyus was living as if he expected a speedy death. (Corn. Nep. Datam. 2, 3; Theop. ap. Ath. iv. pp. 144, f., 145, a, x. p. 415, d; Ael. V. H. i. 27.) [E. E.]

TIBERI'NUS, one of the mythical kings of Alba, son of Capetus, and father of Agrippa, is said to have been drowned in crossing the river Alba, which was hence called Tiberis after him, and of which he became the guardian god. (Liv. i. 3; Dionys. i. 71; Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 20.)

TIBE'RIUS I., emperor of Rome, A. D. 14—37. His full name was TIBERIUS CLAUDIUS NERO CAESAR. He was the son of T. Claudius Nero [NERO, No. 7] and of Livia, and was born on the 16th of November, B. C. 42, before his mother married Augustus. Tiberius was tall and strongly made, and his health was very good. His face was handsome, and his eyes were large. He was carefully educated according to the fashion of the day, and became well acquainted with Greek and Latin literature. He possessed talent both as a speaker and writer, but he was fond of employing himself on trivial subjects, such as at that time were comprehended under the term Grammar (grammatica). His master in rhetoric was Theodorus of Gadara. He was a great purist, and affected a wonderful precision about words, to which he often paid more attention than to the matter. Though not without military courage, as his life shows, he had a great timidity of character, and was of a jealous and suspicious temper; and these qualities rendered him cruel after he had acquired power. He had more penetration than decision of character, and he was often irresolute. (Tac. Ann. i. 80.) From his youth he was of an unsociable disposition, melancholy and reserved, and this character developed itself more as he grew older. He had no sympathies nor affections, was indifferent about pleasing or giving pain to others: he had all the elements of cruelty; suspicion nourished his implacable temper, and power gave him the opportunity of gratifying his long nourished schemes of vengeance. In the latter years of his life, particularly, he indulged his lustful propensities in every way that a depraved imagination could suggest: lust and cruelty are not strangers. It is said, too, that he was addicted to excess in wine: he was not originally avaricious, but he became so. He affected a regard to decency and to externals. He was the prince of hypocrites; and the events of his reign are little more than the exhibition of his detestable character. [TACITUS.]

Tiberius was about thirteen years of age when he accompanied Augustus in his triumphal entry into Rome (B. C. 29) after the death of M. Antonius: Tiberius rode on the left of Augustus and Marcellus on his right. Augustus conferred on Tiberius and his brother Drusus titles of dignity, while his grandsons, Caius and Lucius, were still living: but besides Caius and Lucius, Marcellus, the nephew of Augustus, had superior claims to the succession, and the prospect of Tiberius succeeding to the power of his mother's husband seemed at one time very remote. The death of Agrippa made way for Tiberius being employed in public affairs, and Augustus compelled him, much against his will, to divorce his wife Vipsania Agrippina, the daughter of Agrippa, by whom he had one son, and who was then pregnant, and to marry Julia (B. C. 11), the widow of Agrippa, and the emperor's daughter, with whom Tiberius did not long live in harmony. He had one child by Julia, but it did not live.

He was employed on various military services during the lifetime of Augustus. He made his first campaign in the Cantabrian war as Tribunus Militum. In B. C. 20 he was sent by Augustus to restore Tigranes to the throne of Armenia. Artabazus, the occupant of the throne, was murdered before Tiberius reached Armenia, and Tiberius had no difficulty in accomplishing his mission. (Dion Cass. liv. 9.) It was during this campaign that Horace addressed one of his epistles to Julius Florus (i. 12), who was serving under Tiberius. In B. C. 15, Drusus and his brother Tiberius were engaged in warfare with the Rhaeti, who occupied the Alps of Tridentum (Trento), and the exploits of the two brothers were sung by Horace (Carm. iv. 4, 14; Dion Cass. liv. 22.) In B. C. 13 Tiberius was consul with P. Quintilius Varus. In B. C. 11, the same year in which he married Julia, and while his brother Drusus was fighting against the Germans, Tiberius left his new wife to conduct, by the order of Augustus, the war against the Dalmatians who had revolted, and against the Pannonians. (Dion Cass. liv. 31.) Drusus died (B. C. 9) owing to a fall from his horse, after a campaign against the Germans between the Weser and the Elbe. On the news of the accident, Tiberius was sent by Augustus, who was then at Pavia, to Drusus, whom he found just alive. (Dion Cass. lv. 2.) He conveyed the body to Rome from the banks of the Rhine, walking all the way before it on foot (Sueton. Tiber. 7), and he pronounced a funeral oration over his brother in the forum. Tiberius returned to the war in Germany, and crossed the Rhine. In B. C. 7 he was again in Rome, was made consul a second time, and celebrated his second triumph. (Vell. Pat. ii. 97.)

In B. C. 6 he obtained the tribunitia potestas for five years, but during this year he retired with the emperor's permission to Rhodes, where he spent the next seven years. Tacitus (Ann. i. 53) says that his chief reason for leaving Rome was to get away from his wife, who treated him with contempt, and whose licentious life was no secret to her husband: probably, too, he was unwilling to stay at Rome when the grandsons of Augustus were attaining years of maturity, for there was mutual jealousy between them and Tiberius. During his residence at Rhodes, Tiberius, among other things, employed himself on astrology, and he was one of the dupes of this supposed science. His chief master in this art was Thrasyllus, who predicted that he would be emperor. (Tacit. Ann. vi. 21.) Augustus had not been very ready to allow Tiberius to retire to Rhodes, and he was not willing to let him come back; but, at the instance of Caius Caesar, Tiberius was allowed to return, A. D. 2. He was relieved from one trouble during his absence, for his wife Julia was banished to the island of Pandataria (B. C. 2), and he never saw her again. (Dion Cass. lv. 10.) Suetonius says that Tiberius, by letter, entreated the emperor to let Julia keep whatever he had given her.

Tiberius was employed in public affairs until the death of L. Caesar (A. D. 2), which was followed by the death of C. Caesar (A. D. 4). Augustus, now being without a successor of his own blood, adopted Tiberius, the son of his wife Livia, with the view of leaving to him the power that he had himself acquired; and at the same time he required Tiberius to adopt Germanicus, the son of his brother Drusus, though Tiberius had a son Drusus by his wife Vipsania. (Sueton. Tiber. 15; Vell. Pat. ii. 103.) Augustus was not ignorant of the character of Tiberius, but, like others in power, he left it to a man whom he did not like, and could not esteem, rather than allow it to go out of his family. Augustus had indeed adopted Postumus Agrippa, the brother of C. and L. Caesares, but there was nothing to hope for from him; and Germanicus was too young to be adopted by Augustus with a view to the direct succession.

From the year of his adoption to the death of Augustus, A. D. 14, Tiberius was in command of the Roman armies, though he visited Rome several times. He was sent into Germany A. D. 4, and the historian Velleius Paterculus accompanied him as praefectus equitum. Tiberius reduced all Illyricum to subjection A. D. 9; and in A. D. 12 he had the honour of a triumph at Rome for his German and Dalmatian victories. Tiberius displayed military talent during his transalpine campaigns; he maintained discipline in his army, and took care of the comforts of his soldiers. In A. D. 14 Augustus held his last census, in which he had Tiberius for his colleague.

Tiberius being sent to settle the affairs of Illyricum, Augustus accompanied him as far as Beneventum, but as the emperor was on his way back to Rome he died at Nola, on the 19th of August, A. D. 14. Tiberius was immediately summoned home by his mother Livia, who managed affairs so as to secure the power to her son, so far as such precaution was necessary. If nothing more had been known of Tiberius than his conduct during the lifetime of the emperor, he might have descended to posterity with no worse character than many other Romans. His accession to power developed all the qualities which were not unknown to those who were acquainted with him, but which hitherto had not been allowed their full play. He took the power which nobody was prepared to dispute with him, affecting all the while a great reluctance; and he declined the name of Pater

Patriae, and only took that of Augustus when he wrote to foreign princes. He began his reign by putting Postumus Agrippa to death, and he alleged that it was done pursuant to the command of Augustus (Tacit. Ann. i. 6.)

His conduct in other respects was marked by moderation and prudence; he rejected all flattery from the senate; he conferred offices according to merit, and he allowed persons to grow old in them. He endeavoured to relieve the scarcity of bread, a kind of complaint at Rome, which occurred at intervals, notwithstanding, and perhaps, in consequence of, the efforts of the government to secure a supply of food for the city. His mode of life was frugal, and without ostentatious display, and there was little to find fault with in him. (Dion Cass. lvii. 2, &c.) He had got rid of Agrippa, who was the nearest rival, and who, if he had possessed merit, would have seemed to have a better title to the imperial power than Tiberius, for he was the son of Julia. Germanicus was the son of his younger brother, and had a less direct claim than Tiberius; but Tiberius feared the virtues and the popularity of Germanicus, and so long as he felt that Germanicus might be a rival, his conduct was exceedingly circumspect. (Tacit. Ann. i. 14, 15.) When he felt himself sure in his place, he began to exercise his craft. He took from the popular assembly the election of the magistrates, and transferred it to the senate, for this is what Tacitus means in the passage of the Annals just referred to: the popular assembly still enacted laws, though the consulta of the senate were the ordinary form of legislation from the time of the accession of Tiberius. The emperor limited himself to the recommendation of four candidates annually to the senate, who of course were elected; and he allowed the senate to choose the rest. He also nominated the consuls.

The news of the death of Augustus roused a mutiny among the legions in Pannonia, which was quelled by Drusus, the son of Tiberius, aided by the terrors of an eclipse which happened very opportunely (27th September, A. D. 14). The armies on the Rhine under Germanicus showed a disposition to reject Tiberius, and a mutinous spirit, and if Germanicus had been inclined to try the fortune of a campaign, he might have had the assistance of the German armies against his uncle. But Germanicus restored discipline to the army by his firmness, and maintained his fidelity to the new emperor. Tiberius, however, was not yet free from his fears, and he looked with suspicion on Germanicus and his high-spirited wife Agrippina, who was also disliked by Livia, the mother of Tiberius. The first year of his reign was marked by the death of Julia, whom Augustus had removed from Pandataria to Rhegium; her husband deprived her of the allowance that she had from her father, and allowed her to pine away in destitution. One of her lovers, Sempronius Gracchus, who was living in exile in a small island on the coast of Africa, was by the order of Tiberius put to death. (Tacit. Ann. i. 53.)

Germanicus (A. D. 15) continued the Germanic war, though with no important results, but Agrippina's courage on a trying occasion aroused the emperor's fears, and he had now a man about him, Sejanus, who worked on the emperor's suspicious temper for his own sinister purposes [SEJANUS.] It became common at this time to listen to informations of treason or laesa majestas against the emperor; and persons were accused not of acts only, but words, and even the most indifferent matters were made the ground of such charges. Thus was established a pestilent class of men, under the name of Delatores, who became a terrible means of injustice and oppression (Tacit. Ann. i. 73), and enriched themselves at the expense of their victims by encouraging the cruel suspicions of the emperor. In the lifetime of Augustus, Tiberius had urged the emperor to punish those who spoke disrespectfully of the emperor, but his more prudent step-father, content with real power and security, allowed the Romans to indulge their taste for satire and pasquinades. (Sueton. Aug. c. 51.) Tiberius followed this wise advice for a time, and made great profession of allowing liberty of speech, but his real temper at last prevailed, and the slightest pretence was sufficient to found a charge of laesa majestas (Sueton. Tiber. c. 28). He paid unwillingly and tardily the legacies left by Augustus to the people, and he began his payment with an act of cruelty, which was not the better for being seasoned with humour (Sueton. Tiber. c. 57; Dion Cass. lvii. 14, tells the same story).

Vonones, the son of Phraates, once a hostage at Rome, had been invited back to his Parthian kingdom in the time of Augustus, but Artabanus of the royal house of the Arsacidae drove him out (A. D. 16), and he sought refuge in Armenia, which being then without a king accepted Vonones. The new king however was unable to maintain himself against a threatened attack of Artabanus. Tiberius did not wish to get into a quarrel with Artabanus, by giving Vonones aid, and the exiled king took refuge with Creticus Silanus, governor of Syria. (Tacit. Ann. ii. 12.) Germanicus was carrying on the war with success in Germany, and Tiberius, who had long been jealous of his rising fame, recalled him to Rome under the pretext of giving him a triumph. It seems somewhat inconsistent that Tiberius who was addicted to astrology and divination should have allowed this class of impostors to be banished from Italy (Tacit. Ann. ii 32); this, however, was one of the events of this year.

Germanicus enjoyed (26th of May A. D. 17) the triumph which had been decreed. Tiberius added to the Roman empire the kingdom of Cappadocia, the last king of which, Archelaus, had been summoned to Rome, and died there, probably of old age and grief combined, after being accused of some frivolous matters before the senate. Tiberius was enabled by the produce of the new province to reduce the tax of one per cent. on auctions to one half per cent. (Tacit. Ann. ii. 42.) The state of affairs in the East, where the kingdoms of Commagene and Cilicia were disturbed by civil dissensions and Syria and Judaea were uneasy at the weight of taxation, gave Tiberius an opportunity of removing Germanicus from Rome by conferring on him by a decree of the senate the government of the East. Drusus, the son of Tiberius, was sent into Illyricum. This year is memorable for the great earthquake in Asia, the greatest on record at the time when it happened, and the more destructive from having happened by night. Twelve cities were damaged or destroyed, the earth opened and swallowed up the living, and even southern Italy and Sicily felt the terrific shock. Sardes suffered the most of the twelve cities. The emperor alleviated the calamity by his bounty, and in the case of Sardes by a remission of all payment to the aerarium or fiscus for five years. It is just to commemorate his refusal to take testamentary bequests, when not made by persons who were on terms of intimacy with him; but the emperor did not want money, nor yet prudence; and it was not prudent to be taking money from every body, even those of no character. In this year died Titus Livius, the historian, and Ovid in his exile at Tomi.

Germanicus restored quiet to Armenia (A. D. 18) by crowning with his own hands Artaxias as king in the city of Artaxata. His administration of the East was prudent and successful, but he died in Syria A. D. 19, and the dislike of Tiberius and the enmity of Cn. Piso, the governor of Syria, gave credibility to the report that Germanicus was poisoned. About this time Maroboduus, king of the Suevi, being driven from his states by Roman intrigues, crossed the Danube, came to Italy and settled at Ravenna. A Thracian king Rhescuporis, who had murdered his nephew Cotys, who was king of part of Thrace, wrote to Tiberius to inform him that Cotys had been punished for his treachery. Tiberius artfully got Rhescuporis into his power, and had him brought to Rome, where he was convicted by the senate, and Thrace was divided between the son of Rhescuporis and the children of Cotys. (Tacit. Ann. ii. 64.)

A regard to external decency was one of the characteristics of the reign of Tiberius, and a decree of the senate was made against certain classes of women who professed the occupation of courtesans. (Sueton. Tiber. c. 35; Tacit. Ann. ii. 85.) But religious tolerance was not one of the merits of the time of Tiberius; a senatus consultum imposed penalties on those who practised the ceremonial of the Egyptian or Jewish worship, though this was not the first example of the kind of intolerance at Rome. (Tacit. Ann. ii. 85; compare Seneca, Ep. 108.) This year was memorable for the appearance of a new island above the sea near Delos. (Plin. Hist. Nat. ii. 87.)

In the spring of A. D. 20 Agrippina landed at Brundisium with the ashes of her husband. The remains of Germanicus received a public interment, but Tiberius and Livia did not show themselves, for which Tacitus assigns a reason, which may be true or false. (Ann. iii. 3.) Piso, who came to Rome, was accused before the senate of having taken the life of Germanicus. There was strong suspicion, but little or no proof; yet Piso, seeing that Tiberius gave him no support, released himself by a voluntary death, or was put to death by order of Tiberius. His wife Plancina, who was guilty if her husband was, escaped through the influence of Livia. There is certainly strong reason to believe that in this matter of the death of Germanicus as well as of Piso, Tiberius was guilty (Tacit. Ann. iii. 16), though Tacitus does not pronounce a positive opinion. Tiberius gave Julia, the daughter of his son Drusus, in marriage to Nero, the eldest son of Germanicus, which was a popular measure. He also moderated the penalties which the Lex Papia, passed in the time of Augustus, imposed on unmarried persons, with the double purpose of encouraging matrimony and filling the aerarium. (Tacit. Ann. iii. 25.)

The year A. D. 21 was the fourth consulship of Tiberius, and the second of his son Drusus Caesar, but it was considered a bad omen for Drusus, because all those who had been his father's colleagues in the consulship had come to a violent death. A great revolt broke out this year headed by Julius Florus, at Trèves on the Mosel, and by Julius Sacrovir, among the Aedui. The alleged grounds of the revolt were the heavy taxation, and the oppression of the Roman governors. Sacrovir mustered forty thousand men at Autun (Augustodunum), eight thousand of whom were furnished with the arms of the legionary soldiers, which had been secretly fabricated, and the rest had staves, knives, and other implements of the huntsman. The rising was not unlike the style of insurrection that has often shown itself in France since 1789. The rebellion was put down; and Florus and Sacrovir only escaped from the Romans by dying by their own hands. (Tacit. Ann. iii. 40.)

The principle of treason against the princeps (laesa majestas) was already established under Tiberius in its utmost extent, for C. Lutorius Priscus was condemned by the senate for having written a poem upon the death of Drusus, in anticipation of the event, Drusus being then very ill. The senate seem to have proceeded in the mode of a bill of pains and penalties, for there does not appear to have been any law applicable to such a case. Priscus was executed, and Tiberius, in his usual perplexed mode of expression, blamed the senate; he praised their affectionate zeal in avenging insults to the princeps, but he disapproved of such hasty penalties being inflicted for words only. (Tacit. Ann. iii. 49.) It was on this occasion that a senatus consultum was enacted, that no decree of the senate should be carried to the Aerarium before the tenth day, and thus a reprieve of so many days would be allowed to the condemned (Tacit. Ann. iii. 51; Dion Cass. lvii. 20). In the year A. D. 22 the senate conferred on Drusus, at the request of Tiberius, the Tribunitia Potestas, the highest title of dignity, and an intimation that Drusus was to be the successor of Tiberius. Though the senate had conferred the honour in terms of great adulation, Drusus, who appears to have been in Campania at the time, did not think it worth while to come to Rome to thank them. (Tacit. Ann. iii. 59.) Tacfarinas, an African chieftain, had long troubled the province of Africa, and Junius Blaesus was sent as proconsul, with orders to catch him; but it was no easy thing to take this wandering robber, and Blaesus only seized his brother. Tiberius allowed the soldiers to salute Blaesus with the title of Imperator, and he was the last Roman citizen, except the emperors, who enjoyed this ancient distinction. (Tacit. Ann. iii. 74.)

In A. D. 23 Drusus, the son of Tiberius, died, being poisoned by the contrivance of Sejanus [SEJANUS]. His death was no loss to the state, for he gave indications of a character in no respect better than that of his father; yet he had lived on good terms with Germanicus, and after his death he had behaved well to his children, or at least had not displayed any hostility towards them. The emperor either did not feel much sorrow for the death of his son or he concealed it; and when the people of Ilium some time after sent him a message of condolence, he returned the compliment by condoling with them on the death of their fellow-citizen Hector (Sueton. Tiber. c. 52). It was remarked that the influence of Sejanus over Tiberius increased after the death of Drusus, and Tiberius began to display the vices of his character more and more. The same was remarked also after the death of Germanicus, and again when his mother Livia died. Tiberius allowed the cities of Asia to erect a temple to himself and his mother at Smyrna, the first instance of this flattery which he had permitted. But when the province of Hispania Ulterior asked permission to do the same thing, the emperor refused, and stated his reason in an oration to the senate, which is characterised by modesty and good sense. This singular man had a sound judgment, and if we formed our opinion of him from his words only, we should place him among the wisest and best of the Roman emperors. His measures too were often prudent and beneficial; and yet such was his insincerity, that we can hardly know when to give him credit even for a good action.

Tacfarinas, who had given the Romans so much trouble, was at last defeated and killed by the proconsul P. Cornelius Dolabella (A. D. 24); but Dolabella did not obtain the triumphal honours, though with inferior forces he had accomplished that which his predecessors had in vain attempted: this was owing to the influence of Sejanus, who was unwilling that the glories of his uncle Blaesus should be eclipsed by honours conferred on Dolabella. The system of delations was now in full activity, and Rome witnessed the scandalous spectacle of a son accusing his father, Q. Vibius Serenus, of a conspiracy against the emperor, without being able to prove any thing against him. The abject senate condemned Serenus to death, but Tiberius used his tribunitian power to prevent the execution of the capital sentence, and the man against whom nothing could be proved even by putting his slaves to the torture, was banished to the island of Amorgus. Caecilius Comutus, who had been charged with being an accomplice of Serenus, committed suicide. On this occasion a motion was made in the senate for giving no reward to informers, if the person accused of treason should die by his own hand before sentence was pronounced; but Tiberius, seeing that this would weaken one of his engines of state-craft, in harsh terms, and contrary to his practice, openly maintained the cause of the informers; such a measure as the senate proposed would, he said, render the laws ineffectual and put the state in jeopardy; they had better subvert all law than deprive the law of its guardians. Tiberius, always fearing enemies, thought his safety consisted in encouraging informers; here he spoke out fairly, and revealed one of his secrets of governing. Cremutius Cordus had written Annals, in which he had commended Brutus and Cassius: he was accused, and as he had made up his mind to die, he spoke boldly in his defence. After going out of the senate house he starved himself to death; the senate ordered the aediles to search for his works and burn them, but all the copies were not discovered, and his Annals were extant when Tacitus wrote (Ann. iv. 35).

In the year A. D. 26 Tiberius left Rome, and never returned, though he came sometimes close to the walls of the city. He left on the pretext of dedicating temples in Campania, but his real motives were his dislike to Rome, where he heard a great deal that was disagreeable to him, and his wish to indulge his sensual propensities in private. Sejanus may have contributed to this resolution of leaving Rome, as it is said, but Tiberius still continued to reside out of Rome for six years after the death of Sejanus. (Tacit. Ann. iv. 57.) A great accident happened at Fidenae in the following year: a man named Atilius built a temporary amphitheatre, for the exhibition of a show of gladiators, but being ill-constructed, it fell down during the games, and twenty thousand people, it is said, were killed (Tacit. Ann. iv. 62; compare Sueton. Tiber. 40). Atilius was banished. About this time a great conflagration destroyed all the buildings on the Mons Caelius, and the emperor liberally relieved the sufferers in proportion to their losses, a measure which procured him the good-will of the people. His dislike of publicity was shown during his residence in Campania, by an edict which commanded the people not to disturb his retirement, and he prevented all assemblages of people by placing soldiers in various posts. In order, however, to secure the retirement which he loved, he went (A. D. 27) to the island of Capri (Capreae), which is about three miles from the promontory of Surrento. This retreat was further recommended by having an almost inaccessible coast. A poor fisherman, who had caught a large mullet, with difficulty made his way up the rocks to present it to the emperor, who rewarded him by ordering his face to be well rubbed with the fish. (Sueton. Tiber. c. 60.)

The new year (A. D. 28) was opened with the death of Titus Sabinus, a friend of Germanicus, whom Latinius Latiaris had inveigled into very strong expressions against Sejanus and Tiberius, while he had placed persons in secret to be witnesses. The villains informed Tiberius of the words of Sabinus, and at the same time of their own treachery. The emperor let the senate know his wishes, and this servile body immediately put Sabinus to death, for which they received the thanks of Tiberius. (Tacit. Ann. iv. 68.) In this year Tiberius married Agrippina, a daughter of Germanicus, to Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, and the result of this union was the emperor Nero [NERO]. The death of Livia (A. D. 29), the emperor's mother, released Tiberius from one cause of anxiety. He had long been tired of her, because she wished to exercise authority, and one object in leaving Rome was to be out of her way. He did not visit her in her last illness, nor come to the funeral, being, as he said, overwhelmed with public affairs, he who neglected all important affairs, and devoted himself to his solitary pleasures. (Tacit. Ann. v. 2; Dion Cass. lviii. 2.) Livia's death gave Sejanus and Tiberius free scope, for Tiberius never entirely released himself from a kind of subjection to his mother, and Sejanus did not venture to attempt the overthrow of Livia's influence. The destruction of Agrippina and her children was now the chief purpose of Sejanus, who had his own ambitious projects to serve, as it is shown in his life [SEJANUS; AGRIPPINA]; he finally got from the tyrant the reward that was his just desert, an ignominious death.

In A. D. 32 Latinius Latiaris, the infamous accuser of Sabinus, was executed. Cotta Messalinus, a notorious scoundrel, was accused before the senate, but Tiberius wrote to them in his favour. This memorable letter (Tacit. Ann. iv. 6) began with an admission, the truth of which will not surprise any one; but it is somewhat singular, that so profound a dissembler as Tiberius could not keep to himself the consciousness of his own wretchedness: "What to write to you, P. C., or how to write, I know not; and what not to write at this time, may all the gods and goddesses torment me more, than I daily feel that I am suffering, if I do know." This artful tyrant knew how to submit to what he could not help: M. Terentius was charged before the senate with being a friend of Sejanus, and he boldly avowed it. His courage saved him from death, his accusers were punished, and Tiberius approved of the acquittal of Terentius (Dion Cass. lviii. 19). The emperor also prudently took no notice of an insult of the praetor L. Sejanus, the object of which was to ridicule the emperor's person. [SEJANUS, L.] Tiberius now left his retreat for Campania, and he came as far as his gardens on the Vatican; but he did not enter the city, and he placed soldiers to prevent any one coming near him. Old age and debauchery had bent his body, and covered his face with ugly blotches, which made him still more unwilling to show himself; and his taste for obscene pleasures, which grew upon him, made him court solitude still more.

One of the consuls of the year A. D. 33 was Serv. Sulpicius Galba, afterwards emperor. A great number of informers in this year pressed for the prosecution of those who had lent money contrary to a law of the dictator Caesar. The Romans never could understand that money must be treated as a commodity, and from the time of the Twelve Tables they had always interfered with the free trade in money, and without success. The law of Caesar was enforced, but as many of the senators had violated it, eighteen months were allowed to persons to settle their affairs, so as to bring them clear of the penalties of the lex. The consequence was great confusion in the money market, as every creditor was pressing for payment, and people were threatened with ruin by a forced sale of their property, to meet their engagements. The emperor relieved this distress by loans of public money, on security of land, and without interest. (Tacit. Ann. vi. 17.)

The death of Sex. Marius, once a friend of Tiberius, is given by Dion Cassius (lviii. 22), as an example of the emperor's cruelty. Marius had a handsome daughter, whom he removed to a distance, to save her from the lust of his imperial friend. Upon this he was accused of incestuous commerce with his own daughter, and put to death; and the emperor took possession of his gold mines, though they had been declared public property. The prisons, which were filled with the friends or supposed friends of Sejanus, were emptied by a general massacre of men, women, and children, whose bodies were thrown into the Tiber.

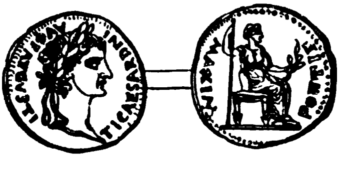
About this time, when the emperor was returning to Capreae, he married Claudia, the daughter of M. Silanus, to C. Caesar, the son of Germanicus, a youth whose early years gave ample promise of what he would be and what he was, as the emperor Caligula. Asinius Gallus, the son of Asinius Pollio, and the husband of Vipsania, the divorced wife of Tiberius, died this year of hunger, either voluntarily or by constraint. Drusus, the son of Germanicus, and his mother Agrippina, also died at this time. The death of Agrippina brought on the death of Plancina, the wife of Cn. Piso, for Livia being dead, who protected her, and Agrippina, who was her enemy, there was now no reason why justice should not have its course; yet it does not appear what evidence there was against her. Plancina escaped a public execution by voluntary death. (Tacit. Ann. vi. 26.)

In the year A. D. 33 Jesus Christ suffered under Pontius Pilatus, in Judaea. [PONTIUS PILATUS.]

It became the fashion in the time of Tiberius either for the accused or the accuser to be punished; and there was perhaps justice in it at such a time. Abudius Rufo made it a charge against L. Gaetulicus, under whom he had served, that Gaetulicus had designed to give his daughter to the son of Sejanus, and Abudius was banished from the city. Gaetulicus was at that time in command of the legions in Upper Germany, and he is said to have written a letter to Tiberius, from which the emperor might learn that a general at the head of an army, by whom he was beloved, was not to be treated like a man who was within the walls of Rome.

Artaxias, whom Germanicus had placed on the throne of Armenia, was now dead, and Artabanus, king of the Parthians, had put his eldest son, Arsaces, on the throne. But Artabanus had enemies around him, who sent a secret message to Rome to ask the emperor to send them Phraates for their king, whom his father Phraates had given as a hostage to Augustus. Phraates was sent, but he died in Syria, upon which Tiberius nominated Tiridates, who was of the same family, and he sent L. Vitellius to direct affairs in the East (A. D. 35). It was the policy of Tiberius to give employment to Artabanus by raising up enemies against him at home, rather than by employing the arms of Rome against him. [TIRIDATES; ARTABANUS.]

Rome was still the scene of tragic occurrences. Vibulenus Agrippa, who was accused before the senate, after his accusers had finished their charge against him took poison in the senate-house, and fell down in the agonies of death; yet he was dragged off to prison, and strangled though life was already extinct. Tigranes, once king of Armenia, who was then at Rome, was also accused and put to death. In the same year (A. D. 36) a conflagration at Rome destroyed a part of the Circus contiguous to the Aventine hill, and the houses on the Aventine also; but the emperor paid the owners of property to the full amount of their losses.



Tiberius, now in his seventy-eighth year, had hitherto enjoyed good health; and he was accustomed to laugh at physicians, and to ridicule those who, after reaching the age of thirty, required the advice of a doctor to tell them what was useful or injurious to their health. (Tacit. Ann. vi. 46.) But he was now attacked with a slow disease, which seized him at Astura, whence he travelled to Circeii, and thence to Misenum, to end his life in the villa of Lucullus. He concealed his sufferings as much as he could, and went on eating and indulging himself as usual. But Charicles, his physician, took the opportunity of feeling the old man's pulse, and told those about him that he would not last two days. No successor was yet appointed. Tiberius had a grandson, Tiberius Nero Gemellus, who was only seventeen, and too young to direct affairs. Caius, the son of Germanicus, was older and beloved by the people; but Tiberius did not like him. He thought of Claudius, the brother of Germanicus, as a successor, but Claudius was too weak of understanding. Accordingly, says Tacitus, he made no declaration of his will, but left it to fate to determine his successor. Dion Cassius says (lviii. 23) that he named C. Caligula, because he knew his bad disposition; but this is always Dion's fashion. Suetonius (Tiber. c. 76) says that he made a will two years before his death, in which he instituted Caius and Tiberius Gemellus his coheredes, with mutual substitution; and this will might be a disposition of the empire as well as of his private property. Caius had for some time employed all his artifices to win the favour of the emperor, and also that of Macro, who was now all-powerful with the emperor. It seems that Tiberius certainly did not like Caius, and if he had lived longer, he would probably have put him to death, and given the empire to his grandson.

On the sixteenth of March A. D. 37, Tiberius had a fainting fit, and was supposed to be dead, on which Caius came forth and was saluted as emperor; but he was alarmed by the intelligence that Tiberius had recovered and called for something to eat. Caius was so frightened that he did not know what to do, and was every moment expecting to be put to death; but Macro, with more presence of mind, gave orders that a quantity of clothes should be thrown on Tiberius, and that he should be left alone. Thus Tiberius ended his life. Suetonius, quoting Seneca, gives a somewhat different account of his death. Tiberius reigned twenty-two years, six months, and twenty-six days. His body was taken to Rome, and his funeral ceremony was conducted with the usual pomp. His successor Caligula pronounced the oration, but he spoke less of Tiberius than of Augustus, Germanicus, and himself. Tiberius did not receive divine honours, like Augustus. Tacitus (Ann. vi. 51) has given, in a few words, his character, the true nature of which was not fully shown till he was released from all restraint. He was probably one of those men who, in a private station, might have been as good as most men are, for it is fortunate for mankind that few have the opportunity and the temptation which unlimited power gives.

In the time of Tiberius lived Valerius Maximus, Velleius Paterculus, Phaedrus, Fenestella, and Strabo; also the jurist Massurius Sabinus, M. Cocceius Nerva, and others.

Tiberius wrote a brief commentary of his own life (Sueton. Tiber. c. 61), the only book that the emperor Domitian studied: Suetonius made use of it for his life of Tiberius. Suetonius also made use of various letters of Tiberius to princes and others, and his Orationes to the senate. Tiberius made several public orations, such as that on his father, delivered when he was nine years old, but this we must assume to have been written by somebody else; the funeral oration of Augustus; that on Maroboduus, delivered before the senate A. D. 19, was extant when Tacitus wrote (Ann. ii. 63). Tiberius also wrote Greek poems, and a lyric poem on the Death of L. Caesar.

COIN OF TIBERIUS.

(Vell. Pat. ii. 94; Tacitus, Annales, i.—vi.; Dion Cassius, lvii. lviii.; Suetonius, Tiberius; Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. i.; De C. Suetonii Tranquilli Fontibus et Auctoritate, Scripsit A. Krause, Berlin, 1831; Oratorum Romanorum Fragmenta, H. Meyer, 2d ed.) [G. L.]

TIBE'RIUS II., emperor of the East A.D. 578—582. His full name was ANICIUS THRAX, FLAVIUS CONSTANTINUS. He was captain of the guards to the emperor Justinus II., who elevated him to the rank of Caesar or Augustus, A. D. 574. He was a native of Thrace, whence he has the addition of Thrax to his name. He assumed the name of Constantinus after he became emperor. The date of his birth is uncertain. He was brought up at the court of Justinian, and employed by Justinus II., who succeeded Justinian A. D. 565. In A. D. 573 Tiberius commanded the imperial troops against the Avars, in the neighbourhood of the Save and the Danube. He lost one battle against them, but he soon recovered this failure, and secured for the empire the possession of Sirmium, near the junction of the Save and the Danube. Justinus, feeling himself incompetent for the labour of administration, associated Tiberius with him, and it is said that the influence of his wife Sophia, who admired the handsome captain, contributed to determine the emperor's choice. The speech which the emperor addressed to Tiberius on this occasion is preserved by Theophylactus Simocatta, and has been translated by Gibbon: it contained wise advice, and Tiberius followed it. Justinus survived this ceremony four years, during which the weight of administration fell on Tiberius alone.

The Longobards were now in Italy, but a war with Persia prevented Tiberius from directing all his attention to that quarter. Yet he maintained his authority in the exarchate of Ravenna, and in other parts of Italy, and he saved Pelagius II., the pope of Rome, and the Roman citizens, from the Longobards, by a timely supply of provisions, which were forwarded by a fleet. To check the progress of the Longobards in the north of Italy, he concluded an alliance some years later with Chilperic the king of the Franks. The war with Chosroes, king of Persia, demanded all the resources of Tiberius. In A. D. 576, Justinian, who was in command of the armies of the Eastern Empire, crossed the Bosporus with a force of 150,000 men, to relieve Theodosiopolis in Armenia, which was defended by Theodorus, a Byzantine general. This force comprehended a great number of Germans and Slavonians. A battle was fought with Chosroes near Melitene in Armenia, in which the Persians were defeated, and many of them perished in the Euphrates. An immense booty, carried by twenty-four elephants, was brought to Constantinople. Justinian is said to have advanced into the very centre of the Persian empire, and was about concluding a treaty with Chosroes, but it was interrupted by some advantage gained over Justinian by one of the generals of Chosroes. Justinian was recalled, and Mauricius, afterwards the successor of Tiberius was appointed to command in his place. Mauricius secured himself against sudden attacks by adopting the old Roman plan of never resting, except in an entrenched camp. The winter (A. D. 577—578) Mauricius spent in Mesopotamia.

Justinus died on the fifth of October A. D. 578, and Tiberius was now sole emperor. Sophia, it is said, hoped to become the wife of Tiberius, but when the people in the Hippodrome called for the new empress, Tiberius produced as his wife Anastasia, to whom he had been for some time secretly married. Sophia, though treated with respect by the new emperor, and enjoying an ample allowance, could not forget her disappointment, and she is said to have induced Justinian to conspire with her to overthrow the man whom she had loved. The plot was discovered: Sophia was deprived of all power of doing further mischief, and Justinian, who was pardoned, became a faithful friend of Tiberius.

In A. D. 579 Chosroes, the Persian, was succeeded by Hormisdas, and the war began again. Mauricius defeated the Persians, overran a large part of Persia, and in a bloody contest on the Euphrates, A. D. 580, gave the forces of Hormisdas a most signal defeat; and again in the following year. In Africa, which had long been disturbed by the natives, Gennadius, the exarch of Ravenna, defeated (A. D. 580) Gasmul, king of the Mauritani. Mauricius enjoyed a triumph at Constantinople for his Persian victories, A. D. 581, and in August of that year, Tiberius, whose health was rapidly failing, raised him to the dignity of Caesar, having no sons of his own. He also gave him his daughter Constantina in marriage. Tiberius died on the 14th of August, A. D. 582, and was succeeded by Mauricius.

Tiberius was universally regretted. By an economical administration he diminished the taxation of his subjects, and always had his treasury full.

There were at least six constitutions of the emperor Tiberius; three of which (Nos. 161, 163, 164) form part of the collection of 168 Novellae, one is found by itself in the Venice manuscript, the fifth is lost, and the sixth only exists in Latin. The constitution (No. 163, Περὶ κουφισμῶν δημοσίων, "On the Diminution of Taxes," expresses a humane desire to relieve the people from their burdens, combined with a prudent regard to supply the necessary demands of the state. (Gibbon, Decline and Fall, &c., ch. 45, who also gives the references to the authorities for the reign of Tiberius; Mortreuil, Hist. du Droit Byzantin, vol. i. p. 81.) [G. L.]

TIBE'RIUS ABSI'MARUS, who held the command of the Cibyratae in the fleet of Leontius II., was proclaimed emperor by the mutinous soldiers and sailors, and, returning to Constantinople, he usurped the throne and put Leontius in prison, A. D. 698. [LEONTIUS II.] The usurper added to his name Absimarus, the respected name of Tiberius. His brother Heraclius, whom he appointed to conduct the war against the Arabs, invaded Syria (A. D. 699—700), and treated the inhabitants with the most inhuman cruelty. The events of this usurper's reign are unimportant. The strangeness of his rise was only equalled by the suddenness of his fall, and by the restoration to the imperial throne of Justinian II. (A. D. 704), who had been expelled by Leontius [JUSTINIANUS II.], as Leontius was expelled by Tiberius. [G. L.]

TIBE'RIUS ALEXANDER. [ALEXANDER.]

TIBE'RIUS, literary. 1. A philosopher and sophist, of unknown time, the author of numerous works on grammar and rhetoric, the titles of which are given by Suidas, and of commentaries on Herodotus, Thucydides, Xenophon, and Demosthenes. One of his works, on the figures in the orations of Demosthenes (περὶ τῶν παρὰ Δημοσθένει σχημάτων), is still extant, and has been published in the Rhetores Graeci of Thomas Gale, Oxon, 1676, 8vo., Lips. 1773, 8vo.; and separately by Boissonade, Lond. Valpy, 1815, 8vo. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 118; Classical Journal, No. 23, pp. 198—204.)

2. ILLUSTRIUS, the author of two epigrams in the Greek Anthology. Nothing more is known of him. (Brunck, Anal. vol. iii. p. 7; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 228, vol. xiii. p. 962.) [P. S.]

TIBE'RIUS, a veterinary surgeon, who may perhaps have lived in the fourth or fifth century after Christ. He wrote some works, of which only fragments remain, which are to be found in the collection of writers on veterinary surgery, first published in Latin by J. Ruellius, Paris. 1530. fol., and in Greek by S. Grynaeus, Basil. 1537. 4to. [W. A. G.]

TIBOETES (Τιβοίτης), an uncle of Prusias I., king of Bithynia, was living in Macedonia in the early part of the reign of Prusias, and was sent for by the Byzantines in B. C. 220, as they wished to set him up as a competitor for the throne of Bithynia; but he died on his journey from Macedonia. (Polyb. iv. 50—52.)

TI'BULUS FLACCUS. [FLACCUS.]

TIBULLUS, A'LBIUS (his praenomen is unknown), was of equestrian family. The date of his birth is uncertain: it is assigned by Voss, Passow, and Dissen to B. C. 59, by Lachman and Paldamus to B. C. 54; but he died young (according to the old life by Hieronymus Alexandrinus, in flore juventutis) soon after Virgil (Domitius Marsus in Epigrammate)

> "Te quoque Virgilii comitem non aequa, Tibulle, > Mors juvenem campos misit ad Elysios."

But as Virgil died B. C. 19, if Tibullus died the year after, B. C. 18, he would even then have been 36. The later date therefore is more probable. Of the youth and education of Tibullus, absolutely nothing is known. His late editor and biographer, Dissen, has endeavoured to make out from his writings, that according to the law, which compelled the son of an eques to perform a certain period of military service (formerly ten years), Tibullus was forced, strongly against his will, to become a soldier. This notion is founded on the tenth elegy of the first book, in which the poet expresses a most un-Roman aversion to war. He is dragged to war, "Some enemy is already girt with the arms with which he is to be mortally wounded (l. 13). Let others have the fame of valour; he would be content to hear old soldiers recite their campaigns around his hospitable board, and draw their battles on the table with their wine." (l. 29, 32.) But this Elegy is too perfectly finished for a boyish poem; by no means marks its date in any period of the poet's life; and intimates rather that he was, at the time when it was written, quietly settled on his own patrimonial estate.

That estate, belonging to the equestrian ancestors of Tibullus, was at Pedum, between Tibur and Praeneste. This property, like that of the other great poets of the day, Virgil and Horace, had been either entirely or partially confiscated during the civil wars; yet Tibullus retained or recovered part of it, and spent there the better portion of his short, but peaceful and happy life. He describes most gracefully, in his first elegy, his reduced fortunes. "His household gods had once been the guardians of a flourishing, they were now of a poor family (l. 19, 20). A single lamb was now the sacrifice of that household, which used to offer a calf chosen from among countless heifers. On this estate he had been brought up, as a child he had played before the simple wooden images of the same Lares."

The first elegy shows likewise Tibullus already on intimate terms with his great patron Messala, to whom he may have owed the restoration in part of his paternal estate. But in his love of peace, and the soft enjoyments of peace, he declines to follow Messala to war, though that war was the strife for empire between Octavian and Antony, which closed with the battle of Actium. But when Messala immediately after that victory (in the autumn of B.C. 31), was detached by Caesar to suppress a formidable insurrection which had broken out in Aquitaine, Tibullus overcame his repugnance to arms, and accompanied his friend or patron in the honourable post of contubernalis (a kind of aide-de-camp) into Gaul. Part of the glory of the Aquitanian campaign (described by Appian, B. C. iv. 38) for which Messala four years later (B.C. 27) obtained a triumph, and which Tibullus celebrates in language of unwonted loftiness, redounds, according to the poet, to his own fame. He was present at the battle of Atax (Aude in Languedoc), which broke the Aquitanian rebellion. Messala, it is probable, went round the province to receive the submission of all the Gaulish tribes, and was accompanied in his triumphant journey by Tibullus. The poet invokes, as witnesses of his fame, the Pyrenean mountains, the shores of the sea in Xaintonge, the Saone, the Garonne, and the Loire, in the country of the Carnuti (near Orleans) (Eleg. i. 7. 9, foll.). In the autumn of the following year (B. C. 30) Messala, having pacified Gaul, was sent into the East to organise that part of the empire under the sole dominion of Octavian. Tibullus set out in his company, but was taken ill, and obliged to remain in Corcyra (Eleg. i. 3), from whence he returned to Rome.

So ceased the active life of Tibullus: he retired to the peace for which he had yearned; his life is now the chronicle of his poetry and of those tender passions which were the inspiration of his poetry. The first object of his attachment is celebrated under the poetic name of Delia; it is supposed (Apul. Apolog. 106, but the reading is doubtful) that her real name was Plancia or Plautia, or, as has been plausibly conjectured, Plania, of which the Greek Delia was a translation. To Delia are addressed the first six elegies of the first book. She seems to have belonged to that class of females of the middle order, not of good family, but above poverty, which answered to the Greek hetaerae.

The poet's attachment to Delia had begun before he left Rome for Aquitaine. His ambition seems to have been to retire with her, as his mistress, into the country, and pass the rest of his life in quiet enjoyment. But Delia seems to have been faithless during his absence from Rome; and admitted other lovers. On his return from Corcyra, he found her ill, and attended her with affectionate solicitude (Eleg. i. 5), and again hoped to induce her to retire with him into the country. But first a richer lover appears to have supplanted him with the inconstant Delia; and afterwards there appears a husband in his way. The second book of Elegies is chiefly devoted to a new mistress named Nemesis. Besides these two mistresses (Christian morals command silence on another point) Tibullus was enamoured (his poems have all the signs of real, not of poetic passion) of a certain Glycera. He wrote elegies to soften that cruel beauty, whom there seems no reason to confound either with Delia, the object of his youthful attachment, or with Nemesis. Glycera, however, is not known to us from the poetry of Tibullus, but from the ode of Horace, which gently reproves him for dwelling so long in his plaintive elegies on the pitiless Glycera. Ovid. on the other hand, writing of the poetry of Tibullus, names only two objects of his passion:

> "Sic Nemesis longum, sic Delia nomen habebunt, > Altera cura recens, altera primus amor."
> Amor. iii. 9.

The poetry of his contemporaries shows Tibullus as a gentle and singularly amiable man. He was beautiful in person: Horace on this point confirms the strong language of the old biographers. To Horace especially he was an object of warm attachment. Besides the ode which alludes to his passion for Glycera (Hor. Carm. i. 33). the epistle of Horace to Tibullus gives the most full and pleasing view of his poetical retreat, and of his character: it is written by a kindred spirit. Horace does homage to that perfect purity of taste which distinguishes the poetry of Tibullus; he takes pride in the candid but favourable judgment of his own satires. The time of Tibullus he supposes to be shared between the finishing his exquisite small poems, which were to surpass even those of Cassius of Parma, up to that time the models of that kind of composition, and the enjoyment of the country.

Tibullus possessed, according to his friend's notions, all the blessings of life—a competent fortune, favour with the great, fame, health; and seemed to know how to enjoy all those blessings.

The two first books alone of the Elegies, under the name of Tibullus, are of undoubted authenticity. The third is the work of another, a very inferior poet, whether Lygdamus be a real or fictitious name or not. This poet was much younger than Tibullus, for he was born in the year of the battle of Mutina, B. C. 43. The lines which convey this information seem necessary in their place, and cannot be considered as an interpolation. (Eleg. iii. 5. 17.) The hexameter poem on Messala, which opens the fourth book, is so bad that, although a successful elegiac poet may have failed when he attempted epic verse, it cannot well be ascribed to a writer of the exquisite taste of Tibullus. The smaller elegies of the fourth book have all the inimitable grace and simplicity of Tibullus. With the exception of the thirteenth (of which some lines are hardly surpassed by Tibullus himself) these poems relate to the love of a certain Sulpicia, a woman of noble birth, for Cerinthus, the real or fictitious name of a beautiful youth. Sulpicia seems to have belonged to the intimate society of Messala (Eleg. iv. 8). Nor is there any improbability in supposing that Tibullus may have written elegies in the name or by the desire of Sulpicia. If Sulpicia was herself the poetess, she approached nearer to Tibullus than any other writer of elegies.

The first book of Elegies alone seems to have been published during the author's life, probably soon after the triumph of Messala (B. C. 27). The birthday of that great general gives the poet an occasion for describing all his victories in Gaul and in the East (Eleg. i. 7). In the second book he celebrates the cooptation of Messalinus, the son of Messala, into the college of the Quinqueviri. But this second book no doubt did not appear till after the death of Tibullus. With it, according to our conjecture, may have been published the elegies of his imitator, perhaps his friend and associate in the society of Messala, Lygdamus (if that be a real name), i. e. the third book: and likewise the fourth, made up of poems belonging, as it were, to this intimate society of Messala, the Panegyric by some nameless author, which, feeble as it is, seems to be of that age; the poems in the name of Sulpicia, with the concluding one, the thirteenth, a fragment of Tibullus himself.

L. TIBU'RTIUS, a centurion in the civil war B. C. 48. (Caes. B. C. iii. 19.)

TICHO'NIUS. [TYCHONIUS.]

L. TI'CIDA, one of Caesar's officers, was taken prisoner along with Q. Cominius in B. C. 46. (Hirt. B. Afr. 44, 46.) [COMINIUS, No. 7.]

TI'CIDA, a Roman poet, who wrote epigrams in which he spoke of his mistress under a fictitious name. (Ov. Trist. ii. 432; Suet. Gramm. 11.)

P. TICI'NIUS MENA, was the first person who introduced barbers into Italy from Sicily in the 454th year after the foundation of the city. (Varr. R. R. ii. 11. § 10; Plin. H. N. vii. 59.)

TIGELLI'NUS, SOPHO'NIUS, the son of a native of Agrigentum, owed his rise from poverty and obscurity to his handsome person and his unscrupulous character. He was banished to Scyllaceum (Squillace) in Bruttii (A. D. 39—40), for an intrigue with Agrippina [AGRIPPINA, No. 2] and Julia Livilla [JULIA, No. 8], sisters of Caligula, and respectively the wives of L. Domitius Ahenobarbus [No. 10] and M. Vinucius, cos. A. D. 30. (Vet. Schol. in Juv. i. 155; Dion Cass. lix. 23.)

Tigellinus was probably among the exiles restored by Agrippina, after she became empress, since early in Nero's reign he was again in favour at court, and on the death of Burrus (A. D. 63) was appointed praetorian prefect jointly with Fenius Rufus. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 48, 51.) Tigellinus ministered to Nero's worst passions, and of all his favourites was the most obnoxious to the Roman people. He inflamed his jealousy or his avarice against the noblest members of the senate and the most pliant dependants of the court. C. Rubellius Plautus [Vol. II. p. 411], Cornelius Sulla, Minucius Thermus, and C. Petronius, Nero's master of the ceremonies, were successively his victims (Tac. Ann. xiv. 57, xvi. 18), and he actively promoted the emperor's divorce from Octavia and his marriage with Poppaea. A. D. 63. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 60—64; Dion Cass. lxii. 13.) In A. D. 65, Tigellinus entertained Nero in his Aemilian gardens, with a sumptuous profligacy unsurpassed even in that age, and in the same year shared with him the odium of burning Rome, since the conflagration had broken out on the scene of the banquet. (Tac. Ann. xv. 37—40; Dion Cass. lxii. 15.) In the prosecutions that followed the discovery of Piso's conspiracy in the following year, Nero found in Tigellinus an able and merciless agent for his revenge. Tigellinus attached himself to Poppaea's faction, and it was said commonly in Rome, that the imperial privy-council (Tac. Ann. xv. 61) contained only three members, the praetorian prefect, Nero and his wife. The cruelty and rapacity of Tigellinus filled all ranks with dismay. "Pone Tigellinum," says Juvenal (i. 155) using his name proverbially, and the stake and faggot will be your portion. Annaeus Mela, the younger brother of Seneca the philosopher, was one only of many persons who bequeathed a large share of his property to Tigellinus and his son-in-law, Cossutianus Capito, that the residue might be secured to the rightful heirs (Tac. Ann. xvi. 17; Dion Cass. lxii. 27), and those who escaped from the real or imputed guilt of conspiring with Piso owed their exemption, not to their innocence, but to their bribes. (Dion Cass. ib. 28). It was probably about this time that Apollonius of Tyana was brought before Tigellinus on a charge of having traduced the emperor. But the philosopher managed to impress his judge with such a dread of his supernatural powers that he was dismissed unharmed. (Philostr. Ap. Tyan. iv. 42—44.) The history of Tigellinus is so inwoven with that of his master, that we may refer to the life of Nero and briefly add, that the minister presided at the emperor's nuptials with Sporus, that he accompanied him to Greece, and distinguished himself every where by his venality, his shamelessness, and his rapacity. (Tac. Ann. xv. 59; Dion Cass. lxiii. 11, 12, 13.) He encouraged Nero to degrade the imperial dignity as a public singer on the stage, and contributed to his downfal as much by his own unpopularity as by pampering his master's vices. (Dion Cass. ib. 21.) Tigellinus returned to Rome in A. D. 68, and shortly afterwards Nero was dethroned by the indignant legions and the long-suffering senate and people. In his deepest distress (Suet. Ner. 48) the emperor retained some faithful adherents, but Tigellinus was not of the number. He joined with Nymphidius Sabinus, who had succeeded Fenius Rufus as praetorian prefect, in transferring the allegiance of the soldiers to Galba. By large bribes to T. Vinius, Galba's freedman, and to Vinius's daughter he purchased a reprieve from the sentence which, on all occasions, the Roman people clamorously demanded, and he even obtained from Galba a decree rebuking the populace for their petition, and informing them that Tigellinus was sinking rapidly under consumption. On the accession of Otho, however, in January, A. D. 70, his doom was no longer to be eluded. A centurion and his company were despatched to Sinuessa, and Tigellinus, in the lap of luxury, and surrounded by the victims and ministers of his excesses, after a vain attempt to corrupt his executioners, perished by his own hand. (Tac. Hist. i. 72; Plut. Galb. 2, 13, 17, 19, 23, 29, Oth. 2; Dion Cass. lxiv. 3; Joseph. B. J. iv. 9. § 2; Suet. Galb. 15). [W. B. D.]

TIGE'LLIUS HERMO'GENES. [HERMOGENES.]

TIGRA'NES (Τιγράνης), was the name of several kings of Armenia, of whom the first and greatest is also frequently reckoned among the kings of Syria. The Armenian or native form of the name is Dikran.

TIGRANES I.* was a descendant of ARTAXIAS, the founder of the Armenian monarchy. According to Appian (Syr. 48) his father's name was Tigranes, but no king of that name preceded his accession, and the native historians represent him as a son of Artaces or Artaxes. [ARSACIDAE, Vol. I. p. 365.] The statement of Plutarch that he had reigned twenty-five years when he received the first embassy of Lucullus in B. C. 71 (Plut. Lucull. 21), would fix the date of his accession in B. C. 96, but Appian (Mithr. 15), perhaps inadvertently, alludes to him as already on the throne in B. C. 98. Of the early events of his reign we have very imperfect information. But it appears that he successively conquered Arsaces or Artanes, king of Sophene, and several other petty princes, so that he united under his sway not only all Armenia, but several of the neighbouring provinces, and thus raised himself to a degree of power far superior to that enjoyed by any of his predecessors. Towards the commencement of his reign he appears to have been worsted by the Parthians, and was compelled to purchase a peace from those formidable neighbours by the cession of a considerable extent of territory. But at a later period he was not only able to recover possession of these districts, but invaded Parthia in his turn, and carried his arms as far as Ninus and Arbela, while he permanently annexed to his dominions the important provinces of Atropatene and Gordyene. Inflated by these successes, he assumed the pompous title of king of kings, and always appeared in public accompanied by some of his tributary princes as attendants (Strab. xi. p. 532; Plut. Lucull. 21; Appian, Syr. 48). His power was at the same time greatly strengthened by his alliance with Mithridates the Great, king of Pontus, whose daughter Cleopatra he had married at an early period of his reign. (Appian, Mithr. 15; Plut. Lucull. 22.)

An additional field was now opened to his ambition by the dissensions which divided the Seleucidan princes of Syria. That country had been so long distracted by civil wars, that a large part of its inhabitants appear to have welcomed, if they did not invite, the foreign invader; Antiochus Eusebes was able to offer little opposition, and Tigranes made himself master without difficulty of the whole Syrian monarchy from the Euphrates to the sea, together with the dependent province of Cilicia, B. C. 83 (App. Syr. 48; Justin. xl. 1). He was now at the summit of his power, and continued in the undisputed possession of these extensive dominions for nearly fourteen years. Of the events of this period we have scarcely any information, but he appears to have consigned the government of Syria to a viceroy Magadates, while he himself continued to reside in the upper provinces of his kingdom (Appian, l. c.). Here he followed the example of so many other Eastern despots, by founding a new capital which he named after himself, Tigranocerta (Strab. xi. p. 532). It was his connection with Mithridates that, by bringing him into collision with the power of Rome, paved the way for his downfall. When that monarch was preparing to renew the contest with Rome after the death of Sulla (B. C. 76), he was desirous to obtain the support of his son-in-law by involving him in the same quarrel. and in consequence instigated Tigranes to invade Cappadocia. The Armenian king swept that country with a large army, and is said to have carried off into captivity no less than 300,000 of the inhabitants, a large portion of whom he settled in his newly-founded capital of Tigranocerta (Appian, Mithr. 67; Strab. xi. p. 532; Memnon, c. 43). But in other respects he appears to have furnished little support to the projects of Mithridates, and left that monarch to carry on the contest with Lucullus single-handed, while he himself turned his attention to his Syrian dominions. And when (in B. C. 71) the vicissitudes of the war at length compelled the king of Pontus to take refuge in the dominions of his son-in-law, Tigranes, though he assigned him a guard of honour, and treated him with all the distinctions of royalty, refused to admit him to a personal interview, and manifested no inclination to espouse his cause. But when Appius Clodius who had been sent by Lucullus to demand the surrender of the fugitive monarch, at length obtained an interview with Tigranes at Antioch, his haughty demeanour as well as the imperious terms in which his message itself was couched, so offended the pride of the Armenian king that he returned a peremptory refusal, accompanied with an express declaration of war. (Plut. Lucull. 21, 22; Memnon, 46.)

There now remained for him no choice but to prepare for the contest which he had so imprudently provoked. But he was quite unable to appreciate the character of the enemy with whom he had to cope, and though he now at length condescended to admit Mithridates to his presence and his councils, he was too much inflated with pride to listen to the advice which his experience prompted; and hastened to assume the offensive by sending a force to invade Lycaonia and Cilicia, before his other preparations were completed. He appears to have been firmly impressed with the idea that Lucullus would await his approach in the Roman provinces, and when that general instead of doing so, boldly crossed the Euphrates and the Tigris, and penetrated into the heart of Armenia itself, Tigranes was completely taken by surprise. He at first refused to believe the intelligence, and when at length convinced of its truth he opposed Mithrobarzanes with a very inadequate force to the advance of the conqueror. The destruction of this detachment aroused him to a sense of his error and he now abandoned his capital of Tigranocerta, and withdrew to the mountains. Murena, who was sent in pursuit of him, succeeded in cutting off all his baggage, and converting his retreat into a disorderly flight (Plut. Lucull. 22—25; Appian, Mithr. 84). But notwithstanding this reverse, the mighty host which he was soon able to gather around his standard, inspired him again with the same overweening confidence, and he hastened to attack Lucullus in order to avert the fall of Tigranocerta. The event was decisive; the army of the Armenian king, though amounting according to the most authentic statement, to 55,000 horse and 150,000 regular infantry, besides light-armed troops, was totally routed by the small force under Lucullus; the king himself fled almost unattended from the field, and Tigranocerta was surrendered to the victorious general. (Plut. Lucull. 26—28; Appian, Mithr. 85, 86; Memnon, 56; Liv. Epit. xcviii.; Eutrop. vi. 9; Oros. vi. 3.)

During the ensuing winter, while Lucullus was established in Gordyene, several of the neighbouring princes hastened to throw off the yoke of the Armenian king, and tender their submission to the Roman general. Among others, Antiochus (surnamed Asiaticus), the son of Antiochus Eusebes, presented himself to claim the throne of his fathers, and was reinstated, apparently without opposition, in the possession of the whole of Syria, where the yoke of Tigranes had long been odious to his Greek subjects (App. Syr. 49; Strab. xi. p. 532). Meanwhile Tigranes, in concert with Mithridates (with whom his disasters had brought him into closer relations), was using every exertion to assemble a fresh army, while they both endeavoured, though without success, to induce Phraates, king of Parthia, to make common cause with them (App. Mithr. 87; Dion Cass. xxxv. 3; Epist. Mithr. ap. Sall. Hist. iv. p. 238, ed. Gerlach.). Failing in this they awaited the approach of Lucullus among the bleak highlands of Armenia, where he was not able to penetrate until late in the summer of 68. The two kings met him on the river Arsanias, with an army less numerous, but better disciplined than that of the preceding year, but with equal ill success: they were again totally defeated, and it was only a mutiny among the troops of Lucullus that prevented him from making himself master of Artaxata, the ancient capital of Armenia. But the spirit of disaffection which had by this time pervaded the Roman troops, hampered all the proceedings of their commander; and though in the ensuing winter Lucullus reduced the strong fortress of Nisibis in Mesopotamia, which was held by Guras, the brother of Tigranes, his subsequent movements were completely paralysed by the disobedience of his own soldiers. The two kings took advantage of this respite, and while Mithridates sought to recover his own dominions, Tigranes regained great part of Armenia, and defeated the Roman lieutenant L. Fannius, whose army was only saved by the arrival of Lucullus himself to his relief (Dion Cass. xxxv. 4—8; Plut. Lucull. 31—34). In the following year, also (B. C. 67), he was able to pour his troops into the provinces of Armenia Minor and Cappadocia without opposition, and Lucullus was unable to punish his audacity. (Dion Cass. xxxv. 14—15.)

The arrival of Pompey (B. C. 66) soon changed the face of events, and Mithridates, after repeated defeats, was again compelled to seek a refuge in Armenia. Meanwhile, a new enemy had arisen to the Armenian king in his own son Tigranes, who, having engaged in a conspiracy against the life of his father, and finding himself detected, fled for refuge to the Parthian king, Phraates. That monarch, who had recently concluded a treaty of alliance with Pompey, readily lent his support to the fugitive prince, and invaded Armenia with a large army, with which he advanced as far as Artaxata. But he was unable to reduce that city, and as soon as the Parthian king withdrew, Tigranes easily drove out his rebel son. It was at this juncture that Mithridates, after his final defeat by Pompey, once more threw himself upon the support of his son-in-law: but Tigranes, who suspected him of abetting the designs of his son, refused to receive him, and even set a price upon his head, while he himself hastened to make overtures of submission to Pompey. That general had already advanced into the heart of Armenia, and was approaching Artaxata itself, under the guidance of the young Tigranes, when the old king repaired in person to the Roman camp, and presenting himself as a suppliant before Pompey, laid his tiara at his feet. By this act of humiliation he at once conciliated the favour of the conqueror, who treated him in a friendly manner, and left him in possession of Armenia Proper with the title of king, depriving him only of the provinces of Sophene and Gordyene, which he erected into a separate kingdom for his son Tigranes. The elder monarch was so overjoyed at obtaining these unexpectedly favourable terms, that he not only paid the sum of 6000 talents demanded by Pompey, but added a large sum as a donation to his army, and continued ever after the steadfast friend of the Roman general (Dion Cass. xxxvi. 33—36; Plut. Pomp. 32, 33; Appian, Mithr. 104, 105, Syr. 49; Vell. Pat. ii. 37). He soon reaped the advantage of this fidelity, as in B. C. 65 Pompey, on his return from the campaign against Oroeses, finding that the Parthian king Phraates had wrongfully occupied the province of Gordyene, sent his lieutenant Afranius to expel him, and restored the possession of it to Tigranes. (Dion Cass. xxxvii. 5.)

The next year (B. C. 64) we find him again at war with the king of Parthia, but after several engagements with alternations of success, their differences were arranged by the mediation of Pompey, and the two monarchs concluded a treaty of peace (Dion Cass. xxxvii. 6, 7; App. Mithr. 106). This is the last event recorded to us of the reign of Tigranes: the exact date of his death is unknown, but we find him incidentally mentioned by Cicero (pro Sext. 27) as still alive and reigning in the spring of B. C. 56, while we know that he was succeeded by his son Artavasdes before the expedition of Crassus against the Parthians in B. C. 54 (Dion Cass. xl. 16). His death must therefore have occurred in this interval.

The character of Tigranes seems to have in no respect differed from that of many other Eastern despots. It was marked by the most extravagant pride and overweening confidence in prosperity, as well as by the most abject humiliation in misfortune. He alienated not only his Greek subjects and dependent princes by his violent and arbitrary acts, but extended his cruelties even to his own family. Of his sons by the daughter of Mithridates, he put to death two upon various charges, while the civil wars in which he was engaged with the third have been already mentioned. Yet he seems not to have been altogether without a tincture of Greek cultivation; for we learn that he afforded protection to the Athenian rhetorician Amphicrates, and had assembled a company of Greek players to celebrate the opening of a theatre in his new capital of Tigranocerta. (Plut. Lucull. 21, 22, 29; Appian, Mithr. 104.)

The coins of Tigranes, which were probably struck in Syria and bear Greek inscriptions, represent him with a tiara in the Oriental fashion, instead of the simple diadem of the Seleucidae.

COIN OF TIGRANES.

Tigranes II., king of Armenia, was a son of Artavasdes I., and grandson of the preceding. He was living an exile at Rome, when a party of his countrymen, discontented with the rule of his elder brother, Artaxias, sent to request that he should be placed on the throne. To this Augustus assented, and Tiberius was charged with the duty of accomplishing it, a task which he effected apparently without opposition, Artaxias being put to death by some of the Armenians themselves. Tiberius placed the crown on the head of Tigranes with his own hand (B. C. 20), and then withdrew from Armenia (Tac. Ann. ii. 3; Dion Cass. liv. 9; Suet. Tib. 9; Mon. Ancyr. pp. 35, 107, ed. Franz.; Joseph. Ant. xv. 4. § 3). No particulars are known of his reign, which was of short duration. (Tac. l. c.; Orell. ad loc.)

Tigranes III., king of Armenia, appears to have been a son of the preceding, and to have succeeded him on the throne for a short time: but the accounts transmitted to us of the revolutions of the Armenian monarchy at this period are very confused and unsatisfactory. (See Visconti, Iconographie Grecque, iii. p. 30; and Orell. ad Tac. Ann. ii. 3.) According to a fragment of Dion Cassius, quoted by Visconti (l. c.) he perished in a war against the neighbouring barbarians.

Tigranes IV. Another king of this name who was placed on the throne by Augustus, after the death of Artavasdes, would seem to have been distinct from the preceding, as Augustus himself only terms him "a certain Tigranes who belonged to the royal family." (Mon. Ancyr. p. 107.) He is not mentioned by any other historian.

For the later kings of Armenia of this name, see Arsacidae. [E. H. B.]

TIGRA'NES (Τιγράνης). 1. A son of the Armenian king who was conquered by Cyrus the Elder. According to Xenophon he had been a schoolfellow of Cyrus, and by his intercession with that monarch, procured the pardon of his father, whose fidelity he thenceforth guaranteed. His name is afterwards repeatedly mentioned in the Cyropaedeia among the friends and attendants of the Persian king (Xen. Cyrop. iii. 1, 2, v. 1, 3, viii. 3. § 25, 4. § 1.) In the Armenian historians Tigranes assumes a much more conspicuous character, and is represented as bearing an important part in the overthrow of the Median kingdom, and the defeat of Astyages. He appears to have become a sort of national hero, and his exploits are recounted at length by Moses of Chorene (Hist. Armen. i. 23—29), but they are in all probability fabulous.

2. A Persian of the royal race of the Achaemenidae, who commanded the Median troops in the army of Xerxes, with which he invaded Greece, B. C. 480. After the defeat of the Persian king, Tigranes was appointed to command the army of 60,000 men, which was destined to maintain possession of Ionia. (Herod. vii. 62, ix. 96.)

3. One of the sons of Tigranes I., king of Armenia. He had at first enjoyed a high place in his father's favour, so that the latter had even bestowed on him the titles and ensigns of royalty. At a later period, however, he was gained over by the party disaffected to the old king, and joined in their intrigues; but the plot being discovered, he sought safety in flight, and took refuge with Phraates king of Parthia. That monarch readily embraced the opportunity, gave him his daughter in marriage, and invaded Armenia with a large army in order to place him on the throne. But the Parthian king was unable to reduce Artaxata, the capital of Armenia, and after some time returned into his own dominions, leaving a part only of his forces under Tigranes, who was quickly defeated by the superior arms of his father. He now however sought a refuge in the camp of Pompey, who was at this time (B. C. 66) in full advance upon Artaxata, and who welcomed the young prince with open arms. But when the elder Tigranes came in person to humble himself before the conqueror, Pompey was easily moved to clemency, and instead of placing the son upon his father's throne, left the latter in possession of the greater part of his dominions, while he erected the provinces of Sophene and Gordyene into a subordinate kingdom for the younger Tigranes. The prince had the imprudence to display openly his dissatisfaction with this arrangement; and not only absented himself from the festival which Pompey gave on the occasion, but soon after openly disobeyed the orders of the Roman general in regard to the disposal of his treasures. Hereupon Pompey caused him to be immediately arrested and detained as a prisoner. A few years later we find him among the captive princes who adorned the triumph of the Roman conqueror, B. C. 61. (Appian, Mithr. 104, 105, 117; Dion Cass. xxxiii. 33—36; Plut. Pomp. 33, 45.) [E. H. B.]

TI'LLIUS CIMBER. [Cimber.]

TILPHU'SA (Τιλφοῦσα). 1. The nymph of the well Tilphusa in Boeotia, which was sacred to Apollo. (Hom. Hymn. in Apoll. 247; Strab. ix. p. 410, &c.; Apollod. iii. 7. § 3.)

2. A surname of the Erinnys by whom Ares became the father of the dragon which was slain by Cadmus. (Müller, Orchom. p. 142, 2d ed.) [L. S.]

TIMAEA (Τιμαία), wife of Agis II., king of Sparta. [Agis II.]

TIMAE'NETUS (Τιμαίνετος), a painter, whose picture of a wrestler, in the chamber on the left of the propylaea of the Acropolis at Athens, is mentioned by Pausanias (i. 22. §. 7). [P. S.]

TIMAEUS (Τίμαιος). 1. Of Tauromenium in Sicily, the celebrated historian, was the son of Andromachus, who collected the Naxian exiles, after their city had been destroyed by Dionysius, and settled them in the town of Tauromenium, which had been recently founded, and of which he became the tyrant, or supreme ruler, B. C. 358 (Diod. xvi. 7, comp. xiv. 59, with Wesseling's note). Andromachus received Timoleon at Tauromenium, when he came to Sicily in B. C. 344, and he was almost the only one of the tyrants whom Timoleon left in possession of their power (Plut. Tim. 10; Marcellin. Vit. Thuc. § 42). We do not know the exact date of the birth or death of Timaeus, but we can make an approximation to it, which cannot be very far from the truth. We know that his history was brought down to B. C. 264 (Polyb. i. 5), and that he attained the age of ninety-six (Lucian, Macrob. 22). Now as his father could not have been a very young man between B. C. 358 and 344, during which time he held the tyrannis of Tauromenium, we probably shall not be far wrong in placing the birth of Timaeus in B. C. 352, and his death in B. C. 256. We learn from Suidas that Timaeus received instruction from Philiscus, the Milesian, a disciple of Isocrates; but we have no further particulars of his life, except that he was banished from Sicily by Agathocles, and passed his exile at Athens, where he had lived fifty years when he wrote the thirty-fourth book of his history (Diod. Exc. ex libr. xxi. p. 560, Wess.; Polyb. Exc. Vat. pp. 389, 393; Plut. de Exil. p. 605, c). We are not informed in what year he was banished by Agathocles, but it may have been in the year that the latter crossed over to Africa (B. C. 310), since we are told that the tyrant, fearing an insurrection in his absence, either put to death or drove into exile all the persons whom he suspected to be hostile to his government. (Diod. xx. 4.)

Timaeus wrote the history of Sicily from the earliest times to B. C. 264, in which year Polybius commences the introduction to his work (Polyb. i. 5). This history was one of great extent. Suidas quotes the thirty-eighth book (s. v. ῷ τὸ ἱερὸν πῦρ), and there were probably many books after this. It appears to have been divided into several great sections, which are quoted with separate titles, though they in reality formed a part of one great whole. Thus Suidas speaks of Ἰταλικὰ καὶ Σικελικὰ in eight books, and of Ἑλληνικὰ καὶ Σικελικά. It has been conjectured that the Italica and Sicelica were the title of the early portion of the work, during which period the history of Sicily was closely connected with that of Italy; and that the second part of the work was called Sicelica and Hellenica, and comprised the period during which Sicily was brought more into contact with Greece by the Athenian invasions as well as by other events. The last five books contained the history of Agathocles (Diod. p. 561, Wess.). Timaeus wrote the history of Pyrrhus as a separate work (Dionys. i. 6; Cic. ad Fam. v. 12); but, as it falls within the time treated of in his general History, it may almost be regarded as an episode of the latter.

The value and authority of Timaeus as an historian have been most vehemently attacked by Polybius in many parts of his work. He maintains that Timaeus was totally deficient in the first qualifications of an historian, as he possessed no practical knowledge of war or politics, and never attempted to obtain by travelling a personal acquaintance with the places and countries he described; but on the contrary confined his residence to one spot for fifty years, and there gained all his knowledge from books alone. Polybius also remarks that Timaeus had so little power of observation, and so weak a judgment, that he was unable to give a correct account even of the things he had seen, and of the places he had visited; and adds that he was likewise so superstitious, that his work abounded with old traditions and well-known fables, while things of graver importance were entirely omitted (Polyb. lib. xii. with the Fragmenta Vaticana of his work). His ignorance of geography and natural history appears to have been very great, and Polybius frequently mentions his errors on these subjects (e. g. ii. 16, xii. 3, 5). But Polybius brings still graver charges against Timaeus. He accuses him of frequently stating wilful falsehoods, of indulging in all kinds of calumnies against the most distinguished men, such as Homer, Aristotle, and Theophrastus, and of attacking his personal enemies, such as Agathocles, in the most atrocious manner. These charges are repeated by Diodorus and other ancient writers, among whom Timaeus earned so bad a character by his slanders and calumnies, that he was nick-named Epitimaeus (Ἐπιτίμαιος), or the Fault-Finder (Athen. vi. p. 272, b; comp. Diod. v. 1, xiii. 90, Exc. xxi. p. 561, Wess.; Strab. xiv. p. 640). Lastly, Polybius censures the speeches in the history of Timaeus, as unsuitable to the speakers, and the times at which they are represented as delivered, and as marked by a scholastic, verbose, and inflated style of oratory.

Most of the charges of Polybius against Timaeus are unquestionably founded upon truth; but from the statements of other writers, and from the fragments which we possess of Timaeus's own work, we are led to conclude that Polybius has greatly exaggerated the defects of Timaeus, and omitted to mention his peculiar excellencies. Nay, several of the very points which Polybius regarded as great blemishes in his work, were, in reality, some of its greatest merits. The rationalising Polybius quite approved of the manner in which Ephorus and Theopompus dealt with the ancient myths, which they attempted, by stripping them of all their miracles and marvels, to turn into sober history; but it was one of the great merits of Timaeus, for which he is loudly denounced by Polybius, that he attempted to give the myths in their simplest and most genuine form, as related by the most ancient writers. There can be little doubt that if the early portion of the history of Timaeus had been preserved, we should be able to gain a more correct knowledge of many points than from the histories of Theopompus and Ephorus. Timaeus also collected the materials of his history with the greatest diligence and care, a fact which even Polybius is obliged to admit (Exc. Vat. p. 402, init.). He likewise paid very great attention to chronology, and was the first writer who introduced the practice of recording events by Olympiads, which was adopted by almost all subsequent writers of Greek history (Diod. v. 1). For this purpose he drew up a list of the Olympic conquerors, which is called by Suidas Ὀλυμπιονῖκαι ἢ χρονικὰ πραξίδια. Cicero formed a very different opinion of the merits of Timaeus from that of Polybius. He says (de Orat. ii. 14):—"Timaeus, quantum judicare possim, longe eruditissimus, et rerum copia et sententiarum varietate abundantissimus, et ipsa compositione verborum non impolitus, magnam eloquentiam ad scribendum attulit, sed nullum usum forensem." (Comp. Cic. Brut. 95.)

In addition to the Sicilian history and the Olympionicae, Suidas assigns two other works to Timaeus, neither of which is mentioned by any other writer, namely, An Account of Syria, its cities and kings, in three books (περὶ Συρίας καὶ τῶν αὐτῆς πόλεων καὶ βασιλέων βιβλία γ′), and a collection of rhetorical arguments in sixty-eight books (Συλλογὴ ῥητορικῶν ἀφορμῶν), which was more probably written, as Ruhnken has remarked, by Timaeus the sophist.

The fragments of Timaeus have been collected by Göller, in his De Situ et Origine Syracusarum, Lips. 1818, pp. 209—306, and by Car. and Theod. Müller, in the Fragmenta Historicorum Graecorum, Paris, 1841, pp. 193—233, both of which works also contain dissertations on the life and writings of Timaeus. (Compare Vossius, De Historicis Graecis, pp. 117—120, ed. Westermann; Clinton, Fast. Hell. vol. iii. pp. 489, 490.)

2. Of Locri, in Italy, a Pythagorean philosopher, is said to have been a teacher of Plato. (Cic. de Fin. v. 29, de Re Publ. i. 10.) There is an extant work, bearing his name, written in the Doric dialect, and entitled περὶ ψυχᾶς κόσμου καὶ φύσιος; but its genuineness is very doubtful, and it is in all probability nothing more than an abridgment of Plato's dialogue of Timaeus. This work was first printed in a Latin translation by Valla, along with several other works, Venice, 1488 and 1498. It was first printed in Greek at Paris, 1555, edited by Nogarola. It is also printed in many editions of Plato, and in Gale's Opuscula Mythologica, Physica et Ethica, Cambridge, 1671, and Amsterdam, 1688. The Greek text was published with a French translation by the Marquis d'Argens, Berlin, 1762. The last and best edition is by J. J. de Gelder, Leyden, 1836. (Comp. Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 93, foll.) Suidas says (s. v.) that Timaeus wrote the life of Pythagoras, but as no other writer mentions such a work by the Locrian Timaeus, it is not improbable that this life of Pythagoras was simply a portion of the history of Timaeus of Tauromenium, who must have spoken of the philosopher in that portion of his work which related to the early history of Italy.

3 and 4. Of Crotona and Paros, Pythagorean philosophers. (Iamblich. Vit. Pyth. cap. extr.; Clem. Alex. Strom. p. 604; Theodoret. ii. Therap. p. 36.)

5. Of Cyzicus, a disciple of Plato, endeavoured to seize the supreme power in the state (Athen. xi. p. 509, a.). Diogenes Laërtius (iii. 46) mentions Timolaus of Cyzicus and not Timaeus among the disciples of Plato; and hence it has been conjectured that there is a corruption in the name, either in Athenaeus or Diogenes.

6. The Sophist, wrote a Lexicon to Plato, addressed to a certain Gentianus, which is still extant. The time at which this Timaeus lived is quite uncertain. Ruhnken places him in the third century of the Christian aera, which produced so many ardent admirers of the Platonic philosophy, such as Porphyry, Longinus, Plotinus, &c. The Lexicon is very brief, and bears the title Τιμαίου σοφιστοῦ ἐκ τῶν τοῦ Πλάτωνος λέξεων, from which it might have been inferred that it is an extract from a larger work, had not Photius (Cod. 151), who had read it, described it as a very short work (βραχὺ ποιημάτιον ἐν ἑνὶ λόγῳ). It is evident, however, that the work, as it stands, has received several interpolations, especially in explanations of words occurring in Herodotus. Notwithstanding these interpolations the work is one of great value, and the explanations of words are some of the very best which have come down to us from the ancient grammarians. It was printed for the first time, from a manuscript at Paris, edited by Ruhnken, Leyden, 1754, with a very valuable commentary, and again, with many improvements, Leyden, 1789. There are also two more recent editions by Koch, Leipsig, 1828, and 1833. The work on rhetorical arguments in sixty-eight books (Συλλογὴ ῥητορικῶν ἀφορμῶν) which Suidas assigns to Timaeus of Tauromenium, was more probably written by Timaeus, the author of the Lexicon to Plato, as has been already remarked. (Ruhnken's Preface to his edition of the Lexicon.)

7. The Mathematician, is quoted by Pliny (H. N. v. 9, xvi. 22, ii. 8). Suidas says that Timaeus, the Locrian [No. 2] wrote Μαθηματικά, but whether this was really the work of the Locrian or not, cannot be determined. The fragment on the Pleiades, preserved by the Scholiast on the Iliad (xviii. 486), and usually assigned to Timaeus of Tauromenium, is supposed by Göller to belong to the mathematician.

TIMA'GENES (Τιμαγένης). Three persons of this name are mentioned by Suidas. 1. Timagenes, the rhetorician (ῥήτωρ), of Alexandria, the son of the king's banker, was taken prisoner by Gabinius (B. C. 55), and brought to Rome, where he was redeemed from captivity by Faustus, the son of Sulla. He taught rhetoric at Rome in the time of Pompey, and afterwards under Augustus, but losing his school on account of his freedom of speech, he retired to an estate at Tusculum. He died at Dabanum, a town of Osrhoëne in Mesopotamia. He wrote many books, the titles of which are not given by Suidas. 2. Timagenes, the historian, wrote a Periplus of the whole sea, in five books. 3. Timagenes or Timogenes, of Miletus, an historian or an orator, wrote on the Pontic Heracleia and its distinguished men, in five books, and likewise epistles. Besides these three persons, we have mention of a fourth (4), Timagenes, the Syrian, who wrote on the history of the Gauls. (Plut. de Fluv. c. 6.) Of these four writers it is probable that the rhetorician, the historian who wrote the Periplus, and the Syrian, are the same. [Nos. 1, 2 and 4.] Of the historian we have an account given us by the two Senecas, which differs from what Suidas says respecting the grammarian, but does not really contradict the statement of the lexicographer. It is related by the Senecas that Timagenes after his captivity first followed the trade of a cook, and afterwards of a litter or sedan bearer (lecticarius), but rose from these humble occupations to be the intimate acquaintance of Augustus. He afterwards offended the emperor by some caustic remarks on his wife and family, and was in consequence forbidden the imperial palace. Timagenes in revenge burnt his historical works, in one of which he gave an account of the deeds of Augustus, and which he had probably written at the request of the emperor. Augustus, however, did not punish him any further, but allowed him to retain the protection of the powerful friends he had formerly enjoyed. He found an asylum in the house of Asinius Pollio. (M. Senec.

Controv. 34 ; L. Senec. de Ira, iii. 23, Ep. 91.) Plutarch also tells us (De Adulatore et Amico, c. 27, p. 68, b), that Timagenes lost the friendship of Augustus by an imprudent use of his tongue.

By putting together the accounts of Suidas and the Senecas, we obtain the following particulars respecting the life of Timagenes. He was a native of Alexandria, from which place he was carried as a prisoner to Rome, where he was first employed as a slave in menial offices, but being liberated by Faustus Sulla, the son of the dictator, he opened a school of rhetoric, in which he taught with great reputation and success. (Comp. Hor. Ep. i. 19. 15.) His fame gained him the friendship of many distinguished men, and among others of the emperor Augustus, who induced him to write a history of his exploits. But having offended Augustus by sarcastic remarks upon his family, he was forbidden the palace; whereupon he burnt his historical works, gave up his rhetorical school, and retired from Rome to the house of his friend Asinius Pollio at Tusculum. After he had discontinued writing a long while, he resumed his pen (Quintil. x. 1), and composed those historical works upon which his fame was founded. How long he resided at Tusculum we do not know, nor the reason for which he quitted this retreat, but he afterwards went to the East, and died at Dabanum in Mesopotamia. It is probable that it was from the place of his death that he was called the Syrian by the author of the treatise de Fluviis (c. 6). The works of Timagenes mentioned by ancient writers are, 1. Περίπλους. (Suidas, s. v. Τιμαγένης.) It is probably from this work that Strabo quotes (xv. p. 711). 2. Περὶ βασιλέων, appears to have contained a history of Alexander the Great and his successors. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Μιλύαι; Curt. ix. 5. § 21; Joseph. c. Apion. ii. 6 ; Plut. Pomp. c. 49). 3. On the Gauls (Plut. l. c.; Strab. iv. p. 188 ; Amm. Marc. xv. 9. § 2.) (Bonamy, Recherches sur l'historien Timagène, in the Mém. de l'Academie des Inscr. vol. xiii. p. 35, foll.; Schwab, Disputatio de Livio et Timagene, historiarum scriptoribus, aemulis, Stuttg. 1834; Vossius, De Historicis Graecis, p. 195, foll., ed. Westermann, who makes the rhetorician, the historian and the Syrian three distinct persons ; Clinton, Fast. Hellen. vol. iii. p. 624, who supposes the rhetorician and the historian to be two distinct persons, but makes the Syrian the same as the historian.)

TIMAGE'NIDAS or TIMAGE'NIDES (Τιμαγενίδας, Τιμαγενίδης), a Theban, son of Herpys, was one of the principal adherents of the Persian cause in the invasion of Xerxes. Shortly before the battle of Plataea, Timagenides advised Mardonius to occupy the passes of Cithaeron, and so to intercept the re-inforcements and supplies which were coming in through them to the enemy. The advice was taken, and the Persians succeeded in cutting off a convoy of provisions with 500 beasts of burden. After their victory at Plataea the Greeks advanced against Thebes, and demanded that the chief traitors to the national cause, Timagenides among the number, should be given up to them. The Thebans at first refused in spite of the ravages which their land suffered, but at length they consented at the instigation of Timagenides himself. It appears that the culprits expected to be brought to an open trial, at which they hoped to have recourse effectually to the expedient of bribery. To prevent this, however, Pausanias carried them off to Corinth, and there put them to death without any judicial ceremony. (Herod. ix. 38, 86—88 ; Paus. vii. 10.) [E. E.]

TIMA'GORAS (Τιμαγόρας), historical. 1. A Tegean, was one of the ambassadors who were sent, in B. C. 430, to ask the king of Persia to aid the Peloponnesians against Athens. On their way through Thrace they were seized by SADOCUS at the instigation of the Athenian envoys at the court of Sitalces, and, having been taken to Athens, were there put to death. (Thuc. ii. 67.)

2. A citizen of Cyzicus, and son of Athenagoras. Having been driven into exile by his political opponents of the democratic party, he took refuge at the court of Pharnabazus, the satrap of the Persian provinces near the Hellespont, by whom he was sent to Lacedaemon, in B. C. 412, to urge that a fleet should be despatched to support the Greek cities in his satrapy in their intended revolt from Athens. (Thuc. viii. 6, 39.) [PHARNABAZUS, No. 2.]

3. An Athenian, was the colleague of Leon as ambassador from Athens, in B. C. 367, to the Persian court. [LEON, No. 6.] In this mission he spent four years, and had the address to adapt his conduct to what he perceived to be the king's inclination, separating himself altogether from Leon, and taking part with Pelopidas, the Theban envoy. His supple compliance and his treachery in revealing state-secrets purchased for him the bounty of Artaxerxes, but on his return home he was impeached by Leon, and put to death. (Xen. Hell. vii. 1. §§ 33, &c.; Plut. Artax. 22, Pelop. 30; Demosth. de Fals. Leg. pp. 383, 400 ; Ath. ii. p. 48, d, e; Val. Max. vi. 3, ext. 2.) Athenaeus (l. c.) speaks of a Cretan, called Timagoras, who also enjoyed the Persian king's favour and was a distinct person from the Athenian of the same name. See, however, Casaub. ad loc.

4. A Rhodian, was placed in command of five ships, which his countrymen sent to Chalcis, in B. C. 171, to co-operate with C. Lucretius in the war with Perseus. (Polyb. xxvii. 6.)

5. In the same passage of Polybius it is stated that, while these five ships sailed to Chalcis, one more was sent to Tenedus under a commander also named Timagoras, who fell in with and captured the crew of a ship which was conveying Diophanes on an embassy from Perseus to Antiochus Epiphanes. Diophanes himself escaped. [E. E.]

TIMA'GORAS (Τιμαγόρας), of Chalcis, a painter, contemporary with Panaenus, whom he defeated in a contest for the prize of painting, at the Pythian games. Timagoras afterwards celebrated his victory in a poem. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 9. s. 35.) [P. S.]

TIMANDRA (Τιμάνδρα), a daughter of Tyndareus and Leda, and the wife of Echemus, by whom she became the mother of Euandrus. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 6 ; Paus. viii. 5. § 1 ; Serv. ad Aen. viii. 130.) Another mythical personage of this name is mentioned by Antonius Liberalis (5). [L. S.]

TIMANTHES (Τιμάνθης), an athlete of Cleonae. Pausanias relates of him that, when he had ceased to be a competitor at the games, he used still to make daily trial of his strength by bending a huge bow. At length, however, having been absent for some time from his own city, he found on his return that he was no longer able to perform the feat, whereupon he burnt himself to death through mortification. There was a statue of him at Olympia, the work of Myron. (Paus. vi. 8.) [E. E.]

TIMANTHES (Τιμάνθης), artists. 1. The celebrated Greek painter, contemporary with Zeuxis and Parrhasius (about Ol. 95, B. C. 400; Plin. H. N. xxxv. 10. s. 36. § 3), is said by Quintilian (ii. 13) to have been a native of Cythnos, but Eustathius (ad Il. xxiv. 163, p. 1343. 60) makes him a Sicyonian: these testimonies may be reconciled by supposing him to have been a native of Cythnos, and to have belonged to the Sicyonian school of painting. Our information respecting his personal history is confined to the facts of his having contended with Parrhasius and Colotes; the works which he painted on those occasions will be mentioned presently. Native genius, power of expression and suggestion, and entire mastery of the resources of his art, seem to have been the chief qualities which characterised Timanthes. (Plin. l. c. § 6.) His pictures were distinguished, Pliny tells us, from those of all other painters by suggesting more than they expressed; and, striking as was the art displayed in them, they showed a genius which surpassed that art. (Atque in unius hujus operibus intelligitur plus semper, quam pingitur: et cum sit ars summa, ingenium tamen ultra artem est). Only five of his works are mentioned; but they are evidently masterpieces, and one of them involves one of the most interesting questions in the history of art.

(1) The work referred to, and that which appears to have been regarded by the ancients as his masterpiece, is the celebrated picture of the sacrifice of Iphigeneia, which he painted in competition with Colotes of Teos (Quintil. l. c.); and the question involved in it is, whether Timanthes displayed consummate skill, or was guilty of a mere trick, in painting Agamemnon with his face hidden in his mantle. It is evident that the ancients regarded this stroke of art with the most unbounded admiration. Pliny tells us that it was "oratorum laudibus celebrata;" and it is praised also by Cicero (Orat. 22), Quintilian (l. c.), and Valerius Maximus (viii. 11. ext. 6). Unfortunately, however, these writers display in this, as in other cases, their ignorance of the true principles of art, by giving an unsound reason for their right judgment of the work. The picture, they tell us, showed Iphigeneia, standing by the altar, surrounded, among the assistants, by Calchas, whose prophetic voice had demanded her sacrifice, and whose hand was about to complete it, Ulysses, who had brought her from her home, and Menelaus, her father's brother, all manifesting different degrees of grief, so that, when the artist had painted the sorrow of Calchas, and the deeper sorrow of Ulysses, and had added all his powers to express the woe of Menelaus, his resources were exhausted, and, unable to give a powerful expression to the agony of the father, he covered his head with a veil. In the present state of aesthetic criticism, it is hardly necessary to point out the absurdity of thus making out Timanthes to be the Epimetheus of painting. The very writers, who have given this false judgment, let fall expressions, borrowed doubtless from their Greek authorities, which intimate the true reason of the manner in which Timanthes painted Agamemnon: "patris ipsius vultum velavit, quem digne non poterat ostendere," says Pliny; "non reperiens quo digno modo patris vultum posset exprimere," says Quintilian. In one word, it was his knowledge of aesthetic principles, not his want of artistic power, that dictated to Timanthes this mode of representation. His conduct has been most admirably vindicated by Fuseli, in reply to the (in this case) mistaken judgment of Reynolds, and the shallow flippancy of Falconet (Reynolds, Discourse viii.; Fuseli, Lecture i. vol. ii. pp. 44—58, in Knowles's Life and Writings of Fuseli). The whole of Fuseli's remarks should be read; but the following extract will perhaps convey their spirit sufficiently. "The subject of Timanthes was the immolation of Iphigenia; Iphigenia was the principal figure, and her form, her resignation, or her anguish, the painter's principal task; the figure of Agamemnon, however important, is merely accessory, and no more necessary to make the subject a completely tragic one, than that of Clytemnestra the mother, no more than that of Priam, to impress us with sympathy at the death of Polyxena. It is therefore a misnomer of the French critic, to call Agamemnon 'the hero' of the subject.

"Neither the French nor the English critic appears to me to have comprehended the real motive of Timanthes, as contained in the words, 'decere, pro dignitate, and digne,' in the passages of Tully, Quintilian, and Pliny; they ascribe to impotence what was the forbearance of judgment. Timanthes felt like a father: he did not hide the face of Agamemnon, because it was beyond the power of his art, not because it was beyond the possibility, but because it was beyond the dignity of expression, because the inspiring feature of paternal affection at that moment, and the action which of necessity must have accompanied it, would either have destroyed the grandeur of the character, and the solemnity of the scene, or subjected the painter with the majority of his judges to the imputation of insensibility. He must either have represented him in tears, or convulsed at the flash of the raised dagger, forgetting the chief in the father, or shown him absorbed by despair, and in that state of stupefaction, which levels all features and deadens expression; he might indeed have chosen a fourth mode, he might have exhibited him fainting and palsied in the arms of his attendants, and by this confusion of male and female character, merited the applause of every theatre at Paris. But Timanthes had too true a sense of nature to expose a father's feelings, or to tear a passion to rags; nor had the Greeks yet learnt of Rome to steel the face. If he made Agamemnon bear his calamity as a man, he made him also feel it as a man. It became the leader of Greece to sanction the ceremony with his presence, it did not become the father to see his daughter beneath the dagger's point: the same nature that threw a real mantle over the face of Timoleon, when he assisted at the punishment of his brother, taught Timanthes to throw an imaginary one over the face of Agamemnon; neither height nor depth, but propriety of expression was his aim."

The question as to whether Timanthes invented this mode of representation, or whether he borrowed it from Euripides, is altogether beside the mark; and, in raising such a question, Falconet merely showed his ignorance of the true relation between pictorial and poetic invention. It may be worth while, however, to mention that Eustathius supposed the idea to have been suggested to Timanthes by a line of the Iliad (xxiv. 163). An imitation of the picture of Timanthes was found on the wall of a house at Pompeii. (Mus. Borb. iv. 3.; Pompeii, vol. ii. p. 165.) (2) With his picture of the contest of Ajax and Ulysses for the arms of Achilles, he gained a victory over Parrhasius, respecting which, and the arrogant remark of Parrhasius on the occasion, see PARRHASIUS, p. 128, b. (3) The picture of the death of Palamedes at Ephesus, mentioned by Photius (Bibl. Cod. 190, vol. i. p. 146, b. 27, ed. Bekker) is ascribed to Timanthes by Tzetzes (Chil. viii. 198). (4) A picture of his was preserved at Rome, in the temple of Peace, which Pliny describes in the following words: Pinxit et heroas, absolutissimi operis, arte ipsa complexus vires pingendi. (5) Lastly, as a striking example of his skill and invention, Pliny mentions his picture of a sleeping Cyclops, of a very small size (parvula tabula), in which the magnitude of the figure was indicated by the insertion of some satyrs, measuring his thumb with a thyrsus. Timanthes is mentioned by Cicero (Brut. 22) as one of the painters who used only four colours. The sense, in which this is to be understood, is explained in the Dictionary of Antiquities, s. v. Colores.

2. A painter, contemporary with Aratus. His picture of the battle of Pellene, in which Aratus defeated the Aetolians (Ol. 135. 1, B. C. 240), is praised by Plutarch (Arat. 32). [P. S.]

TIMA'RCHIDES, a freedman and an accensus of Verres, was one of the most villainous instruments of the oppressions of Verres. (Cic. Verr. ii. 28, 53, 54, iii. 66, v. 45.)

TIMA'RCHIDES and TI'MOCLES (Τιμαρχίδης, Τιμοκλῆς), of Athens, the sons of Polycles, have already been spoken of under POLYCLES, p. 459, a., where their statues of Asclepius and Athena are mentioned, and their date is discussed; for it is, of course, dependent on the date assigned to Polycles. In addition to the remarks in that article, it should be observed that, in the passage of Pliny referred to (H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4. § 10), not only are Polycles and the sons of Timarchides mentioned as the makers of statues in the portico of Octavia, but also Timarchides himself, as the maker of a statue of Apollo, holding the cithara, in his temple, which formed a part of those buildings. Moreover, it is most probable that the passage, correctly read, contains some further information about "the sons of Timarchides," who are nameless in the ordinary text, as established by Harduin. The old text had "Item Polycles et Dionysius, Timarchidis filii," &c.; and, although the first four words are not contained in the MSS. used by Harduin, who therefore rejected them, they are found, with a slight variation, in the Bamberg MS., which gives "Idem polycles et dionysius timarcidis, fili," i. e. filius. The last word is confirmed by the Munich MS., which has "machidis filius." Hence it would appear to be probable that the true reading is "Idem Polycles (who had been mentioned in the preceding sentence) et Dionysius, Timarchidis filius," or, as Jan proposes to read it, "Iidem Polycles et Dionysius (for the latter also is mentioned in the preceding sentence), Timarchidis filii." (Sillig's edition of Pliny and Jan's Supplement.)

Slight as is the difference between the two readings, they have a very different effect on the succession of this family of artists. According to the former, we have only to add to the genealogy the name of Dionysius, thus:—

Polycles
- Timocles
- Timarchides
  - Dionysius.

But then we have the somewhat improbable result of a grandfather and grandson working together on the same statue. If, on the other hand, we adopt the reading of Jan, and combine it with the statement of Pausanias, that Timocles and Timarchides were the sons of Polycles, and if we still identify this Polycles with the Polycles of Pliny, the result is the absurdity that "the same Polycles" was both the son and the father of Timarchides. Either, therefore, we must place another Timarchides at the beginning of the genealogy, thus—

Timarchides
- Polycles
  - Timocles
  - Timarchides:
- Dionysius

or, we must reject the word idem or iidem (restoring, perhaps, item in its place), and thus obtain another Polycles, the brother of Dionysius: or, lastly, the identification of the Polycles of Pausanias and Pliny may be given up, and it may be supposed that we have two different and somewhat distinct portions of this artistic family, namely,

Polycles
- Timocles
- Timarchides,

the artists mentioned by Pausanias, and Timocles and Timarchides (brothers)

- Polycles
- Dionysius

those mentioned by Pliny. In this position the question must be left for the solution of other scholars, and for the instruction of students in the difficulties of criticism. It must, however, be remembered that the text cannot be regarded as fixed by the authority of the Bamberg MS.

The works of Timarchides and Timocles at Rome were in marble. Pausanias does not specify the material of their statues which he mentions. Pliny, however, includes Timarchides in his list of those statuaries in bronze, who made athletas et armatos et venatores sacrificantesque. (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 34.) [P. S.]

TIMARCHUS (Τίμαρχος), historical. 1. An Athenian general, who, in conjunction with Leotrophides, was sent in command of an expedition against Megara, in B. C. 408. (Diod. xiii. 65.)

2. An Athenian politician, the son of Arizelus, a contemporary of Demosthenes and Aeschines. He was an active orator, and took a conspicuous part in public affairs, being the author of a considerable number of decrees. One of these forbade the exportation of arms or marine stores for the service of Philip of Macedon, under pain of death. Timarchus was, however, a man of the most profligate and abandoned habits. He joined Demosthenes in impeaching Aeschines, on the score of malversation in the embassy to Philip. Aeschines, however, anticipated him, and brought him to trial under a law of Solon, by which any one who had been guilty of such flagrant excesses as Timarchus, was forbidden to appear before the public assembly. There are different accounts as to the result of this trial. According to some, Timarchus was condemned and disfranchised; according to others, he put an end to his life even before the trial was terminated. (Plut. Vit. X. Orat. Aesch.; Prooem. ad Aesch. adv. Tim.) Timarchus had previously been impeached by Aristogeiton, and prevented from being entrusted with a public commission. (Suidas s. v.; Harpocr. s. v. Αὐτοκλείδης and Θέρσανδρος; Tzetzes, Chiliad. vi. 47, &c.; Aeschines Κατὰ Τιμάρχου, with Taylor's preface.)

3. A favourite of Antiochus, the son of Antiochus the Great, by whom he was appointed satrap of Babylon. He administered the affairs of his province badly, and having made a stand against Demetrius Soter, was overpowered and put to death by him. (Appian. Syr. 45, 47.)

4. A tyrant of Miletus, who was overthrown by Antiochus, the son of Antiochus Soter. The deliverance seems to have been a most welcome one, as the Milesians, in consequence of it, gave to Antiochus the surname Θεός. (Appian. Syr. 65.) [C. P. M.]

TIMARCHUS (Τίμαρχος), literary. 1. A friend and disciple of Aristotle, left by him as one of the guardians of Nicanor. (Diog. Laërt. v. 12.)

2. A Greek grammarian, who lived in the reign of Ptolemaeus Euergetes. (Suid. s. v. Ἀπολλώνιος.)

3. A Greek grammarian, of uncertain date. Athenaeus (xi. p. 501) quotes from the fourth book of a work by him, περὶ τοῦ Ἐρατοσθένους Ἑρμοῦ. He also wrote upon Homer (Schol. ad Il. φ. 122), and on Euripides (Schol. ad Eurip. Med. 1). If the reading in Harpocration (s. v. Ἀργᾶς), is correct, Timarchus was a native of Rhodes, and was a writer on glosses. But as we find elsewhere mention of a Rhodian named Timachidas, who was a glossographer, some critics propose to alter the reading in Harpocration. The reason is not a very convincing one. (Vossius, de Hist. Gr. p. 143; Ruhnken, Opuscula, p. 205.) [C. P. M.]

TIMARCHUS, artist. [CEPHISODOTUS, No. 2, p. 670.]

TIMARCHUS, CLAU'DIUS, of Crete, was accused in the senate in A. D. 62, on which occasion Paetus Thrasea made a celebrated speech, the substance of which is given by Tacitus (Ann. xv. 20).

TIMA'RETE (Τιμαρέτη), a female painter, the daughter of that Micon, whom Pliny distinguishes from the celebrated painter Micon, by the epithet of minor (H. N. xxxv. 9. s. 35). Pliny also tells us that she painted a panel-picture of Diana, in a very ancient style of the art (antiquissimae picturae), which was preserved at Ephesus. (H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 43.) [P. S.]

TIMA'SION (Τιμασίων), a citizen of Dardanus in the Troad, appears to have been a soldier of fortune, and served in Asia under CLEARCHUS and DERCYLLIDAS. He was exiled from his native city,—at what period we do not know,—and was one of those who entered the service of Cyrus the Younger. In the retreat of the 10,000, after the treacherous arrest of the five generals by Tissaphernes, Timasion was chosen commander in the room of Clearchus, and he and Xenophon, as the youngest of the new leaders, were appointed to command the rear-guard. When the Cyreans had reached Cotyora, and were waiting there for the transports which the Sinopian envoys had promised them, Timasion and Thorax, a Boeotian, took advantage of the report of Xenophon's project for the establishment of a Greek colony on the Euxine, to represent to some merchants of Sinope and Heracleia that the only way to prevent it was to furnish pay as well as ships to the army. The two cities in question, on this being reported to them, not only engaged to do what was desired, but even bribed Timasion to persuade the Greeks to accept the terms, and to sail away home. Afterwards, however, when they knew that Xenophon had abandoned his project, they would not fulfil their promise of paying the soldiers, and Timasion accordingly and the other generals, who had been involved in the same intrigues with him, and had ventured to hold out to the men brilliant prospects of abundant funds, tried to persuade Xenophon to resume his design. He refused, however, to bring the question at all before the army, and they then attempted to gain over the officers of their respective divisions, but a report of what they were about spread among the troops, and their indignant opposition defeated the plan. When the Cyreans separated into three divisions at Heracleia, Timasion continued with the one under Xenophon, and when it was advancing to rescue the Arcadians from the Bithynians, whose country they had attempted to plunder, and who had hemmed them round on a hill where they had taken refuge, he was sent forward with the cavalry to reconnoitre; and shortly after we find him again commanding the cavalry in the battle in which the Greeks defeated the forces of Pharnabazus and the Bithynians. On the discovery of the inability of COERATADAS to perform the promises by which he had induced the Cyreans to elect him as their leader, while the army was lying without the walls of Byzantium, Timasion, in opposition to the other generals, wished to cross over again to Asia, in the hope of returning to his native city with the treasures which we find he had collected in his expeditions. He entered with the rest of the army into the service of Seuthes [SEUTHES, No. 2], and took part in the hard winter campaign which reestablished the Thracian prince in his kingdom; and when the disputes arose about the pay, which Seuthes wished to evade, and Heracleides, the instigator of the prince, endeavoured to cause disunion among the generals, Timasion positively refused to act apart from Xenophon. He, no doubt, crossed over to Asia with the army, when it entered into the Spartan service; and perhaps he then took an early opportunity to return home to Dardanus. (Xen. Anab. iii. 1. § 47, 2. § 37, v. 6. §§ 19—37, vi. 1. § 32, 3. §§ 14, 22, 5. § 28, vii. 1. § 40, 2. §§ 1, 2, 3. §§ 18, 46, 5. §§ 4, 10.) [E. E.]

TIMASI'THEUS or TIMESI'THEUS (Τιμασίθεος, Τιμησίθεος), a citizen of Trapezus, and a proxenus of the Mossynoeci, between whom and the Cyrean Greeks he acted as interpreter, when the latter wished to make a treaty with the barbarians, and to obtain a passage through their country. (Xen. Anab. v. 4. §§ 2, &c.) [E. E.]

cratium at the Olympic and Pythian games, and was also distinguished as a brave soldier. He was one of the partisans of the Athenian ISAGORAS, when he seized the Acropolis, with the help of Cleomenes. The citadel was besieged by the Athenians, and Timasitheus was one of those who fell into their hands, and were put to death. Pausanias mentions his statue at Olympia, the work of Ageladas, the Argive. (Herod. v. 72; Paus. vi. 8.) [E. E.]

TIMA'SIUS, FL., a distinguished general in the reign of Theodosius I. He was appointed commander of the cavalry in A. D. 386, and of the infantry in 388, and he was made consul along with Promotus in 389. In 391 Timasius served under Theodosius in his campaign against the barbarians in Macedonia, and in 394 he was made commander of the Roman troops in the war against Eugenius. After the death of Theodosius and the accession of Arcadius, Eutropius, who had unbounded influence over the latter, resolved to ruin all persons of influence in the reign of the late emperor. Timasius was one of his first victims. He was accused of aspiring to the empire, and banished to the Oasis in Africa in 396. (Zosim. iv. 45, 57, v. 8, 9; Sozomen, viii. 7; Suidas, s. v.; Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. v., and the authorities there quoted.)

TIME'SIAS (Τιμησίας) or TIME'SIUS (Τιμήσιος, Herod.), of Clazomenae, was the first founder of the colony of Abdera in Thrace. He is praised both by Plutarch and Aelian as a wise and virtuous man. Eusebius places his colony in the 31st Ol., B. C. 656. Timesias was expelled by the Thracians, but he was afterwards worshipped as a hero at Abdera by the Teians, who at a later time founded a second colony in that place. (Herod. i. 168; Plut. Reip. ger. Praecepta, p. 812, a; Aelian. V. H. xii. 9.)

TIMESI'THEUS (Τιμησίθεος), a tragic poet, mentioned only by Suidas (s. v.) who gives us the following titles of his plays:—Δαναΐδες β', Ἕκτορος λύτρα, Ἡρακλῆς, Ἰξίων, Καπανεύς, Μέμνων, Μνηστῆρες, Ζηνὸς γοναί, Ἑλένης ἀπαίτησις, Ορέστης [καὶ] Πυλάδης, Κάστωρ καὶ Πολυδεύκης. In the last title but one, the καὶ, which is not in the text of Suidas, should evidently be inserted, for it cannot be supposed that Ὀρέστης and Πυλάδης were two distinct plays, any more than Κάστωρ and Πολυδεύκης. Meineke proposes to unite also two of the other titles, so as to make Ἑλένης μνηστῆρες a single play (Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. p. 391), but Welcker judiciously observes that the μνηστῆρες may refer to the suitors of Penelope quite as probably as to those of Helen, and that, in either case, the title is quite sufficient as it stands, without robbing another play in order to improve it. Welcker has also remarked, and probably with as much truth as ingenuity, that some of the above titles seem to be those of satyric dramas; for the Ζηνὸς γοναί cannot possibly be a tragedy, and Ἡρακλῆς, standing alone, without any epithet, indicates a satyric drama rather than a tragedy; and moreover, the Ζηνὸς γοναί and the Ἑλένης ἀπαίτησις both stand out of the alphabetical order. The same scholar shows that there is reason to think that the Δαναΐδες was not founded on the corresponding play of Aeschylus, but contained a different version of the story, which had already been adopted by Archilochus, and according to which Lynceus avenged his brethren by slaying Danaus and his daughters (Jo. Malal. Chron. iv. init.; Schol. Eurip. Hec. 869, Serv. ad Virg. Aen. x. 497). The plan of the Ἑλένης ἀπαίτησις may be conjectured to have been borrowed from Sophocles, and that of the Ἰξίων from Euripides; shortly after whom, so far as any conclusion can be drawn from the titles, Timesitheus appears to have lived (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 325; Welcker, die Griech. Tragöd. pp. 1046—1048; Kayser, Hist. Crit. Trag. Graec. p. 327; Wagner, Frag. Trag. Graec. pp. 144, 145, in Didot's Bibliotheca.) [P. S.]

TIME'SIUS. [TIMESIAS.]

TIMO (Τιμώ), one of the inferior priestesses in the temple of Demeter at Paros, offered to betray Paros to Miltiades. (Herod. vi. 134.) [MILTIADES.]

TIMO'CHARES, was the author of a work on Antiochus, which is cited by Eusebius (Praep. Ev. ix. 35, p. 265). Another writer of the same name is mentioned by the Scholiast on Aratus (Phaen. 269).

TIMO'CHARIS (Τιμόχαρις), a statuary of Eleuthernae, in Crete, whose name occurs in an inscription, found at Astypalaea, as the maker of a statue dedicated to Asclepius, by a certain Archimenidus, the son of Arithmius. The style of the letters of the inscription is that of the period of the Roman dominion in Greece. (Böckh, Corp. Inscrip. Addend. vol. ii. p. 1098, No. 2491, b.; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 445, 446, 2d ed.) His name also occurs in one of the inscriptions found by Ross, at Lindos in Rhodes, as the maker of a statue of Nicasidamus, priest of Athena Lindia (Rhein. Mus. 1846, vol. iv. p. 169), and again in another Rhodian inscription, also discovered by Ross, as the maker of a dedicatory statue of a certain Xenophantus. (Ross, Hellenika, pt. ii. p. 108.) [P. S.]

TIMOCLEIA (Τιμόκλεια), a woman of Thebes, at the capture of which by Alexander the Great, in B. C. 335, her house was broken into and pillaged by a body of Thracians in the Macedonian service. She was herself violated by their commander, who then asked her whether she had not gold or silver concealed somewhere. Answering in the affirmative, she led him to a well in her garden, where she pretended to have thrown her chief treasures when the city was taken, and, while he was stooping to look, she pushed him in, and killed him. Hereupon she was brought by the Thracians before Alexander, and exhibited so high a spirit and so noble a bearing in the interview, that the king ordered her to be set at liberty with her children. (Plut. Alex. 12.) [E. E.]

TIMOCLES (Τιμοκλῆς). 1. A tragic poet of uncertain date, who is distinguished from the comic poet (No. 2) by Athenaeus (ix. p. 407, b.) in the following words, Τιμοκλῆς ὁ τῆς κωμῳδίας ποιητής, ἦν δὲ καὶ τραγῳδίας, which Schweighäuser has unaccountably misunderstood, as if they implied the identity of the comic and the tragic poet, whereas they mean "Timocles the comic poet, but there was also a tragic" (poet of the same name). There is, however, no other mention of this poet; for, although a quotation from Sophocles in Plutarch (Timol. 36) is ascribed by some MSS. to Timocles, it is so evident that the latter reading may have arisen, according to a frequent and well-known error of transcription, out of a confusion with the word Τιμολέοντος just before, that the balance of probability is in favour of the common reading, and accordingly the passage is placed by Dindorf and Ahrens among the fragments of Sophocles (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 325; Welcker, die Griech. Tragöd. p. 1100; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. p. 430; Wagner, Frag. Com. Graec. p. 146, in Didot's Bibliotheca).

2. A distinguished Athenian comic poet of the Middle Comedy, who lived at a period when the revival of political energy, in consequence of the encroachments of Philip, restored to the Middle Comedy much of the vigour and real aim of the Old, is conspicuous for the freedom with which he discussed public men and measures, as well as for the number of his dramas, and the purity of his style, in which scarcely any departures from the best standards of Attic diction can be detected. His time is indicated by several allusions in his plays, especially to the Attic orators and statesmen. Like Antiphanes, he made sarcastic allusions to the vehement spirit and rhetorical boldness of Demosthenes, whom he also attacked, with Hyperides, and the other orators who had received money from Harpalus. (Pseudo-Plut. Vit. X. Orat. p. 845, b.; Timoc. Heroës, ap. Ath. vi. p. 224, a., Delus or Delius, ap. Ath. viii. p. 341, e.; Clinton, F. H. s. aa. 343, 336, 324, where, as well as in Meineke, other such personal allusions are mentioned.) Hence the period during which he flourished appears to have extended from about the middle of the fourth century B. C. till after B. C. 324, so that at the beginning of his career he was in part contemporary with Antiphanes, and at the end of it, with Menander. (Comp. Ath. vii. p. 245, c.) There is also an allusion to one of his plays, the Icarii, in a fragment of Alexis (Ath. iii. p. 120, a). From these statements it is clear that he is rightly referred to the Middle Comedy, although Pollux (x. 154) reckons him among the poets of the New (τοῖς νεωτέροις), perhaps on account of the late period down to which he flourished. He is the latest of the poets of the Middle Comedy, excepting Xenarchus and Theophilus.

Suidas, who has here fallen into his frequent error of making two persons out of one, assigns to Timocles, in his two articles upon him, nineteen dramas, on the authority of Athenaeus, in whose work are also found some titles not mentioned by Suidas, and a few more are gathered from other sources. The list, when completed and corrected, stands thus: — Αἰγύπτιοι, Βαλανεῖον, Δακτύλιος, Δῆλος or perhaps Δήλιος, Δημοσάτυροι, Διονυσιάζουσαι, Διόνυσος, Δρακόντιον, Ἐπιστολαί, Ἐπιχαιρέκακος, Ἥρωες, Ἰκάριοι σάτυροι, Καύνιοι, Κένταυρος ἢ Δεξαμενός, Κονίσαλος, Λήθη, Μαραθώνιοι, Νέαιρα, Ὀρεσταυτοκλείδης, Πολυπράγμων, Ποντικός, Πορφύρα (but perhaps this belongs to Xenarchus), Πύκτης, Σαπφώ, Συνέριθοι (doubtful), Φιλοδικαστής, Ψευδολησταί. Some of these titles involve important questions, which are fully discussed by Meineke. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 503, 504; Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 428—433, vol. iii. pp. 590—613; Editio Minor, pp. 798—811.)

3. Of Syracuse, a supposed author of one of the pretended works of Orpheus, namely, the Σωτήρια, which was also ascribed to Persinus of Miletus (Suid. s. v. Ὀρφεύς; Eudoc. p. 318). Nothing more is known of him. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 158; Meineke, vol. i. pp. 430, 431.)

4. There is also an almost unintelligible passage in Photius (Epist. 55, p. 111), about a certain mendacious writer of the name of Timocles. (Meineke, l. c.) [P. S.]

TIMOCLES, artist. [TIMARCHIDES].

TIMO'CRATES (Τιμοκράτης). 1. A Lacedaemonian, was one of the three counsellors (Brasidas and Lycophron being his colleagues) who were sent to assist Cnemus after his first defeat by Phormion in the Corinthian gulf, in B. C. 429. In the second battle there shortly after, Timocrates was on board of a Leucadian galley, which was one of the twenty fast-sailing ships appointed to prevent the Athenians from escaping to Naupactus. This vessel, in the pursuit, far outstripped the rest of the squadron, and the hindmost Athenian galley, closely chased by it, wheeled suddenly round a merchant ship which was lying at anchor, struck her pursuer in the centre, and sank her. Timocrates hereupon slew himself, and his body was washed into the harbour of Naupactus (Thuc. ii. 85—92).

2. An Athenian, was one of the commissioners for concluding the fifty years' truce between Athens and Sparta, in B. C. 421, and also the separate treaty between these states in the same year. (Thuc. v. 19, 24.) We may perhaps identify him with the father of the Athenian commander, Aristoteles. (Thuc. iii. 105.)

3. (Unless he is to be identified with No. 2.) An Athenian, who, in B. C. 406, was a member of the Council of Five Hundred, before which the generals who had conquered at Arginusae gave in their account. Having heard it, Timocrates made and carried a proposal that they should all be kept in custody and handed over to the judgment of the people (Xen. Hell. i. 7. § 3.)

4. A Rhodian, who was sent into Greece by the satrap Tithraustes in B. C. 395, taking with him fifty talents wherewith to bribe the leading men in the several states to excite a war against Sparta at home, and so to compel the return of Agesilaus from his victorious career in Asia. Plutarch calls him Hermocrates (Xen. Hell. iii. 5. § 1; Paus. iii. 9; Plut. Artax. 20.)

5. A Lacedaemonian, was one of the ambassadors who were sent to Athens in B. C. 369, to settle the terms of alliance between the Athenians and the Spartans (Xen. Hell. vii. § 13.) [CEPHISODOTUS, No. 2.]

6. A Syracusan, who commanded a squadron of twelve galleys, sent by Dionysius the Younger to the aid of Sparta in B. C. 366. The arrival of this force enabled the Spartans to reduce Sellasia, which had revolted from them. (Xen. Hell. vii. 4. § 12.)

7. An Athenian, the proposer of a law providing that a public debtor should be exempt from imprisonment on his giving security for payment within a certain time. For this, Timocrates was prosecuted by Diodorus and Euctemon, and for them Demosthenes wrote the oration (κατὰ Τιμοκράτους), which was delivered by Diodorus in B. C. 353 [ANDROTION; MELANOPUS.] It is a question whether this Timocrates should be identified with a person of the same name, who was the first husband of the sister of Onetor, and who surrendered her to Aphobus. (Dem. c. Onet. i. pp. 865, &c.) [E. E.]

TIMO'CREON (Τιμοκρέων), of Rhodes, a lyric

poet, celebrated for the bitter and pugnacious spirit of his works, and especially for his attacks on Themistocles and Simonides. From fragments of his poetry, which are preserved by Plutarch (Themist. 21), it appears that he was a native of Ialysus in Rhodes, whence he was banished on the then common charge of an inclination towards Persia (μηδισμός); and in this banishment he was left neglected by Themistocles, who had formerly been his friend, and his connection by the ties of hospitality. According to Plutarch, the influence of Themistocles was positively employed to procure the banishment of Timocreon: but from the words of the poet himself, the offence seems to have amounted only to his neglecting to procure Timocreon's recall from exile, when he obtained that favour for other political fugitives. This distinction Timocreon ascribes to pecuniary corruption; and, in another passage quoted by Plutarch (ibid.) he insinuates that Themistocles was not free from the guilt of the same political crime for which he himself was suffering. It is to be observed that Timocreon does not deny the charge brought against him, but he even admits it, unless the words are to be construed hypothetically. According to the statement of Thrasymachus (ap. Ath. x. p. 416, a.) he was at one time living at the Persian court. Plutarch also tells us that after the exile of Themistocles, Timocreon attacked him still more violently in an ode, the opening lines of which call on the "Muse to confer fame upon this strain throughout Greece, as is fitting and just." Hence it follows that Timocreon was still flourishing after B. C. 471.

The three fragments thus referred to by Plutarch constitute the greater part of the extant remains of Timocreon; and hence it may be conjectured that poetry was not the business of his life, but only the accidental form in which he uttered the violent emotions which political misfortunes and personal wrongs would naturally excite in a man of great vigour of mind as well as body. For that such was his constitution of body appears from the fact that he was an athlete in that combination of the contests which required the greatest strength, namely the pentathlon (Ath. x. p. 415, f.). Thrasymachus (l. c.) relates a specimen, which was exhibited at the Persian court, of Timocreon's prodigious strength, and of the voracity by which he sustained it; and hence, as well as from the satyric spirit of his poetry, is derived the point of that epigram which, according to Athenaeus (l. c.), was inscribed upon his tomb:—

ἀνθρώπους, κεῖμαι Τιμοκρέων Ῥόδιος.

If, as modern scholars generally suppose, this epigram was written by Simonides, it does not necessarily follow that Timocreon died before Simonides; for an epitaph, as a vehicle of satire on a living person, is a species of wit of which we have many examples in the history of poetry, both ancient and modern. For the fact of the rivalry between Simonides and Timocreon, we have the testimony of Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 46), and of Suidas; and the Greek Anthology contains an epigram by Timocreon (Anth. Pal. xiii. 31),

Κηΐα με προσῆλθε φλυαρία οὐκ ἐθέλοντα.
Οὐκ ἐθέλοντά με προσῆλθε Κηΐα φλυαρία, which is evidently a parody on the following epigram of Simonides (Anth Pal. xiii. 30),

Μοῦσά μοι Ἀλκμήνης καλλισφύρου υἱὸν ἄειδε·
υἱὸν Ἀλκμήνης ἄειδε Μοῦσά μοι καλλισφύρου.

The attacks of Timocreon on his contemporaries have led Suidas, or the writer whom he follows, into the erroneous statement, that he was a comic poet of the Old Comedy, and that he wrote comedies against Themistocles and Simonides; although in the very same article we have another account of these attacks, evidently from a better source, in which the poem against Themistocles is expressly called lyric (ἐμμελοῦς). In another passage of Suidas (s. v. σκόλιον), he is made an epic poet (ἐποποιός); a mistake borrowed from a passage in the Scholia on Aristophanes (Ran. 1302), where, however, the error is manifest, as the quotation made is from a scolion by Timocreon; and, in another passage of the Scholia (Acharn. 532), where the same quotation is made, and of which indeed the former passage seems to be merely a transcript, Timocreon is rightly designated μελοποιός. The quotation made in these passages consists of two lines from a scolion on the mischiefs caused by riches, in which the poet utters the wish "that blind Plutus had never appeared upon earth, neither upon the sea, nor on the mainland, but had had Tartarus and Acheron for his abode." We have also some lines, which Hephaestion (p. 71) quotes, as an example of the Ionic a Minore Dimeter Catalectic or Timocreontic metre, from the commencement of what appears to have been a Sybaritic apologue, namely which are also referred to by Plato (Gorg. p. 493, a.), where we have an indication of the popularity of Timocreon's poems at Athens, although later writers condemned the moral spirit of his compositions (Aristeid. vol. ii. p. 380, μηδὲ Τιμοκρέοντος τοῦ σχετλίου πρᾶγμα ποιῶμεν), and the sober judgment of modern criticism is that he gave proofs of a high degree of talent, which he abused through want of character and repose. The fragments already referred to comprise all his extant remains, except a single pentameter, quoted by Hephaestion (p. 4) from his Epigrams, and two references, which Diogenianus (Praef. pp. 179, 180, ed. Schneidewin) makes to his works. There is also a chorus in the Wasps of Aristophanes (1060, foll.), which, the Scholiast tells us, on the authority of Didymus, is a parody on an ode by Timocreon. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 144, 159, 504, vol. iv. p. 498, vol. viii. p. 635; Böckh, Prooem. Aest. Lectt. Berol. 1833; Bernhardy, Grundriss d. Griech. Litt. vol. ii. pp. 542—544; Ulrici; Bode; Brunck, Anal. vol. i. p. 148; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. i. p. 80, vol. xiii. p. 962; Schneidewin, Delect. Poës. Graec. pp. 427—431; Bergk, Poet. Lyr. Graec. pp. 807—810; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. s. a. 471). [P. S.]

TIMO'CRITUS (Τιμόκριτος), of Aegina, a lyric poet, who is mentioned incidentally by Pindar, as if he were a poet of some distinction, but of whom we know nothing further. (Pind. Nem. 22, 145, with Dissen's Note). [P. S.]

TIMOLA'US (Τιμόλαος), historical. 1. A Corinthian, who was bribed by Timocrates, when the latter was sent to Greece by Tithraustes to gain over as many of the Greeks as he could, to take the side of the Persians against Agesilaus. We find him soon after in a congress, held at Corinth, of the states that were leagued against Sparta. A speech of his on the occasion is reported by Xenophon. (Xen. Hellen. iii. 5. § 1, iv. 2. § 11; Paus. iii. 9. § 8.)

2. A Theban, who is denounced by Demosthenes (de Cor. p. 241, ed. Reiske) as a traitor to his country, because he took the Macedonian side. Polybius (xvii. 14. § 4) defends him from the charge. [C. P. M.]

TIMOLA'US, the son of Odenathus and Zenobia, the brother of Herennianus. Trebellius Pollio gives him a place in the list of the thirty tyrants [AUREOLUS], but has preserved no particulars with regard to his history, except that he displayed extraordinary zeal in the study of Latin literature. (Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyrann. xxvii.; comp. HERENNIANUS; ODENATHUS; ZENOBIA.) [W. R.]

TIMOLA'US (Τιμόλαος), literary. 1. A native of Cyzicus, who is mentioned as one of the disciples of Plato.

2. A Greek writer, a native of Larissa, and a disciple of Anaximenes of Lampsacus. He exercised his ingenuity by producing an Iliad, in which each line of Homer was followed by one of his own; thus: —

Μῆνιν ἄειδε θεὰ Πηληϊάδεω Ἀχιλῆος ἣν ἔθετο Χρύσου κεχολώμενος εἵνεκα κούρης, οὐλομένην ἣ μύρι' Ἀχαιοῖς ἄλγε' ἔθηκε μαρναμένοις ὅτε Τρωσὶν ἄτερ πολέμιζον ἄνακτος, πολλὰς δ' ἰφθίμους ψυχὰς Ἄϊδι προΐαψεν

(Suidas, s.v.; Eustath. Praef. in Od. p. 4.) Comp. PIGRES. [C. P. M.]

TIMO'LEON (Τιμολέων), the son of Timodemus or Timaenetus and Demariste, belonged to one of the noblest families at Corinth, and gained at an early age among his fellow-citizens a reputation for ability and courage. Corinth had long exercised great influence over the Greek cities in Sicily as the metropolis or mother-city of Syracuse. After the death of Dion, the most terrible disorders had prevailed throughout Sicily, and several men of enterprize and energy had succeeded in making themselves tyrants or supreme rulers in various places. Dionysius had again recovered his power in Syracuse. Hicetas had established himself as tyrant at Leontini, and Andromachus, the father of the historian Timaeus, at Tauromenium. The friends of Dion had taken refuge either with Hicetas or Andromachus, and the former was making war against Dionysius under the pretext of restoring the exiles, but in reality in hopes of making himself master of Syracuse. Meantime, the Carthaginians prepared to take advantage of the distracted condition of Sicily; and the fears of this invasion, as well as the hopes of restoring tranquillity to the island, led many of the Sicilians, and among them the Syracusan exiles, to send an embassy to Corinth to implore assistance (B. C. 344). The Corinthians immediately resolved to comply with their request, and the unanimous voice of the people selected Timoleon as the person most competent to take the command in the proposed expedition. Such a proposal was, in itself, most acceptable to the bold and enterprising spirit of Timoleon; but there was another reason which had rendered Corinth an unwelcome place of residence to him. His elder brother Timophanes had commanded the Corinthian troops in a war against Argos with great success; and subsequently when the state expected another attack, he had the command of four hundred mercenaries entrusted to him. By their means, and supported by a powerful party in the state, he resolved to obtain the supreme power in Corinth, and make himself tyrant of the city. His brother Timoleon, who was a warm lover of liberty, disapproved of his schemes, and endeavoured by argument and persuasion to turn him from his purpose, but when he found Timophanes inflexible, he resolved to kill his brother rather than allow him to destroy the liberty of his state. The manner of Timophanes' death is stated differently by the ancient writers. Diodorus says that Timoleon slew him with his open hand openly in the forum. Plutarch relates that Timoleon introduced the assassins into his brother's house, but turned his back while the deed was done; and Cornelius Nepos states that Timoleon was not even present at the murder, though it was perpetrated at his desire. (Diod. xvi. 65; Plut. Tim. 4; Corn. Nep. Tim. 1; Aristot. Pol. v. 5. § 9.) Plutarch further relates that Timophanes was murdered twenty years before the Sicilian ambassadors arrived at Corinth, during the whole of which time Timoleon lived in solitude, a prey to sorrow and remorse; but as Xenophon in his Greek history makes no mention of the affair, which he would hardly have omitted, if it occurred in B. C. 364, we may follow in preference the narrative of Diodorus, who relates that Timoleon murdered his brother just before the arrival of the Sicilian ambassadors, and that at the very moment of their arrival the Corinthians had not come to any decision respecting Timoleon's act, some denouncing it as a wilful murder which should be punished according to the laws, others as a glorious deed of patriotism, for which he ought to be rewarded. The historian adds that the Corinthian senate avoided the difficulty of a decision by appointing him to the command of the Sicilian expedition, with the singular provision, that if he conducted himself justly in the command, they would regard him as a tyrannicide, and honour him accordingly; but if otherwise, they would punish him as a fratricide.

In whatever manner, and to whatever causes Timoleon owed his appointment, his extraordinary success more than justified the confidence which had been reposed in him. His history in Plutarch reads almost like a romance; and yet of the main facts of the narrative, confirmed as they are by Diodorus and other authorities, we cannot entertain any reasonable doubt. Although the Corinthians had readily assented to the requests of the Sicilians in the appointment of a commander, they were not prepared to make many sacrifices in their favour; and accordingly it was only with ten triremes and seven hundred mercenaries that Timoleon sailed from Corinth to repel the Carthaginians, and restore order to the Sicilian cities. It was not without difficulty that Timoleon could even reach Sicily. Hicetas, the tyrant of Leontini, who had ostensibly joined the other Greeks in asking assistance from Corinth, dreaded the arrival of Timoleon, and had therefore entered into secret negotiations with Hanno, the Carthaginian general, who had meantime arrived in Sicily. The interference of Corinth with Sicilian affairs could not be pleasing to the Carthaginians; and Hanno accordingly sent a squadron of twenty ships to the coast of Italy, to watch the movements of Timoleon. The latter, however, contrived to outwit the Carthaginian commander at Rhegium, and crossed over in safety to Tauromenium, where he was kindly received by Andromachus, the tyrant of the place, and by the Syracusan exiles. Meanwhile, Hicetas had been prosecuting the war with success against Dionysius. At the head of a considerable force he had attacked Syracuse; and, after defeating Dionysius in a decisive battle, he had made himself master of the whole city, with the exception of the island citadel, where he kept Dionysius closely besieged. Timoleon saw that it was necessary to act with promptitude; for hardly any of the Sicilian Greeks could be expected to join him till he had won their confidence and commanded their respect. Accordingly, although he could collect only twelve hundred men, he marched at once to Adranum, the different parties in which had at the same time implored his assistance and that of Hicetas. The two generals reached the town almost at the same time; and in the battle which immediately ensued, Timoleon put Hicetas to flight, although he had nearly five times the number of men. Timoleon followed up his victory by marching against Syracuse, and before Hicetas could collect his troops, he succeeded in obtaining possession of two quarters of the city, Tyche and Epipolae. Syracuse was now in the hands of the three contending parties, Dionysius keeping the island citadel, Hicetas Neapolis and Achradina, and Timoleon the two other quarters. Such was the state of affairs towards the end of B. C. 344. The ensuing winter was spent in negotiations with the other Greek cities in Sicily, and Timoleon's recent success gained for him the adhesion of several important places, and among others that of Catana, of which Mamercus was tyrant. In the following spring (B. C. 343) Dionysius, despairing of success, surrendered the citadel to the Corinthian leader, on condition of his being allowed to depart in safety to Corinth. Hicetas, finding that he had to contend alone with Timoleon, first attempted to remove his rival by assassination, and, after the failure of this attempt, openly had recourse to the Carthaginians, and introduced Mago with his fleet and army into the port and city of Syracuse. Hicetas now seemed certain of success, for the Carthaginian force is said to have amounted to 50,000 men; but Timoleon did not despair, and showed himself quite equal to the emergency. He contrived to send a seasonable supply of provisions from Catana to the Corinthian garrison in the citadel at Syracuse; and while Mago and Hicetas marched against Catana with the best part of their troops, Leon, the commander of the Corinthian garrison at Syracuse, made a sudden attack upon Achradina, and gained this important quarter of the city. This unexpected success raised the suspicions of Mago, who, fearful of treachery, resolved to quit the island, and sailed away, with all his forces, to Carthage. Notwithstanding the defection of his powerful ally, Hicetas still attempted to retain possession of the part of Syracuse that was still in his power, but he was unable to resist the attack of Timoleon, and was obliged to abandon the city, and return to Leontini.

Timoleon thus became the undisputed master of Syracuse. Although he might easily have made himself tyrant of the city, he resolved to show that neither he nor any other private person should become the irresponsible ruler; and therefore one of his first acts was to call upon the people to destroy the citadel, which had been for so many years the seat and bulwark of the power of the tyrants. His next care was to repeople the city, which had become so deserted that whole streets were left without inhabitants, and grass grew in the market-place in sufficient quantity to feed the horses. He sent ambassadors to Corinth, to invite persons to come and settle at Syracuse, holding out to them as an inducement a division of lands. Corinth collected in Greece ten thousand colonists, who sailed to Syracuse; and such numbers flocked to the city from different parts of Italy and Sicily, that the number of new inhabitants amounted to sixty thousand. Having thus collected a population, he proceeded to enact laws for their government. Of the details of these we are not informed. We only know that they were of a democratical nature, and that he appointed a chief magistrate, to be elected annually, who was called the Amphipolus of the Olympian Zeus, and who gave his name to the Syracusan year. The historian adds that this office continued to be in existence in his time, that is, in the reign of Augustus (Diod. xvi. 70). The arrangement of the internal affairs of Syracuse engaged the principal attention of Timoleon for the next two or three years; but during that time he did not neglect the great object to which he had now devoted his life, the expulsion of the tyrants from the cities. He compelled Leptines, who was tyrant of Apollonia and Engyum, to surrender his power, and sent him into exile at Corinth. He was not, however, so successful in an attack upon Leontini (Diod. xvi. 72), although Plutarch represents him as forcing Hicetas to demolish his strongholds, and live among the Leontines as a private person (Tim. 24). But as these expeditions did not bring his troops much booty, and it was necessary to find both employment and rewards for his mercenaries, he sent the latter into the Carthaginian dominions in Sicily, where they reaped a rich harvest, and compelled many cities to desert the Carthaginian cause.

The Carthaginians did not need this provocation to engage in war against Timoleon. The rise of a new power at Syracuse, and the union of the Sicilian Greeks, could not but excite jealousy among the Carthaginians. They had been so exasperated against Mago for his cowardly conduct in leaving Sicily, that they would have crucified him if he had not put an end to his own life; and they now resolved to send a force to Sicily sufficiently powerful to subdue the whole island. This formidable armament reached Lilybaeum in B. C. 339. It was under the command of Hasdrubal and Hamilcar, and is said to have consisted of 70,000 foot and 10,000 horse and war-chariots, with a fleet of 200 ships of war, and 1000 other vessels carrying a vast quantity of provisions and military stores. Such an overwhelming force struck the Greeks with consternation and dismay. So great was their alarm that Timoleon, according to Diodorus (xvi. 78), could only induce twelve thousand men to march with him against the Carthaginians, including in that number his mercenaries, and even of them one thousand deserted him on the march. Timoleon hastened to meet the enemy with this small force, knowing that any delay, in the divided condition in which the Sicilians still were, might prove fatal to him. The Carthaginian commanders were equally anxious to bring matters to a speedy decision, confident of victory from their superior numbers. The Greeks found the Carthaginians encamped on one side of the Crimesus or Crimissus, a river which flows into the Hypsa, on the south-western coast of Sicily. Timoleon drew up his troops on the brow of a hill overlooking the Carthaginian army, who were on the further bank of the river. The Carthaginian commanders, impatient for the victory, began to cross the river in presence of the enemy. This favourable circumstance determined the movements of Timoleon. As soon as the Carthaginian army was divided by the stream, he charged them with all his forces. The Carthaginians resisted bravely, but in the hottest of the fight a dreadful storm came on, attended with lightning, hail, and rain, which beat full in the faces of the Carthaginians. Unable to bear up against the storm, and to hear the commands of their officers amidst the roar of the thunder, and the clattering of the rain and hail upon their arms, the Carthaginians began to retreat and make for the river; but pursued by the Greeks, their retreat soon became a rout; a panic spread through their ranks; and the different nations of which the vast army was composed, ignorant of one another's language, and maddened by fear, used their swords against one another, each eager to gain the stream. Numbers were killed, and still more were drowned in the river. The victory was complete, and justly ranks as one of the greatest gained by Greeks over barbarians. It was fought in the middle of summer, B.C. 339. The booty which Timoleon and his troops gained was prodigious; and some of the richest of the spoils he sent to Corinth and other cities in Greece, thus diffusing the glory of his victory throughout the mother country.

The victory of the Crimesus brought Timoleon such an accession of power and influence, that he now resolved to carry into execution his project of expelling all the tyrants from Sicily. Of these, two of the most powerful, Hicetas of Leontini, and Mamercus of Catana, had recourse to the Carthaginians for assistance, who sent Gisco to Sicily with a fleet of seventy ships and a body of Greek mercenaries. Although Gisco gained a few successes at first, the war was upon the whole favourable to Timoleon, and the Carthaginians were therefore glad to conclude a treaty with the latter in B.C. 338, by which the river Halycus was fixed as the boundary of the Carthaginian and Greek dominions in Sicily. It was during the war with Gisco that Hicetas fell into the hands of Timoleon. He had been completely defeated by Timoleon at the river Damurias, and was taken prisoner a few days afterwards, with his son Eupolemus. They were both slain by Timoleon's order. His wife and daughters were carried to Syracuse; where they were executed by command of the people, as a satisfaction to the manes of Dion, whose wife Arete and sister Aristomache had both been put to death by Hicetas. This is one of the greatest stains upon Timoleon's character, as he might easily have saved these unfortunate women, if he had chosen.

After the death of Hicetas, and the treaty between the Carthaginians and Timoleon, Mamercus, being unable to maintain himself in Catana, fled to Messana, where he took refuge with Hippon, tyrant of that city. Timoleon quickly followed, and besieged Messana so vigorously by sea and land, that Hippon, despairing of holding out, attempted to escape by sea, but was taken and put to death in the public theatre. Mamercus now surrendered, stipulating only for a public trial before the Syracusans, with the condition that Timoleon should not appear as his accuser. But as soon as he was brought into the assembly at Syracuse, the people refused to hear him, and unanimously condemned him to death.

Thus almost all the tyrants were expelled from the Greek cities in Sicily, and a democratical form of government established in their place. Timoleon, however, was in reality the ruler of Sicily, for all the states consulted him on every matter of importance; and the wisdom of his rule is attested by the flourishing condition of the island for several years even after his death. He repeopled the great cities of Agrigentum and Gela, which had been laid desolate by the Carthaginians, and also settled colonies in other cities. He did not, however, assume any title or office, but resided as a private citizen among the Syracusans, to whom he left the administration of their own affairs. Once, when his public conduct was attacked in the popular assembly by a demagogue of the name of Demaenetus, Timoleon is reported to have thanked the gods for answering his prayer that the Syracusans might enjoy freedom of speech; and when Laphystius, another demagogue, demanded that Timoleon should give sureties to answer an indictment that was brought against him, and some of Timoleon's friends began thereupon to raise a clamour, Timoleon himself restrained them by saying, that the great object of all his toils and exertions had been to make the law the same for all the Syracusans. A short time before his death Timoleon became completely blind, but the Syracusan people notwithstanding continued to pay him the same honour as they had done before, and took his advice on all difficult cases. He died, according to Diodorus, in B.C. 337, in the eighth year after his first arrival in Sicily. He was buried at the public expense in the market-place at Syracuse, where his monument was afterwards surrounded with porticoes and a gymnasium, which was called after him the Timoleonteium. Annual games were also instituted in his honour. Timoleon certainly deserves to be regarded as one of the greatest men of Greece, and it is not the slightest eulogium paid to him, that Mitford, with all his prejudices against the destroyer of his favourite tyrants, is able to detract so little from the virtues and merits of Timoleon. (Plutarch and Cornelius Nepos, Life of Timoleon; Diod. xvi. 65—90; Polyaen. v. 3. § 8; Mitford, History of Greece, c. xxxiii.)

TIMO'MACHUS (Τιμόμαχος), an Athenian, of the demus of Acharnae. In B.C. 366, he commanded a body of Athenian troops, which, in conjunction with a Lacedaemonian force, had been appointed to guard the Isthmus of Corinth against the Thebans. But they neglected to occupy the passes of Oneium, and Epaminondas, who was preparing to invade Achaia, persuaded Peisias, the Argive general, to seize a commanding height of the mountain. The Thebans were thus enabled to make their way through the Isthmus (Xen. Hell. vii. i. § 41; Diod. xv. 75). Towards the end, apparently, of B. C. 361, Timomachus was sent out to take the command in Thrace, for which he seems to have been utterly unfit, and he failed quite as much at least as his immediate predecessors, Menon and Autocles, in forwarding the Athenian interests in that quarter. Not only were his military arrangements defective, but, according to the statement of Aeschines, it was through his culpable easiness of disposition that Hegesander, his treasurer (ταμίας), was enabled to appropriate to his own use no less than 80 minae (more than 300*l.*) of the public money. Timomachus appears to have been superseded by Cephisodotus in B. C. 360, and, on his return to Athens, was impeached by Apollodorus (son of Pasion, the banker), who had been one of his trierarchs. He was condemned, and, according to Demosthenes, was heavily fined; but his punishment was death, if we may believe the statement of the Scholiast on Aeschines (Aesch. c. Tim. p. 8; Schol. ad loc.; Dem. de Fals. Leg. p. 398, pro Phorm. p. 960, c. Polycl. pp. 1210, &c.; Rehdantz, Vit. Iph., Chabr., Tim. cap. v. §§ 7, 8). It was during the command of Timomachus in Thrace that he received a letter from Cotys, who repudiated in it all the promises he had made to the Athenians when he wanted their aid against the rebel Miltocythes. (Dem. c. Arist. p. 658.) [COTYS, No. 2.] [E. E.]

TIMO'MACHUS (Τιμόμαχος), a very distinguished painter, of Byzantium. He lived (if the statement of Pliny, as contained in all the editions, be correct) in the time of Julius Caesar, who purchased two of his pictures, the Ajax and Medea, for the immense sum of eighty Attic talents, and dedicated them in the temple of Venus Genitrix. (Plin. H. N. vii. 38. s. 39, xxxv. 4. s. 9, 11. s. 40. § 30.) In the last of these passages, Pliny defines the artist's age in the following very distinct terms: — "Timomachus Byzantius Caesaris Dictatoris aetate Ajacem et Medeam pinxit." But here an important and difficult question has been raised. In Cicero's well-known enumeration of the masterpieces of Grecian art, which were to be seen in various cities (in Verr. iv. 60), he alludes to the Ajax and Medea at Cyzicus, but without mentioning the painter's name. (Quid Cyzicenos [arbitramini merere velle], ut Ajacem, aut Medeam [amittant]?) From this passage a presumption is raised, that the two pictures should be referred to a period much earlier than the time of Caesar, namely to the best period of Grecian art, to which most of the other works, in connection with which they are mentioned, are known to have belonged: at all events, as the manner in which they are referred to by Cicero presupposes their being already celebrated throughout the Roman empire, it is not likely that they could have been painted during the life of Caesar, and it is of course impossible that they were painted during his dictatorship. But then, the question comes, whether these were the paintings mentioned by Pliny, and, as will presently be seen, celebrated by other writers. The first impulse of any reader would be to assume this, as a matter of course; and it would be strange indeed if, while two such pictures as the Ajax and Medea, celebrated by Cicero, existed at Cyzicus, two others on the same subjects should have been painted by Timomachus, and should have been admired as we know they were, and that the pictures of Ajax and Medea should be simply mentioned by Pliny as well known, without any distinction being made between the two pairs of pictures. It is true that, from one of the passages of Pliny above cited (xxxv. 4. s. 9), the inference has been drawn that, besides the Ajax and Medea, which Caesar dedicated in the temple of Venus, there was another pair of pictures brought to Rome, by Agrippa, who purchased them from the Cyzicenes at a great price, namely, an Ajax and Venus; but the passage is extremely difficult to understand clearly; and, even taking the above explanation, any conclusion drawn from it would apply only to the Ajax, and not to the Medea, which was evidently the more celebrated of the two. On the whole, then, it seems most probable that the pictures at Cyzicus, mentioned by Cicero, were the very pictures of Timomachus, which were purchased by Julius Caesar; and therefore that the word aetate in Pliny must either be rejected, or interpreted with a considerable latitude. In confirmation of this conclusion another passage is cited from Pliny himself (l. c. § 41), in which he enumerates, as examples of the last unfinished pictures of the greatest painters, which were more admired than even their finished works, the Medea of Timomachus, in connection with the Iris of Aristeides, the Tyndaridae of Nicomachus, and the Venus of Apelles; whence it has been argued that Timomachus was probably contemporary with the other great painters there mentioned, and moreover that it is incredible that Caesar should have given the large price above mentioned for two pictures of a living artist, especially when one of them was unfinished. Still, any positive chronological conclusion from these arguments can only be received with much caution. They seem to prove that Timomachus flourished not later than the early part of the first century B. C., but they do not prove that he is to be carried back to the third century. The associations of works and names, in the passages of Cicero and Pliny, have respect to the order of excellence and not to that of time; and it must be remembered that a great artist often obtains a reputation even above his merits during his life and soon after his death, and that fashion, as well as fame, will set a high pecuniary value on such an artist's works. On the other hand, a positive argument, to prove that Nicomachus lived later than the time of that flourishing period of the art which is marked by the name of Apelles, may be drawn from the absence of any mention of him by Pliny in his proper chronological order, which indicates the absence of his name from the works of the Greek authors whom Pliny followed, and that he was one of those recent artists who were only known to Pliny by their works which he had seen. Without attempting to arrive at any more precise conclusion with regard to the age of Timomachus, we proceed to state what is known of his works.

(1.) The two pictures already mentioned were the most celebrated of all his works, and the Medea appears to have been esteemed his masterpiece. It is referred to, in terms of the highest praise, in several passages of the ancient writers, from which we learn that it represented Medea meditating the murder of her children, but still hesitating between the impulses of revenge for her own wrongs and of pity for her children. A general notion of the composition is probably preserved in a painting on the same subject found at Pompeii (Mus. Borb. v. 33; Pompeii, vol. ii. p. 190), and the type of Medea is seen in a figure found at Herculaneum (Antiq. di Ercol. i. 13; Mus. Borb. x. 21), and on some gems. (Lippert, Supplem. i. 93; Panofka, Annal. d. Inst. i. p. 243; Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 208, n. 2.) A minute description of the emotions expressed in the artist's Medea is given in the following epigrams from the Greek Anthology. (Anth. Plan. iv. 135, 136, p. 317; Brunck, Anal. vol. iii. p. 214, vol. ii. p. 174; Jacobs, Anth. Pal. Append. vol. ii. p. 667.) The first is anonymous: —

Τέχνη Τιμομάχου στοργὴν καὶ ζῆλον ἔδειξε
Μηδείης, τέκνων εἰς μόρον ἑλκομένων·
τῇ μὲν γὰρ συνένευσεν ἐπὶ ξίφος, ᾗ δ' ἀνανεύει σώζειν καὶ κτείνειν βουλομένη τέκεα.

The other is ascribed to Antiphilus: —

Τὰν ὀλοὰν Μήδειαν ὅτ' ἔγραφε Τιμομάχου χείρ, ζάλῳ καὶ τέκνοις ἀντιμεθελκομέναν, μυρίον ἄρατο μόχθον, ἵν' ἤθεα δισσὰ χαράξῃ, ὧν τὸ μὲν εἰς ὀργὰν νεῦε, τὸ δ' εἰς ἔλεον.
ἄμφω δ' ἐπλήρωσεν· ὅρα τύπον. ἐν γὰρ ἀπειλᾷ δάκρυον, ἐν δ' ἐλέῳ θυμὸς ἀναστρέφεται.
Ἀρκεῖ δ' ἁ μέλλησις, ἔφα σοφός· αἷμα δὲ τέκνων
ἔπρεπε Μηδείῃ, κοὐ χερὶ Τιμομάχου.

There is a similar epigram by Ausonius (No. 129). From these descriptions it appears that the great art of Timomachus consisted in the expression of that conflict of emotions which precedes the perpetration of some dreadful act, and in exciting in the minds of the spectators the corresponding emotions of terror and pity, which are the end aimed at by all tragic exhibitions; and, at the same time, in avoiding the excess of horror, by representing, not the deed itself, but only the conception of it in the mind. Plutarch mentions the painting as an example of one of those works of art, in which unnatural deeds (πράξεις ἄτοποι) are represented, and which, while we abhor the deed, we praise on account of the skill shown in representing it in a becoming manner (τὴν τέχνην, εἰ μεμίμηται προσηκόντως τὸ ὑποκείμενον, Plut. de Aud. Poet. 3, p. 18, b.). There are also two other epigrams upon the picture in the Greek Anthology (Jacobs, l. c. Nos. 137, 138), from the former of which we learn that it was painted in encaustic; and, from the connection in which Timomachus is mentioned by Pliny, it would seem that this was the case with all his works.

(2.) His Ajax resembled his Medea in the conflict of emotions which it expressed. It represented the hero in his madness, meditating the act of suicide. It is described by Philostratus (Vit. Apollon. ii. 10), in an epigram in the Greek Anthology (Jacobs, l. c. No. 83, p. 648), and by Ovid (Trist. ii. 528).

TIMON (Τίμων). 1. The son of Timarchus of Phlius, a philosopher of the sect of the Sceptics, and a celebrated writer of the species of satiric poems called Silli (σίλλοι), flourished in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, about B. C. 279, and onwards. A pretty full account of his life is preserved by Diogenes Laërtius, from the first book of a work on the Silli (ἐν τῷ πρώτῳ τῶν εἰς τοὺς σίλλους ὑπομνημάτων) by Apollonides of Nicaea; and some particulars are quoted by Diogenes from Antigonus of Carystus, and from Sotion (Diog. Laërt. ix. c. 12. §§ 109—115). Being left an orphan while still young, he was at first a choreutes in the theatre, but he abandoned this profession for the study of philosophy, and, having removed to Megara, he spent some time with Stilpon, and then he returned home and married. He next went to Elis with his wife, and heard Pyrrhon, whose tenets he adopted, so far at least as his restless genius and satirical scepticism permitted him to follow any master. During his residence at Elis, he had children born to him, the eldest of whom, named Xanthus, he instructed in the art of medicine and trained in his philosophical principles, so that he might be his successor and representative (καὶ διάδοχον τοῦ βίου κατέλιπε; but these words may, however, mean that he left him heir to his property). Driven again from Elis by straitened circumstances, he spent some time on the Hellespont and the Propontis, and taught at Chalcedon as a sophist with such success that he realised a fortune. He then removed to Athens, where he lived until his death, with the exception of a short residence at Thebes. Among the great men, with whom he became personally acquainted in the course of his travels, which probably extended more widely about the Aegean and the Levant than we are informed, were the kings Antigonus and Ptolemy Philadelphus. He is said to have assisted Alexander Aetolus and Homerus in the composition of their tragedies, and to have been the teacher of Aratus (Suid. s. v. Ἄρατος). "These indications," says Mr. Clinton, "mark his time. He might have heard Stilpo at Megara twenty-five years before the reign of Philadelphus" (Fast. Hellen. vol. iii. s. aa. 279, 272). He died at the age of almost ninety. Among his pupils were Dioscurides of Cyprus, Nicolochus of Rhodes, Euphranor of Seleuceia, and Praÿlus of the Troad.

Timon appears to have been endowed by nature with a powerful and active mind, and with that quick perception of the follies of men, which betrays its possessor into a spirit of universal distrust both of men and truths, so as to make him a sceptic in philosophy and a satirist in every thing. According to Diogenes, Timon had that physical defect, which some have fancied that they have found often accompanied by such a spirit as his, and which at least must have given greater force to its utterances; he was a one-eyed man; and he used even to make a jest of his own defect, calling himself Cyclops. Some other examples of his bitter sarcasms are recorded by Diogenes; one of which is worth qoting as a maxim in criticism: being asked by Aratus how to obtain the pure text of Homer, he replied, "If we could find the old copies, and not those with modern emendations." He is also said to have been fond of retirement, and of gardening; but Diogenes introduces this statement and some others in such a way as to suggest a doubt whether they ought to be referred to our Timon or to Timon the misanthrope, or whether they apply equally to both.

The writings of Timon are represented as very numerous. According to Diogenes, in the order of whose statement there appears to be some confusion, he composed ἔπη, καὶ τραγῳδίας, καὶ σατύρους, καὶ δράματα κωμικὰ τριάκοντα, τραγικὰ δὲ ἑξήκοντα, σίλλους τε καὶ κιναίδους. The double mention of his tragedies raises a suspicion that Diogenes may have combined two different accounts of his writings in this sentence; but perhaps it may be explained by supposing the words τραγικὰ δὲ ἑξήκοντα to be inserted simply in order to put the number of his tragedies side by side with that of his comedies. Some may find another difficulty in the passage, on account of the great number and variety of the poetical works ascribed to Timon; but this is nothing surprising in a writer of that age of universal imitative literature; nor, when the early theatrical occupations of Timon are borne in mind, is it at all astonishing that his taste for the drama should have prompted him to the composition of sixty tragedies and thirty comedies, besides satyric dramas. One thing, however, it is important to observe. The composition of tragedies and comedies by the same author is an almost certain indication that his dramas were intended only to be read, and not to be acted. No remains of his dramas have come down to us.

Of his epic poems we know very little; but it may be presumed that they were chiefly ludicrous or satirical poems in the epic form. Possibly his Python (Πύθων), which contained a long account of a conversation with Pyrrhon, during a journey to Pytho, may be referred to this class; unless it was in prose (Diog. ix. 64, 105; Euseb. Praep. Ev. xiv. p. 761, a.). It appears probable that his Ἀρκεσιλάου περίδειπνον or πρόδειπνον was a satirical poem in epic verse (Diog. ix. 115; Ath. ix. p. 406, e.). Whether he wrote parodies on Homer or whether he merely occasionally, in the course of his writings, parodied passages of the Homeric poems, cannot be determined with certainty from the lines in his extant fragments which are evident parodies of Homer, such, for example, as the verse preserved by Diogenes,

Ἔσπετε νῦν μοι ὅσοι πολυπράγμονές ἐστε σοφισταί, which is an obvious parody on the Homeric invocation (Il. ii. 484), Ἔσπετε νῦν μοι Μοῦσαι Ὀλύμπια δώματ' ἔχουσαι.

The most celebrated of his poems, however, were the satiric compositions called Silli (σίλλοι), a word of somewhat doubtful etymology, but which undoubtedly describes metrical compositions, of a character at once ludicrous and sarcastic. The invention of this species of poetry is ascribed to Xenophanes of Colophon. [XENOPHANES.] The Silli of Timon were in three books, in the first of which he spoke in his own person, and the other two are in the form of a dialogue between the author and Xenophanes of Colophon, in which Timon proposed questions, to which Xenophanes replied at length. The subject was a sarcastic account of the tenets of all philosophers, living and dead; an unbounded field for scepticism and satire. They were in hexameter verse, and, from the way in which they are mentioned by the ancient writers, as well as from the few fragments of them which have come down to us, it is evident that they were very admirable productions of their kind. (Diog. l. c.; Aristocles ap. Euseb. Praep. Ev. xiv. p. 763, c.; Suid. s. vv. σιλλαίνει, Τίμων; Ath. passim; Gell. iii. 17.) Commentaries were written on the Silli by Apollonides of Nicaea, as already mentioned, and also by Sotion of Alexandria. (Ath. viii. p. 336, d.) The poem entitled Ἰνδαλμοί, in elegiac verse, appears to have been similar in its subject to the Silli (Diog. Laërt. ix. 65). Diogenes also mentions Timon's ἴαμβοι (ix. 110), but perhaps the word is here merely used in the sense of satirical poems in general, without reference to the metre.

He also wrote in prose, to the quantity, Diogenes tells us, of twenty thousand lines. These works were no doubt on philosophical subjects, but all we know of their specific character is contained in the three references made by Diogenes to Timon's works περὶ αἰσθήσεως, περὶ ζητήσεως, and κατὰ σοφίας.

The fragments of his poems have been collected by H. Stephanus, in his Poësis Philosophica, 1573, 8vo.; by J. F. Langenrich, at the end of his Dissertationes III. de Timone Sillographo, Lips. 1720, 1721, 1723, 4to.; by Brunck, in his Analecta, vol. ii. pp. 67, foll.; by F. A. Wölke, in his monograph De Graecorum Syllis, Varsav. 1820, 8vo.; and by F. Paul, in his Dissertatio de Sillis, Berol. 1821, 8vo. (See also Creuzer and Daub's Studien, vol. vi. pp. 302, foll.; Ant. Weland, Dissert. de praecip. Parodiarum Homericarum Scriptoribus apud Graecos, pp. 50, foll. 2. TIMON THE MISANTHROPE (ὁ μισάνθρωπος) is distinguished from Timon of Phlius by Diogenes (ix. 112), but, as has been remarked above, it is not clear how much, or whether any part, of the information Diogenes gives respecting Timon is to be referred to this Timon rather than the former. There was a certain distant resemblance between their characters, which may have led to a confusion of the one with the other. The great distinctions between them are, that Timon the misanthrope wrote nothing, and that he lived about a century and a half earlier than Timon of Phlius, namely, at the time of the Peloponnesian war. The few particulars that are known of Timon the misanthrope are contained in the passages in which he is attacked by Aristophanes (Lysist. 809, &c., Av. 1548) and the other comic poets in the dialogue of Lucian, which bears his name (Timon, c. 7), and in a few other passages of the ancient writers (Plut. Anton. 70; Tzetz. Chil. vii. 273; Suid. s. v.) The comic poets who mention him, besides Aristophanes, are Phrynichus, Plato, and Antiphanes, the last of whom made him the subject of one of his comedies. (See Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. pp. 327, 328.) He was an Athenian, of the demos of Colyttus, and his father's name was Echecratides. In consequence of the ingratitude he experienced, and the disappointments he suffered, from his early friends and companions, he secluded himself entirely from the world, admitting no one to his society except Alcibiades, in whose reckless and variable disposition he probably found pleasure in tracing and studying an image of the world he had abandoned; and at last he is said to have died in consequence of refusing to suffer a surgeon to come to him to set a broken limb. His grave is said to have been planted with thorns, and the following epitaph upon him is preserved in the Greek Anthology (Brunck, Anal. vol. i. p. 153; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. i. p. 86): —

Ἐνθάδ' ἀποῤῥήξας ψυχὴν βαρυδαίμονα κεῖμαι,
Τοὔνομα δ' οὐ πεύσεσθε, κακοὶ δὲ κακῶς ἀπόλοισθε.

The few details recorded of his eccentricities by the authors above cited have no value except as contributing to the study of his whole character, as one type of the diseased human mind, a subject which lies beyond our present limits, but for which the reader will find ample materials in comparing the ancient authorities with Shakspeare's Timon of Athens, and in this comparison Mr. Knight's Introductory Notice to that tragedy will be found to give valuable assistance. [P. S.]

TIMON, a statuary, of whom nothing is known beyond the mention of him by Pliny as one of those who made athletas et armatos et venatores sacrificantesque. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 34.) [P. S.]

TIMO'NAX (Τιμώναξ), wrote Σικελικά and Περὶ Σκυθῶν. (Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. iii. 1235, iv. 328, 1217.)

TIMO'NIDES (Τιμωνίδης), accompanied Dion into Sicily, and fought on his side. On one occasion, when Dion had been wounded while fighting against the mercenaries of Dionysius, and was obliged to retire from the combat, he appointed Timonides to the command of his troops. The history of Dion's wars in Sicily was related by Timonides in some letters to the philosopher Speusippus, which are quoted by Plutarch and Diogenes Laërtius. (Plut. Dion, cc. 22, 30, 31, 35; Diog. Laërt. iv. 5, where Τιμωνίδης must be read instead of Σιμωνίδης; C. Müller, Fragm. Historic. Graec. vol. ii. p. 83, Paris, 1848.) The Scholiast on Theocritus (i. 63) quotes a work on Sicily by Simonides, where Timonides is probably likewise the correct reading. In the article SIMONIDES (p. 836, b) an error has been committed, which may be corrected from the preceding account.

TIMO'PHANES (Τιμοφάνης), the brother of Timoleon. [TIMOLEON.]

TIMO'STHENES (Τιμοσθένης), the Rhodian, was the admiral of the fleet of Ptolemy Philadelphus, who reigned from B. C. 285 to 247. He may therefore be placed about B. C. 282. He wrote a work on Harbours (περὶ λιμένων), in ten books, which was copied by Eratosthenes, and which is frequently cited by the ancient writers. Strabo says (ix. p. 421) that Timosthenes also wrote poetry. (Marcian. Heracleot. p. 63; Strab. ii. 92, iii. p. 140, et alibi; Harpocrat. s. v. ἐφ' ἱερόν; Schol. ad Theocr. xiii. 22; Steph. Byz. s. vv. Ἀγάθη, Ἀρτάκη, et alibi; Vossius, De Hist. Graec. pp. 147, 148, ed. Westermann; Clinton, Fast. Hell. vol. iii. p. 508.)

TIMO'STRATUS (Τιμόστρατος), a comic poet, of unknown time, the author of four dramas, Ἄσωτος, Πάν, Παρακαταθήκη, and Φιλοδεσπότης, of which we have scarcely any remnants, beyond the titles. (Antiatt. pp. 80. 12, 81. 1, 89. 23, 91. 1, 98. 4; Phot Lex. s. v. ζάγρα.) He is mentioned by Photius among the poets quoted by Stobaeus (Bibl. Cod. 167, p. 374); but no references to him are found in our present copies of Stobaeus. It is probable also that the name of a poet Δημόστρατος, whose Δημοποίητος is quoted by Suidas (s. v. χάραξ) is an error for Τιμόστρατος. (Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 499, 500, vol. iv. pp. 595, 596; Editio Minor, p. 1184.) [P. S.]

TIMO'THEUS (Τιμόθεος), historical. 1. Father of Conon, the famous general. (Paus. viii. 52.)

2. Son of Conon, was a native of the demus of Anaphlystus, and, according to a probable conjecture of Boeckh, belonged to the priestly family of the Eumolpidae (Corp. Inscr. 393; see Rehdantz, Vit. Iph. Chabr. Tim. p. 45). For the statement of Athenaeus (xiii. p. 577, a), that his mother was a Thracian hetaera, there appear to be no good grounds. Inheriting a considerable fortune from his father, he seems in his early years to have indulged in the display of it, as we may gather from an allusion in the Plutus of Aristophanes (B. C. 388); and we may therefore well believe the assertion, that it was through his intercourse with Isocrates that his mind was directed to higher views (Lys. de Arist. Bon. p. 155; Arist. Plut. 180; Schol. ad loc.; Dem. c. Aphob. i. p. 815, c. Aphob. de F. T. p. 862; Pseudo-Dem. Erot. p. 1415). In B. C. 378, Timotheus was made general with Chabrias and Callistratus, and it is possible that, while Chabrias was occupied in Boeotia, his colleagues commanded the fleet, and were engaged in bringing over Euboea and other islands to the Athenian confederacy (Xen. Hell. v. 4. § 34; Diod. xv. 29, 30; Plut. de Glor. Ath. 8; Rehdantz, p. 57). In B. C. 375, Timotheus was sent with sixty ships to cruize round the Peloponnesus, in accordance with the suggestion of the Thebans, that the Spartans might thus be prevented from invading Boeotia. On his voyage he ravaged Laconia, and then proceeded to Corcyra, which he brought over to the Athenian alliance, behaving after his success with great moderation. This conduct, together with his conciliatory disposition and manners, contributed mainly to the prosperous issue of his further negotiations, and he succeeded in gaining the alliance of the Cephallenians and Acarnanians, as well as that of Alcetas I., the king of Epirus. A Spartan fleet under Nicolochus was sent out against him, but he defeated it off Alyzia on the Acarnanian coast, and, being strengthened shortly after by a reinforcement from Corcyra, he entirely commanded the sea, though, having brought with him only thirteen talents from home, he was greatly embarrassed for want of funds (Xen. Hell. v. 4. §§ 62—66; Dem. c. Arist. p. 686; Isocr. περὶ Ἀντιδ. § 116; Diod. xv. 36; Corn. Nep. Tim. 2; Ael. V. H. iii. 16; Pseudo-Arist. Oecon. ii. 23; Polyaen. iii. 10). In the following year peace was concluded between Athens and Sparta, and Timotheus was recalled. On his way, however, he stopped at Zacynthus, and forcibly restored some democratic exiles who had fled to him for refuge; hereupon the oligarchical party in the island complained to Sparta, and the failure of her application to Athens for redress led to a renewal of the war (Xen. Hell. vi. 2. §§ 2, 3; Diod. xv. 45). In B. C. 373, he was appointed to the command of sixty ships destined to act against MNASIPPUS in Corcyra; but he had no means of fully manning his squadron, and he was obliged therefore to cruize about the Aegean for the purpose of collecting men and money. It would appear to have been in the course of this cruize that he formed an intimacy with Amyntas, king of Macedonia, who made him a present of a quantity of timber for a house which he was building in the Peiraeeus. A considerable time, however, was expended in these preliminary operations, the danger of losing Corcyra was becoming more and more imminent, and Timotheus, being accused by Iphicrates and Callistratus, was deposed from his command, and recalled to Athens to stand his trial. This came on in the autumn of the same year, and he obtained an acquittal principally through the intervention of Jason of Pherae, and Alcetas, king of Epeirus, who had come to Athens to intercede for him. In the oration against him written for Apollodorus, son of Pasion, and ascribed to Demosthenes, there are many statements connected with the circumstances of Timotheus at this period, which we must of course regard with suspicion; but we learn from it certainly that he was now reduced to great pecuniary embarrassments, having probably expended his money in the public service, and was even compelled to borrow from Pasion wherewithal to receive his distinguished guests above mentioned (Xen. Hell. vi. 2. §§ 11—13; Diod. xv. 47; Dem. c. Tim. pp. 1186—1192, &c.; Corn. Nep. Tim. 4). In the following year (B. C. 372) he entered into the service of Artaxerxes II., king of Persia, and went to command against Nectanabis I. in Egypt; but of his operations in this quarter we have no record (Dem. c. Tim. pp. 1191, 1192, 1195). It appears to have been about B. C. 367 that he was sent by the Athenians to aid ARIOBARZANES, with an injunction, however, not to abet him in any enterprise against the king, his master; and accordingly, when he found that he was in open revolt from Artaxerxes, he refused to give him any assistance. He did not, however, consider himself precluded from besieging Samos, which was occupied by a Persian garrison under Cyprothemis, and, if he had felt any scruples, the rescript of the king, so favourable to Thebes at the expense of Athens, must have removed them [PELOPIDAS; LEON, No. 6]. The attack on the island was successful, and at the end of eleven months Samos was restored to the Athenian alliance. Timotheus then sailed northward, and took the towns of Sestus and Crithote on the Hellespont, acquisitions which, according to Isocrates, first directed the attention of the Athenians to the recovery of the whole Chersonesus. If we may believe Cornelius Nepos, he was placed in possession of these two places by Ariobarzanes, as a reward for his services to him; but it is not easy to reconcile this statement with the account of Demosthenes, as given above, of his refusal to help the rebel satrap. (Dem. pro Rhod. Lib. pp. 192, 193; Isocr. περὶ Ἀντιδ. §§ 118, &c.; Corn. Nep. Tim. 1; Pseudo-Arist. Oec. ii. 23; Polyaen. iii. 10.)

These successes, coupled probably with their jealousy of Iphicrates as the son-in-law of Cotys, seem to have mainly induced the Athenians to appoint Timotheus instead of him as commander in Macedonia (B. C. 364), where the recovery of Amphipolis was the great object of their wishes. In the interval between the recall of Iphicrates and the arrival of Timotheus, the Athenian forces were commanded by Callisthenes, whose disadvantageous treaty with Perdiccas III. of Macedonia contributed perhaps to hamper the new general, when he came on the scene of action. Timotheus, on taking the command, endeavoured to secure the services of the adventurer Charidemus, but the latter passed over to the service of Cotys, in ships with which the Athenians themselves had furnished him; and it was now perhaps that, despairing of any effectual assault on Amphipolis, Timotheus turned his arms against the Olynthians, from whom, with the help of king Perdiccas, he took Potidaea and Torone; and followed up these successes, if we may believe Isocrates, his friend and panegyrist, with the capture of all the Chalcidian towns. It was in the same year, if we adopt the chronology of Diodorus, that he rejected an application from the nobles of Heracleia on the Euxine to aid them against the people; and in the same year, too, he relieved Cyzicus from a siege in which it was hard pressed, perhaps by the Persian garrison, which the citizens had ejected, perhaps, according to a conjecture of Mitford, by the armament of Epaminondas, who at the time was endeavouring to make Thebes a naval power, and to contest with Athens the sovereignty of the sea. The chronology, however, of the operations of Timotheus at this period is very uncertain; but on the whole it appears probable, following the views of Rehdantz, in preference to those of Thirlwall, that his campaign in the Chersonesus against Cotys was subsequent to his attempt on Amphipolis. The latter turned out an utter failure, the enemy having collected against him with numbers so superior, that he found it necessary to burn his ships on the Strymon, and to make his retreat by land. He was more successful, however, in the war with Cotys, who was probably assisted by the Byzantians (B. C. 363?), and gathered from his territory booty to the value of 1200 talents. (Dem. Olynth. ii. p. 22, iii. p. 36; Schol. Aug. ad loc.; Dem. c. Arist. pp. 669, 670; Aesch. de Fals. Leg. p. 32; Isocr. περὶ Ἀντιδ. § 119; Deinarch. c. Dem. p. 91, c. Philocl. p. 110; Diod. xv. 81; Pseudo-Arist. Oec. l. c.; Polyaen. iii. 10; Just. xvi. 4; C. Nep. Tim. 1; Mitford's Greece, vol. v. p. 220; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. v. pp. 189, 193, 206, 217, 218; Rehdantz, pp. 132, &c.) [CHARIDEMUS; CLEARCHUS.]

At this period Timotheus would probably be at the height of his glory and popularity, not only among the Athenians, but with many of the other Greeks, a popularity, however, not unmixed with envy, if we may believe the anecdote related by Aelian, that painters were wont to represent him as sleeping in his tent, while Fortune, standing over his head, drew cities for him into a net. (Dem. c. Lept. pp. 482, 483; Isocr. Ep. ad Myt. p. 426; Paus. i. 3; Ael. V. H. xiii. 43; Plut. Reg. et Imp. Apoph. Tim. 1.) It seems most likely also that at this time, about B. C. 360, he increased his political influence by a reconciliation with Iphicrates, to whose son Menestheus he gave his daughter in marriage. [IPHICRATES; MENESTHEUS.] To the suit instituted against him by Apollodorus, the son of Pasion, for sundry sums of money alleged to have been borrowed by him from the latter, it is not possible to assign any exact date; but there is no period at which it can be fixed more satisfactorily than between B. C. 360 and 356. The oration, written for the plaintiff on this occasion, and ascribed to Demosthenes, is still extant. (See Rehdantz, pp. 195, 196.) In B. C. 358, when the Thebans had sent a military force over to Euboea, Timotheus, by an energetic appeal and fervid eloquence, incited the Athenians to raise an armament for the purpose of opposing them there, and saving their own interests in the island. (Diod. xvi. 7; Dem. Olynth. i. p. 11, de Chers. p. 108, c. Androt. p. 597; Aesch. c. Ctes. p. 65.) In the following year the Social War broke out; and in the second campaign of it (B. C. 356) Timotheus, Iphicrates, and Menestheus were joined with Chares as commanders of the Athenian fleet. The circumstances which followed are variously related. According to Diodorus, Chares vainly endeavoured to induce his colleagues to engage the enemy in a storm, and, on their refusal, wrote to the people, accusing them of treachery. The account of C. Nepos is that Chares, having risked a battle in spite of the weather, was defeated, and, in order to screen himself, laid the blame on the other generals for not supporting him. Any how they were recalled, and Iphicrates and Menestheus were brought to trial first, the prosecution being conducted by Aristophon the Azenian. They were acquitted; but Timotheus was nevertheless afterwards arraigned, probably in B. C. 354, and condemned to the crushing fine of 100 talents (more than 24,000*l.*). From Deinarchus we learn that the main charge against him was the having received bribes from the Chians and Rhodians, and the truth of this, if we follow the common reading in the passage (Dein. c. Dem. p. 92), he himself confessed. According to Isocrates, his condemnation was caused chiefly by his haughty and unbending demeanour, and by his refusal to pay court to the people and the popular orators. Be that as it may, he was unable to pay the fine, and withdrew to Chalcis in Euboea, where he died shortly after. The Athenians subsequently remitted nine-tenths of the penalty, and allowed his son Conon to expend the remainder on the repair of the walls, which the famous Conon had restored. (Isocr. Περὶ Ἀντιδ. §§ 137, &c.; Diod. xvi. 21; C. Nep. Tim. 3, 4; Deinarch. c. Philocl. p. 110; Ael. V. H. iii. 47, xiv. 3; Perizon. ad loc.)

The character of Timotheus was marked by mildness and amiability, even though we should set against this the haughtiness and the somewhat presumptuous self-reliance which his brilliant successes seem to have produced in him. Like his contemporaries Chabrias and Chares, he preferred residing abroad when he could,—a preference which may be ascribed at least as much to the glaring evils of the Athenian democracy as to the luxurious propensities which have been, on no very strong grounds, imputed to him. The eloquence and learning which were united with his military talents, must be traced in a great measure to his intimate friendship with Isocrates, who frequently attended him in his campaigns, and wrote his despatches for him. As a general he possessed some of the highest qualities, and held in contempt that fiery rashness which, as in the case of Chabrias, forgets the special duties of the commander in the mere dashing gallantry of the soldier. (Ael. V. H. ii. 10, 18; Ath. x. p. 419, c., d., xii. p. 532, b.; Cic. Tusc. Quaest. v. 35, de Orat. iii. 34, de Off. i. 32; Nep. Chabr. 3; Plut. Sull. 6, Reg. et Imp. Apoph. Tim. 2.)

3. Son of Clearchus, the tyrant of Heracleia on the Euxine. After the death of his father in B. C. 353, he succeeded to the sovereignty, under the guardianship, at first, of his uncle Satyrus, and held the rule for fifteen years. There is extant a letter addressed to him by Isocrates, in which the rhetorician commends him for his good qualities, gives him some very common-place advice, and recommends to his notice a friend of his, named Autocrator, the bearer of the epistle. (Diod. xvi. 36; Wess. ad loc.; Memn. ap. Phot. Bibl. 224; Isocr. Ep. ad Tim.) [CLEARCHUS.]

4. An Athenian, of the priestly family of the Eumolpidae, whom Ptolemy Lagi brought over to Egypt, to preside over and interpret religious rites and ceremonies. He was consulted by the king when, in consequence of a dream, he was contemplating the introduction of the foreign deity Serapis. (Tac. Hist. iv. 83; Plut. de Is. et Osir. 28.) [E. E.]

TIMO'THEUS (Τιμόθεος), literary. 1. An Athenian comic poet of the Middle Comedy, of whose plays we have the following titles, Κυνάριον (Ath. vi. p. 243, d; Suid.), Πύκτης, Παρακαταθήκη, and Μεταβαλλόμενος or Μεταφερόμενος. The only fragments of his dramas extant are the three lines quoted by Athenaeus from the first of the above plays, and three other lines, without the title of the comedy to which they belong (Append. Florent. ad Stob. p. 23. 7, ed. Gaisford). Three of the above titles are identical with those of plays ascribed to other poets; namely, there is a Πύκτης by Timocles, a Παρακαταθήκη by Aristophon, Sopater, Sophilus, and Timostratus, and a Μεταφερόμενος by Poseidippus. The Κύκλωψ, which Harless adds to the list of the comedies of Timotheus, is evidently the title of a work of the celebrated dithyrambic poet Timotheus. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 505; Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. p. 428, vol. ii. p. 589; Editio Minor, p. 798.)

2. The celebrated musician and poet of the later Athenian dithyramb, was a native of Miletus, and the son of Thersander (Steph. Byz. s. v. Μίλητος; Marm. Par. Ep. 77; Alex. Aetol. ap. Macrob. Sat. v. 22; Suid. s. v.). Suidas calls him a son of Thersander, or Neomysus, or Philopolis; but, as Schmidt observes, when Suidas mentions several names for a person's father, the first is usually the one which he has obtained from the best authorities; and the same scholar has suggested that the name Νεομύσου should perhaps be read Νεομούσου, which is very likely to be the invention of a comic poet, in allusion to the innovations made by Timotheus in music. (Diatribe in Dithyramb. pp. 96, 97.)

The date of Timotheus is marked by the ancients with tolerable precision. According to the Parian marble, he died in B. C. 357, in the ninetieth year of his age, which would place his birth in B. C. 446; but Suidas (s. v.) says that he lived ninety-seven years. The period at which he flourished is described by Suidas as about the times of Euripides, and of Philip of Macedon; and he is placed by Diodorus with Philoxenus, Telestes, and Polyeidus, at Ol. 95, B. C. 398. (Diod. xiv. 46). The absence of any mention of Timotheus by Aristophanes (unless we suppose him to have been one of the many Timothei who, as the Scholiast on the Plutus, v. 180, tells us, were attacked by the poet) is a proof that he could not have attained to much eminence before the date mentioned by Diodorus; but yet it must have been before that year that his innovations in music began to attract public attention; for we have the testimony not only of Suidas, but also of Plutarch (see below) to the fact of his commencing his career during the life-time of Euripides, and we have also the decisive evidence of the celebrated passage from the comic poet Pherecrates, in which the musicians of the day are violently attacked as corrupters of the art (Plut. de Mus. 30, p. 1141, f.; Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 326—335). It is evident that this attack was aimed principally at Timotheus, whom the personification of Music mentions last of all, as having inflicted more numerous and more serious injuries upon her than either of his predecessors, Melanippides, Cinesias, or Phrynis. The following are the lines referring to him:—

> ὁ δὲ Τιμόθεός μ', ὦ φιλτάτη, κατορώρυχεν
> καὶ διακέκναικ' αἴσχιστα. Δ. Ποῖος οὑτοσὶ
> Τιμόθεος; Μ. Μιλήσιός τις Πυῤῥίας *
> κακά μοι παρέσχεν· οὗτος ἅπαντας οὓς λέγω > παρελήλυθ', ᾄδων ἐκτραπέλους μυρμηκιὰς > ἐξαρμονίους ὑπερβολαίους τ' ἀνοσίους, > καὶ νιγλάρους, ὥσπερ τε τὰς ῥαφάνους ὅλην > κάμπτων με κατεμέστωσε . . . . . .
> κἂν ἐντύχῃ πού μοι βαδιζούσῃ μόνῃ, > ἀπέδυσε κἀνέλυσε χορδαῖς δώδεκα.

Respecting the details of his life we have very little information. He is said to have spent some time at the Macedonian court; and reference will presently be made to a visit which he paid to Sparta. He appears to have formed his musical style chiefly on that of Phrynis, who was also a native of Miletus, and over whom he on one occasion gained a victory. He was at first unfortunate in his professional efforts. Even the Athenians, fond as they were of novelty, and accustomed as they were to the modern style of music introduced by Melanippides, Phrynis, and the rest, were offended at the still bolder innovations of Timotheus, and hissed off his performance. On this occasion it is said that Euripides encouraged Timotheus by the prediction that he would soon have the theatres at his feet (Plut. An seni sit gerend. Respub. 23, p. 795, c. d.). This prediction appears to have been accomplished in the vast popularity which Timotheus afterwards enjoyed. Plutarch records his exultation at his victory over Phrynis (De se ipsum laudand. 1, p. 539, b. c.); and even when, on one occasion, he was conquered by Philotas, a disciple of Polyïdus, he could console himself with the rebuke administered to the boasting master of his successful competitor by the witty Stratonicus, ὅτι αὐτὸς μὲν (i. e. Polyïdus) ψηφίσματα ποιεῖ, Τιμόθεος δὲ νόμους. (Ath. viii. p. 352, b.: the point of the saying is in the double meaning of νόμους, laws and musical strains, and is untranslateable into English.) The Ephesians rewarded him, for his dedicatory hymn to Artemis, with the sum of a thousand pieces of gold (Alex. Aetol. ap. Macrob. Sat. v. 22): the last accomplishment, by which the education of the Arcadian youth was finished, was learning the nomes of Timotheus and Philoxenus (Polyb. iv. 20; Ath. xiv. p. 626, c.): and there is still extant a decree of the Cnossians, probably of the second century B. C., in which Timotheus and Polyïdus are mentioned with the highest praise, and their names associated with those of the ancient Cretan poets (see Polyidus, p. 467, b.). Timotheus died in Macedonia, according to Stephanus of Byzantium (l. c.), who has preserved the following epitaph upon him. (Also in Jacobs, Anth. Pal. App. No. 295, vol. ii. p. 851.)

> Πάτρα Μίλητος τίκτει Μούσαισι ποθεινὸν

The general character of the music of Timotheus, and the nature of his innovations, are pretty clearly described in the fragment of Pherecrates above quoted, and in other passages of the ancient writers. He delighted in the most artificial and intricate forms of musical expression, "windings like the passages in ant-hills" (Pherecr. l. c.): he used instrumental music, without a vocal accompaniment, to a greater extent than any previous composer (at least if Ulrici is right in his interpretation of the words μόνῃ βαδιζούσῃ in Pherecrates): and, in direct opposition to the ancient practice, he preferred the chromatic to the other genera of music, and employed it to such an extent, as to be by some considered its inventor. (Boëth. de Mus. i. 1, p. 1372, ed. Basil.) But perhaps the most important of his innovations, as the means of introducing all the others, was his addition to the number of the strings of the cithara. Respecting the precise nature of that addition the ancient writers are not agreed; but it is most probable, from the whole evidence, that the lyre of Timotheus had eleven strings. The eight-stringed cithara, formed by the addition of the chord of the octave which was wanting in the heptachord of Terpander, was used in the time of Pindar [Terpander]. The ninth string appears to have been added by Phrynis (Plut. Apophtheg. Lacon. p. 220, c.). There were already ten strings to the cithara in the time of Ion of Chios, the contemporary of Sophocles (Ion, Epigr. ap. Euclid. Introd. Harmon. p. 19, ed. Meibom.); and the conjecture appears therefore probable that the tenth was added by Melanippides. There remains, therefore, only the eleventh string to be ascribed to Timotheus, for it is most probable that the mention of a twelve-stringed lyre, in the above passage of Pherecrates, according to the present text, arises from some error, and the word ἕνδεκα may be substituted for δώδεκα in the last verse, without injuring the metre. The positive testimonies for ascribing the eleventh string to Timotheus, are that of Suidas (s. v.), who, however, makes him the inventor of the tenth string also, which the testimony of Ion proves to be an error; and the tradition that, when Timotheus visited Sparta, and entered the musical contest at the Carneia, one of the Ephors snatched away his lyre, and cut from it the strings, four in number, by which it exceeded the seven-stringed lyre of Terpander, and, as a memorial of this public vindication of the ancient simplicity of music, and for a warning to future innovators, the Lacedaemonians hung up the mutilated lyre of Timotheus in their Scias. (Paus. iii. 12. § 8; Plut. Instit. Lacon. 17, p. 238, c., Agis, 10; Artemon. ap. Ath. xiv. p. 636, e.; Cic. de Legg. ii. 15; the number of the additional strings is only stated in the first of these passages, but, besides the agreement of that number with the other evidence, it must be remembered that Pausanias actually saw the lyre hanging in the Scias at Sparta). It is quite a mistake to argue, in the spirit of a pseudo-rationalistic criticism, against the truth of this tradition, from the fact of the very same story being told about the nine-stringed lyre of Phrynis (Plut. Agis, 10. Apophth. Lacon. p. 220, c.); for the conduct ascribed to the Ephor is so characteristic of the state of Spartan feelings with reference to the ancient music, that we may easily believe such an incident to have occurred every time that the attempt was made to violate that feeling; so that the two stories rather confirm one another; and, moreover, they are mentioned together, as two distinct events, by Plutarch (Agis, 10). The tradition is also embodied, with other particulars of the innovations of Timotheus, in the alleged decree of the Spartans, preserved by Boëthius (de Mus. l. c.). It has been, however, very clearly proved, that this decree is the forgery of a grammarian of an unknown date. (See especially Müller, Dor. b. iv. c. 6. § 3, vol. ii. pp. 316—319, ed. Schneidewin). Still it is of importance, as embodying what the grammarian, who forged it, had collected from the ancient writers respecting the musical innovations of Timotheus. The substance of it is an order to the Ephors to censure Timotheus the Milesian, for that he had dishonoured the ancient music, and had corrupted the ears of the youth by deserting the seven-stringed lyre, and introducing a multiplicity of strings, and a novelty of melodies, in which ignoble and diversified strains took the place of the old simple and sustained movements, and by changing the genus from the Enharmonic to the Chromatic as an Antistrophic variation, and also for that, when invited to perform at the festival of the Eleusinian Demeter, he had given an indecent representation of the myth, and had improperly taught the youth the travail of Semele; and, besides this censure, he was to be ordered to cut away the strings of his lyre which exceeded seven.

* The meaning of this epithet is doubtful. See Schmidt, pp. 97, 98, and Lehrs, Quaest Epic. pp. 20, 21.

Suidas (s. v.) describes his style in general terms as a softening of the ancient music (τὴν ἀρχαίαν μουσικὴν ἐπὶ τὸ μαλακώτερον μετήγαγεν). And Plutarch mentions him, with Crexus and Philoxenus, and the other poets of that age, as φορτικώτεροι καὶ φιλόκαινοι, and as especially addicted to the style called τὸν φιλάνθρωπον καὶ θεματικόν (de Mus. 12. p. 1135, d.).

With regard to the subjects of his compositions, and the manner in which he treated them, we have abundant evidence that he even went beyond the other musicians of the period in the liberties which he took with the ancient myths, in the attempt to make his music imitative as well as expressive, and in the confusion of the different subjects and department of lyric poetry; in one word, in the application of that false principle, which also misled his friend Euripides, that pleasure is the end of poetry. Unfortunately the fragments of the poems of Timotheus and the other musicians of the period are insufficient to guide us to a full knowledge of their style; but we can judge of its general character by the choral parts of the tragedies of Euripides, and by the description of Plato (de Legg. iii. p. 700, e.), aided by the ancient testimonies, and the few fragments collected by later writers. The subject is well, though briefly, treated by Müller (Hist. of Lit. of Anc. Greece, vol. ii. pp. 61, 62), who remarks that in the late dithyramb "there was no unity of thought; no one tone pervading the whole poem, so as to preserve in the minds of the hearers a consistent train of feelings; no subordination of the story to certain ethical ideas; no artificially constructed system of verses regulated by fixed laws; but a loose and wanton play of lyrical sentiments, which were set in motion by the accidental impulses of some mythical story, and took now one direction, now another; preferring, however, to seize on such points as gave room for an immediate imitation in tones, and admitting a mode of description which luxuriated in sensual charms." And a little above (p. 60)—"At the same time the dithyramb assumed a descriptive, or, as Aristotle says, a mimetic character (μεταβολή). The natural phenomena which it described were imitated by means of tunes and rhythms and the pantomimic gesticulations of the actors (as in the antiquated Hyporcheme); and this was very much aided by a powerful instrumental accompaniment, which sought to represent with its loud full tones the raging elements, the voices of wild beasts, and other sounds. A parasite wittily observed of one of these storm-dithyrambs of Timotheus, that 'he had seen greater storms than those which Timotheus made in many a kettle of boiling water' (Ath. viii. p. 338, a.)." A striking example of this mimetic and sensuous mode of representation is furnished by the dithyramb of Timotheus, entitled "the Travail of Semele" (Σεμέλης ὠδίν), which is censured in the pseudo-Lacedaemonian decree already quoted, and on one passage of which Stratonicus is said to have asked, "If she had been bringing forth a mechanic, and not a god, what sort of cries would she have uttered?" (Ath. viii. p. 352, a.; comp. Dio Chrysost. Orat. 77, p. 426, ed. Reiske.)

The language of Timotheus was redundant and luxuriant, as we see by a fragment from his Cyclops, preserved by Athenaeus (xi. p. 465, d.). Of the boldness of his metaphors we have a specimen, in his calling a shield φιάλην Ἄρεος, for which he was attacked by the comic poet Antiphanes (Ath. x. p. 433, c.), and which Aristotle has noticed no less than three times (Poet. xxi. 12, Rhet. iii. 4, 11). There is another example of his bold figures in a fragment of Anaxandrides (Ath. x. p. 455, f.). In the celebrated passage of Aristotle respecting the representation of actual and ideal characters, in poetry and painting (Poet. 2), reference is made to "the Persae and Cyclopes of Timotheus and Philoxenus;" but unfortunately there is nothing in the present text to show which of the two poets Aristotle meant to represent as the more ideal.

Like all the dithyrambic poets of the age, Timotheus composed works in every species of lyric poetry, and that in such a manner as to confound the distinctions between the several species, mingling Threnes with Hymns, Paeans with Dithyrambs, and even performing on the lyre the music intended for the flute (Plato, de Legg. l. c.). The crowning step in this process appears to have been that which is ascribed to Timotheus alone, namely, the giving a dithyrambic tone and expression to the Nomes, which seem to have been hitherto preserved almost in their original form, and the adapting them to be sung by a chorus, instead of by a single performer (Plut. de Mus. 4, p. 1132, d.; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 365).

The account which has now been given of the character of Timotheus as a musician and a poet must not be misunderstood. It is one thing to judge an artist by pure aesthetic standards, or by a comparison with the severe simplicity of an early stage of the development of his art; it is quite another thing to form a genial estimate of his character with reference to the prevailing taste of the times in which he lived, or to the impression he would probably make on the mind of our own age. There was undoubtedly great power and beauty in the compositions of Timotheus, and if they could be restored, even as mere writings, and much more if they could be reproduced as they were publicly performed, they would certainly excite our admiration, whatever might be the judgment of calm criticism. The few fragments which have come down to us afford ample proof of this. Such a line, for instance, as that with which he led off his nome entitled Persae, bears upon it the impress of the true poet. (Paus. viii. 50. § 3; Plut. Philopoem. 11.)

He composed, according to Stephanus of Byzantium (l. c.), eighteen books of citharoedic nomes, containing eight thousand verses, and προνόμια αὐλῶν χίλια, according to the correction of Gronovius, αὐλῶν for ἄλλων, and, perhaps too, for προνόμια we should read προοίμια, but even so the meaning is not very clear, for we have no account of any flute-music by Timotheus: possibly there is some confusion between him and the flute-player of the same name, who lived in the time of Alexander the Great. Suidas gives a much fuller account of his works, and ascribes to him nineteen Musical Nomes, thirty-six Prooems, eight Diasceuae (διασκευαί, which Meineke supposes to mean compositions by other poets, which Timotheus recast and adapted to his own style of music, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. p. 32), eighteen Dithyrambs, twenty-one Hymns, some Encomiums, and other works; and, besides this general classification of his works, Suidas mentions the following special titles, Ἄρτεμις, Πέρσαι ἢ Ναύπλιος, Φινεΐδαι, Λαέρτης. Probably, instead of Πέρσαι ἢ Ναύπλιος, we ought to read Πέρσαι, Ναύτιλος, as two distinct titles, for the Ναύτιλος of Timotheus is quoted by Athenaeus (viii. p. 338) and by Eustathius (ad Od. v. p. 1588). The Κύκλωψ, which appears to have been one of the most celebrated of his Dithyrambs, has already been referred to. The few extant fragments of these poems are collected by Bergk, Poetae Lyrici Graeci, pp. 860—863, and by Kayser, Diatribe in Dithyrambum, pp. 96—120. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 747, vol. ii. p. 325; Müller, Hist. of Lit. of Anc. Greece, vol. ii. pp. 59—62; Ulrici, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. ii. pp. 604—610; Bode, vol. ii.; Bernhardy, Gesch. d. Griech. Litt. vol. ii. pp. 551—554; Kayser, l. c.; Clinton, Fast. Hellen. vol. ii. s. aa. 398, 357).

3. A very distinguished flute-player of Thebes, concerning whom a few particulars are mentioned in Lucian's dialogue Harmonides, in which Timotheus is introduced as discoursing to his disciple Harmonides concerning the means of obtaining success in his art. We learn from Suidas that Timotheus flourished under Alexander the Great, on whom his music made so powerful an impression that once in the midst of a performance by Timotheus, of an Orthian Nome to Athena, he started from his seat, and seized his arms. (Suid. s. vv. Ἀλέξανδρος, Ὀρθιασμάτων, Τιμόθεος.) We have a suspicion, notwithstanding the opinions of eminent scholars, that this Timotheus has been invented, through a series of confusions, out of the celebrated Milesian musician; but it is impossible in such a work as this to discuss every complicated question of criticism which may present itself.

4. A philosopher, follower of Patron the Epicurean, is mentioned by Strabo among the distinguished natives of Sinope (xii. p. 546; the words are Τιμόθεον τὸν Πατρίωνα).

5. Of Athens, the author of a biographical work, from which Diogenes Laërtius (iii. 5, iv. 3, v. 1, vii. 1) quotes statements respecting Plato, Speusippus, Aristotle, and Zeno. Nothing is known of his age, unless these references be supposed to furnish any guide to it. Vossius is probably right in supposing him to be a different person from the Timotheus whose Ἀργολικά and the eleventh book of whose work on Rivers are quoted by Plutarch (de Fluv. 18. 3), and also different from the writer to whom Eustathius (ad Dion. Perieg. 421) refers (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 507, ed. Westermann.)

6. A mythological writer, from whom Arnobius (v. 5) quotes some statements respecting the Phrygian worship of the mother of the gods. (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 506, ed. Westermann.)

7. Of Gaza, an eminent grammarian, in the time of the emperor Anastasius, whose financial administration he is said to have attacked in a tragedy entitled Χρυσάργυρος, of which no fragments are extant. He flourished therefore at the end of the fifth century of our era. He also wrote a poem in epic verse, and in four books, on the quadrupeds of India, Arabia, Egypt, and Libya, and on foreign and extraordinary birds and serpents. (Suid. s. v.; Tzetz. Chil. iv. 128.)

8. Bishop of Alexandria towards the close of the fourth century, was distinguished for his opposition to Gregory of Nazianzus. He succeeded his brother Peter in the see of Alexandria in A. D. 379, and was present at the second general council at Constantinople, in the year 381, where he was one of the most active agents in the attack upon Gregory of Nazianzus, which caused the retirement of that great and good man, and in the appointment of his successor Nectarius. He died in A. D. 385. He wrote a work on the lives of the fathers and monks, which is quoted by Sozomen (H. E. vi. 25), but is now lost. (Cave, Hist. Litt. s. a. 380, p. 274, ed. Basil.; Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. vol. x. pp. 138—293; Clinton, Fast. Rom. s. a. 381).

Notices of some other ecclesiastics and Christian writers of the name will be found in the works of Cave, Fabricius, and Schröckh. None of them seem to require specific mention, except a chronographer, who is quoted by G. Cedrenus and Jo. Malala. (See Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 507, ed. Westermann.) [P. S.]

TIMO'THEUS (Τιμόθεος), a statuary and sculptor, whose country is not mentioned, but who evidently belonged to the later Attic school of the time of Scopas and Praxiteles; for he was one of the artists who executed the bas-reliefs which adorned the frieze of the Mausoleum, about Ol. 107, B. C. 352. Timotheus sculptured the southern side of the frieze, the other three sides being wrought by Scopas, Bryaxis, and Leochares. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4. § 9; Vitruv. vii. Praef. § 12; SCOPAS; Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Mausoleum, 2d ed.) This statement also shows the eminence of Timotheus as an artist; for Pliny expressly tells us that it was an undetermined question, which of the four artists had been the most successful (hodieque certant manus). It must, however, be mentioned, that the Greek writers on the Mausoleum were not agreed as to the share of Timotheus in its execution, some ascribing to Praxiteles that side of the frieze which others assigned to our artist. (Vitruv. l. c.)

The Artemis of Timotheus was esteemed worthy to be placed by the side of the Apollo of Scopas and the Latona of Praxiteles, in the temple which Augustus erected to Apollo on the Palatine (Plin. l. c. § 10; the lines of Propertius, describing these statues, are quoted under SCOPAS, p. 756, b.). The head of this statue, however, was only a restoration by Aulanius Evander. (Plin. l. c.)

Pausanias (ii. 32. § 3. s. 4) mentions Timotheus as the maker of a statue at Troezen, which the Troezenians themselves believed to represent Hippolytus, but which he considered to be the statue of Asclepius. Pliny also enumerates Timotheus among the artists who made athletas et armatos et venatores sacrificantesque (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 34). There is no ground for the doubt expressed by Sillig respecting the identity of the Timotheus referred to in all these passages. It is quite true that the artists of the later Attic school of sculpture wrought chiefly in marble; but there is sufficient evidence that they also practised the art of casting in bronze. [P. S.]

TIMO'XENUS (Τιμόξενος). 1. The commander of the troops of Scione, attempted to betray Potidaea to the Persians in B. C. 480, but his treachery was discovered. (Herod. viii. 128; Polyaen. vii. 33. § 1; Aeneas Tact. Poliorcet. p. 31.)

2. Son of Timocrates, was one of the commanders of the Corinthian force sent to Acarnania in B. C. 431. (Thuc. ii. 33.)

3. The Achaean, was general of the Achaean League in B. C. 223, in which year he obtained possession of Argos, and successfully resisted the efforts of Cleomenes to recover it. In B. C. 221 he was again general of the League; but in consequence of the want of discipline and practice among the Achaean troops, he was unwilling to undertake the command of the war against the Aetolians; and accordingly a few days before the expiration of the office, he resigned it to Aratus, who was already general elect. He was a candidate for the office again in B. C. 218, and was supported by Aratus, but he was not elected in consequence of the influence of Apelles, the minister of Philip V., who wished to mortify Aratus. He was however general again in B. C. 216, after the termination of the Social War. (Polyb. ii. 53, iv. 6, 7, 82, v. 106; Plut. Cleom. 20, Arat. 38, 47.)

T. TINCA, of Placentia, was celebrated for his wit, but was no match for Granius. (Cic. Brut. 46.) [GRANIUS, No. 1.]

TINEIUS CLEMENS, consul under Septimius Severus, A. D. 195, with Scapula Tertullus. (Dig. 27. tit. 9. s. 1; Cod. 9. tit. 1. s. 1.)

TINEIUS SACERDOS. [SACERDOS.]

TIPHYS (Τῖφυς), a son of Agnius or of Phorbas and Hyrmine, of Siphae or Tiphae in Boeotia, was the helmsman of the ship Argo. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 105; Paus. ix. 32. § 3; Apollod. i. 9. § 22; Hygin. Fab. 14; Schol. ad Apollon. l. c.) [L. S.]

TIRESIAS. [TEIRESIAS.]

TIRIBAZUS or TERIBAZUS (Τιρίβαζος, Τηρίβαζος), a Persian, high in the favour of Artaxerxes II. (Mnemon), and when he was present, so Xenophon tells us, no one else had the honour of helping the sovereign to mount his horse. At the time of the retreat of the 10,000, in B. C. 401, Tiribazus was satrap of Western Armenia, and, when the Greeks had reached the river Teleboas on the frontier of his territory, he himself rode up to their camp and proposed a truce, on condition that both parties should abstain from molesting each other, the Greeks taking only what they needed while in his country. The terms were accepted, but Tiribazus kept watching the 10,000 at the distance of several stadia with the intent of assailing them in a mountain pass, through which their march necessarily lay. On hearing this, the main body of the Greeks hastened to secure the pass, and, having moreover attacked the camp of Tiribazus, put the barbarians to flight, and captured the tent of the satrap himself (Xen. Anab. iv. 4. §§ 4—7, 16—21, 5. § 1, vii. 8. § 25; Diod. xiv. 27.) Tiribazus succeeded Tithraustes as satrap of Western Asia, and in this office we find him in B. C. 393, when Antalcidas was sent to negotiate, through him, a peace for Sparta with the Persian king. The satrap was convinced by Antalcidas that it was expedient for Artaxerxes to support the Lacedaemonians, and he accordingly gave them all the help which he could venture to furnish without express authority from his master. We do not know the cause which led to Tiribazus being superseded by Struthas, in B. C. 392; but by B. C. 388 he had returned to his satrapy. He then co-operated cordially, as before, with Antalcidas, perhaps accompanied him to the Persian court to support his cause there, and, having summoned, on his return, a congress of deputies from Greek states, he promulgated in the king's name the famous decree which laid down the terms of the peace of Antalcidas (Xen. Hell. iv. 8. §§ 12, &c., v. 1. §§ 6, 25—31; Diod. xiv. 85). [ANTALCIDAS; CONON; STRUTHAS.] In B. C. 386 he was appointed to command the Persian fleet against Evagoras, the land forces being entrusted to Orontes. They defeated Evagoras, and formed the siege of Salamis; but Tiribazus was impeached by Orontes, and was recalled to court to answer for his conduct, B. C. 385. The accounts of what followed, as given by Diodorus and Plutarch, it is not very easy to reconcile. The former seems to intimate that Tiribazus was detained in prison until the return of Artaxerxes from his expedition against the Cadusii; while Plutarch tells us that he accompanied the king in his campaign, and did good service by exciting mutual suspicion against one another in the two Cadusian kings, and so inducing them separately to sue for peace. The language of Plutarch, however, implies that during the expedition in question Tiribazus was in disgrace, and it appears therefore that his trial did not take place until the king's return. It came on before three judges of the highest reputation, whose sense of impartiality would be also quickened by the recollection that some of their predecessors had been recently flayed alive for an unjust sentence, and that the judgment-seat was now covered with their skins. Tiribazus triumphantly disposed of the charges against him, and was honourably acquitted with the full approbation of Artaxerxes, in consideration not only of his innocence in regard to the special charges, but also of the great services he had rendered to his master. (Diod. xv. 8—11; Wess. ad loc.; Plut. Artax. 24.) [EVAGORAS; GAOS; ORONTES.] He now stood higher than ever in the royal favour, and received a promise of the hand of Amestris, the king's daughter. Artaxerxes, however, broke faith with him, and married the lady himself; and, the royal word having been again pledged to him, and again broken in the same way, with respect to Atossa, the youngest of the princesses, Tiribazus was beyond measure exasperated, and incited Dareius, the son of Artaxerxes and his heir-elect, to join him in a plot against the king's life. The design was betrayed to Artaxerxes by an eunuch, and the conspirators, when they came to execute their purpose, found themselves foiled. Tiribazus offered a desperate resistance to the guards who endeavoured to arrest him, and was slain at length by a javelin hurled at him from a distance. (Plut. Artax. 27—29.) [ASPASIA, No. 2; DAREIUS.] [E. E.]

TIRIDA'TES or TERIDA'TES (Τηριδάτης), a common Eastern name, more particularly among the Parthians.

1. A beautiful eunuch, at whose death Artaxerxes was inconsolable. (Aelian, V. H. ii. 1.)

2. The guardian of the royal treasures at Persepolis, wrote to Alexander to inform him that the inhabitants wished to seize the treasures, and to beg him to march with all speed to the city. In consequence of this information Tiridates was left by Alexander in the same post which he had occupied under Dareius. He was afterwards made satrap of the Gedrosii and Arimaspi by Alexander. (Curt. v. 5, 6; Diod. xvii. 69, 81.)

3. The second king of Parthia. [ARSACES II.]

4. One of the royal race of the Arsacidae, was proclaimed king of Parthia in place of Phraates IV. (Arsaces XV.), whose cruelties had produced a rebellion of his subjects and led to his expulsion from his kingdom. Phraates, however, was restored to the throne soon afterwards, and Tiridates fled for refuge to Augustus, who refused to give him up to Phraates. This happened about B. C. 23. (Dion Cass. li. 18, liii. 33; Justin, xlii. 5; Hor. Carm. i. 26.) [ARSACES XV.]

5. Probably a grandson of Phraates IV., was set up by Tiberius in A. D. 35 as a claimant to the Parthian throne in opposition to Artabanus III. (Arsaces XIX.) The history of his war with Artabanus III. and of his short reign is related elsewhere. [ARSACES XIX.]

6. TIRIDATES I., king of Armenia, and brother of Vologeses I. (Arsaces XXIII.), king of Parthia. He was made king of Armenia by his brother, but was driven out of the kingdom by Corbulo, the Roman general, and finally received the Armenian crown from Nero at Rome in A. D. 63, as is more fully related in the life of Vologeses I. [ARSACES XXIII.]

7. TIRIDATES II., king of Armenia, was the son of the Armenian king Vologeses. He was in the power of the Romans, from whom he escaped, and fled for refuge to Vologeses V. (Arsaces XXX.), king of Parthia. The Parthians, however, surrendered him to Caracalla, when the latter demanded him in A. D. 215, and backed his demand with an army. Tiridates must, however, have again escaped from captivity, for we find him at a later time on the Armenian throne. Macrinus, who was unwilling to prosecute the war against him, which had been commenced by Caracalla, concluded a peace with him, and sent him the diadem. (Dion Cass. lxxvii. 19, 21, lxxviii. 27, with the notes of Reimarus.)

8. TIRIDATES III., king of Armenia, the son of Chosroes. His father was assassinated by the emissaries of Sapor I., king of Persia, who made Armenia a province of the Persian empire, and placed a certain Artavasdes on the throne, about A. D. 258. Tiridates, who was then an infant, was saved by the fidelity of a servant and carried to the Romans, by whom he was educated with great care. (Moses Choren. ii. 71, 73, 74.*) After he had lived under the protection of the Roman emperors for nearly thirty years, he was restored to the throne of his ancestors at the commencement of the reign of Diocletian. Although Tiridates displayed the greatest energy and courage, he was unable long to retain possession of his kingdom against the overwhelming power of the Persian monarchy. He was expelled from Armenia by Narses, and was obliged to take refuge a second time at the court of the Roman emperors. This led to a war between Rome and Persia, in which Narses was completely defeated and obliged to submit to a humiliating peace, A. D. 298. One of the conditions of this peace was the restoration of Tiridates to the Armenian throne. [SASSANIDAE, p. 717, a.] (Moses Choren. lib. ii.)

M. TIRO, a centurion, expelled from the army by Caesar, B. C. 47. (Hirt. B. Afr. 54.)

TIRO, API'NIUS, a man of praetorian rank, placed himself at the head of the fleet when it revolted from Vitellius to Vespasian in A. D. 69 but by the severe contributions which he levied in the municipia he did more harm than good to the cause of Vespasian. (Tac. Hist. iii. 57, 76.)

TIRO, CAELE'STRIUS, an intimate friend of the younger Pliny. They had served together as military tribunes, as quaestors and as praetors, and were in the habit of frequently residing in each other's houses. (Plin. Ep. vii. 16.) Four of Pliny's letters are addressed to him (Ep. i. 12, vi. 1, 22, ix. 5).

TIRO, NUMI'SIUS. [NUMISIUS, No. 5.]

TIRO, M. TU'LLIUS, the freedman and pupil of Cicero, to whom he was an object of the most devoted friendship and tender affection, appears to have been a man of very amiable disposition, and highly cultivated intellect. He was not only the amanuensis of the orator, and his assistant in literary labour, but was himself an author of no mean reputation, and notices of several works from his pen have been preserved by ancient writers. Thus we are told by A. Gellius (xiii. 9, comp. xii. 3) that he composed several books De Usu atque Ratione Linguae Latinae, and also De variis atque promiscuis Quaestionibus. It is added that on the most important of these he bestowed the Greek designation πανδέκται "tanquam omne rerum atque doctrinarum genus continentes," an interpretation of the title altogether rejected by Lersch, who believes the piece in question to have been a grammatical treatise on the adverb, which was termed πανδέκτης by the stoics (see Charis. p. 175, ed. Putsch.), and supports this view by a quotation from Charisius (p. 186): "Novissime Tiro in Pandecte non recte ait dici adiicitque quod suâ coeperit aetate id adverbium." On the other

* Zonaras speaks (xii. 21) of Tiridates as king of Armenia at this time, and says that after he fled to the Romans, his children joined the Persians; but this is clearly a mistake, for the subsequent narrative shows that the account of the Armenian historian is correct. See Gibbon, c. x. note 134.

sand, the passage extracted by Gellius relates entirely to the etymology of the word Suculae. Asconius Pedianus (in Milon. § 38) refers to the fourth book of a life of Cicero by Tiro, and he was perhaps the compiler of a collection of his jests mentioned by both Quintilian (vi. 3. § 2), and Macrobius (ii. 1). But we owe him a debt of gratitude which never can be adequately acknowledged if it be true, as many believe, that he was the chief agent in bringing together and arranging the works of his illustrious patron, and in preserving his correspondence from being dispersed and lost. (See Cic. ad Fam. xvi. 17, ad Att. xvi. 5.)

After the death of Cicero, Tiro purchased a farm in the neighbourhood of Puteoli, to which he retired and lived, according to Hieronymus, until he reached his hundredth year.

It is well known that the Romans under the empire were acquainted with a species of shorthand writing so as to be able to take down fully and correctly the words of public speakers, however rapid their enunciation (Martial. Ep. xiv. 202; Manil. Astron. iv. 197; Senec. Epist. 90). From a notice in the Eusebian chronicle, taken in combination with some observations in the Origines of Isidorus (i. 21), it has been inferred that Tiro was the inventor of the art, and although the expressions employed certainly do not warrant such a conclusion, yet abbreviations of this description, which are by no means uncommon in MSS. from the sixth century downwards, have very generally been designated by the learned as Notae Tironianae. The whole subject is very fully discussed in the Palaeographia Critica of Kopp, Pars Prima, 4to. Manh. 1817, p. 18, foll.

(See Cic. ad Att. iv. 6, vi. 7, vii. 2, 3, 5, xiii. 7, ad Fam. lib. xvi., the whole contents of this book being addressed to Tiro; Plut. Cic. 41, 49; Lersch, die Sprachphilosophie der Alten, 2te Theil, p. 46; Engelbronner, Disputatio hist. crit. de M. Tullio Tirone, 8vo. Amst. 1804; Lion, Tironiana, in Seebode's Archiv. für Philologie, 1824; Drumann, Geschichte Roms, vol. vi. p. 409.) [W.R.]

TIRYNS (Τίρυνς), according to Pausanias (ii. 25. § 7), a son of Argos, from whom the ancient city of Tiryns derived its name; according to Stephanus of Byzantium it derived its name from Tiryns, a daughter of Halus and sister of Amphitryon. [L. S.]

TISA'GORAS (Τισαγόρας), an artist who wrought in iron, and dedicated at Delphi a group made by himself in that material, representing the contest of Hercules with the hydra. Pausanias mentions this group as an admirable specimen of that most difficult kind of statuary in metal, but as to who Tisagoras was, he confesses himself entirely ignorant. (Paus. x. 18. § 5. s. 6.) [P. S.]

TISA'MENUS (Τισαμενός). 1. A son of Orestes and Hermione, was king of Argos, but was deprived of his kingdom when the Heracleidae invaded Peloponnesus. (Apollod. ii. 8. § 2; Paus. ii. 18. § 5, 38. § 1, vii. 6. § 2.) He was slain in a battle against the Heracleidae (Apollod. ii. 8. § 3), and his tomb was afterwards shown at Helice, whence at one time his remains were removed to Sparta by command of an oracle. (Paus. vii. 1. § 3.)

2. A son of Thersander and Demonassa, was king of Thebes, and the father of Autesion. (Paus. iii. 15. § 4, ix. 5. § 8; Herod. iv. 147.) [L. S.]

TISA'MENUS (Τισαμενός). 1. An Elean soothsayer, of the family of the Clytiadae, who seem to have been a branch of the Iamidae, if the received reading in Herodotus (ix. 33) is sound. (Comp. Philostr. Vit. Apoll. v. 25; Cic. de Div. i. 41.) According to the story told by Herodotus, Tisamenus had been assured by the Delphic oracle that he should be successful in five great conflicts. Supposing this to be a promise of distinction as an athlete, he devoted himself to gymnastic exercises, and on one occasion was very near winning the prize for the pentathlum at Olympia. The Spartans, however, understanding the oracle to refer, not to gymnastic, but to military victories, made great offers to Tisamenus to induce him to take with their kings the joint-command of their armies. This he refused to do on any terms short of receiving the full franchise of their city, whereupon the Spartans at first indignantly broke off the negotiation, but afterwards professed their readiness to yield the point. Tisamenus then rising in his demands, stipulated for the same privilege on behalf of his brother Hegias, and this also was granted him. He was present with the Spartans at the battle of Plataea, in B. C. 379, which, according to Herodotus, was the first of the five conflicts referred to by the oracle. The second was with the Argives and Tegeans at Tegea; the third, with all the Arcadians except the Mantineans, at Dipaea, in the Maenalian territory (both between B. C. 479 and 465); the fourth was the third Messenian War (B. C. 465—455); and the last was the battle of Tanagra, with the Athenians and their allies, in B. C. 457. (Herod. ix. 33—36; Müller, Dor. bk. i. ch. 9. §§ 9—11.)

2. A descendant apparently of the above, who took part in the plot of CINADON, and was put to death for it, in B. C. 397. (Xen. Hell. iii. 3. § 11.) [E. E.]

TISANDER (Τίσανδρος), a statuary of unknown country, who flourished at the end of the fifth century B. C., and made a large number of the statues in the group which the Lacedaemonians dedicated at Delphi out of the spoils of the victory of Aegospotami. (Paus. x. 9. § 4. s. 9.) [P. S.]

TI'SIAS, a Greek statuary, of whom nothing is known beyond the mention of his name in Pliny's list of those artists who made, in bronze, athletas et armatos et venatores sacrificantesque. (Plin. H. N xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 34.) [P. S.]

TISI'CRATES. 1. An eminent Greek statuary, of the school of Lysippus, to whose works those of Tisicrates so nearly approached, that many of them were scarcely to be distinguished from the works of the master. Such were his Theban Old Man, his King Demetrius, and his statue of Peucestes, who saved the life of Alexander the Great. The words added by Pliny to his mention of the last work, dignus tanta gloria, show the high estimation in which the artist was held. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 8.) Pliny introduces the name of Tisicrates in such a way as to cause a doubt, whether he was the disciple of Lysippus himself or of his son Euthycrates; but we think he means the former. The artist's date may be fixed at about Ol. 120, B. C. 300. He appears to have excelled in equestrian groups. Pliny also mentions a biga of his, to which the artist Piston added the figure of a woman (l. c. § 32). There is another passage of Pliny, in which the name of Tisicrates occurs in the common editions (l. c. § 12); where the reading Tisicratis rests on no other authority than a conjecture of Gronovius. The more probable conjecture of Sillig, Amphicratis, has been rendered certain by the authority of the Bamberg MS. (See AMPHICRATES, and Jan's Supplement to Sillig's Pliny.)

2. A sculptor of the same name, whom M. Raoul-Rochette considers to be undoubtedly a different person, has been made known by a marble found near Albano, with the inscription, ΤΕΙΣΙΚΡΑΤΗΣ ΕΠΟΙΕΙ. (Visconti, Op. Var. vol. ii. p. 82; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 419, 2d ed.) Perhaps, however, the work may be only a marble copy of a bronze statue by the celebrated Tisicrates. The orthography deserves notice: there are other examples of names beginning with the root ΤΙ, in both of the derived forms ΤΙΜ and ΤΙΣ, being spelt with the diphthong ΕΙ. (See Pape, Wörterbuch d. Griech. Eigennamen.) [P. S.]

TISIE'NUS GALLUS. [GALLUS.]

TISI'PHONE (Τισιφόνη). 1. The name of one of the Erinnyes (the avenger of murder, Orph. Arg. 966; comp. ERINNYES).

2. A daughter of Alcmaeon and Manto. (Apollod. iii. 7. § 7.) [L. S.]

TISI'PHONUS (Τισίφονος), the eldest brother of Thebe, the wife of Alexander of Pherae, in whose murder he took part with his sister and his two brothers, Lycophron and Peitholaus. After Alexander's death, according to Conon the grammarian, Thebe virtually governed, while Tisiphonus held the nominal authority. Xenophon simply mentions him as Alexander's successor, and Diodorus tells us that he and Lycophron held the tyranny together, maintaining themselves by cruelty and violence with the aid of a mercenary force. We do not know how long the reign of Tisiphonus lasted; but he appears to have been dead by B. C. 352, when Philip of Macedon marched into Thessaly to support the Aleuadae against Lycophron. (Xen. Hell. vi. 4. § 37; Diod. xvi. 14; Con. Narr. 50; Plut. Pel. 35; Clint. F. H. vol. ii. App. ch. 15.) [E. E.]

TISSAPHERNES (Τισσαφέρνης), a famous Persian, who in B. C. 414 was commissioned by Dareius II. (Nothus) to quell the rebellion of Pissuthnes, satrap of Lower Asia, and to succeed him in his government. Tissaphernes and his colleagues bribed the Greek mercenaries of Pissuthnes to desert his cause, and then entrapped him into a surrender by a promise, which Dareius broke, that his life should be spared. Amorges, however, the son of Pissuthnes, still continued in revolt, and Tissaphernes was commanded by Dareius to slay or capture him. The king also required from the new satrap the full tribute arising from his government, a considerable portion of which, viz. all which was due from the Greek towns under the protection of Athens, it had been hitherto impossible to collect. These combined motives led Tissaphernes, early in B. C. 412, to despatch an ambassador to Sparta, proposing an alliance, with the promise of payment for any troops that might be sent him, and supporting the prayer of Chios and Erythrae (states within his satrapy) that they might be aided by a Peloponnesian force in their intended revolt from Athens. Through the influence mainly of Alcibiades the Lacedaemonians decided in favour of the application of Tissaphernes, in preference to that of Pharnabazus, and shortly after the first treaty between the Persian king and Lacedaemon was concluded by Tissaphernes and Chalcideus, the characteristic cunning of the former being exhibited in one of its articles, which secured to Dareius whatever territory or cities had been at any time possessed by himself or his ancestors. For a short period after this we find the satrap helping his allies with apparent cordiality, and co-operating with them in particular against the Athenians at Miletus, while they in their turn assisted him in the reduction of Iasus in Caria, and in the capture of Amorges, who was maintaining himself in the place. But disputes soon arose between the parties about the pay for the fleet, the amount of which Tissaphernes had diminished, and it was found necessary to make a new treaty, which specially provided that the king should support all the forces he might send for, so long as they continued in his territory, the article, however, which had virtually acknowledged the sovereignty of Persia over all the states she had ever possessed, being only slightly modified. Accordingly the eleven commissioners, whom the Spartans sent out in the winter of the same year (412) as counsellors to Astyochus, objected strongly to both the treaties, and especially to the sweeping clause in question; whereupon Tissaphernes, in real or pretended anger, broke off the conference and withdrew. When therefore Alcibiades deemed it expedient to abandon the Peloponnesian cause, and took refuge with the satrap, he found him fully prepared to listen to his suggestions, that the pay to the seamen should be not only reduced, but irregularly supplied, and that it would conduce more to the king's interests to hold the balance between Athens and Sparta, and so to weaken both, than to give a complete triumph to the latter. In this advice, however, the subtle Athenian had over-reached himself; for the view which it opened was so acceptable to Tissaphernes, and suited so well his crafty temper, that Alcibiades could not persuade him to take any decided part in favour of Athens; and therefore when PEISANDER and his fellow-ambassadors came to negotiate for his alliance, their mission proved an utter failure. Tissaphernes now sought to connect himself again with the Peloponnesians, and a new treaty between the parties was concluded, which contained a more stringent stipulation on the subject of the pay, while the offensive article as to the king's right over the Asiatic cities was expressed in more vague and ambiguous terms. But Tissaphernes, with all his subscriptions to treaties, and all his promises of bringing up a Phoenician fleet to act against the Athenians, never intended to give any effectual assistance to his nominal allies, who at length (worn out and disgusted with his duplicity, and alarmed too at the apparent good understanding between him and Alcibiades, of which the latter made an ostentatious display) withdrew their whole armament from Miletus, and sailed northward to unite themselves with Pharnabazus (B. C. 411). Annoyed at this step of their's, and alarmed also at the part they had taken in the expulsion from Antandrus of the Persian garrison under Arsaces, his lieutenant, Tissaphernes left Aspendus, whither he had gone under pretence of bringing up the Phoenician fleet, and proceeded towards the Hellespont to remonstrate with the Peloponnesians, and, if possible, to conciliate them. On his way he stopped at Ephesus, and sacrificed there to the Ephesian Artemis, a circumstance which Thucydides, for some reason unknown to us, has thought it worth while to record, and with which his history abruptly ends. When the satrap arrived at the Hellespont, Alcibiades came with presents to pay his court to him, but Tissaphernes, in the hope of regaining the confidence of his old allies, seized the Athenian and sent him to Sardis, to be there kept in custody. He endeavoured also at the same time to apologise for his breach of promise with respect to the Phoenician ships, by alleging that they were needed to defend the king's dominions from the Arabians and Egyptians; for there can be no doubt that the name of Pharnabazus in Diodorus (xiii. 46) is a blunder of the historian's for Tissaphernes, as it certainly is in other passages of the same author, e. g. xiii. 36, 37, 38, xiv. 22. As however the value of the professions of Tissaphernes was now pretty well known, it is probable that few, if any, believed him; and Alcibiades, when he escaped from prison, after a month's detention, would be likely enough to gain credit for his assertion, that he had been released by the satrap himself. The latter notwithstanding still carried on his intrigues, through his emissaries at Sparta, to win back the confidence which had been transferred to Pharnabazus; but his attempts were defeated by HERMOCRATES, who had repaired thither for the express purpose of setting his character in its true light before the Lacedaemonians, and, a revolution having taken place about the same time at Thasos (B. C. 410), accompanied with the expulsion of Eteonicus, the Spartan harmost, Tissaphernes was suspected of having promoted it. In the following year (B. C. 409), when the Athenians under Thrasyllus had invaded Lydia, and were threatening Ephesus, Tissaphernes sent all round to summon the population "to the defence of the goddess," and, having thus collected a considerable force, baffled the attempt of the enemy.

In B. C. 407 Cyrus the younger was appointed by his father, Dareius, to be viceroy of the whole maritime region of Asia Minor, and, regarding Tissaphernes as his enemy, listened readily to Lysander's complaints against him, and prepared to supply the Lacedaemonians with cordial and effectual assistance; nor could he be diverted from this course by the representations of Tissaphernes, that the true policy for Persia was the one which he himself had hitherto pursued. The mutual distrust and hostility between the prince and the satrap only increased with time; and when Cyrus, in B. C. 405, was summoned to court by his father, he took Tissaphernes with him, under pretence of doing him honour, but really because he was afraid to leave him behind. After the death of Dareius, at the end of the same year, Tissaphernes accused Cyrus of a plot against the life of his brother Artaxerxes, the new king, and it was only through the influence of the queen-mother, Parysatis, that the prince was pardoned. On their return to western Asia, Cyrus and Tissaphernes were engaged in continual disputes about the cities in the satrapy of the latter, over which Cyrus claimed dominion, and all of which indeed transferred their allegiance to him, with the exception of Miletus, where Tissaphernes quenched an intended revolt in blood. The ambitious views of Cyrus towards the throne at length became manifest to the satrap, who lost no time in repairing to the king with information of the danger. At the battle of Cunaxa, in B. C. 401, he was one of the four generals who commanded the army of Artaxerxes, and was stationed with the main body of the cavalry in the left wing, of which his troops were the only portion that was not put to flight by the Greeks. When the 10,000 had begun their retreat, Tissaphernes sought an interview with them, professed his great anxiety to serve them, as being a neighbour of Greece in his satrapy, and declared that he had been using in their favour his influence with the king, who had promised to consider his request, and had sent him in the meantime to ask the reason of their expedition against him. By his advice they gave to this message a moderate and prudent answer, and within three days' time Tissaphernes returned and informed them that he had with much difficulty prevailed on Artaxerxes to allow him to conduct them home in safety. After a delay of more than twenty days, during which he kept them waiting, the march began. In spite, however, of the solemn treaty between the parties, mutual suspicions continued to prevail, and it was in the hope of removing these that Clearchus sought an explanation with Tissaphernes and consented to the interview, at which he himself and four of the other generals were arrested by the treacherous satrap. [CLEARCHUS.] Some time after this, Tissaphernes endeavoured, through his emissary Mithridates, to ascertain the plans of the Greeks, but his attempt was baffled by their resolution to hold no further intercourse with him. He then continued to annoy and harass them in their march, without however seriously impeding it, till they reached the Carduchian Mountains, at which point he gave up the pursuit.

Not long after, and while the 10,000 were yet on their return home, Tissaphernes, as a reward for his great services, was invested by the king, in addition to his own satrapy, with all the authority which Cyrus had enjoyed in western Asia. On his arrival he claimed dominion over the Ionian cities, which, alarmed for their liberty, and fearing, too, the resentment of the satrap, whose rule they had renounced for that of Cyrus, applied to Sparta for aid. Their request was granted, and an army was sent under Thimbron, in B. C. 400, to support them. In the following year Dercyllidas superseded Thimbron, and, taking advantage of the jealousy between Pharnabazus and Tissaphernes, concluded a truce with the latter, who, to save his own territory, unscrupulously abandoned that of his fellow satrap to the invasion of the enemy. In B. C. 397, however, the Lacedaemonian forces threatened Caria, where the property of Tissaphernes lay. The two satraps now united their forces, but no engagement took place, and the negotiations which ensued ended in a truce, which was to last till the mutual requisitions of the belligerents should be decided on by the Spartan authorities and the Persian king respectively. [DERCYLLIDAS.] In the following year, when Agesilaus invaded Asia with the professed intention of effecting the independence of the Asiatic Greeks, Tissaphernes proposed an armistice, that he might have time to lay the demand of the Lacedaemonians before Artaxerxes, whose answer he pretended to think would be favourable. The truce was solemnly ratified; but Tissaphernes, who of course had no intention of keeping it, immediately sent to the king for reinforcements, and on their arrival arrogantly commanded Agesilaus to withdraw from Asia. To this the Spartan king replied that he thanked the satrap for having, by his perjury, made the gods the allies of Greece. Having then induced his wily and selfish enemy to believe that Caria was the object of his attack, and thus induced him to concentrate his forces in that direction, Agesilaus carried the war successfully into the satrapy of Pharnabazus. In the following year, B. C. 395, he declared his intention of invading the richest portion of the enemy's country, and Tissaphernes, imagining that, if this had been his real purpose, he would not have revealed it, and that his operations therefore would now be indeed directed against Caria, again arranged his forces for the defence of that province. Agesilaus then, in accordance with what he had given out, marched into the country about Sardis, ravaged it for three days, and defeated a body of cavalry which Tissaphernes had sent against him. Grievous complaints of selfish neglect and treachery were now made against the satrap by those who had suffered from the Lacedaemonian invasion; and the charges were transmitted to court, where they were backed by all the influence of Parysatis, eager for revenge on the enemy of Cyrus, her favourite son. The result was that Tithraustes was commissioned by the king to put Tissaphernes to death and to succeed him in his government. The disgraced satrap accordingly was surprised and slain in his bath by a minister of execution, and his head was sent to Artaxerxes. TITAN (Τιτάν). 1. This name commonly appears in the plural Τιτᾶνες, from Τιτανίδες, as the name of the sons and daughters of Uranus and Ge, whence they are also called Οὐρανίωνες or Οὐρανίδαι. (Hom. Il. v. 898; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1232.) These Titans are Oceanus, Coeus, Crius, Hyperion, Iapetus, Cronus, Theia, Rheia, Themis, Mnemosyne, Phoebe, and Tethys, to whom Apollodorus (i. 1. § 3) adds Dione. (Hes. Theog. 133, &c.) Some writers also add Phorcys and Demeter. (Heyne, ad Apollod. i. 1. § 1; Clemens, Homil. vi. 2.) Stephanus of Byzantium (s. v. Ἄδανα) has the following as the names of the children of Uranus and Ge: Adanus, Ostasus, Andes, Cronus, Rhea, Iapetus, Olymbrus; and Pausanias (viii. 37. § 3) mentions a Titan Anytus, who was believed to have brought up the Arcadian Despoena. Uranus, the first ruler of the world, threw his sons, the Hecatoncheires, Briareus, Cottys, Gyes (Hes. Theog. 617), and the Cyclopes, Arges, Steropes, and Brontes, into Tartarus. Gaea, indignant at this, persuaded the Titans to rise against their father, and gave to Cronus an adamantine sickle (ἅρπη). They did as their mother bade them, with the exception of Oceanus. Cronus, with his sickle, unmanned his father, and threw the part into the sea, and out of the drops of his blood there arose the Erinnyes, Alecto, Tisiphone, and Megaera. The Titans then deposed Uranus, liberated their brothers who had been cast into Tartarus, and raised Cronus to the throne. But he again threw the Cyclopes into Tartarus, and married his sister Rhea (Ovid, Met. ix. 497, calls her Ops). As, however, he had been foretold by Gaea and Uranus, that he should be dethroned by one of his own children, he, after their birth, swallowed successively his children Hestia, Demeter, Hera, Pluto and Poseidon. Rhea therefore, when she was pregnant with Zeus, went to Crete, gave birth to the child in the Dictaean Cave, and entrusted him to be brought up to the Curetes, and the daughters of Melissus, the nymphs Adrasteia and Ida. The armed Curetes guarded the infant in the cave, and struck their shields with their spears, that Cronus might not hear the voice of the child. Rhea, moreover, deceived Cronus by giving him a stone wrapped up in cloth, which he swallowed, believing it to be his newly-born son. (Apollod. i. §§ 1—5; Ov. Fast. iv. 179, &c.) When Zeus had grown up he availed himself of the assistance of Thetis, the daughter of Oceanus who gave to Cronus a potion which caused him to bring up the stone and the children he had swallowed. United with his brothers and sisters, Zeus now began the contest against Cronus and the ruling Titans. This contest (usually called the Titanomachia), which was carried on in Thessaly, the Titans occupying Mount Othrys, and the sons of Cronus Mount Olympus, lasted for ten years, when at length Gaea promised victory to Zeus, if he would deliver the Cyclopes and Hecatoncheires from Tartarus. Zeus accordingly slew Campe, who guarded the Cyclopes, and the latter furnished him with thunder and lightning, Pluto gave him a helmet, and Poseidon a trident. The Titans then were overcome, and hurled down into a cavity below Tartarus (Hom. Il. xiv. 279; Hes. Theog. 697, 851; Hom. Hymn. in Apoll. 335; Paus. viii. 37. § 3), and the Hecatoncheires were set to guard them. (Hom. Il. viii. 479; Hes. Theog. 617, &c.; Apollod. i. 2. § 1.) It must be observed that the fight of the Titans is sometimes confounded by ancient writers with the fight of the Gigantes.

2. The name Titans is also given to those divine or semi-divine beings who were descended from the Titans, such as Prometheus, Hecate (Hes. Theog. 424; Serv. ad Aen. iv. 511), Latona (Ov. Met. vi. 346), Pyrrha (i. 395), and especially Helios and Selene (Mene), as the children of Hyperion and Theia, and even the descendants of Helios, such as Circe. (Serv. ad Aen. iv. 119, vi. 725; Schol. ap Apollon. Rhod. iv. 54; Ov. Fast. i. 617, iv. 943, Met. iii. 173, xiv. 382; Tibull. iv. 1. 50.)

3. The name Titans, lastly, is given to certain tribes of men from whom all mankind is descended. Thus the ancient city of Cnosos in Crete is said to have originally been inhabited by Titans, who were hostile to Zeus, but were driven away by Pan with the fearful sounds of his shell-trumpet. (Hom. Hymn. in Apoll. 336; Diod. iii. 57, v. 66; Orph. Hymn. 36 2; comp. Höck, Creta, p. 171, &c.; Lobeck, Aglaoph. p. 763; Völcker, Mythol. des Iapet. Geschl. p. 280, &c.) [L. S.]

TITARE'SIUS (Τιταρήσιος), a surname of Mopsus, derived, according to some, from the river Titaresius in Thessaly, near which he was born (Hom. Il. ii. 751), but according to others, from his grandfather Titaron. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 65 with the Schol.) [L. S.]

TITHO'NUS (Τιθωνός), a son of Laomedon, and brother of Priam (Hom. Il. xx. 237), or according to others (Serv. ad Virg. Georg. i. 447, iii. 48), a brother of Laomedon. Others, again, call him a son of Cephalus and Eos. (Apollod. iii. 14. § 3.) By the prayers of Eos who loved him he obtained from the immortal gods immortality, but not eternal youth, in consequence of which he completely shrunk together in his old age, whence an old decrepit man was proverbially called Tithonus. (Hom. Hymn. in Ven. 219; Hes. Theog. 984; Apollod. iii. 12. § 4; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 18; Horat. Carm. i. 28. 8; Ov. Fast. i. 461.) [L. S.]

TITHO'REA (Τιθορέα), a nymph of Mount Parnassus, from whom the town of Tithorea, previously called Neon, was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. x. 32. § 6.) [L. S.]

TITHRAUSTES (Τιθραύστης), a Persian, who was commissioned by Artaxerxes II. (Mnemon), in B. C. 395, to put Tissaphernes to death, and to succeed him in his satrapy. On his arrival at Colossae in Phrygia, he caused Tissaphernes to be slain, and sent his head to the king. He then opened negotiations with Agesilaus, representing to him that, as the chief promoter of the war was dead, there was no longer any occasion for the presence of a Spartan army in Asia, and proposing peace on condition that the Asiatic Greeks should be independent, only paying their ancient tribute to Persia. To this Agesilaus would not consent in the absence of instructions from home, and Tithraustes then persuaded him to remove the war from his satrapy into that of Pharnabazus, and even supplied him with money for the expedition. Being soon after convinced that Agesilaus had no intention of leaving Asia, Tithraustes sent Timocrates, the Rhodian, into Greece with fifty talents, which he was ordered to distribute among the leading men in the several states, to induce them to excite a war against Sparta at home (Xen. Hell. iii. 4. §§ 25, &c., 5. § 1; Diod. xiv. 80; Paus. iii. 9; Plut. Art. 20, Ages. 15). Tithraustes had been superseded in his satrapy by B. C. 393, when Antalcidas was sent to negotiate with his successor, Tiribazus. (Xen. Hell. iv. 8. § 12.)

It was probably the same Tithraustes whom we find joined with Pharnabazus and Abrocomas in the command of the unsuccessful expedition of the Persians to Egypt, which seems to have occurred between B. C. 392 and 390 [PHARNABAZUS]. We may perhaps identify him also with the Tithraustes who is mentioned as holding the office of Chiliarch (Vizier) at the time of the embassy of Pelopidas and Ismenias to Susa in B. C. 367 (Ael. V. H. i. 21; see, however, C. Nep. Con. 3). We hear, moreover, of a certain Tithraustes, who was sent to act against the rebel Artabazus in B. C. 356, and was defeated by the Athenian general, Chares (Schol. Aug. ad Dem. Phil. i. p. 45). [CHARES.] [E. E.]

TI'TIA GENS, plebeian, is rarely mentioned in the republican period, and did not rise out of obscurity till a very late time. None of its members obtained the consulship under the republic; and the first person of the name who held this office was M. Titius in B. C. 31. In the times of the empire, the Titii bore various surnames, a list of which is given below. [TITIUS.]

TITIA'NA, FLA'VIA, the wife of Pertinax and daughter of Flavius Sulpicianus. When her husband assumed the purple, the senate passed a decree conferring the title of Augusta upon the empress and of Caesar upon her son; but neither was permitted to accept these honours. She survived Pertinax; but the time and the manner of her death are unlike unknown. (Dion Cass. lxxiii. 7.) [W. R.]

TITIA'NUS, T. ATI'LIUS, consul under Hadrian in A. D. 127, with M. Squilla Gallicanus. (Fasti.)

TITIA'NUS, CORNE'LIUS, a friend of the younger Pliny, who has addressed two letters to him. (Ep. i. 17, ix. 32.)

TITIA'NUS, T. FA'BIUS, consul under Constantinus in A. D. 337 with Felicianus. (Fasti.)

TITIA'NUS, FLA'VIUS, procurator of Alexandria, was put to death by Theocritus, the favourite of Caracalla. (Dion Cass. lxxvii. 21.)

TITIA'NUS, JU'LIUS, a Roman writer, all whose works are lost, was the father of the rhetorician Titianus, who taught the younger Maximinus. The elder Titianus may therefore be placed in the reigns of Commodus, Pertinax, and Severus. He was called the ape of his age, because he had imitated every thing (Jul. Capitol. Maximin. Jun. c. 1). He wrote, 1. A description of the provinces of the Roman empire (Jul. Capitol. l. c.), which is perhaps the same work as the Chorographia, which is quoted by Servius (ad Virg. Aen. iv. 42) as a work of Titianus. 2. Epistolae, which were supposed to be written by distinguished women, and in which he imitated the style of Cicero. (Sidon. Apoll. Ep. i. 1.) 3. Rhetorica. (Isidor. Orig. ii. 2.) 4. Themata, or subjects for declamation taken from Virgil (Serv. ad Virg. Aen. x. 18). Titianus appears to have written other works (comp. Serv. ad Virg. Aen. xi. 651), but some of them may belong to his son. It was probably the younger Titianus whose Apologi or Fables, translated by Aesop, were sent by Ausonius to Probus, and who is called by the poet "Fandi Titianus artifex" (Auson. Ep. xvi. Praef. and line 81). (See Vossius, De Historicis Latinis, p. 172, foll.)

TITIA'NUS, JU'NIUS, consul with the emperor Philippus in A. D. 245. (Cod. 6. tit. 39. s. 2, et alibi.)

TI'TIAS (Τιτίας), one of the Idaean Dactyls, or according to others, a Mariandynian hero, is called a son of Zeus and Mariandynus. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 1126.) On his expedition against the Amazons, Heracles assisted the Mariandyni against the Bebryces, and during the struggle, Priolaus, the leader of the Mariandyni, fell. During the funeral games Heracles conquered Titias, who is called the father of Barynus, while others call Priolaus and Mariandynus sons of Titias. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 780, ad Aeschyl. Pers. 933; Eustath. ad Dionys. Perieg. 987; comp. Lobeck, Aglaoph. p. 1165.) [L. S.]

TITI'DIUS LA'BEO. [LABEO.]

TITI'NIA, the wife of Cotta, was defended by Cicero against Ser. Naevius. (Cic. Brut. 60.)

TITI'NIA GENS, plebeian, is mentioned as early as the time of the decemvirs, but it never attained much importance, and none of its members were raised to the consulship. [TITINIUS.]

TITINIA'NUS, PO'NTIUS. [PONTIUS; TITINIUS, No. 13.]

TITI'NIUS, a Roman dramatist whose productions belonged to the department of the Comoedia Togata, is commended by Varro on account of the skill with which he developed the characters of the personages whom he brought upon the stage. "Ἤθη nulli alii servare convenit quam Titinio et Terentio; πάθη vero Trabea et Attilius et Caecilius facile moverant." From the terms in which this criticism is expressed, it has been inferred that Titinius was younger than Caecilius, but older than Terence, and hence that he must have flourished about B. C. 170. The names of upwards of fourteen plays together with a considerable number of short fragments, the language of which bears an antique stamp, have been preserved by the grammarians, especially Nonius Marcellus. These will be found collected in the Poetarum Latii Scenicorum Fragmenta of Bothe, vol. ii. 8vo. Lips. 1834, p. 58, and in the essay of Neukirch, De Fabula Togata Romanorum. 8vo. Lips. 1833, p. 97. (See Varr. L. L. lib. v. as quoted by Charisius, p. 215, ed. Putsch; Seren. Sammon. de Re Med. v. 1044, where, according to one (false) reading, the name of the author would be Vectius or Vettius Titinius.) [W. R.]

TITI'NIUS. 1. M. TITINIUS, one of the tribunes of the plebs, elected immediately after the abolition of the decemvirate, B. C. 449. (Liv. iii. 54.)

2. SEX. TITINIUS, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 439. (Liv. iv. 16.)

3. L. TITINIUS PANSA SACCUS, consular tribune, B. C. 400 and 396. (Liv. v. 12, 18; Fasti Capit.)

4. M. TITINIUS C. F. C. N., magister equitum to the dictator C. Junius Bubulcus, B. C. 302. (Liv. x. 1; Fasti Capit.)

5. P. TITINIUS, legatus of the praetor in the war against the Gauls B. C. 200. (Liv. xxxi. 21.)

6 and 7. M. and C. TITINII, tribunes of the plebs, B. C. 193. (Liv. xxxv. 8,)

6. M. TITINIUS CURVUS, praetor urbanus B. C. 178. He levied troops at Rome in this year, and gave an audience of the senate to Ti. Sempronius Gracchus and L. Postumius Albinus on their return from Spain. (Liv. xl. 59, xli. 5, 6.)

7. M. TITINIUS, praetor B. C. 178, received the province of Nearer Spain with the title of proconsul, and continued to govern it for four years, till B. C. 174. In B. C. 171 he was accused of malversation in the province, but was acquitted. (Liv. xli. 15, 26, xliii. 2.)

8. C. TITINIUS GADAEUS, one of the leaders of the slaves in Sicily, betrayed an important fort to the praetor Licinius Nerva in B. C. 103. (Diod. xxxvi. Ecl. 1. p. 532, Wess.)

9. M. TITINIUS, a legatus of Nerva in the Servile war in Sicily, was defeated by the slaves. (Diod. l. c.)

10. C. TITINIUS, the husband of Fannia, who concealed Marius in B. C. 88. (Val. Max. viii. 2. § 3; Plut. Mar. 38, who erroneously calls him Tinnius.) For particulars of the dispute between Titinius and Fannia, see FANNIA.

11. CN. TITINIUS, a distinguished Roman eques, resisted the tribune M. Livius Drusus, B. C. 91. (Cic. pro Cluent. 56.)

12. TITINII, are mentioned among the people of property proscribed by Sulla and murdered by Catiline in B. C. 81. (Q. Cic. de Pet. Cons. c. 2.)

13. Q. TITINIUS, one of the judices at the trial of Verres, was a brother (by the same mother) of C. Fannius, a Roman eques (Cic. Verr. i. 49). This Titinius carried on the business of a money-lender, and as such Cicero had dealings with him. On the breaking out of the civil war in B. C. 49, he espoused the cause of Pompey, but his son, who had been adopted by one Pontius, and who is therefore called Pontius Titinianus, sided with Caesar. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 4, v. 21. § 5, vii. 18. § 4, ix. 6. § 6, ix. 9, 18, 19.)

14. TITINIUS, a centurion in the army of Cassius at the battle of Philippi, B. C. 42, was sent by his commander, after his defeat by Antony, to see how Brutus had fared; but as Titinius did not return so soon as was expected, Cassius, supposing all was lost, put an end to his own life. Titinius, on his arrival, killed himself over the body of Cassius, to atone for his involuntary error. (Val. Max. ix. 9. § 2.) The story is told a little differently by Appian (B. C. iv. 113) and Plutarch. (Brut. 43.)

15. TITINIUS, a legate of Octavianus in his war with Sex. Pompeius. (Appian, B. C. v. 111.)

16. C. TITINIUS, whose name occurs on coins, cannot be referred with certainty to any of the preceding persons. On the obverse is the head of Pallas, and on the reverse Victory in a biga with C. TITINI, and underneath ROMA. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 325.)

COIN OF C. TITINIUS.

TI'TIUS, a Roman sculptor, whose name appears on two inscriptions, the one published by Boissard (Antiq. Roman. p. iii. fig. 132), the other in the Museum of the Louvre. From the latter it seems, though there is some doubt as to the true reading of the inscription, that the artist's full name was Titius Gemellus. (Sillig, Catal. Artif. s. v.; R. Rochette. Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 419.) [P. S.]

TI'TIUS. 1. C. TITIUS, a Roman eques, and an orator of considerable merit, who, according to Cicero, obtained as much excellence as was possible without a knowledge of Greek literature, and without great practice. He left orations behind him, and likewise some tragedies. Cicero makes him a contemporary of Antonius and Crassus, who lived from B. C. 148 to 87; and this agrees with the statement of Macrobius, who calls him vir aetatis Lucilianae, for Lucilius was born in B. C. 148, and died in 103. It appears, however, that Titius ought to be placed a little earlier, since Macrobius likewise says that Titius spoke in favour of the Sumtuaria Lex of Fannius, which, we know, was enacted in B. C. 161. It is therefore probable that Titius spoke in favour of this law when he was quite a young man. (Cic Brut. 45; Macrob. Sat. ii. 9, 12; Meyer, Oratorum Romanorum Fragmenta, p. 203, foll., 2d ed.)

2. C. TITIUS, a man who gained his living by pleading causes, but certainly a different person from the preceding, excited a mutiny of the soldiers against the consul L. Porcius Cato in B. C. 89, but nevertheless escaped punishment. (Dion Cass. Fragm. 114, p. 46, Reimar.) [CATO, No. 7.]

3. SEX. TITIUS, a seditious tribune of the plebs, B. C. 99, attempted to follow in the steps of Saturninus and Glaucia, who had perished in the preceding year, but was vigorously resisted by the orator M. Antonius, who was then consul. He was afterwards condemned for having a statue of Saturninus in his house. Cicero says (Brut. 62) that Titius was fluent, and with a fair measure of acuteness, but so extravagant in his gestures, that a dance was called after his name. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 11, 66, pro C. Rabir. 9.)

4. L. TITIUS, a Roman citizen residing at Agrigentum, was robbed of his ring by Verres. (Cic. Verr. iv. 26.)

5. T. TITIUS T. F. one of the legates of Cn. Pompeius, when the latter was intrusted with the superintendence of the corn-market. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 58.)

6. C. TITIUS L. F. RUFUS, praetor urbanus B. C. 50. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 58.)

7 and 8. C. TITIUS STRABO and L. TITIUS STRABO. [STRABO.]

9. Q. TITIUS, was sent by Caesar into Epeirus in B. C. 48 to obtain corn for his troops. (Caes. B. C. iii. 42.)

10. L. TITIUS, a tribune of the soldiers in the Alexandrine war, B. C. 48. (Hirt. B. Alex. 57.)

11. P. TITIUS, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 43, proposed the law for the creation of the triumvirs in that year. Shortly before this he had deprived his colleague P. Servilius Casca of his tribunate, because the latter fled from Rome, fearing the vengeance of Octavianus on account of the part he had taken in the assassination of Caesar. Titius died soon after, during his year of office, thus confirming the superstition, that whoever deprived a colleague of his magistracy, never lived to see the end of his own official year. (Appian, B. C. iv. 7; Dion Cass. xlvi. 49; Cic. ad Fam. x. 12. § 3, x. 21. § 3.)

12. M. TITIUS, was proscribed by the triumvirs in B. C. 43, and escaped to Sex. Pompeius in Sicily. He married Munatia, the sister of L. Munatius Plancus, the orator, by whom he had a son [No. 13]. (Dion Cass. xlviii. 30; Vell. Pat. ii. 83.)

13. M. TITIUS, the son of the preceding, raised a fleet on his own account during the civil wars which followed the death of Caesar, but was taken prisoner in B. C. 40 off the coast of Gallia Narbonensis by Menas, the admiral of Sex. Pompeius. He was, however, spared by Sex. Pompeius, chiefly for the sake of his father, who was then living with Pompeius in Sicily. By the peace of Misenum, concluded in the following year (B. C. 39) between Pompeius and the triumvirs, Titius returned to Italy (Dion Cass. xlviii. 30). Titius now entered the service of Antonius and served as his quaestor in the campaign against the Parthians, in B. C. 36 (Plut. Ant. 42). In the following year (B. C. 35), Titius received the command of some troops from L. Munatius Plancus, the governor of Syria, in order to oppose Sex. Pompeius, who had fled from Sicily to Asia. Pompeius was shortly after taken prisoner and brought to Miletus, where he was murdered by Titius, although the latter owed his life to him. Titius, however, had probably received orders from Plancus or Antonius to put him to death [POMPEIUS, p. 491, a]. (Appian, B. C. v. 134, 136, 140, 142, 144; Dion Cass. xlix. 18; Vell. Pat. ii. 79). This, however, was not the only act of ingratitude committed by Titius, for in B. C. 32 he deserted Antonius, and went over to Octavianus along with his uncle Plancus. He was rewarded for his treachery by being made one of the consuls (suffecti) in B. C. 31. He served under Octavianus in the war against his former patron, and, along with Statilius Taurus, had the command of the land forces. Shortly before the battle of Actium he put Antony's cavalry to the rout. (Dion Cass. l. 3, 13; Plut. Ant. 58; Vell. Pat. ii. 83.)

14. Q. TITIUS, occurs on coins, but cannot be referred with certainty to any of the preceding persons. Whom the head on the obverse represents is uncertain: on the reverse is Pegasus. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 325.)

M. TITU'RNIUS RUFUS, recommended by Cicero to Acilius B. C. 46 (ad Fam. xiii. 39).

TITUS FLA'VIUS SABI'NUS VESPASIA'NUS, Roman emperor, A. D. 79—81, commonly called by his praenomen Titus, was the son of the emperor Vespasianus and his wife Flavia Domitilla. He was born on the 30th of December, A. D. 40, about the time when Caius Caligula was murdered, in a mean house and a small chamber, which were still shown in the time of Suetonius. From his childhood he manifested a good disposition. He was well made, and had an agreeable countenance, but it was remarked that his belly was somewhat large. (Sueton. Titus, 3.) Yet he was active, and very expert in all bodily exercises; and he had a great aptitude for learning. He was brought up in the imperial household with Britannicus, the son of Claudius, in the same way and with the same instructors. It is said that he was a guest at Nero's table, when Britannicus was poisoned, and that he also tasted of the same deadly cup. He afterwards erected a gilded statue to the memory of Britannicus, on the Palatium. Titus was an accomplished musician, and a most expert shorthand writer, an art in which the Romans excelled.

When a young man he served as tribunus militum in Britain and in Germany, with great credit; and he afterwards applied himself to the labours of the forum. His first wife was Arricidia, daughter of Tertullus, a Roman eques, and once praefectus praetorio; and, on her death, he married Marcia Furnilla, a woman of high rank, whom he divorced after having a daughter by her, who was called Julia Sabina. After having been quaestor, he had the command of a legion, and served under his father in the Jewish wars. He took the cities of Tarichaea, Gamala, and other places.

When Galba was proclaimed emperor, A. D. 68, Titus was sent by his father to pay his respects to the new emperor, and probably to ask for the promotion to which his merits entitled him; but hearing of the death of Galba at Corinth, he returned to his father in Palestine, who was already thinking of the higher destiny to which he was called. Titus managed to reconcile Mucianus the governor of Syria, and his father, and thus he contributed greatly to Vespasian's elevation. [MUCIANUS, LICINIUS.] Vespasian was proclaimed emperor on the 1st of July, A. D. 69, and Titus accompanied him to Alexandria in Egypt. He returned to Palestine to prosecute the siege of Jerusalem, during which he showed the talents of a general with the daring of a soldier. The siege of Jerusalem, one of the most memorable on record, was concluded by the capture of the place, on the 8th of September, A. D. 70, and Titus received from the acclamations of his soldiers the title of Imperator. The most complete account of the siege and capture of Jerusalem is by Josephus. He did not return to Italy for eight months after the capture of Jerusalem, during which time he had an interview with the Parthian ambassadors at Zeugma on the Euphrates, and he paid a visit to Egypt, and assisted at the consecration of the bull Apis at Memphis. (Sueton. Titus, c. 5.) On his journey to Italy he had an interview with Apollonius of Tyana, who gave him some very good advice for a youth in his elevated station.

Titus triumphed at Rome with his father. He also received the title of Caesar, and became the associate of Vespasian in the government. They also acted together as Censors. Titus undertook the office of Praefectus Praetorio, which had hitherto only been discharged by Roman equites. His conduct at this time gave no good promise, and the people looked upon him as likely to be another Nero. He was accused of being excessively addicted to the pleasures of the table, of indulging lustful passions in a scandalous way, and of putting suspected persons to death with very little ceremony. A. Caecina, a consular whom he had invited to supper, he ordered to be killed as he was leaving the room; but this was said to be a measure of necessary severity, for Titus had evidence of Caecina being engaged in a conspiracy. His attachment to Berenice also made him unpopular. Berenice was the sister of King Agrippa II., and the daughter of Herodes Agrippa, sometimes called the Great. She was first married to Herodes, king of Chalcis, her uncle, and then to Polemon, king of Cilicia. Titus probably became acquainted with her when he was in Judaea, and after the capture of Jerusalem she followed him to Rome with her brother Agrippa, and both of them lodged in the emperor's residence. It was said that Titus had promised to marry Berenice, but as this intended union gave the Romans great dissatisfaction, he sent her away from Rome after he became emperor, as Suetonius says, but in his father's lifetime according to Dion. The scandalous story of Titus having poisoned his father at a feast (24th June, A. D. 79) is not believed even by Dion, who could believe any thing bad of a man.

The year A. D. 79 was the first year of the sole government of Titus, whose conduct proved an agreeable surprise to those who had anticipated a return of the times of Nero. His brother Domitian, it is said, was dissatisfied at Titus being sole emperor, and formed the design of stirring up the soldiers; but though he made no decided attempt to seize the supreme power, he is accused of having all along entertained designs against his brother. Instead of punishing him, Titus endeavoured to win Domitian's affection, and urged him not to attempt to gain by criminal means that power which he would one day have in a legitimate way. During his whole reign Titus displayed a sincere desire for the happiness of the people, and he did all that he could to relieve them in times of distress. A story is told, that one evening, recollecting that he had given nothing during the day, he said, "My friends, I have lost a day." He assumed the office of Pontifex Maximus after the death of his father, and with the purpose, as he declared, of keeping his hands free from blood; a resolution which he kept. Two patricians who were convicted by the senate of a conspiracy against him, were pardoned and treated with kindness and confidence. He checked all prosecutions for the crime of laesa majestas, which from the time of Tiberius had been a fruitful source of false accusations; and he severely punished all informers. He also removed from about him many young men, whose acquaintance had damaged his reputation, and he associated only with persons of good repute.

At the close of this year Titus repaired one of the Roman aqueducts, and he assumed the title of Imperator on the occasion of the successes of Agricola in Britain. This year is memorable for the great eruption of Vesuvius, which desolated a large part of the adjacent country, and buried with lava and ashes the towns of Herculaneum and Pompeii. Plinius the elder lost his life in this terrible catastrophe; the poet Caesius Bassus is said to have been burnt in his house by the lava, and Agrippa the son of Claudius Felix, once governor of Judaea, perished with his wife. Dion Cassius (lxvi. 21, &c.) has described the horrors of this terrible calamity; and we have also the description of them in a letter addressed to Tacitus by the younger Plinius. [TACITUS.] Titus endeavoured to repair the ravages of this great eruption: he sent two consulars with money to restore the ruined towns, and he applied to this purpose the property of those who had been destroyed, and had left no next of kin. He also went himself to see the ravages which had been caused by the eruption and the earthquakes. During his absence a fire was burning at Rome for three days and three nights A. D. 80: it destroyed the Capitol, the library of Augustus, the theatre of Pompeius, and other public buildings, besides many houses. The emperor declared that he should consider all the loss as his own, and he set about repairing it with great activity: he took even the decorations of the imperial residences, and sold them to raise money. The eruption of Vesuvius was followed by a dreadful pestilence, which called for fresh exertions on the part of the benevolent emperor.

In this year he completed the great amphitheatre, called the Colosseum, which had been commenced by his father; and also the baths called the baths of Titus. The dedication of these two edifices was celebrated by spectacles which lasted one hundred days; by a naval battle in the old naumachia, and fights of gladiators: on one day alone five thousand wild animals are said to have been exhibited, a number which we may reasonably suspect to be exaggerated. He also repaired several aqueducts, and paved the road from Rome to Rimini (Ariminum).

In the year A. D. 81 Agricola was employed in securing his conquests in Scotland south of the Clyde and the Forth. After presiding at some games, at the close of which he is said to have wept bitterly, though the cause of his sorrow is not stated, Titus went off to the country of the Sabines in very low spirits, owing to some bad omens. He was seized with fever at the first resting-place, and being carried from thence to a villa, in which his father had died, he ended his life there on the 13th of September, after a reign of two years and two months, and twenty days. He was in the forty-first year of his age. There were suspicions that he was poisoned by Domitian. Plutarch says that his health was damaged by the frequent use of the bath. There is a story that Domitian came before Titus was dead, and ordered him to be deserted by those about him: according to another story, he ordered him to be thrown into a vessel full of snow, under the pretext of cooling his fever. It is reported that shortly before his death, Titus lamented that he was dying so soon, and said that he had never done but one thing of which he repented. Nobody knew what this one thing was; but there were various conjectures. Perhaps the difficulty may be best solved by supposing that he never uttered the words, or if he did, that he was in the delirium of his fever. Titus was succeeded by his brother Domitian. His daughter Julia Sabina was married to Flavius Sabinus, his cousin, the son of Flavius Sabinus, the brother of Vespasian.

Titus is said to have written Greek poems and tragedies: he was very familiar with Greek. He also wrote many letters in his father's name during Vespasian's life, and drew up edicta. (Suetonius, Titus Flavius Vespasianus; Tacitus, Hist.; Dion Cassius, lxvi.; Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. ii.) [G. L.]

COIN OF TITUS.

TITUS, one of the two supernumerary tyrants added by Trebellius Pollio to his list of the Thirty [see AUREOLUS]. He is said to have maintained his pretensions to the throne for a few days during the reign of Maximinus, and to have been put to death by the very soldiers who had forced the purple on his acceptance. There can be little doubt that he is the same person who is called Tycus by Capitolinus (Maximin. duo, c. 11), and Quartinus by Herodian. [QUARTINUS.] [W. R.]

TI'TYUS (Τιτυός), a son of Gaea, or of Zeus and Elara, the daughter of Orchomenus, was a giant in Euboea, and the father of Europa. (Hom. Od. vii. 324; Apollod. i. 4. § 1; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 181, 761; Pind. Pyth. iv. 81.) Instigated by Hera (Hygin. Fab. 55), he made an assault upon Leto or Artemis, when she passed through Panopaeus to Pytho, but was killed by the arrows of Artemis or Apollo, or, according to others, Zeus killed him with a flash of lightning. (Hygin. l. c.; Schol. ad Apollon. i. 181; Paus. iii. 18. § 9; Pind. Pyth. iv. 160; Horat. Carm. iv. 6. § 2.) He was then cast into Tartarus, and there he lay outstretched on the ground, covering nine acres, and two vultures or snakes devoured his liver. (Hygin. l. c.; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. i. 97; Hom. Od. xi. 576, &c.) His gigantic tomb was shown in aftertimes near Panopeus (Paus. x. 4. § 4), and his fall by the arrows of Artemis and Apollo was represented on the throne of Apollo at Amyclae. (Paus. iii. 18. § 9, x. 11. § 1, 29. § 2; comp. Strab. ix. p. 422; Virg. Aen. vi. 595; Ov. Met. iv. 457, Epist. ex Pont. i. 2. 41.) [L. S.]

TLEPO'LEMUS (Τληπόλεμος.) 1. A son of Heracles by Astyoche, the daughter of Phylas (Hom. Il. ii. 658; Apollod. ii. 7. §§ 6, 8; Philostr. Her. ii. 14), or by Astydameia, the daughter of Amyntor, king of the Dolopians in Thessaly. (Pind. Ol. vii. 41.) Tlepolemus was king of Argos, but after slaying his uncle Licymnius, he was obliged to take to flight, and in conformity with the command of an oracle, settled in Rhodes, where he built the towns of Lindos, Ialysos and Cameiros, and from whence he joined the Greeks in the Trojan war with nine ships. (Hom. Il. ii. 653, &c.; Apollod. ii. 8. § 2.) At Troy he was slain by Sarpedon. (Il. v. 627, &c.; Diod. iv. 58, v. 59.) His wife Philozoë instituted funeral games in commemoration of his death. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 911.)

2. A Trojan, a son of Damastor, who was slain by Patroclus. (Hom. Il. xvi. 416.) [L. S.]

TLEPO'LEMUS (Τληπόλεμος), historical. 1. An Athenian general, who brought a reinforcement to Pericles in the Samian war, B. C. 440. (Thuc. i. 117.)

2. The son of Pythophanes, one of the ἑταῖροι, or body-guard of Alexander the Great, was joined in the government of the Parthyaei and Hyrcanii with Amminapes, a Parthyaean, whom Alexander had appointed satrap of those provinces. At a later period Tlepolemus was appointed by Alexander satrap of Caramania, which he retained on the death of Alexander in B. C. 323, and also at the fresh division of the provinces at Triparadisus in B. C. 321. (Arrian, Anab. iii. 22, vi. 27; Diod. xviii. 3, 39.)

TLEPO'LEMUS, CORNELIUS, and HIERO, who are called by Cicero the canes venatici of Verres, were brothers, natives of Cibyra, whence they fled, under the suspicion of having pillaged the temple of Apollo, and betook themselves to Verres, who was then in Asia. From that time they became his dependants, and during his government of Sicily they performed for him the service of hunting out the works of art which appeared to be worth appropriating. They were both artists, Tlepolemus being a painter, and Hiero a modeller in wax. Some particulars of their mode of proceeding are given by Cicero (in Verr. iii. 28, iv. 13).

Respecting another artist of this name, see TLENPOLEMOS. [P. S.]

TLENPOLEMOS (TVENΓOVEMOϟ), is the form in which the name of a maker of painted vases is inscribed twice on one of the Canino vases (Mus. Etrusque, No. 149), and again, in connection with the name of the painter Taconides, on a vase discovered by the MM. Candelori (Gerhard, Rapport. Volcent. p. 180), and thirdly on a recently discovered vase, now in the Museum at Berlin. (Neuerworbene Vasenbilder, No. 1597.) It has been disputed whether the true reading of the name is Tlepolemus or Tlesipolemus; but the con-joint evidence of the three vases is decisive in favour of the form Tlenpolemos. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 61, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

TLESON, son of Nearchus, a maker of painted vases, whose name is inscribed, in the following manner, on several vases found at Canino, Toscanella, Corneto, and elsewhere:

ΤΛΕΣΟΝ ΗΟΝΕΑΡΧΟ ΕΠΟΙΕΣΕΝ.

His vases are all in the form of a patera mounted on a tall foot, and of an antique style of workmanship. Raoul-Rochette regards the addition of the name of the artist's father, on these vases, as a novelty borrowed from the Greek vase-makers, and as one of the proofs that the manufacture was not of Etruscan origin. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 61, 62, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

TMOLUS (Τμῶλος). 1. The god of Mount Tmolus in Lydia, is described as the husband of Pluto (or Omphale) and father of Tantalus, and said to have decided the musical contest between Apollo and Pan. (Apollod. ii. 6. § 3; Schol. ad Eurip. Or. 5; Ov. Met. xi. 157.)

2. A son of Proteus, was killed by Heracles. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 124.) [L. S.]

TOGO'NIUS GALLUS, a senator, proposed in A. D. 32 that Tiberius should choose twenty senators, who should accompany him as a bodyguard as often as he went into the senate, a proposition which only made Togonius ridiculous, as it was well known that Tiberius intended never to return to Rome. (Tac. Ann. vi. 2; Dion Cass. lviii. 17.)

TO'LMIDES (Τολμίδης), an Athenian general, who in B. C. 455 persuaded the people to send him with a fleet to cruize round the Peloponnesus, and ravage the enemy's country. If we may believe Diodorus, 1000 men were voted to him, to be selected by himself; but he first prevailed on 3000 to join him as volunteers, by assuring them that he meant at any rate to name them for the service, and, having thus secured these, he proceeded to act on the vote of the assembly, and chose 1000 more. In his expedition he burnt the Lacedaemonian arsenal at Gythium, took Chalcis, a town of the Corinthians, and disembarking on the Sicyonian territory, defeated the troops that came against him. According to Diodorus, he had previously captured Methone, which, however, by the arrival of Spartan succours, he was soon obliged to relinquish. He also took Naupactus from the Ozolian Locrians, and settled there the Messenians, who had been besieged and recently conquered by the Lacedaemonians at Ithome. After the return of Tolmides to Athens, we hear of his leading Athenian settlers (κληροῦχοι) to Euboea and Naxos; and in B. C. 447, when the Boeotian exiles had returned and seized Chaeroneia and Orchomenus, he proposed that he should be sent at once with a body of volunteers to quell the rising. Pericles objected in vain to the expedition as hasty and ill-timed, and Tolmides, having carried his point, marched into Boeotia with 1000 Athenians and some allied troops, and took Chaeroneia, where he left a garrison. But near Coroneia he fell in with a force consisting of the Boeotian exiles who had gathered together at Orchomenus, some Locrians and Euboean exiles, and others of the same party. A battle ensued, in which the Athenians were utterly defeated, and Tolmides himself was slain. (Thucyd. i. 103, 108, 113; Diod. xi. 84, 85, xii. 6; Aesch. de Fals. Leg. p. 38; Paus. i. 27; Plut. Ages. 19, Per. 16, 18.) [E. E.]

TOLU'MNIUS, LAR, king of the Veientes, to whom Fidenae revolted in B. C. 438, and at whose instigation the inhabitants of Fidenae slew the four Roman ambassadors, who had been sent to Fidenae to inquire into the reasons of their recent conduct. The names of these ambassadors, were C. Fulcinius, Cloelius, or Cluilius Tullus, Sp. Aritius, and L. Roscius; and statues of all four were placed on the Rostra at Rome, where they continued till a late time (Liv. iv. 17; Cic. Phil. ix. 2; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 6. s. 11). In the war which followed, Tolumnius was slain in single combat by Cornelius Cossus, who dedicated his spoils in the temple of Jupiter Feretrius, the second of the three instances in which the spolia opima were won. (Liv. iv. 18, 19,) [COSSUS, p. 865, b.]

TOLYNUS (Τόλυνος), of Megara, is supposed to have been a comic poet of the Old Comedy, before Cratinus, and about contemporary with Ecphantides, on the authority of a passage in the Etymologicum Magnum, which seems to ascribe to him the invention of the metre afterwards called the Cratinean. (Etym. Mag. p. 761. 47, Τολύνειον τὸ καλούμενον Κρατίνειον μέτρον, κ. τ. λ.) It appears, however, very probable that Τολύνειον, in this passage, is only a false reading for Τελλήνειον, and that the reference is to the lyric poet and musician Tellen. (Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. pp. 38, 39.) [P. S.]

TO'MYRIS (Τόμυρις), a queen of the Massagetae. According to Herodotus, when Cyrus the Great was contemplating the reduction of that nation (B. C. 529), Tomyris was a widow, and the Persian king sent an embassy to her with an offer of marriage. This she indignantly rejected, and Cyrus then prepared to cross the river Araxes, and to invade her territory. Tomyris warned him by a herald not to be guilty of such injustice, but added that, if he were bent upon it, she would not dispute with him the passage of the river, but would either advance three days' journey into his territory, or allow him to come as far into her's, that they might decide their quarrel by a fair battle. Cyrus chose the latter alternative, and by a stratagem surprised and captured Spargapises, the son of Tomyris. The queen demanded his restoration, with the threat that Cyrus, as he loved blood, should have plenty of it if he refused her. The Persian would not release his prisoner, who slew himself through grief, and a battle ensued, in which Cyrus was defeated and slain. Tomyris is described by Herodotus as roaming about the field after her victory in search of her enemy's body, on finding which she fastened his head in a leathern bag full of blood, in accordance with her threat. (Herod. i. 205—214.) [E. E.]

TONGI'LIUS. 1. A dissolute youth, was one of Catiline's crew. (Cic. in Cat. ii. 2.)

2. A person ridiculed by Juvenal (vii. 130).

TORISMOND. [THORISMOND.]

TORQUA'TA, JU'NIA, a Vestal virgin, and the sister of C. Junius Silanus, interceded on behalf of her brother, who was condemned of treason in A. D. 22, and obtained from Tiberius a commutation of his punishment. Her name occurs in inscriptions. (Tac. Ann. iii. 70, with the note of Lipsius; Spon, Miscell. p. 150.) [SILANUS, No. 10.]

TORQUA'TUS, C. BELLI'CIUS, consul under Hadrian in A. D. 143 with Ti. Claudius Atticus Herodes. (Fasti)

TORQUA'TUS, JU'NIUS. [SILANUS.]

TORQUA'TUS, LUCEIUS, a man of consular rank, slain by Commodus. He must have been one of the consules suffecti, as his name does not occur in the Fasti. (Lamprid. Commod. 7.)

TORQUA'TUS, MA'NLIUS. The Torquati were a patrician family of the Manlia Gens. Their descent is given in the following genealogical table, which is to some extent conjectural.

1. T. MANLIUS L. F. A. N. IMPERIOSUS TORQUATUS, the son of L. Manlius Capitolinus Imperiosus, dictator in B. C. 363, was a favourite hero of Roman story. He possessed the characteristic virtues of the old Romans, being a brave man, an obedient son, and a severe father; and he never allowed the feelings of nature or friendship to interfere with what he deemed his duty to his country. Manlius is said to have been dull of mind in his youth, and was brought up by his father in the closest retirement in the country. The tribune M. Pomponius availed himself of the latter circumstance, when he accused the elder Manlius in B. C. 362, on account of the cruelties he had practised in his dictatorship in the preceding year, to excite an odium against him, by representing him at the same time as a cruel and tyrannical father. As soon as the younger Manlius heard of this, he hurried to Rome, obtained admission to Pomponius early in the morning, and compelled the tribune, by threatening him with instant death if he did not take the oath, to swear that he would drop the accusation against his father. Although the elder Manlius was no favourite with the people, and had received the surname Imperiosus on account of his haughtiness, yet they were so delighted with the filial affection of the younger Manlius, that they not only forgave his violence to the tribune but elected him one of the tribunes of the soldiers in the course of the same year. In the following year, B. C. 361, according to Livy, though other accounts give different years, Manlius served under the dictator T. Quintius Pennus in the war against the Gauls, and in this campaign earned immortal glory by slaying in single combat a gigantic Gaul, who had stepped out of the ranks and challenged a Roman to fight him. From the dead body of the barbarian he took the chain (torques) which had adorned him, and placed it around his own neck; his comrades in their rude songs gave him the surname of Torquatus, which he continued ever afterwards to bear, and which he handed down to his descendants. His fame became so great that he was appointed dictator in B. C. 353, before he had held the consulship, in order to carry on the war against the Caerites and the Etruscans. In B. C. 349 he was again raised to the dictatorship for the purpose of holding the comitia. Two years afterwards, B. C. 347, he was consul for the first time with C. Plautius Venno Hypsaeus; during which year nothing of importance occurred, except the enactment of a law de fenore. He was consul a second time in B. C. 344 with C. Marcius Rutilus, and a third time in B. C. 340 with P. Decius Mus. In his third consulship Torquatus and his colleague gained the great victory over the Latins at the foot of Vesuvius, which established for ever the supremacy of Rome over Latium. An account of this battle, which was mainly won by the self-sacrifice of Decius Mus, has been given elsewhere. [MUS, No. 1.] The name of Torquatus has become chiefly memorable in connection with this war on account of the execution of his son. Shortly before the battle, when the two armies were encamped opposite to one another, the consuls published a proclamation that no Roman should engage in single combat with a Latin on pain of death. Notwithstanding this proclamation, the young Manlius, the son of the consul, provoked by the insults of a Tusculan noble of the name of Mettius Geni-nus, accepted his challenge, slew his adversary, and bore the bloody spoils in triumph to his father. Death was his reward. The consul would not overlook this breach of discipline: and the unhappy youth was executed by the lictor in presence of the assembled army. This severe sentence rendered Torquatus an object of detestation among the Roman youths as long as he lived; and the recollection of his severity was preserved in after ages by the expression Manliana imperia. Two writers relate that the young Manlius was executed by his father's orders in a war with the Gauls (Sall. Cat. 52; Dionys. viii. 79); but as we do not read of Torquatus having the command in any war against the Gauls, it is probable that he is confounded by these writers with No. 6, as Zonaras has done, who says (ix. 8), that No. 6 caused his son to be executed. Torquatus is not mentioned again by Livy; but according to the Fasti he was dictator for the third time in B. C. 320. (Liv. vii. 4, 5, 10, 19, 26—28, viii. 3—12; Cic. de Off. iii. 31, de Fin. i. 7, ii. 19, 22, Tusc. iv. 22; Val. Max. vi. 9, § 1, i. 7. § 3, ii. 7. § 6; Gell. i. 13; Dion Cass. Fragm. 34, p. 16, Reim.; Aurel Vict. de Vir. Ill. 28.)

2. T. MANLIUS TORQUATUS, the son of the preceding, was slain by his father's order, as is related above.

3. T. MANLIUS TORQUATUS, probably a son of No. 2, was consul B. C. 299 with M. Fulvius Paetinus. He was appointed to conduct the war against the Etruscans; but he had scarcely entered Etruria, when he was thrown from his horse, and died in consequence on the third day after. (Liv. x. 9, 11.)

4. L. MANLIUS TORQUATUS, probably a brother of No. 3, legatus of the propraetor Scipio in the great campaign of B. C. 295. (Liv. x. 26.)

5. A. MANLIUS T. F. T. N. TORQUATUS ATTICUS, son of No. 3, was censor B. C. 247 with A. Atilius Calatinus, consul for the first time in 244 with C. Sempronius Blaesus, and for the second time in 241 with Q. Lutatius Cerco. In his second consulship Torquatus defeated the Falisci, who had taken up arms and obtained a triumph in consequence. (Fasti Capit.; Eutrop. ii. 28; Oros. iv. 11; comp. Liv. Ep. 19; Polyb. i. 65.) Pliny (H. N. vii. 53. s. 54) speaks of the sudden death of a consular A. Manlius Torquatus, who may have been either the subject of this notice or No. 9.

6. T. MANLIUS T. F. T. N. TORQUATUS, son of No. 3 and brother of No. 5, was consul for the first time in B. C. 235 with C. Atilius Bulbus, in which year he conquered the Sardinians, and obtained in consequence a triumph. His first consulship was memorable from the circumstance that the temple of Janus was closed in this year, in consequence of the Romans enjoying universal peace, which is said not to have occurred before since the reign of Numa Pompilius. (Eutrop. iii. 3; Liv. xxiii. 34; Vell. Pat. ii. 38; Oros. iv. 12; Liv. i. 19; Plut. Num. 20.) In B. C. 231 Torquatus was elected censor with Q. Fulvius Flaccus, but was obliged to resign through some unfavourable symptom in the auspices. (Fasti Capit.) In B. C. 224 he was consul a second time with Q. Fulvius Flaccus, and along with his colleagues carried on the war with success against the Gauls in the north of Italy. These consuls were the first Roman generals who crossed the Po. (Polyb. ii. 31; Liv. Epit. 20; Oros. iv. 13.) This Torquatus possessed the hereditary sternness and severity of his family (priscae ac nimis durae severitatis, Liv. xxii. 60). We accordingly find him resolutely opposing in the senate the ransom of those Romans who had been taken prisoners at the fatal battle of Cannae (B. C. 216). In the following year (B. C. 217) he was sent into Sardinia in consequence of the illness of the praetor Q. Mucius, who had the government of the province; and while in the island he carried on the war with success against the Carthaginians and the Sardinians, who had revolted at the instigation of the former people. In B. C. 212 he was a candidate for the dignity of pontifex maximus, but was defeated by P. Licinius Crassus, who was greatly his junior, and was then suing for the curule aedileship. The people wished to choose Torquatus consul for the year 210, but he refused to accept the honour. Two years afterwards (B. C. 208) he was appointed dictator for the purpose of holding the comitia and presiding at the games which had been vowed by the praetor M. Aemilius. (Liv. xxii. 60, xxiii. 34, 40, 41, xxv. 5, xxvi. 22, xxvii. 33.) He died in B. C. 202. (Liv. xxx. 39.)

7. A. MANLIUS TORQUATUS, known only from the Fasti Capitolini as the son of No. 6 and the father of No. 8.

8. T. MANLIUS A. F. T. N. TORQUATUS, the son of No. 7, was consul B. C. 165 with Cn. Octavius. He inherited the severity of his ancestors; of which an instance is related in the condemnation of his son, who had been adopted by D. Junius Silanus, the particulars of which are related elsewhere. [SILANUS, No. 3.] He appears to be the same person as the T. Manlius Torquatus, who was elected pontiff in B. C. 170, and who was sent on an embassy to Egypt about B. C. 164 to mediate between the two Ptolemies, Philometor and Euergetes. On his return Torquatus spoke in the senate in favour of the younger brother, Euergetes. (Liv. xliii. 11; Polyb. xxxi. 18, xxxii. 1.)

9. A. MANLIUS A. F. T. N. TORQUATUS, son of No. 7 and brother of No. 8, was praetor B. C. 167, when he obtained Sardinia, but was unable to go into his province, as he was retained by the senate to investigate some capital offences. He was consul in B. C. 164 with Q. Cassius Longinus (Liv. xlv. 16; Fasti Capit.). Respecting his death, see No. 5.

10. A. MANLIUS TORQUATUS, was propraetor of Africa, perhaps about B. C. 70, where Plancius, whom Cicero defended at a later period, served under him. (Cic. pro Planc. 11.)

11. A. MANLIUS TORQUATUS, probably son of No. 10, was praetor in B. C. 52, when he presided at the trial of Milo for bribery. On the breaking out of the civil war he espoused the side of Pompey, and after the defeat of the latter retired to Athens, where he was living in exile in B. C. 45. He was an intimate friend of Cicero, who addressed four letters to him (ad Fam. vi. 1—4) while he was in exile. (Ascon. in Cic. Mil. pp. 40, 54, ed. Orelli; Cic. ad Att. v. 1, 4, 21, vi. 1, vii. 14, ix. 8, de Fin. ii. 22.)

12. T. MANLIUS T. F. TORQUATUS, the first cousin (frater patruelis) and father-in-law of No. 10, bore witness on behalf of Plancius in B. C. 54. He is spoken of by Cicero as an orator who came from Molo's school. (Cic. pro Planc. 11, Brut. 70.)

13. T. MANLIUS TORQUATUS, probably a son of No. 12, is spoken of by Cicero in his oration for Deiotarus, B. C. 45, as "optimus adolescens." He appears to be the same person as the Torquatus who is mentioned by Cicero two or three times in his correspondence with Atticus in that year, from which we learn that he was augur. He was quaestor of Pansa in B. C. 43. (Cic. pro Deiot. 11, ad Att. xiii. 20, 21, xii. 17; Appian, B. C. iii. 69, 76; Pseudo-Brut. ad Cic. i. 6.)

14. L. MANLIUS L. F. TORQUATUS, was consul B. C. 65 with L. Aurelius Cotta. Torquatus and Cotta obtained the consulship in consequence of the condemnation, on account of bribery, of P. Cornelius Sulla and P. Autronius Paetus, who had been already elected consuls. It is stated by Dion Cassius (xxxvi. 27) that Cotta and his colleague accused the consuls elect; but it appears from Cicero (de Fin. ii. 19, pro Sull. 17, 18) that this is a mistake, and that it was the younger Torquatus [No. 15] who brought the accusation against Sulla and Paetus. Before Torquatus and Cotta entered upon the consulship, the first Catilinarian conspiracy, as it is called, was formed, in which Sulla and Paetus are said to have united with Catiline for the purpose of assassinating the consuls on the 1st of January. This conspiracy, however, failed. At this time and during his consulship Torquatus was in close connection with Hortensius, and he did not consult Cicero on any matters, although the latter was then praetor, and was very intimate with the younger Torquatus. (Cic. pro Sull. 4.) Notwithstanding this attempt upon his life, Torquatus defended Catiline in the course of the same year when he was accused of extortion (de repetundis) in his province. After his consulship Torquatus obtained the province of Macedonia, where he performed some exploits; in consequence of which the senate, upon the motion of Cicero, conferred upon him the title of imperator. During Cicero's consulship, B. C. 63, he took an active part in suppressing the Catilinarian conspiracy, although he was then out of health. He also supported Cicero, when he was banished in B. C. 58, and interceded in vain on his behalf with the consul Piso. He is not mentioned again, and probably died soon afterwards. Cicero speaks of him (Brut. 68) as "elegans in dicendo, in existimando admodum prudens, toto genere perurbanus;" and as he belonged to the aristocratical party, the orator praises his gravitas, sanctitas, and constantia. (Dion Cass. xxxvi. 27; Sall. Cat. 18; Liv. Epit. 101; Cic. de Div. i. 12, de Leg. Agr. ii. 17, pro Sull. 4, 10, 12, 29, ad Att. xii. 21, in Pison. 19, 20, 31.)

15. L. MANLIUS TORQUATUS, son of No. 13, accused of bribery, in B. C. 66, the consuls elect, P. Cornelius Sulla and P. Autronius Paetus, as is related above, and thus secured the consulship for his father. He was closely connected with Cicero during the praetorship (B. C. 65) and consulship (B. C. 63) of the latter. In B. C. 62 he brought a second accusation against P. Sulla, whom he now charged with having been a party to both of Catiline's conspiracies. Sulla was defended by Hortensius and by Cicero in a speech which is still extant, and through the eloquence of his advocates, and the support of the aristocratical party, he obtained a verdict in his favour. In B. C. 54 Torquatus defended Gabinius when he was accused by Sulla. Torquatus, like his father, belonged to the aristocratical party, and accordingly opposed Caesar on the breaking out of the civil war in B. C. 49. He was praetor in that year, and was stationed at Alba with six cohorts; but on the fall of Corfinium he abandoned Alba and his soldiers went over to Caesar. He subsequently joined Pompey in Greece. In the following year (B. C. 48) he had the command of Oricum intrusted to him, but was obliged to surrender both himself and the town to Caesar, who, with his usual magnanimity, dismissed Torquatus uninjured. Torquatus, however, forthwith joined Pompey, and fought under him against Caesar at Dyrrhachium (Oros. v. 15). After the battle of Pharsalia he went to Africa, and upon the defeat of his party in that country, in B. C. 46, he attempted to escape to Spain along with Scipio and others, but was taken prisoner by P. Sittius at Hippo Regius and slain together with his companions. (Cic. pro Sull. 1, 8, 10, 12, ad Att. iv. 16. § 11, ad Q. Fr. iii. 3. § 2, ad Att. vii. 12, 23, ix. 8; Caes. B. C. i. 24, iii. 11; Hirt. B. Afr. 96; Oros. vi. 16, where he is erroneously called Titus.) Torquatus was well acquainted with Greek literature, and is praised by Cicero as a man well trained in every kind of learning. Although he expressed himself with elegance and force, he was not much of an orator. He belonged to the Epicurean school of philosophy, of which he was one of the most distinguished disciples at that time at Rome; and he is introduced by Cicero as the advocate of that school in his dialogue De Finibus, the first book of which is called Torquatus in Cicero's letters to Atticus. (Cic. Brut. 76, de Fin. i. 5, ad Att. xiii. 5, 19, 32.)

16. MANLIUS TORQUATUS, the legatus of Pompey in the war against the pirates in B. C. 67 (Appian, Mithr. 95), was probably the same as one of the preceding persons, but we have no means of determining which.

17. TORQUATUS, to whom Horace addresses two of his poems (Carm. iv. 7, Sat. i. 5), probably did not belong to the Manlia gens, but was the same person as C. Nonius Asprenas. [NONIUS, No. 8.]

There are several coins bearing the name of L. Manlius Torquatus, who was the proquaestor of Sulla, as we learn from one of the coins. The specimen annexed has on the obverse the head of Rome, encircled with a torques or chain [see No. 1], and on the reverse a man riding a horse at full gallop, with the legend L. TORQVA. (Q.) EX S. C. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 244.)

TORQUA'TUS, NO'NIUS ASPRE'NAS. [NONIUS, No. 8.]

TORQUA'TUS, NOVE'LLIUS, of Mediolanum (Milan), lived in the reign of Claudius, and obtained the surname of Tricongius by drinking three congii of wine at once, that is, nearly eighteen English pints! (Plin. H. N. xiv. 22. s. 28.)

TORQUA'TUS SILA'NUS. [SILANUS, Nos. 14, 15.]

TOXEUS (Τοξεύς), a son of Oeneus and Althaea, was killed by Meleager. (Apollod. i. 8. § 1; Anton. Lib. 2; comp. OENEUS.) [L. S.]

TOXO'TIUS, a senator, married Junia Fadilla, the proneptis of Antoninus, who had been previously betrothed to the younger Maximinus. Toxotius died after his praetorship, leaving some poems behind him. (Capitol. Maximin. Jun. 1.)

Q. TRA'BEA, a Roman comic dramatist who occupies the eighth place in the canon of Volcatius Sedigitus [SEDIGITUS]. Varro, while he assigns the palm to Titinius and Terence in the delineation of character (ἤθη), classes together Trabea, Attilius, and Caecilius as masters in the art of touching the feelings (πάθη). The period when he flourished is uncertain, but he has been placed by Gronovius about B. C. 130. No portion of his works has been preserved with the exception of half a dozen lines quoted by Cicero. (Cic. Tuscul. Quaest. iv. 31, de Fin. ii. 4, comp. ad Fam. ix. 21, where, however, the interpretation is doubtful; Varr. L. L. lib. v. ap. Charis. p. 215, ed. Putsch.; Bothe, Poetarum Latii Scenicorum Fragmenta, vol. ii. p. 58, 8vo. Lips. 1834.) [W. R.]

TRA'CHALUS, GALE'RIUS, was consul A. D. 68 with Silius Italicus, and a relation of Galeria Fundana, the wife of Vitellius, who protected him on the accession of her husband to the throne. Trachalus is frequently mentioned by his contemporary Quintilian, as one of the most distinguished orators of his age. Tacitus takes notice of a report that Trachalus wrote the orations which the emperor Otho delivered, but the speeches of Otho in the Histories of Tacitus (i. 37, 83) were composed by the historian and not by Trachalus. (Tac. Hist. i. 90, ii. 60; Quintil. vi. 3. § 78, viii. 5. § 19, x. 1. § 119, xii. 5 § 5, xii. 10. § 11; Spalding, ad Quintil. vi. 3. § 78; Bernardi, Recherches sur Galerius Trachalus, in the Mémoires de l'Institut Royal de France, vol. vii. p. 119, foll., Paris, 1824; Meyer, Oratorum Romanorum Fragmenta, p. 592, foll., 2d ed.)

TRAGISCUS (Τραγίσκος), a Tarentine, assisted Philemenus and Nicon in betraying his native city to Hannibal in B. C. 212. (Polyb. viii. 29, foll.) For details, see NICON, No. 2.

TRAJA'NUS, M. U'LPIUS, Roman emperor A. D. 98—117, was born at Italica (Alcalà del Rio), near Seville, the 18th of September, A. D. 52, according to some authorities. His father, also named Trajanus, had attained, it is said, the dignity of consul, and been elevated to the rank of patrician; but his name does not occur in the Fasti.

The son was trained to arms, and served as tribunus militum. It appears that he was employed near the Euphrates, probably about A. D. 80, when he checked the progress of the Parthians; and it is not unlikely that he was at this time serving under his father. He was raised to the praetorship some time before A. D. 86, and was consul in A. D. 91 with M' Acilius Glabrio. He afterwards returned to Spain, whence he was summoned by Domitian to command the troops in Lower Germany, and he had his head-quarters at Cologne. At the close of A. D. 97, he was adopted by the emperor Nerva, who gave him the rank of Caesar, and the names of Nerva and Germanicus, and shortly after the title of imperator, and the tribunitia potestas. His style and title after his elevation to the imperial dignity were Imperator Caesar Nerva Trajanus Augustus. He was the first emperor who was born out of Italy.

Trajan was a man adapted to command. He was strong and healthy, of a majestic appearance, laborious, and inured to fatigue. Though not a man of letters, he had good sense, a knowledge of the world, and a sound judgment. His mode of living was very simple, and in his campaigns he shared all the sufferings and privations of the soldiers, by whom he was both loved and feared. He was a friend to justice, and he had a sincere desire for the happiness of the people. Yet it is said that he sometimes indulged in wine to excess, and during intoxication was subject to fits of passion. A strong nature, like that of Trajan, may sometimes have required excitement, notwithstanding his habitual temperance. It is difficult to decide between the testimony of his panegyrist Plinius, who commends the chastity of Trajan, and the testimony of Dion Cassius, the universal calumniator, who says that he was addicted to shameful vices. Julian, a severe judge, has not spared him on this point.

Nerva died in January A. D. 98, and was succeeded by Trajan, who was then at Cologne. He did not come to Rome for some months, being employed in settling the frontiers on the Rhine and the Danube. It was apparently about this time that the Chamavi and Angrivarii drove the Bructeri from their lands on the Rhine, and destroyed the greater part of them, the Romans being witnesses of the bloody combat, and seeing with indifference, or even pleasure, the mutual slaughter of their enemies.

In A. D. 99 Trajan did not take the consulship, though it was usual for an emperor to hold this office in the year which followed his elevation. One of the consuls of this year was C. Sosius Senecio, whom Plutarch addresses in the beginning of his life of Romulus, and in several of his moral essays. Trajan entered Rome on foot, amidst the rejoicings of the Romans, accompanied by his wife Pompeia Plotina. This lady is highly commended by Plinius the younger for her modest virtues, and her affection to Marciana, the sister of Trajan. The title of Pater Patriae was accepted by the emperor after his arrival at Rome, and the new designation of Optimus. It seems probable that his wife and sister also had the title of Augustae.

It was usual for a new emperor to bestow a gift of money on each of his soldiers, and it appears from the medals that Trajan made his congiarium in this year. He also showed the same liberality to the Roman citizens, and extended it to children under eleven years of age, who had not been allowed to share in former donations of this kind. The emperor made allowances for the bringing up of the children of poor free persons at Rome, the direct object being to encourage the procreation, or rather the preservation of children, who otherwise would have been allowed to perish. "It is," says Plinius (Panegyr. c. 27), "a great inducement to bring up children, to raise them with the hope of receiving sustenance (alimenta), of receiving donations (congiaria)." Plinius commends the emperor for being liberal out of his own means, that is, out of the imperial revenue; but this money came either from taxes, or from the produce of lands which belonged to the fiscus. So long as a bounty is paid for the procreation of children, the state may rest secure that it will not want citizens. This system was extended to other towns of Italy, where provision was made for supporting the children of the poor. This was the mode in which the Roman policy attempted to meet an evil, which grows up in all large towns, a population without the means of subsistence (see the Tabula Alimentaria of Velleia). Trajan also occupied himself with provisioning Rome, a part of Roman policy which had been long established. There are only two ways of feeding a people; one way is to let them feed themselves by removing all obstacles to freedom of trade and freedom of communication; the other is by taking from one to give to another, a system which is more agreeable to him who gains than to him who loses. Trajan punished the odious class of informers, a measure that will always be popular.

There was at Rome a tax of five per cent (vicesima) on successions, that is, on property which came to a man by the death of another. This mode of raising a revenue contains the principle of the state assuming that a man's title to property ceases with his life, for if the amount of the tax is carried high enough, the whole will go to the state. It is not like a tax annually paid upon the annual produce or value of land, which is only a contribution of a portion of the fruits. Trajan (Plin. Paneg. c. 37, &c.) released from this tax on successions those heredes who were not extranei, and also those who succeeded to a small hereditas. Many of the public buildings at Rome were repaired by the emperor in the early part of his reign, and he added accommodation to the Circus for five thousand persons.

In the year A. D. 100, various persons enjoyed for a time the honour of the consulship; Sex. Julius Frontinus, the author of a work on the aqueducts of Rome, Tertullus Cornutus, and C. Caecilius Plinius Secundus. In this year Marius Priscus, proconsul of Africa, was tried by the senate for peculation in his province. Plinius and Cornelius Tacitus, the historian, were appointed by the senate to prosecute. Priscus made no defence, and submitted to be convicted. He was banished, but he still enjoyed himself in his exile (Juv. Sat. viii. 120). Caecilius Classicus, proconsul of Baetica, was accused about the same time of pillaging the people whom he had been sent to govern. He died or killed himself before judgment was given (Plin. Ep. iii. 9); but the matter was still prosecuted: the property which Classicus had before he was governor was given to his daughter, and the rest was distributed among those whom he had robbed. Some of the accomplices of Classicus were also punished. The Panegyricus on Trajan, which is our authority for many of Trajan's acts up to this time, was pronounced by Plinius in A. D. 100, the year in which he received the consular honour. Some additions were made to the Panegyricus after it was pronounced (Plin. Ep. iii. 13, 18). It was perhaps about this time that Hadrian, afterwards emperor, married Sabina, the grand-niece of Trajan; and to this date or somewhere about this time we may refer a letter of Plinius (Ep. iii. 20), in which he says that all the senators on the day of electing the magistrates demanded the vote by ballot (tabellas postulaverunt).

In his fourth consulship, A. D. 101, Trajan left Rome for his campaign against the Daci. Decebalus, king of the Daci, had compelled Domitian to purchase peace by an annual payment of money; and Trajan, either being tired of paying this shameful tribute, or having other grounds of complaint, determined on hostilities. Decebalus was defeated, and one of his sisters was taken prisoner, and many of his strong posts were captured. Trajan advanced as far as Zermizegethusa, probably the chief town of the Dacian king, and Decebalus at last sued for peace at the feet of the Roman emperor; but Trajan required him to send ambassadors to Rome to pray for the ratification of the treaty. The conqueror assumed the name of Dacicus, and entered Rome in triumph.

Plinius (Ep. iv. 22) records a curious decision at Rome in the emperor's consilium. Trebonius Rufinus, duumvir of Vienna, had put an end to certain games in that town, which had been established by a testamentary bequest; the ground of not allowing their celebration was, that the games were injurious to the morals of the people of Vienna. The case was carried by appeal to Rome, and the judgment of Rufinus was confirmed. When the members of the consilium were asked their opinion Junius Mauricus said that he wished such exhibitions could be stopped at Rome also. This was the same man who gave Nerva a rebuke [NERVA, p. 1167]. (Plin. Ep. iv. 22.)

It was probably some time in A. D. 103, that Trajan made an artificial harbour at Centum Cellae (Cività Vecchia), the form of which is recorded on a medal: the operations of constructing the port are described by Plinius (Ep. vi. 31). The port was called Trajanus Portus, but the old name of Centum Cellae afterwards prevailed. In this year or the following Plinius was sent by Trajan as governor of Pontus and Bithynia, with the title of Legatus and Propraetor, and with Consularis Potestas. It was during his residence of about eighteen months in this province that part of his correspondence with Trajan took place, which is preserved in the tenth book of the letters of Plinius. He was particularly commissioned by the emperor to examine the state of the revenue and expenditure of the towns, and to cut off all useless cost. The correspondence of Trajan with his governor shows the good sense and moderation of the Roman emperor, his attention to business, his honest straightforward purpose. As to the treatment of the Christians in Bithynia, see PLINIUS, C. CAECILIUS SECUNDUS.

An embassy from a Sarmatian king (A. D. 104) passed through Nicaea in Bithynia on their way to Trajan (Plin. Ep. x. 14). In this year the remains of Nero's golden palace were burnt, and Orosius adds (vii. 12) that it was a visitation upon Trajan for his persecution of the Christians; but as it is not proved to the satisfaction of all persons that Trajan was a persecutor, perhaps the historian may be mistaken in his opinion. Besides, the burning of Nero's palace, who set the first example of persecution, does not seem to have been an appropriate punishment for Trajan, even if he deserved punishment.

In this year Trajan commenced his second Dacian war against Decebalus, who, it is said, had broken the treaty; and when Trajan required him to surrender himself, he refused, and prepared for resistance. The senate declared Decebalus an enemy, and Trajan conducted the campaign in person. The Dacian attempted to rid himself of his formidable enemy by sending two pretended deserters to assassinate him when he was in

Maesia. Longinus, one of the generals of Trajan was surprised by Decebalus in an ambuscade, and the Dacian king offered to restore him, if Trajan would grant peace, restore the country as far as the Danube, and pay the expenses of the war. Trajan, who could not accept such terms as these, gave an evasive answer, and in the mean time Longinus relieved the emperor from his difficulty by poisoning himself. In order to effect a communication with the country north of the Danube, Apollodorus the architect constructed, by Trajan's command, a bridge over the river, which is described by Dion Cassius (lxviii. 13, and the valuable note of Reimarus), though his description is inaccurate, and his measurements exaggerated. "When the water is very low, some of the piles stand two or three feet above it." (Wilkinson's Wallachia and Moldavia, p. 5.) The bridge was built at a place called Szernecz. The piers were of enormous size, but the arches were constructed of wood. Trajan crossed the Danube on his new bridge, and entered Dacia. He found great obstacles in this country, where there were no roads, and every thing was almost in a state of nature. Hadrian commanded a legion under the emperor, and greatly distinguished himself in this Dacian campaign. Decebalus being defeated on every side, killed himself, and his head was carried to Rome. Dacia was reduced to the form of a Roman province; strong forts were built in various places, and Roman colonies were planted. It is generally supposed that the column at Rome called the Column of Trajan was erected to commemorate his Dacian victories. On his return Trajan had a triumph, and he exhibited games to the people for one hundred and twenty-three days, a time long enough to satisfy the avidity of the Romans for these spectacles. Eleven thousand animals were slaughtered during these amusements; and an army of gladiators, ten thousand men, gratified the Romans by killing one another. We must assume that there was at least another army as large to prevent the outbreak of so many desperate men. Probably many of these gladiators were prisoners. (A. D. 105.)

About this time Arabia Petraea was subjected to the empire by A. Cornelius Palma, the governor of Syria; and an Indian embassy came to Rome.

Trajan constructed a road across the Pomptine marshes, and built magnificent bridges across the streams. Buildings, probably mansiones, were constructed by the side of this road. He also called in all the old money, and issued a new coinage.

In the autumn of B. C. 106 Trajan left Rome to make war on the Armenians and the Parthians. The pretext for the war was that Exedares, the king of Armenia, had received the diadem from the Parthian king, and he ought to have received it from the Roman emperor, as Tiridates had received it from Nero. When Chosroes, the Parthian king, knew that Trajan was seriously bent on war, he sent ambassadors, who found Trajan at Athens, and, in the name of Chosroes, offered him presents, and informed him that Chosroes had deposed Exedares, and begged him to confer the crown on Parthamasiris. Trajan refused his presents, and said that when he arrived in Syria he would do what was proper. He reached Seleucia in Syria in the month of December, and entered Antioch early in the following January. The evidence for the interview at Antioch between the emperor and Ignatius, which ended in the condemnation of Ignatius, is stated elsewhere [IGNATIUS]. The circumstances, as told, are exceedingly improbable, and sound criticism would lead us to reject the genuineness of the narrative contained in the Martyrdom of Ignatius on the internal evidence alone.

From Antioch Trajan marched to Armenia, by way of Samosata, on the Euphrates, which he took He thence advanced to Satala, and Elegia, a town in Armenia, where he granted Parthamasiris an interview. Parthamasiris had already written to Trajan, and in his letter he assumed the title of king. Trajan sent no answer, and he wrote again, dropping the title of king, and prayed that M. Junius, governor of Cappadocia, might be sent to him: Trajan sent to him the son of Junius. The Armenian king took the diadem from his head. and placed it at the feet of Trajan, who sat on his tribunal within the Roman camp. He expected that Trajan would give it back to him, but he was told that Armenia was now a Roman province, and he was sent away escorted by some horsemen. The kings of the countries bordering on Armenia made a form of submission to the Roman emperor; the king of the Iberi, of the Sauromatae, of Colchis, and others.

Trajan returned by way of Edessa, where he was well received by the cautious Abgarus, king of Osrhoene, who now made his apology for not having paid the emperor a visit at Antioch, and through the interest of his son Arbandes, whom Trajan had seen and liked, the king of Osrhoene was excused for his former want of respect. The transactions with some of the petty chieftains of Mesopotamia hardly merit a notice, but military operations in this country are dangerous enough even without a formidable enemy, and the emperor set his soldiers an example of endurance, which may have been an act of prudence as of hardihood. The town of Singar (Sinjar) is one of those which are mentioned as having been taken by the Romans. The history of this campaign of Trajan is lost, and the few scattered notices that remain of it do not enable us to construct even a probable narrative. In fact the period from A. D. 108 to A. D. 115 is nearly a blank; it is even doubful whether Trajan ever returned to Rome. The year A. D. 112 was the sixth and last consulship of Trajan, and there is some slight evidence which renders it probable that he was at Rome in this year.

In the spring of A. D. 115 he left Syria on his Parthian expedition. He had constructed boats of the timber which the forests near Nisibis supplied, and they were conveyed on waggons to the Tigris, for the formation of a bridge of boats. He crossed the river and advanced into the country of Adiabene, an event which is recorded by an extant medal. The whole of this country, in which were situated Gaugamela and Arbela, places memorable in the history of Alexander, was subdued. From Adiabene he marched to Babylon, according to Dion Cassius (lxviii. 26), and he must therefore have recrossed the Tigris. His course was through the desert to the Euphrates, and past the site of Hit (Is), where he saw the springs of bitumen, which was used for cement at Babylon, and which Herodotus has described. Trajan meditated (Dion Cass.) the formation of a canal from the Euphrates to the Tigris, in order that he might convey his boats along it, and construct a bridge over the lower course of the Tigris. We must suppose that the bridge of boats over the upper Tigris in Adia-sene was intended to remain; and that Trajan had also sent boats down the Euphrates, which Dion Cassius has not mentioned. Dion Cassius's narrative, which exists only in the epitome of Xiphilinus, is very confused. There were already canals existing, which joined the Euphrates and Tigris, and we must therefore suppose that they required clearing out, and were not in a fit condition for the transit of boats. According to Dion Cassius, Trajan did not cut the intended canal, for fear that the Euphrates might be drained by it of its waters. Accordingly, the boats were taken across by land, the Tigris was bridged, and the Roman emperor entered the Parthian capital of Ctesiphon. This event was commemorated by his assuming the name of Parthicus, though it seems that he had assumed it before. (See the medal at the close of this article.)

Tillemont supposes that Trajan returned to Antioch in the winter of A. D. 115, during which happened the great earthquake, which nearly destroyed Antioch and many other cities; but Dion Cassius places the earthquake before the capture of Ctesiphon. This terrible calamity, which was as awful in its circumstances as the great earthquake of Lisbon in the last century, destroyed a great number of buildings and many people: Pedo the consul perished, and Trajan escaped through a window, with a slight injury, being led forth by a man of supernatural size.

In the following year Trajan descended the Tigris and entered the Erythraean Sea (the Persian Gulf). The king of the district called Mesene, between the lower course of the Tigris and the Euphrates, submitted to the emperor. Dion Cassius adds that Trajan sailed as far as the Ocean, and seeing a vessel bound for India, said that he would have gone thither, if he were younger. In the mean time he was losing his Eastern conquests as quick as he had gained them; some of his governors were slaughtered, and others expelled. He sent his generals Lusius and Maximus to restore obedience. Maximus lost his life; but Lusius was successful, for he recovered Nisibis, and took Edessa by storm and burnt it. Seleucia on the Tigris, near Ctesiphon, was taken and burnt by Erycius Clarus and Julius Alexander. It appears that the whole country east of the Tigris from north to south, had risen against the Romans. Returning to Ctesiphon, Trajan determined to give the Parthians a king. He assembled the Romans and Parthians in a great plain near the city, and ascending a lofty tribunal, he commemorated his own exploits, and concluded by declaring Parthamaspates king of the Parthians, and placing the diadem on his head. The conquest of Arabia is recorded by several medals among the exploits of Trajan, but it is impossible to say which of the several parts of Asia included under that name, was conquered by him. Dion Cassius says: "after this he went into Arabia and attacked the Atreni, who had revolted; and their city is neither large nor rich." By Arabia he here means northern Mesopotamia, for Atra is Al Hadhr. (London Geog. Journal, vol. xi. p. 17.) Trajan was obliged to raise the siege of this town. Tillemont supposes that Trajan entered the Indian Ocean, and penetrated "even to the extremities of Arabia Felix," but it is impossible to adopt his conclusions from the evidence that he produces.

Trajan fell ill after the siege of Atra, and as his complaint grew worse, he set out for Italy, leaving Hadrian in Syria, and Parthia again hostile, for the Parthians had ejected the king whom Trajan gave them. The emperor seems to have had a variety of complaints, both dropsy and paralysis. He lived to reach Selinus in Cilicia, afterwards called Trajanopolis, where he died in the early part of August, A. D. 117, after a reign of nineteen years six months and fifteen days. His ashes were taken to Rome in a golden urn, carried in triumphal procession, and deposited under the column which bears his name. He left no children, and he was succeeded by Hadrian.

Trajan constructed several great roads in the empire; he built libraries at Rome, one of which, called the Ulpia Bibliotheca, is often mentioned; and a theatre in the Campus Martius. His great work was the Forum Trajanum, the site of which was an elevation which was removed, and the ground was levelled to a plain, in the centre of which was placed the column of Trajan, the height of which marked the height of the earth which had been removed. The inscription on the column fixes the date at the year A. D. 112, the sixth consulship of Trajan. Apollodorus was Trajan's architect. Trajan constructed the port of Ancona, on the ancient mole of which there still stands a triumphal arch, dedicated to Trajan, his wife, and his sister. The inscription on the bridge of Alcantara over the Tagus belonged to the year A. D. 106, but though the inscription was in honour of Trajan, it states that the bridge was made at the common expense of the several towns which are there mentioned.

Under the reign of Trajan lived Sextus Julius Frontinus, C. Cornelius Tacitus, the Younger Plinius, and various others of less note. Plutarch, Suetonius, Epictetus, survived Trajan. The jurists Juventius Celsus, and Neratius Priscus, were living under Trajan.

The authorities for part of the reign of Trajan are very defective. Tillemont, with all his industry, has not been able to construct a narrative of the latter years of his reign, which we can fully accept, and his chronology is open to several objections. Still the life of Trajan in the Histoire des Empereurs (vol. ii.) contains all the materials that exist for the reign of this distinguished man, and, with the notes of Reimarus on the sixty-eighth book of Dion Cassius, must be the foundation of any future attempts to give a satisfactory history of this period. There is an essay by H. Francke, Zur Geschichte Trajans und seiner Zeitgenossen, &c., 1837, which is well spoken of. [G. L.]

COIN OF TRAJANUS.

TRAJA'NUS, comes, a general of the emperor Valens. In A. D. 373 he conducted the war against the Persians, and defeated Sapor with great slaughter. He spent the winter with Valens at Antioch, and in the following year (374) was sent into Armenia, with secret orders to put to death Para the king of Armenia, who was an ally of the Romans, but was distrusted by the emperor. On his arrival in Armenia, Trajan invited Para to a banquet, where he was treacherously murdered by the Roman soldiers. [ARSACIDAE, p. 364, a.] In A. D. 377 the Goths rose in arms, and laid waste Thrace and the surrounding countries. Gratian sent Richomir at the head of a large army to stop their ravages, and Valens despatched forces under the command of Trajan and Profuturus. These three generals fought a battle with the Goths, which lasted from the morning to the evening, without any decisive advantage being gained on either side, according to Ammianus Marcellinus. It would appear, however, that the Romans suffered most, and Theodoret even speaks of the defeat of Trajan. In the following year (378) at all events the Goths assumed the offensive. Valens was so displeased with the conduct of Trajan in the late campaign, that he deprived him of his command as general of the infantry, and conferred it upon Sebastianus. The emperor, however, recalled him to the army shortly afterwards, and he fell in the course of the same year at the fatal battle of Adrianople, in which Valens himself perished, August 9th, 378. [VALENS.] Trajan continued firm in the Catholic faith, although he served an Arian master, and accordingly his praises have been celebrated by the ecclesiastical writers. (Amm. Marc. xxix. 1, xxx. 1, xxxi. 7, 13; Theodoret. iv. 30; Basil, Ep. 376, 377; Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. v.)

TRAMBE'LUS (Τράμβηλος), a son of Telamon and Theaneira or Hesione, a king of the Leleges. (Athen. ii. p. 43.) When his mother was with child with him, she fled to Miletus, where she was received by king Arion, who also brought up her son Trambelus. In the time of the Trojan war, when Achilles came to Miletus, he slew Trambelus, but greatly repented when he learnt that he was a son of Telamon. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 467.) Another tradition places Trambelus in the island of Lesbos. (Parthen. Erot. 26.) [L. S.]

TRANQUILLI'NA, SABI'NIA. [SABINIA.]

TRANQUILLUS, SUETO'NIUS. [SUETONIUS.]

TRAULUS MONTA'NUS, a Roman eques, and one of the paramours of Messalina, was put to death by Claudius in A. D. 48. (Tac. Ann. xi. 36.)

COIN OF TREBANIA GENS.

TREBA'TIUS, mentioned by Appian as the leader of the Samnites in the Social war, B. C. 90—89, is probably a false reading for Egnatius. (Appian, B. C. i. 52, with Schweighäuser's note.) [EGNATIUS, No. 2.]

TREBA'TIUS PRISCUS. [PRISCUS.]

TREBA'TIUS TESTA. [TESTA.]

TREBELLIA'NUS, one of the most insignificant and despicable of the herd of thirty tyrants enumerated by Pollio [see AUREOLUS]. He was a Cilician robber, who called his castle in the fastnesses of the Isaurian mountains the Palatium, established a mint, and gave himself the title of emperor. But having been tempted to quit his stronghold and descend into the plain, he was there encountered and slain by Camsisoleus, an Egyptian, one of the generals of Gallienus. (Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyrann. xxv.) [W. R.]

TREBELLIE'NUS RUFUS. [RUFUS.]

TREBE'LLIUS. 1. Q. TREBELLIUS, a centurion in the second Punic war, was rewarded by Scipio in B. C. 210 with the corona muralis. (Liv. xxvi. 48.) For details see DIGITIUS, No. 1.

2. M. TREBELLIUS, of Fregellae, served in Illyricum under the legate L. Coelius during the war against Perseus in B. C. 169. (Liv. xliii. 21.)

3. M. TREBELLIUS, a friend of Sex. Naevius, B. C. 81. (Cic. pro Quint. 5.)

4. L. TREBELLIUS, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 67, joined his colleague, L. Roscius Otho, in opposing the rogation of Gabinius for conferring upon Pompeius the command of the war against the pirates. Trebellius had promised the senate that he would die before he allowed the proposition to pass into a law; and as neither threats nor entreaties induced him to withdraw his veto, Gabinius proposed to the tribes to deprive him of his office. Seventeen out of thirty-five tribes had already voted for his degradation, when Trebellius gave way. (Ascon. in Cornel. p. 71, ed. Orelli; Dion Cass. xxxvi. 7, 13; comp. OTHO, p. 65. a.)

5. L. TREBELLIUS, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 47, resisted his colleague, P. Dolabella, who had proposed a measure for the abolition of debts. Great tumults arose in consequence at Rome, in which Dolabella's party was eventually defeated. [See Vol. I. p. 1059.] Trebellius was as much involved in debt as Dolabella, and he had only opposed the latter in order to please Caesar. Accordingly after the death of the dictator, he attempted, by Antony's assistance, to carry the very measure which he had formerly resisted. He was one of Antony's friends, whom he accompanied in his campaign against D. Brutus in B. C. 43. (Dion Cass. xlii. 29; Plut. Anton. 9; Cic. Phil. vi. 4, x. 10, xi. 6, xii. 8, xiii. 2, 12; Cic. ad Fam. xi. 13. § 4.)

6. A. TREBELLIUS, a Roman eques, deserted from the Pompeian party to Caesar in the Spanish war, B. C. 45. (Auctor, B. Hisp. 26.)

7. M. TREBELLIUS, the legatus of Vitellius, the governor of Syria in A. D. 36. (Tac. Ann. vi. 41.)

TREBE'LLIUS CALCA, pretended to be Clodius, and actually came before the court of the centumviri, to lay claim to the property of Clodius. (Val. Max. ix. 15. § 4.)

TREBELLIUS MA'XIMUS, was one of the three commissioners appointed in the reign of Nero, A. D. 61, to take the census of the Gauls. He was consul suffectus in the following year (A. D. 62) with L. Annaeus Seneca; and accordingly a Senatusconsultum passed in their consulship is quoted under the title of Senatusconsultum Trebellianum. (Gaius, ii. 251, 253; Dig. 36. tit. 1.)

Trebellius afterwards succeeded Petronius Turpilianus in the government of Britain, where he was hated by the army on account of his inactivity, pusillanimity, and avarice. In the commotions which followed the death of Nero, Roscius Caelius, the legate of Trebellius, induced the soldiers to rise against their general. Trebellius quitted the island, and fled to Vitellius. The latter, however, did not replace Trebellius in the government, but sent Vettius Bolanus to occupy the vacant post. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 46, Hist. i. 60, ii. 65, Agr. 16.)

TREBE'LLIUS PO'LLIO, one of the six "Scriptores Historiae Augustae" [see CAPITOLINUS]. His name is prefixed to the biographies of, 1. The two Valeriani, father and son; 2. The Gallieni; 3. The thirty tyrants; 4. Claudius; the last-named piece being addressed to Constantine. We learn from Vopiscus that the lives written by Trebellius Pollio commenced with Philippus and extended down to Claudius. Of these, all as far as the Valeriani, regarding whom but a short fragment remains, have been lost, thus accounting for the gap in the series which we noticed under CAPITOLINUS. Vopiscus does not give Pollio a very high character as an historian, for he accuses him (Aurelian. c. 2) of having recorded many things meagrely and many things carelessly, but we have no reason to form very high expectations, for he tells us himself, at the close of his book on the Thirty Tyrants, that he did not write but dictated these memoirs, and with such rapidity that he could not draw his breath. He flourished as we have seen above under Constantine, and was anterior to Vopiscus. For editions, translations, &c. see CAPITOLINUS. [W. R.]

M. TRE'BIUS GALLUS, one of Caesar's officers in Gaul in B. C. 58. (Caes. B. G. iii. 7.)

TRE'BIUS SERGIA'NUS, consul under Hadrian in A. D. 132, with C. Serius Augurinus (Fasti.)

TRE'BIUS STA'TIUS. [STATIUS.]

TREBO'NIA GENS, plebeian, was of considerable antiquity, and gained distinction as early as B. C. 447, but none of its members obtained the consulship under the republic, during which time likewise we find none of them mentioned with any surname.

TREBONIA'NUS GALLUS, the Roman emperor, is spoken of under GALLUS, but as no coin of his is given under that head, it is inserted here.

COIN OF TREBONIANUS GALLUS.

TREBO'NIUS. 1. L. TREBONIUS, tribune of the plebs B. C. 447, obtained the surname of Asper on account of his frequent attacks upon the patres. He proposed and carried a plebiscitum, that if the ten tribunes were not chosen before the comitia were dissolved, those who were elected should not fill up the number (co-optare), but that the comitia should be continued till the ten were elected. (Liv. iii. 65, v. 10.)

2. CN. TREBONIUS, tribune of the plebs B. C. 401, vigorously resisted the attempts of the patres to undermine the law of his ancestor. (Liv. v. 11.)

3. M. TREBONIUS, consular tribune in B. C. 383. (Liv. vi. 21.)

4. P. TREBONIUS, consular tribune B. C. 379. (Diod. xv. 51.) His name does not occur in Livy (vi. 30) among the consular tribunes of that year.

5. C. TREBONIUS, legatus of the consul L. Papirius Cursor in B. C. 293. (Liv. x. 40.)

6. TREBONIUS, slew C. Lusius, a nephew of C. Marius, for attempting a criminal assault upon him. [LUSIUS.]

7. A. TREBONIUS, proscribed by Sulla. (Cic. Verr. i. 47.)

8. P. TREBONIUS, brother of No. 6, attempted to leave his brother some property, but his will was declared void by Verres. (Cic. l. c.)

9. A. TREBONIUS, a Roman eques and a negotiator or money-lender in the provinces, was recommended by Cicero to the proconsul Lentulus in B. C. 56. (Cic. ad Fam. i. 3.)

10. C. TREBONIUS, a distinguished Roman eques, the father of the following. (Cic. ad Fam. x. 28, Phil. xiii. 10.)

11. C. TREBONIUS, played rather a prominent part in the last days of the republic. He commenced public life as a supporter of the aristocratical party, and in his quaestorship (B. C. 60) he attempted to prevent the adoption of P. Clodius into a plebeian family, contrary to the wish of the triumvirs. (Cic. ad Fam. xv. 21.) He changed sides, however, soon afterwards, and in his tribunate of the plebs (B. C. 55) he was the instrument of the triumvirs in proposing that Pompey should have the two Spains, Crassus Syria, and Caesar the Gauls and Illyricum for another period of five years. This proposal received the approbation of the comitia, and is known by the name of the Lex Trebonia. (Dion Cass. xxxix. 33; Cic. ad Att. iv. 8. b. § 2.) For this service he was rewarded by being appointed one of Caesar's legates in Gaul, where he remained till the breaking out of the civil war in B. C. 49. In the course of the same year he was intrusted by Caesar with the command of the land forces engaged in the siege of Massilia. (Caes. B. G. v. 24, vi. 40, B. C. i. 36, ii. 1; Dion Cass. xli. 19; Cic. ad Att. viii. 3. § 7.) In B. C. 48 Trebonius was city-praetor, and in the discharge of his duties resisted the seditious attempts of his colleague M. Caelius Rufus to obtain by force the repeal of Caesar's law respecting the payment of debts. The history of these events is related elsewhere. [Vol. III. p. 672, b.] (Caes. B. C. iii. 20, 21; Dion Cass. xlii. 22.) Towards the end of B. C. 47, Trebonius, as propraetor, succeeded Q. Cassius Longinus in the government of Further Spain, but was expelled from the province by a mutiny of the soldiers who espoused the Pompeian party. Notwithstanding this want of success, he still continued to enjoy the favour and confidence of Caesar, who raised him to the consulship in the month of October, B. C. 45, and promised him the province of Asia. (Dion Cass. xliii. 29, 46.) In return for all these honours and favours, Trebonius was one of the prime movers in the conspiracy to assassinate his benefactor, and among the many instances of black ingratitude on the fatal Ides of March, his was one of the blackest. It had been assigned to Trebonius to keep Antonius engaged in conversation outside the senate house while the other conspirators perpetrated the foul deed. Trebonius did not remain long at Rome after the murder of Caesar, but went as proconsul to the province of Asia. In the following year (B. C. 43) he sent a supply of money to M. Brutus in Macedonia, and to C. Cassius who was attempting to obtain possession of Syria. In the course of the same year, Dolabella, who had received from Antonius the province of Syria, appeared before Smyrna, where Trebonius was then residing, surprised the town in the night time, and slew Trebonius in his bed. For details see DOLABELLA, p. 1059, b. (Dion Cass. xliv. 14, 19, xlvii. 21, 26, 29; Plut. Brut. 19; Appian, B. C. ii. 113, 117, iii. 2, 26; Cic. Phil. ii. 11, 14, xi. 1, 2, 4, xii. 10, xiii. 10, ad Fam. x. 28, ad Att. xiv. 10, ad Fam. xii. 12, 14, 15.) A few of Cicero's letters are addressed to this Trebonius (ad Fam. x. 28, xii. 16, xv. 20, 21). The panegyrics which Cicero pronounces upon this ungrateful wretch in his letters and in the Philippics are most disgusting, and the language which the orator uses on one occasion in reference to the murder of the great man to whom he owed his own life, is positively so loathsome that it deprives us of almost all pity for his own fate. Thus he writes to Trebonius (ad Fam. x. 28): — "Quam vellem ad illas pulcherrimas epulas me Idibus Martiis invitasses! reliquiarum nihil haberemus."

12. TREBONIUS, a contemporary of Horace, detected in adultery, is otherwise unknown. (Hor. Sat. i. 4. 114.)

TREBO'NIUS GARUCIA'NUS, procurator of Africa at the death of Nero, A. D. 68, put to death Clodius Macer, the governor of the province, by the command of Galba. (Tac. Hist. i. 7.)

TREBO'NIUS RUFI'NUS. [RUFINUS.]

TREME'LLIA GENS, plebeian, is first mentioned towards the end of the second Punic war, but never obtained much importance. None of its members held the consulship. They bore the surnames of SCROFA and FLACCUS: the latter cognomen is omitted under FLACCUS, and is therefore given below.

TREME'LLIUS. 1. CN. TREMELLIUS FLACCUS, of quaestorian rank in B. C. 205, was sent on an embassy, in that year, with four colleagues, to king Attalus, and brought back with him the sacred stone, which represented the Mother of the Gods. He was plebeian aedile in B. C. 203 and praetor in 202, when he obtained Sicily as his province. (Liv. xxix. 11, xxx. 26, 27.)

2. CN. TREMELLIUS, one of the decemvirs in B. C. 173 for dividing certain lands in Liguria and Cisalpine Gaul among the Roman citizens and the Latin allies. (Liv. xlii. 4.)

3. CN. TREMELLIUS, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 167. (Liv. xlv. 15.)

4. CN. TREMELLIUS, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 160, was condemned to pay a fine on account of his having insulted the pontifex maximus M. Aemilius Lepidus. (Liv. Epit. 47.)

TRE'MULUS, Q. MA'RCIUS, a plebeian, was twice consul with the patrician P. Cornelius Arvina, the first time in B. C. 306, and the second time in B. C. 288. In his first consulship Tremulus carried on wars against the Hernici and Anagnini, whom he conquered with ease, and then marched to the assistance of his colleague in Samnium. On his arrival in the latter country he was unexpectedly attacked by the Samnites, but Cornelius came to his succour, and the two armies gained a brilliant victory over the enemy. Cornelius remained in Samnium, but Tremulus returned to Rome, where he celebrated a triumph over the Hernici and Anagnini, and an equestrian statue was erected to him in the forum before the temple of Castor. (Liv. ix. 42, 43; Fasti Capit.; Cic. Phil. vi. 5; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 6.)

TRIA'RIA, the wife of L. Vitellius, the brother of the emperor of that name, was distinguished for her haughtiness and cruelty. (Tac. Hist. ii. 63, 64, iii. 77.)

TRIA'RIUS. 1. A rhetorician, frequently mentioned by M. Seneca. (Suas. 2, 5, 6, Controv. 1, 2, et alibi.)

TRIA'RIUS, VALE'RIUS. 1. L. VALERIUS TRIARIUS, was quaestor urbanus in B. C. 81 (Cic. Verr. i. 14), and subsequently praetor. He was propraetor in Sardinia in B. C. 77, when he repulsed Lepidus who had fled into that island after his unsuccessful attempt to repeal the laws of Sulla. (Ascon. in Scaur. p. 19, ed. Orelli.) Triarius served under Lucullus as one of his legates in the war against Mithridates, and at first gained considerable distinction by his zeal and activity. [For details, see LUCULLUS, p. 833.] In B. C. 68 Triarius was despatched to the assistance of Fabius, who had been intrusted with the defence of Pontus, while Lucullus invaded Armenia, and who was now attacked by Mithridates with overwhelming numbers. Triarius compelled Mithridates to assume the defensive, and early in the following year he commenced active operations against the Pontic king. Anxious to gain the victory over Mithridates before the arrival of Lucullus, Triarius allowed himself to be attacked at a disadvantage, and was totally defeated with great slaughter. From the expression of Cicero (de Leg. Man. 9) we might conclude that every man in the army perished; but this does not appear to have been the case. Plutarch says that seven thousand Romans fell, among whom were a hundred and fifty centurions and twenty-four tribunes; and that Lucullus, who arrived a few days afterwards, was obliged to secrete Triarius from the fury of his troops. This fatal battle, which was one of the severest blows that the Roman arms had sustained for a long time, was fought near Zela, at the same spot where Caesar afterwards gained a victory over Pharnaces. (Appian, Mith. 88, 89, 112, 120; Plut. Pomp. 35; Dion Cass. xxxv. 10—12; Cic. de Leg. Man. 9; Liv. Ep. 98; Plin. H. N. vi. 3.) In Livy (l. c.) the praenomen of Triarius is erroneously Caius.

2. P. VALERIUS TRIARIUS, the son of the preceding, accused M. Aemilius Scaurus, in B. C. 54, first of repetundae and next of ambitus. Scaurus was defended on both occasions by Cicero. (Ascon. in Scaur. p. 19; Cic. pro Scaur. 1, 2, ad Att. iv. 16. § 8, iv. 17. § 2, ad Q. Fr. iii. 2. § 3.) For details, see SCAURUS, p. 737, b.

3. C. VALERIUS TRIARIUS, perhaps a brother of No. 2, was a friend of Cicero, who introduces him as one of the speakers in his dialogue De Finibus (i. 5), and praises his oratory in his Brutus (c. 76). His sister Valeria Paula divorced her husband in B. C. 50, and married D. Brutus. (Cael.

ap. Cic. ad Fam. viii. 7.) On the breaking out of the civil war Triarius espoused the cause of Pompey, who appointed him and Laelius in B. C. 48 to the command of the ships which were furnished by the province of Asia. He was present at the battle of Pharsalia, and it is said to have been by his advice that Pompey ordered his troops to stand still and receive the charge of Caesar's soldiers, a mistake in the opinion of his great opponent. Triarius perished in the civil wars, probably in Africa, for Cicero speaks in B. C. 45 of his death, and adds, that Triarius had left him the guardian of his children. (Caes. B. C. iii. 5, 92; Cic. Brut. 76, ad Att. xii. 28. § 3.)

TRIBONIA'NUS was a son of Macedonianus, according to Suidas. There are in Suidas two articles on Tribonianus, both of which have been supposed to refer to the same person. They are a strange medley of confusion. The first article begins by saying that Tribonianus was a Greek and an atheist, and in all respects averse to the faith of the Christians; in fact the latter part of the character is an explanation of what the zealot from whom this fragment is taken meant by an atheist. He is further described as a flatterer and a cheat, and as persuading Justinian that he would not die, but would be translated to heaven in the flesh (Suidas, s. v. Τριβωνιανός, ed. Gaisford, and the notes). The foolish compiler seems not to have perceived that a profession of atheism and a promise of heaven to the emperor are hardly consistent things.

He is further said to have had great natural powers, and to have made acquirements inferior to those of no man of his age; but he was wonderfully greedy of money, and he sold justice for lucre; every day he repealed some laws, and made others, selling to each according to his wants. This is taken from Procopius (Persica, i. 24). He lived many years in honour, and died a natural death, having suffered no ill from any one, for he was cunning, and pleasant in his manners, and he threw a shade over his avarice by the abundance of his learning. This is the character which we have of the quaestor of Justinian.

The other article appears to be intended by Suidas to refer to another person of the same name, whom he calls a native of Side in Pamphylia, but he also calls him a lawyer or advocate, and a very learned man. He however makes him a contemporary of Justinian, for one of his works was addressed to the emperor. The list of his works given by Suidas is a list of trifles; and no legal work is enumerated among them. It may be safely affirmed that Tribonian the jurist was not the author of any of the works enumerated in this second article of Suidas.

Tribonianus was successively quaestor, consul, and master of the offices to Justinian. In A. D. 531 he was disgraced in consequence of a popular tumult, but he was soon restored, and remained in office until his death in A. D. 545. His name is recorded among those who made the legal compilations of Justinian. In A. D. 528 he was one of the ten commissioners appointed by Justinian to form his first codex: he had at that time the title of "Vir magnificus magisteria dignitate inter agentes decoratus." In A.D. 530 Tribonianus, then quaestor, was commissioned with sixteen others, to compile the Digest or Pandect; and Tribonianus himself, and the four professors (antecessores) Theophilus, Craterus, Dorotheus and Anatolius, were the most active among the commissioners. In December A.D. 533 the Digest was promulgated as law.

During the time that he was employed on the Pandect, Tribonianus and the two professors, Theophilus and Dorotheus, were commissioned to compile an Institutional work. Tribonian had at this time the title of "Vir magnificus, magister, et Exquaestor sacri palatii nostri" (Instit. Prooemium), and they took as their basis the Institutional work of Gaius, and produced the four books of the Institutions of Justinian, which were published in November A. D. 533. The revised or second edition of the Codex was also the work of Tribonianus and four other jurists, and it was published in December A. D. 534. (Constitutio, Cordi, &c.)

It is hardly possible to form any estimate of the services of Tribonianus as distinct from those of the other commissioners. He had the superintendence of the Digest, and may have taken the chief part in planning the work; and to his activity it was owing, that the large collection of juristical writings was made, from which the compilers selected the materials for the Digest (Constitutio, Tanta, &c.). He had a well-stocked library of the old writers on law. As to the compilations made by Tribonian and his associates see the article JUSTINIANUS.

Gibbon (c. 44) has expanded the scanty and scandalous notices of Procopius (Persica, i. 23, 24, and Anecdota, 13, 20) and Suidas after his peculiar fashion. There is a life of Justinian and Tribonian by J. P. de Ludewig, entitled "Vita Justiniani Magni atque Theodorae nec non Triboniani, Hal. 1731." [G. L.]

TRIBU'NUS (Τριβοῦνος), a very eminent physician, a native of Palestine, and a man of great piety and benevolence. He went to Persia, where he attended on the king, Cosra (or Chosroës) I., and returned home laden with magnificent presents, probably A. D. 531. When this king was concluding a treaty of peace with the emperor Justinian in the following year, he made it a special request that Tribunus should be allowed to stay with him for twelve months. This was agreed to, and when at the end of that time Tribunus was about to take leave of the Persian court, the king told him to ask for any favour that he pleased. The noble-minded physician only begged for the liberation of some Roman captives; and the king released not only those whom he particularly named, but three thousand others besides (Procop. De Bello Goth. iv. 10; Suid. s. v. Τριβοῦνος). This anecdote will bring to the recollection of an English physician the very similar disinterestedness of Mr. Boughton at the court of the Great Mogul about the middle of the seventeenth century, which was the origin of the power of the East India Company in Bengal. [W. A. G.]

TRICCIA'NUS, DE'CIUS, a soldier of humble origin, who rose to the dignity of governor of Pannonia under Macrinus. He is apparently the same person as the Triccianus, who at a subsequent period was put to death by Elagabalus. (Dion Cass. lxxviii. 15, lxxix. 4.) [W. R.]

TRICIPTI'NUS, the name of an ancient patrician family of the Lucretia gens.

1. SP. LUCRETIUS TRICIPTINUS, the father of Lucretia, whose rape by Sex. Tarquinius led to the dethronement of Tarquinius Superbus and the establishment of the republic. [Vol. III. p. 978, b.] Triciptinus was a member of the senate under Tarquinius, and was appointed Praefectus Urbi by the king, when the latter left the city to prosecute the war against Ardea. After the dethronement of the king, and before the appointment of the consuls, Triciptinus, in virtue of his office of Praefectus Urbi, had the government of the city. He presided at the comitia, in which the first consuls were elected, and for this purpose was probably elected interrex by the patricians, as indeed is expressly stated by Dionysius (v. 11), and might be inferred from analogy.

The two first consuls were L. Junius Brutus and L. Tarquinius Collatinus, B. C. 509; and after the death of Brutus in battle, in the course of the same year, Triciptinus was elected to supply his place; but worn out by age, he died a few days after entering upon the office. (Liv. i. 58, 59, ii. 8; Dionys. iv. 76, 82, 84, v. 11, 19; Tac. Ann. vi. 11; Cic. de Rep. ii. 31.)

2. T. Lucretius T. F. Triciptinus, consul in B. C. 508 with P. Valerius Publicola, in which year he fought against the Etruscans, who had attacked Rome under Porsena, and he is said by Dionysius to have been wounded in the battle. Dionysius, however, places the invasion of Porsena in the following year, and accordingly represents Triciptinus as one of the generals of the Roman army under the consuls. (Liv. ii. 8, 11; Dionys. v. 20, 22, 23.) Triciptinus was consul a second time in B. C. 504 with P. Valerius Publicola, in which year the consuls carried on the war against the Sabines with success. (Liv. ii. 16; Dionys. v. 40, foll.)

3. Lucretius (Triciptinus), consul in B. C. 507 with P. Valerius Publicola, according to Livy (ii. 15); but in Dionysius (v. 21) and the Fasti M. Horatius Pulvillus is mentioned instead as the colleague of Publicola. [Pulvillus, No. 1.]

4. L. Lucretius T. F. T. N. Triciptinus, son of No. 2, was consul in B. C. 462 with T. Veturius Geminus Cicurinus. He fell upon the Volscians, when they were returning from an invasion of the Roman territory laden with booty, and nearly annihilated the whole army. He obtained in consequence the honour of a triumph. In the following year he exerted himself warmly to save Kaeso Quintius, who was brought to trial by the tribune Virginius. (Liv. iii. 8, 10, 12; Dionys. ix. 69—71.) Triciptinus is mentioned by Dionysius (xi. 15) as one of the distinguished senators who spoke in favour of the abolition of the decemvirate in B. C. 449.

5. Hostus Lucretius L. F. T. N. Triciptinus, son of No. 4, consul in B. C. 429 with L. Sergius Fidenas. (Liv. iv. 30.)

6. P. Lucretius Hosti F. Triciptinus, son of No. 4, consular tribune in B. C. 419, and a second time in 417. (Liv. iv. 44, 47.)

7. L. Lucretius Flavus Triciptinus, consul in B. C. 393 with Ser. Sulpicius Camerinus, in which year he conquered the Aequi. He was consular tribune in 391, when he gained a victory over the Volsinienses; and he held the same office a second time in 388, a third time in 383, and a fourth time in 381. (Liv. v. 29, 32, vi. 4, 21, 22.) Plutarch (Camill. 32) represents L. Lucretius as the senator who was usually asked first for his opinion, probably because he was one of the few who had held the rank of consul; and the same writer informs us that Lucretius spoke against the removal to Veii.

TRICOLO'NUS (Τρικόλωνος), two mythical personages, one a son of Lycaon, and founder of Tricoloni in Arcadia (Paus. viii. 3. § 1), and the other one of the suitors of Hippodameia, who was conquered and killed by Oenomaus. (Paus. vi. 21. § 7.) [L. S.]

TRICOSTUS, the name of an ancient family of the Virginia gens. Almost all the members of the Virginia gens belonged to this family, which became so extensive that it was subdivided into other families bearing the names of Caeliomontanus, Esquilinus, and Rutilus. The two former are spoken of under their respective names, and it therefore only remains to treat here of the Tricosti, who had no additional name, and of the Tricosti Rutili.

1. Opiter Virginius Tricostus, consul B. C. 502 with Sp. Cassius Viscellinus, carried on war against the Aurunci and took Pometia, in consequence of which he and his colleague obtained a triumph. (Liv. ii. 17; Dionys. v. 49.)

2. Opiter Virginius (Tricostus), consul B. C. 473 with L. Aemilius Mamercus, according to Livy (ii. 54); but other authorities give Vopiscus Julius Julus in place of Virginius. [Julus, No. 3.]

3. L. Virginius Tricostus, consul B. C. 435 with C. Julius Julus. (Liv. iv. 21; Diod. xii. 49.) Respecting the events of this year, see Julus, No. 4. Virginius and Julius were again consuls in the following year, according to Licinius Macer; but other authorities mentioned M. Manlius and Q. Sulpicius as consuls, and others again relate that there were no consuls but consular tribunes this year. (Liv. iv. 23.)

4. L. Virginius Tricostus, consular tribune B. C. 389, the year after Rome had been taken by the Gauls. (Liv. vi. 1.)

5. Proculus Virginius Tricostus Rutilus, consul B. C. 486 with Sp. Cassius Viscellinus, marched against the Aequi; but as they would not meet him in the field, he returned to Rome after laying waste their territory. He took an active part in opposing the agrarian law of his colleague. [Viscellinus.] (Liv. ii. 41; Dionys. viii. 68, ix. 51.)

6. T. Virginius T. F. T. N. Tricostus Rutilus, consul B. C. 479 with K. Fabius Vibulanus, in which year the Fabia gens left Rome to carry on the war alone against Veii. (Liv. ii. 48, 49; Dionys. ix. 14.) This Virginius was augur, and died in 463 in the great pestilence which devastated Rome in that year. (Liv. iii. 7.)

7. A. Virginius T. F. T. N. Tricostus Rutilus, brother of No. 6, was consul in B. C. 476 with Sp. Servilius Priscus Structus. (Liv. ii. 51; Dionys. ix. 25.)

TRIGE'MINUS, P. CURIA'TIUS FISTUS, consul B. C. 453, and one of the first decemvirate, is spoken of under Fistus. The cognomen Trigeminus shows that he pretended to be descended from one of the three Curiatii who fought with the Horatii; and it appears from coins, a specimen of which is annexed, that some of the Curatii in later times laid claim to a similar descent. On the obverse of the coin is the head of Pallas with TRIGE (i. e. Trigeminus), and on the reverse a woman driving a quadriga with Victory standing behind her, and the legend C. CVR (C. Cu- riatius), and below ROMA. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 199, foll.)

COIN OF C. CURIATIUS TRIGEMINUS.

TRIGONEIA or TRITOGENEIA (Τριγόνεια or Τριτογένεια), a daughter of Aeolus, and the wife of Minyas, or according to others, the mother of Minyas by Poseidon. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 873; Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iv. 120.) [L. S.]

TRIO, L. FULCI'NIUS, a notorious informer under Tiberius (celebre inter accusatores Trionis ingenium, Tac. Ann. ii. 28), and one of the friends and favourites of Tiberius. He is first mentioned in A. D. 16, when he was the chief instrument in procuring the condemnation of the praetor L. Scribonius Libo. In A. D. 20 he accused Piso before the consuls, and in consequence of that service was allowed by Tiberius to become a candidate for the higher honours of the state. In A. D. 31 he was consul with P. Memmius Regulus, in which year Sejanus was put to death. Being a friend of Sejanus, Trio was suspected of favouring his cause, and vehement disputes arose in consequence between the two consuls. By pretending great anxiety to bring the accomplices of Sejanus to justice, the fall of Trio was postponed for a short time; but in A. D. 35, having been accused and thrown into prison, he did not choose to wait till he was formally condemned, and therefore put an end to his own life, after first making his will, in which he attacked in the severest terms Macro and the principal freedmen of Tiberius, as well as the emperor himself. (Tac. Ann. ii. 28, 30, iii. 10, 19, v. 11, vi. 4, 38; Dion Cass. lviii. 9, 25.)

TRIO, LUCRE'TIUS, known only from coins, on which we find Cn. Lucretius Trio and L. Lucretius Trio. The specimen annexed has on the obverse the head of the Sun, and on the reverse the Moon surrounded by the seven Triones, or the constellation of the Great Bear. (See Dict. of Antiq. p. 147, 2d ed.) These devices, like many in modern heraldry, are a kind of punning on the name. The Sun and Moon give the greatest light (luc-em), and thus have reference to the gentile name Lucretius; while the seven Triones are an evident allusion to the surname. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 239.)

COIN OF L. LUCRETIUS TRIO.

TRI'OPAS (Τριόπας or Τρίοψ). 1. A son of Poseidon and Canace, a daughter of Aeolus (Schol. ad Callim. Hymn. in Cer. 100) or of Helios and Rhodos, and the father of Iphimedeia and Erysichthon (Apollod. i. 7. § 4; Diod. v. 56; Steph. Byz. s. v. Τριόπιον; Ov. Met. viii. 751); he is also called the father of Pelasgus. (Paus. ii. 22. § 2.) He expelled the Pelasgians from the Dotian plain, but was himself obliged to emigrate, and went to Caria, where he founded Cnidus on the Triopian promontory. (Diod. l. c.; Herod. i. 174.) His son Erysichthon was punished by Demeter with insatiable hunger, because he had violated her sacred grove (Callim. Hymn. in Cer. 25, &c.); but others relate the same of Triopas himself. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 14; comp. Schol. ad Theocrit. xvii. 69.) The statue of Triopas with a horse stood at Delphi, being an offering of the Cnidians. (Paus. x. 11. § 1.)

2. A son of Phorbas, an Argive, was the father of Iasus, Agenor and Messene. (Paus. ii. 16. § 1, iv. 1. § 2.) [L. S.]

TRI'PHYLUS (Τρίφυλος), a son of Arcas from whom Tryphylia, a portion of Elis, was believed to have derived its name. (Polyb. iv. 77; Paus. x. 9. § 3.) [L. S.]

TRIPTO'LEMUS (Τριπτόλεμος), a son of Celeus and Metaneira or Polymnia, or according to others, a son of king Eleusis by Cothonea (or Cyntinea, or Hyona, Serv. ad Virg. Georg. i. 19; Schol. ad Stat. Theb. ii. 382.) Others again describe him as a son of Oceanus and Gaea, as a younger brother or relation of Celeus, as a son of Trochilus by an Eleusinian woman, as a son of Rharus by a daughter of Amphictyon, or lastly, as a son of Dysaules. (Hygin. Fab. 147; Apollod. i. 5. § 2; Paus. i. 14. § 2; Hom. Hymn. in Cer. 153.) Triptolemus was the favourite of Demeter, and the inventor of the plough and agriculture, and of civilisation, which is the result of it. He was the great hero in the Eleusinian mysteries. (Plin. H. N. vii. 56; Callim. Hymn. in Cer. 22; Virg. Georg. i. 19.) According to Apollodorus, who makes Triptolemus a son of Celeus and Metaneira, Demeter, on her arrival at Eleusis in Attica, undertook as nurse the care of Demophon, a brother of Triptolemus, who had just been born. In order to make the child immortal, Demeter at night put him into a fire, but as Metaneira on discovering the proceeding, screamed out, the child was consumed by the flames. As a compensation for this bereavement, the goddess gave to Triptolemus a chariot with winged dragons and seeds of wheat. According to others Triptolemus first sowed barley in the Rharian plain, and thence spread the cultivation of grain all over the earth; and in later times an altar and threshing floor of Triptolemus were shown there. (Paus. i. 38. § 6.) In the Homeric hymn on Demeter, Triptolemus is described as one of the chief men of the country, who like other nobles is instructed by Demeter in her sacred worship (123, 474, &c.); but no mention is made of any relationship between him and Celeus. In the tradition related by Hyginus, who makes Triptolemus a son of Eleusis, Triptolemus himself was the boy whom the goddess wished to make immortal. Eleusis, who was watching her, was discovered by her and punished with instant death. (Ov. Trist. iii. 8. 2.) Triptolemus, after having received the dragon-chariot, rode in it all over the earth, making man acquainted with the blessings of agriculture. (Comp. Paus. vii. 18. § 2, viii. 4. § 1; Ov. Met. v. 646, &c.) On his return to Attica, king Celeus wanted to kill him, but by the command of Demeter he was obliged to give up his country to Triptolemus, which he now called after his father Eleusis. He now established the worship of Demeter, and instituted the Thesmophoria. (Hygin. Fab. 147; comp. Dionys. Hal. i. 12; Ov. Fast. iv. 507, &c.) He had temples and statues both at Eleusis and Athens (Paus. i. 14. § 1, 38. § 6.) Triptolemus is represented in works of art as a youthful hero, sometimes with the petasus, on a chariot drawn by dragons, and holding in his hand a sceptre and corn ears. (See Müller, Anc. Art. and its Rem. § 358.) [L. S.]

TRITAEA (Τρίταια), a daughter of Triton, a priestess of Athena, by whom Ares became the father of Melanippus, who gave to a town in Achaia the name of his mother. Sacrifices were offered there to Ares and Tritaea in the temple of Athena. (Paus. vii. 22. § 5, &c.) [L. S.]

TRITANNUS, a man distinguished for his remarkable strength. (Cic. de Fin. i. 3; Plin. H. N. vii. 19. s. 20; Solin. c. 4.)

TRITANTAECHMES (Τριταντταίχμης). 1. A Persian satrap of Babylon, son of Artabazus. (Herod. i. 192.)

2. A son of Artabanus [No. 1], and a cousin therefore of Xerxes, was one of the commanders of the Persian infantry when the barbarians invaded Greece in B. C. 480. After the battle of Thermopylae, when the Persians had been informed by some Arcadian deserters of the contests at Olympia for no other prize than a simple olive-crown, Tritantaechmes exclaimed that men who thus strove, not for gain, but for glory, could not be attacked with much chance of success, a sentiment which Xerxes ascribed to cowardice. (Herod. vii. 82, 121, viii. 26.) [E. E.]

TRITO or TRITOGENEIA (Τριτώ or Τριτογένεια and Τριτογενής), a surname of Athena (Hom. Il. iv. 515, Od. iii. 378; Hes. Theog. 924), which is explained in different ways. Some derive it from lake Tritonis in Libya, near which she is said to have been born (Eurip. Ion, 872; Apollod. i. 3. § 6; comp. Herod. iv. 150, 179); others from the stream Triton near Alalcomenae in Boeotia, where she was worshipped, and where according to some statements she was also born (Paus. ix. 33. § 4; comp. Hom. Il. iv. 8); the grammarians, lastly, derive the name from τριτώ which, in the dialect of the Athamanians, is said to signify "head," so that it would be the goddess born out of the head of her father. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1310; comp. Hom. Hymn. 28. 4; Hes. Theog. 924.) [L. S.]

TRITON (Τρίτων). 1. A son of Poseidon and Amphitrite (or Celaeno), who dwelt with his father and mother in a golden palace on the bottom of the sea, or according to Homer (Il. xiii. 20) at Aegae. (Hes. Theog. 930, &c.; Apollod. i. 4. § 6.) Later writers describe this divinity of the Mediterranean as riding over the sea on horses or other sea-monsters. (Ov. Heroid. vii. 50; Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 28; Claudian, xxviii. 378.) Sometimes also Tritons are mentioned in the plural, and as serving other marine divinities in riding over the sea. Their appearance is differently described, though they are always conceived as presenting the human figure in the upper part of their bodies, while the lower part is that of a fish. Pausanias (ix. 21. § 1) says: the Tritons have green hair on their head, very fine and hard scales, breathing organs below their ears, a human nose, a broad mouth, with the teeth of animals, sea-green eyes, hands rough like the surface of a shell, and instead of feet, a tail like that of dolphins. (Comp. Orph. Hymn. 23. 4; Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 4, 7.) The chief characteristic of Tritons in poetry as well as in works of art is a trumpet consisting of a shell (concha), which the Tritons blow at the command of Poseidon, to soothe the restless waves of the sea (Ov. Met. i. 333), and in the fight of the Gigantes this trumpet served to frighten the enemies. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 23; comp. Paus. viii. 2. § 3; Mosch. ii. 20; Virg. Aen. x. 209, &c.; Ov. Met. ii. 8; Plin. H. N. ix. 5.) Tritons were sometimes represented with two horse's feet instead of arms, and they were then called Centaur-Tritons or Ichthyocentaurs. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 34, 886, 892.) Their figures are frequently mentioned in works of art, as in the sanctuary of Poseidon on the Corinthian isthmus (Paus. ii. 1. § 7), in the temple of Dionysus at Tanagra (ix. 20. § 4; comp. Aelian, H. A. xiii. 21), in the pediment of the temple of Saturn at Rome. (Macrob. Sat. i. 8; comp. Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb. p. 152; Müller, Anc. Art. and its Rem. § 402.)

2. The god of lake Tritonis in Libya, is, like Glaucus, a marine divinity connected with the story of the Argonauts. (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1552, &c.; Orph. Argon. 337; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 34, 754; Herod. iv. 179.) [L. S.]

TRITO'NIS (Τριτωνίς). 1. A nymph of lake Tritonis in Libya, who according to an ancient tradition was the mother of Athena by Poseidon. (Herod. iv. 180; Pind. Pyth. iv. 20.) By Amphithemis she became the mother of Nasamon and Caphaurus. (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1495.)

2. A surname of Athena, like Tritogeneia and Tritonia. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 72, 109; Virg. Aen. ii. 171.) [L. S.]

TROEZEN (Τροιζήν), a son of Pelops, and founder of the town of Troezen or Troezene. He was the father of Anaphlystus and Sphettus. (Paus. ii. 30. § 8, &c.; Parthen. Erot. 31.) [L. S.]

TROGUS, C. MA'RIUS, a triumvir of the mint under Augustus, occurs only on coins, a specimen of which is annexed. On the obverse is the head of Augustus, and on the reverse two men standing, with the legend C. MARIVS C. F. TRO. III. VIR. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 250.)

TROGUS POMPEIUS. [JUSTINUS, p. 680, b.]

TROGUS, T. QUI'NTIUS, was accused by the quaestor M. Sergius. (Varr. L. L. vi. 90—92, ed. Müller.)

TROGUS, SAUFEIUS. [SAUFEIUS, No. 6.]

TROI'LUS (Τρωΐλος), a son of Priam and Hecabe (Hom. Il. xxiv. 257), or according to others a son of Apollo. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 5.) He fell by the hands of Achilles (Virg. Aen. i. 474; Horat. Carm. ii. 9. 16; Cic. Tusc. i. 39); others relate that Achilles ordered Troilus who was made prisoner, to be strangled (Dict. Cret. iv. 9), or that Troilus, when fleeing from Achilles, ran into the temple of the Thymbraean Apollo, where Achilles slew him on the same spot where he himself was afterwards killed. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 307.) [L. S.]

TRO'ILUS (Τρώιλος), a sophist of some distinction, who taught at Constantinople, under Arcadius and Honorius, at the beginning of the fifth century of our era, was a native of Side in Pamphylia. Among his disciples were Eusebius Scholasticus, Ablabius, a Novatian bishop of Nicaea, and Silvanus, bishop of Philippopolis. He wrote, according to Suidas, λόγοι πολιτικοί, and seven books of letters. (Socrat. H. E. vi. 6, vii. 1, 27; Suid. s. v.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 140; Clinton, Fast. Rom. s. aa. 401, 408.) There is an epigram in the Greek Anthology on the athlete Lyron, ascribed to a grammarian Troïlus, whom Schneider and Jacobs identify with the Sophist; though Fabricius supposes the two persons to be different, without stating his reason. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 498; Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 450; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 155, vol. xiii. p. 962.) [P. S.]

TRO'PHILUS (Τρόφιλος), a physician quoted by Stobaeus (Flor. cii. 9), who said that he was a perfect physician who was able to distinguish what was possible from what was not. He may, perhaps, be the same person who wrote a book entitled Συναγωγὴ Ἀκουσμάτων Θαυμασίων, which is quoted by Stobaeus (ibid. c. 22—24). Fabricius says (Bibl. Graec. vol. xiii. p. 439, ed. vet.) that Trophilus is also mentioned by Plutarch in his Salutaria Praecepta, and if this be so (for the writer has not been able to find the passage) he must have lived some time in or before the first century after Christ. [W. A. G.]

TRO'PHIMUS, a Greek statuary of the Roman period, who made an honorific statue of a Roman magistrate, erected by the college of Pastophori of the town of Industria, of which the artist was a citizen. The following is the inscription:—

T. GRAE. TROPHIMUS IND. FAC.

(Maffei, Mus. Veron. p. ccxxx. 1; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 419, 420, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

TROPHON or GROPHON, is supposed to have been the maker of the statue of Ecphanto, the daughter of Zeus, the inscription belonging to which we still possess, namely, the well-known Melian inscription. The last word of the inscription is ΤΡΟΠΗΟΝ, where it is not quite clear whether the first letter is Τ or Γ, but most scholars take it for the latter. The whole inscription runs thus, when the orthography is modernized:

Παῖ Διὸς Ἐκφαντῷ, δέξαι τόδ' ἀμεμφὲς ἄγαλμα, σοὶ γὰρ ἐπευχόμενος τοῦτ' ἐτέλεσσε Γρόφων.

(Welcker, Rhein. Mus. 1848, vol. vi. p. 383.) [P. S.]

TROPHO'NIUS (Τροφώνιος), a son of Erginus, king of Orchomenus, or of Apollo. He with his brother Agamedes built the temple at Delphi and the treasury of king Hyrieus in Boeotia. (Hom. Hymn. in Apoll. 296; Paus. ix. 37 and 39; Strab. ix. p. 421.) After his death he was worshipped as a hero, and had a celebrated oracle in a cave near Lebadeia in Boeotia. (Herod. i. 46; Strab. ix. p. 414; Eurip. Ion, 300; Aristoph. Nub. 502; comp. Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Oraculum.) [L. S.]

TROS (Τρώς). 1. A son of Erichthonius and Astyoche, and a grandson of Dardanus. He was married to Calirrhoë, by whom he became the father of Ilus, Assaracus and Ganymedes, and was king of Phrygia. (Hom. Il. xx. 230.) The country and people of Troy derived their name from him. He gave up his son Ganymedes to Zeus for a present of horses. (Paus. v. 24. § 1; Apollod. iii. 12. § 2; comp. GANYMEDES.)

2. A Trojan, a son of Alastor, who was slain by Achilles. (Hom. Il. xx. 462.) [L. S.]

TRYPHAENA (Τρύφαινα). 1. Daughter of Ptolemaeus VII., surnamed Euergetes II., married Antiochus VIII. (Grypus), king of Syria. Her sister Cleopatra was married to Antiochus IX. (Cyzicenus). In the civil wars between Grypus and Cyzicenus, Cleopatra fell into the power of the former, and was murdered by order of her own sister Tryphaena. Shortly afterwards Tryphaena was taken prisoner by Cyzicenus, who put her to death to avenge the murder of his wife. (Justin. xxxix. 3, 4)

2. Daughter of Ptolemaeus XI. Auletes, died in the life-time of her father. (Porphyr. ap. Euseb. p. 120.)

TRYPHIODO'RUS (Τρυφιόδωρος), a Greek grammarian, was born in Egypt. Nothing more is known of his personal history. All that is known of the time when he lived is that he was later than Nestor of Laranda [NESTOR], whom he imitated. Some place him as late as the fifth century. Of the grammatical labours of Tryphiodorus we have no records. He is known to us only as a versifier. He wrote a poem called Μαραθωνιακά: another entitled Τὰ καθ' Ἱπποδάμειαν; a third called Ὀδύσσεια λειπογράμματος. This was so called, according to Eustathius (Proleg. ad Odyss. p. 4), because no word was admitted into it which contained the letter σ. It is difficult however to conceive of the composition of an Odyssey from which the name of Odysseus must have been excluded. The account of the matter given by Hesychius is more probable, that from the first book the letter α was excluded, from the second β, and so on (Hes. s. v. Νέστωρ). In any case it must have been a miserable exercise of ingenuity. A fourth work of Tryphiodorus was Παράφρασις τῶν Ὁμήρου παραβολῶν. All these, and others not more distinctly named, have perished. The only effort of the muse of Tryphiodorus which has come down to us is his Ἰλίου ἅλωσις, a poem consisting of 691 lines. From the small dimensions of it, it is necessarily little but a sketch. It is not, like the poem of Quintus Smyrnaeus, a continuation of the Iliad; it is an independent poem. After a brief indication of the subject, there follows a meagre recapitulation of some of the chief events since the death of Hector, given in the clumsiest and most confused manner, without any indication of the mode in which they were connected together. The proper subject of the poem begins with the account of the building of the wooden horse. Tryphiodorus describes minutely the painting and other adornments of the work, and enumerates the heroes who took their places in it; not forgetting to mention the ambrosial food with which Athene provided them. In his account of Sinon Tryphiodorus agrees more with Virgil, not with Quintus, who represents him as mutilated by the Trojans before he would tell them the purpose of the wooden horse. The episode of Laocoon is entirely omitted. After the horse had been brought into the temple of Athene, Venus, assuming the form of an old Trojan woman, discloses to Helen the trick of the Greeks, and informs her that Menelaus is among the heroes inside. Intending to bring about their detection, she goes to the temple, and within the hearing of the warriors talks of their wives in Greece. Stifled sighs and tears escape from the heroes. Anticlus is on the point of betraying the whole scheme by speaking aloud, but Ulysses claps his hands over his mouth, and holds them so tight that he smothers him. Athene appears and sends Helen home again. This scene is the only part of the poem which has much merit. A somewhat lengthy, though otherwise tolerably good description of the scenes which ensued upon the sack and destruction of the city, is followed by a meagre notice of some of the chief special incidents.

The poem of Tryphiodorus was first published in connection with those of Quintus Smyrnaeus and Coluthus. A separate edition, accompanied by a Latin translation in verse, was published by F. Jamot (Paris, 1557). Frischlin and Rhodomann published a critical edition with Latin versions in prose and metre. (Frankfurt, 1588.) An improved edition of Triphiodorus was published by J. Merrick (Oxford, 1741), in which several omissions were supplied from fresh MSS. Merrick also published an English translation and a treatise on Tryphiodorus (Oxford, 1739). The edition of Bandini, (Florence 1765) contained a collection of the various readings of two new MSS. He did little for the text however. His critical apparatus was applied to that object by Thomas Northmore in his edition of the poet (Cambridge 1791, London, 1804). A splendid folio edition was printed by Bodoni at Parma in 1796. An equally imposing edition, and one more correct, was published by Tauchnitz (Leipzig 1808) under the superintendence of G. H. Schaefer. A critical edition with the notes of Merrick, Schaefer, and others, and some of his own, was published by F. A. Wernicke (Leipzig 1819). Besides the Latin and English translations, there is one in German by B. Thiersch. (Suidas, s. v.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 526; Schöll, Gesch. der Griechischen Litteratur, vol. iii. p. 73, &c.) [C. P. M.]

TRYPHON (Τρύφων), literary. 1. Of Alexandria, the son of Ammonius, a grammarian and poet, lived before and during the reign of Augustus (Suid. s. v.). A long list of his works, in almost every department of grammar, is given by Suidas, and an account of several of them, which exist in MS., will be found in Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 351, comp. pp. 165, 192, 319, 321, 381, and vol. i. p. 526).

2. The son of Hermes, the author of an epigram in the Greek Anthology, on the sudden death of the harp-player Terpes, who was killed in the Scias of Sparta, by having a fig thrown into his open mouth. There is a passage of Suidas (s. v. Γλυκὺ μέλι καὶ πνιξάτω), which makes it all but certain that the Terpes of the epigram is no other than the celebrated Terpander, and that the epigram refers to a traditional account of his death, in which, as in similar stories of the end of other poets, even the manner of his decease was made symbolical of the sweetness of his compositions. Respecting Tryphon himself we have no further information. (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 451; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 157, vol. x. p. 296, vol. xiii. p. 963.)

3. See Diodorus Tryphon, Vol. I. p. 1017, b.

4. Tryphon the Jew, whose name appears in Justin's well-known dialogue, hardly falls within the limits of this work. All the particulars respecting him which are necessary for understanding Jerome, and they are very few, will be found in the dialogue itself. (See also Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 62.) [P. S.]

TRYPHON (Τρύφων), artists. 1. An eminent engraver of precious stones, whose beryl, engraved with a figure of the sea-nymph Galene, is mentioned in an epigram by Addaeus (No. 6, Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 242), who appears to have lived in the time of Alexander the Great and his successors. There is a very celebrated gem by him in the collection of the Duke of Marlborough, representing the reconciliation of Eros and Psyche (Bracci, ii. 114), of which there are several copies; one of the best of these is in the Museum at Naples (Visconti, Op. Var. vol. ii. p. 192, No. 114). There is also a carnelian, engraved with a figure of Eros riding on a lion, bearing the inscription ΤΡΥΦΩΝ, in the Museum of the Hague (De Jonge, Notice, p. 148, No. 16); and another gem, mentioned by Raspe (Catal. de Tassie, No. 15454), with the inscription ΤΡΥΦΩΝ ЄΠΟΙЄΙ. His name also occurs on another gem, in the Museum of the Hague (De Jonge, p. 151, No. 12; Caylus, Recueil, v. pl. liii. No. 5, p. 148); but in this case the inscription is certainly a modern forgery. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 157, 158.)

2. An architect, of Alexandria, who flourished in the time of Demetrius Poliorcetes, and distinguished himself in the defence of Apollonia, by the invention of an ingenious plan of countermining. (Vitruv. x. 22. s. 16. § 10, Schneider.) [P. S.]

TRYPHON (Τρύφων). 1. A surgeon, who lived at Rome shortly before the time of Celsus, that is, probably in the first century B. C. (Cels. De Med. vi. 5, vii. 1. pp. 117, 137.) As Celsus calls him "Tryphon pater," there would seem to have been another medical man of the same name, who lived somewhat later. This is perhaps also implied by Galen when he speaks of Τρύφων ὁ ἀρχαῖος (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Loc. vii. 3. vol. xii. p. 843), who may perhaps be the same person as the "Tryphon pater" of Celsus, and who is certainly the surgeon quoted by Scribonius Largus (De Compos Medicam. c. 69. § 201. p. 227. Cf. Gal. De Compos. Medicam. sec. Gen. iv. 13. vol. xiii. p. 745) and apparently his tutor (ibid. c. xliv. § 175. p. 222), and perhaps also the physician mentioned by Caelius Aurelianus (De Morb. Chron. i. 4. p. 323). Tryphon, the native of Gortyna in Crete, who is quoted by Galen (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Loc. ix. 2. vol. xiii. pp. 246, 253) is also perhaps the same person; but the writer on gymnastics, mentioned by Galen (Ad Thrasyb. de Medic. et Gymnast. c. 47. vol. v. p. 898) probably lived earlier.

2. The physician introduced by Plutarch as one of the speakers in his Symposiaca (iii. 1. § 2, 3; 2. § 1, 2), if he was a real personage, lived in the first century after Christ. [W. A. G.]

TRYPHON, DIO'DOTUS (Διόδοτος ὁ Τρύφων), a usurper of the throne of Syria during the reign of Demetrius II. Nicator. After the death of Alexander Balas in B. C. 146, Tryphon first set up Antiochus, the infant son of Balas, as a pretender against Demetrius; but in B. C. 142 he murdered Antiochus and reigned as king himself.

Tryphon was defeated and put to death by Antiochus Sidetes, the brother of Demetrius, in B. C. 139, after a reign of three years. For details and authorities, see DEMETRIUS II., p. 967.

COIN OF TRYPHON, KING OF SYRIA.

TRYPHON, SA'LVIUS, one of the leaders of the revolted slaves in Sicily, had been accustomed to play on the flute in the orgies of the women, and was supposed to have a knowledge of divination, for which reason he was elected king by the slaves in B. C. 103. He displayed considerable abilities, and in a short time collected an army of 20,000 foot and 2000 horse, with which he laid siege to Morgantina, a strong city in Sicily. The propraetor P. Licinius Nerva obtained possession of the camp of the slaves by surprise, but was afterwards defeated by Salvius. After this victory Salvius assumed all the pomp of royalty. He administered justice in the toga praetexta, surrounded himself with lictors, and took the surname of Tryphon, probably because it had been borne by Diodotus, the usurper of the Syrian throne. He chose the strong fortress of Triocala as the seat of his new kingdom; and his power was still further strengthened by the submission of Athenion, who had been elected leader of the slaves in the western part of the island. The insurrection had now assumed such a formidable aspect, that the senate sent the propraetor L. Licinius Lucullus into Sicily in the following year (B. C. 102) with a force of 17,000 men, the greater part of which were regular Roman or Italian troops. Tryphon, however, did not hesitate to meet this force in the open field. Athenion, whom he had first thrown into prison through jealousy, but had afterwards released, fought under him with the greatest bravery, and was severely wounded in the battle. The slaves were defeated with great slaughter, and Tryphon was obliged to take refuge in Triocala. But Lucullus, whether from incapacity or treachery, failed in taking the place, and returned to Rome without effecting any thing more. Lucullus was succeeded by C. Servilius; and on the death of Tryphon, about the same time, the kingdom of the slaves devolved upon Athenion, who was not subdued till B. C. 101. (Diod. Eclog. ex lib. XXXVI. p. 533, foll. ed. Wess.; Flor. iii. 19.)

TRYPHONI'NUS, CLAU'DIUS, a Roman jurist, wrote under the united reign of Septimius Severus, and his son Antoninus Caracalla (Dig. 48. tit. 19. s. 39); and he survived Severus, who died A. D. 212, for he speaks of "Imperator noster cum Divo Severo patre suo" (Dig. 27. tit. 1. s. 44). There is extant a rescript of Antoninus (A. D. 213) addressed to Claudius Tryphoninus, which declares that a legacy left by Cornelia Salvia to the "universitas" of the Jews in Antioch could not be sued for (Cod. 1. tit. 9. s. 1). It is probable that this rescript was addressed to Tryphoninus in the capacity of Advocatus Fisci. Tryphoninus (Dig. 23. tit. 3. s. 78. § 4) speaks of giving his opinion in the "auditorium," which may be that of Papinian. Tryphoninus appears to have studied Cicero's writings: he quotes the oration Pro Cluentio (Dig. 48. tit. 19. s. 39). Tryphoninus was in the Consilium of Severus at the same time with Messius and Papinian (Dig. 49. tit. 14. s. 50). He was the author of twenty-one Libri Disputationum, from which there are seventy-nine excerpts in the Digest; and he also wrote notes on Cervidius Scaevola. [G. L.]

TU'BERO, AE'LIUS. 1. P. AELIUS TUBERO, was elected plebeian aedile B. C. 202, but resigned his office, together with his colleague L. Laetorius, because there had been some fault in the auspices at their election. He was praetor the following year, B. C. 201, when he obtained Sicily as his province. In B. C. 189 he was one of the ten commissioners sent into Asia after the conquest of Antiochus; and in B. C. 177 he was again elected praetor. (Liv. xxx. 39, 40, xxxvii. 55, xli. 8.)

2. Q. AELIUS TUBERO, tribune of the plebs B. C. 194, proposed a plebiscitum, in accordance with a decree of the senate, for founding two Latin colonies in southern Italy; one among the Bruttii, and the other in the territory of Thurii. He was appointed one of the three commissioners for the foundation of the latter colony. (Liv. xxxiv. 53, xxxv. 9.)

3. Q. AELIUS TUBERO, the son-in-law of L. Aemilius Paulus, served under the latter in his war against Perseus, king of Macedonia. After Perseus had been taken prisoner, he was committed by Aemilius to the custody of Tubero. This Tubero, like the rest of his family, was so poor that he had not an ounce of silver plate, till his father-in-law gave him five pounds of plate from the spoils of the Macedonian monarch. (Liv. xlv. 7, 8; Val. Max. iv. 4. § 9; Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 11; Plut. Aemil. Paul. 28.)

4. Q. AELIUS TUBERO, the son of No. 3, the jurist. See below TUBERO, jurists, No. 1.

5. L. AELIUS TUBERO, an intimate friend of Cicero. He was a relation and a schoolfellow of the orator, had served with him in the Marsic war, and had afterwards served under his brother Quintus as legate in Asia. It is uncertain in what way he was related to Cicero. The Scholiast on the oration for Ligarius says (pp. 415, 417, ed. Orelli) that Tubero married the soror of Cicero. We know that Cicero had not a sister; but the brother of the orator's father may have had a daughter, who was married to Tubero; and hence we may understand soror to signify in this passage, as it frequently does, a first cousin, and not a sister. (Drumann, Geschichte Roms, vol. vi. p. 273.) On the breaking out of the civil war, Tubero, who had espoused the Pompeian party, received from the senate the province of Africa; but as Atius Varus and Q. Ligarius, who likewise belonged to the aristocratical party, would not surrender it to him, he passed over to Pompey in Greece. He was afterwards pardoned by Caesar and returned with his son Quintus to Rome. (Cic. pro Lig. 4, 7, 8, ad Q. Fr. i. 1. § 3, pro Planc. 41.) Tubero cultivated literature and philosophy. He wrote a history (Cic. ad Q. Fr. l. c.), and the philosopher Aenesidemus dedicated to him his work on the sceptical philosophy of Pyrrhon. (Phot. Cod. 212.)

6. Q. Aelius Tubero, the son of No. 5, the jurist. See below, No. 2.

TU'BERO, AE'LIUS, jurists. 1. Q. Aelius Tubero, called the Stoic, was a pupil of Panaetius; and one of the scholars of Panaetius dedicated to Tubero a treatise De Officiis (Cic. de Off. iii. 15). He was the son of Q. Aelius Tubero, who was the son-in-law of L. Aemilius Paulus. [See above, No. 3.] Tubero the son had a reputation for talent and legal knowledge. (Cic. Brut. 31, pro Muren. c. 36; Tac. Ann. xvi. 22; Gell. i. 22.) Plutarch (Lucull. c. 39) attributes to this Tubero the saying that Lucullus was "Xerxes in a toga;" but this is a mistake, for Tubero the Stoic was a contemporary of the Gracchi and tribunus plebis in B. C. 133, the year in which Tiberius was also tribunus plebis. Lucullus could not play the part of Xerxes in a toga earlier than B. C. 63. In B. C. 129 Tubero failed in his candidateship for the praetorship, but in B. C. 123 he was praetor. Pomponius says that he was also consul, but it has been inferred from the passage in the Brutus (c. 31) that he never obtained the consulship. He appears however to have been consul suffectus in B. C. 118. He was an opponent of C. Gracchus as well as of Tiberius, and delivered some speeches against him B. C. 123. Tubero is one of the speakers in Cicero's dialogue de Republica. The passages in the Pandect in which Tubero is cited do not refer to this Tubero, but to the son of Lucius. (Cic. Brut. ed. H. Meyer, c. 31, and the note; H. Meyer, Oratorum Romanorum Frag. p. 251, 2d ed.)

2. Q. Aelius Tubero, the son of Lucius [see above, No. 5], was born probably about B. C. 74. When he was a young man, he made a speech (B. C. 46) before C. Julius Caesar against Q. Ligarius, who was defended by Cicero in a speech which is extant (Pro Q. Ligario). When L. Tubero, who had been appointed governor of Africa by the senate, attempted to land there, Ligarius, who held Africa in the capacity of legatus, prevented Lucius from landing with his son Quintus, who accompanied him; and this was the main cause of the enmity of Tubero against Ligarius. The oration of Tubero is mentioned by Quintilian (Instit. Orat. x. 1. § 23, xi. 1. § 78). After his failure on this occasion Tubero applied to the study of the Jus Civile under Ofilius; and he obtained considerable reputation. He had a great knowledge both of Jus Publicum and Privatum, and he wrote several works on both these divisions of law; but he affected an antiquated mode of expression, which made his writings less agreeable to read (Pomponius, Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. 2. § 46): from this remark of Pomponius we may infer that Tubero's works were extant when he wrote. Tubero married a daughter of Servius Sulpicius, and the daughter of Tubero was the mother of the jurist C. Cassius Longinus. It is uncertain if this Tubero was consul under Augustus B. C. 11, with P. Fabius Maximus, for his consulship is not mentioned by Pomponius, but that omission is not decisive against the evidence of the Fasti Capitolini and Plinius (H. N. viii. 17). A work by Tubero, "De Officio Judicis" is mentioned by Gellius (xiv. 2); and another "Ad C. Oppium" is mentioned by Gellius (vii. 19). Like his father Q. Tubero wrote a history (Liv. iv. 23; Suet. Caes. 83), but whether the quotations of A. Gellius (vi. 3, 4) are taken from the history of the father or the son cannot be determined. Tubero the jurist, who is often cited in the Digest, is this Tubero; but there is no excerpt from his writings. [G. L.]

TU'BERO, L. SEIUS, a legatus of Germanicus in his campaign in Germany in A. D. 16, was consul with the latter in A. D. 18. Tubero was falsely accused of majestas in A. D. 24. (Tac. Ann. ii. 20, iv. 29; Fasti.)

TUBERTUS, the name of an ancient family of the patrician Postumia gens.

1. P. Postumius Q. F. Tubertus, consul B. C. 505 with M. Valerius Volusus in the fifth year of the republic. Both consuls fought against the Sabines, over whom they gained a decisive victory in the neighbourhood of Tibur, and obtained in consequence the honour of a triumph. (Liv. ii. 16; Zonar. v. 37—39; Plut. Public. 20; Zonar. vii. 13.) Tubertus was consul again in B. C. 503 with Agrippa Menenius Lanatus. According to Livy he defeated the Aurunci, and on his return triumphed over them; but other authorities relate that he again fought against the Sabines, and at first with bad success, but that he afterwards gained a victory over them, and on his return celebrated the lesser triumph or ovation, which was on this occasion first introduced at Rome. (Dionys. v. 44—47; Zonar. vii. 13; Plin. H. N. xv. 29; Fasti Cap.) In B. C. 493 he was one of the ten ambassadors sent by the senate to the people on the Sacred Mountain. (Dionys. vi. 69.) This Tubertus was buried in the city on account of his virtues, a privilege which his posterity retained. (Cic. de Leg. ii. 23.)

2. A. Postumius Tubertus, was magister equitum to the dictator Mam. Aemilius Mamercinus in B. C. 433, and was himself dictator in B. C. 431. The latter year was memorable in the Roman annals by the great victory which the dictator gained on Mount Algidus over the united forces of the Aequians and Volscians. This victory, which is related to have been fought on the 18th of June, decided the contest with the Aequians, who from this time forward appear as the subjects of Rome. According to universal tradition the dictator put his son to death in this campaign, because he quitted the post in which his father had placed him, through his desire of fighting with the enemy. This story is rejected by Livy, but on insufficient grounds, as Niebuhr has shown. Tubertus celebrated a triumph on his return to Rome. (Liv. iv. 23, 26—29; Diod. xii. 64; Ov. Fast. vi. 721, foll.; Plut. Camill. 2; Val. Max. ii. 7. § 6; Gell. xvii. 21; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. p. 452, foll.)

TUBULUS, the name of a family of the Hostilia gens.

1. C. Hostilius Tubulus, praetor urbanus B. C. 209, was stationed in Etruria in the following year (B. C. 208) as propraetor with the command of two legions. He received orders from the senate to keep an especial watch upon Arretium, which was suspected of an inclination to revolt to Hannibal, and he therefore took away as hostages one hundred and twenty children of the senators of the town. Next year (B. C. 207) Tubulus was sent from Etruria to Tarentum, and in the course of the same year from the latter place to Capua; but while marching to Capua he fell upon Hannibal's army, killed four thousand men, and took nine standards. He continued in the command at Capua till the end of B. C. 203. (Liv. xxvii. 6, 7, 11, 22, 24, 35, 40, xxviii. 10, xxix. 13.)

2. L. HOSTILIUS TUBULUS, praetor B. C. 142, received bribes in such an open manner, when he was presiding at a trial for murder, that in the following year P. Scaevola, the tribune of the plebs, proposed and carried a plebiscitum for an inquiry into his conduct; whereupon Tubulus forthwith went into exile. Cicero more than once speaks of him as one of the vilest of men, and quotes a passage of Lucilius, in which the name of Tubulus occurs as an instance of a sacrilegious wretch. (Cic. ad Att. xii. 5. § 3, de Fin. ii. 16, iv. 28, v. 22, de Nat. Deor. i. 23, iii. 30, pro Scaur. 1.) According to Asconius (in Scaur. p. 23, ed. Orelli) Tubulus was brought back from exile on account of his numerous crimes, and took poison of his own accord, to escape being put to death in prison.

The following coin was struck by a L. Hostilius Tubulus, but it is doubtful whether by the same person as the preceding. It has on the obverse the head of Pallas, and on the reverse a laurel wreath with the legend L. H. TVB. (i. e. L. Hostilius Tubulus), and underneath ROMA. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 227.)

COIN OF L. HOSTILIUS TUBULUS.

TUCCA, PLO'TIUS, a friend of Horace and Virgil. The latter poet left Tucca one of his heirs, and bequeathed his unfinished writings to him and Varius, who afterwards published the Aeneid by order of Augustus. (Hor. Sat. i. 5. 40, i. 10. 81; Donat. Vit. Virgil. §§ 52, 53, 56; Schol. ad Pers. Sat. ii. 42; Weichert, Poëtarum Latinorum Reliquiae, p. 217, foll.)

TUCCA, C. SERVI'LIUS, consul B. C. 284 with L. Caecilius Metellus Denter. (Fasti.)

TU'CCIA, a Vestal Virgin, accused of incest, appealed to the goddess to prove her innocence, and had power given to her to carry a sieve full of water from the Tiber to the temple. (Val. Max. viii. 1. absol. 5; Plin. H. N. xxviii. 2; Dionys. ii. 69; Augustin. de Civ. Dei, x. 16.) This miracle is commemorated on an ancient gem, of which an engraving is given in the Dict. of Antiq. p. 1191, a, 2d ed.

TU'CCIUS. 1. M. TUCCIUS, curule aedile B. C. 192, and praetor B. C. 190, with Apulia and Bruttii as his province, where he also remained for the two following years as propraetor. In B. C. 185 he was one of the triumviri appointed for founding colonies at Sipontum and Buxentum. (Liv. xxxv. 41, xxxvi. 45, xxxvii. 2, 50, xxxviii. 36, xxxix. 23.)

2. M. TUCCIUS, accused C. Sempronius Rufus of vis in B. C. 51, and was in his turn accused by Rufus of the same offence. (Cael. ap. Cic. ad Fam. viii. 8.)

TUDITA'NUS, the name of a plebeian family of the Sempronia gens. The name was supposed by Ateius the philologist to have been originally given to one of the Sempronii, because he had a head like a tudes (tudit-is) or mallet. (Festus, p. 352, ed. Müller.)

1. M. SEMPRONIUS C. F. M. N. TUDITANUS, consul B. C. 240 with C. Claudius Centho, and censor B. C. 230 with Q. Fabius Maximus. (Gell. xvii. 21; Cic. Brut. 18, Tusc. i. 1, de Senect. 14; Fasti Capit.)

2. P. SEMPRONIUS TUDITANUS, was a tribune of the soldiers at the battle of Cannae in B. C. 216, and one of the few Roman officers who survived that fatal day. When the smaller of the two Roman camps in which he had taken refuge was besieged by the Carthaginians, he bravely cut his way through the enemy with six hundred men, reached the larger camp, and from thence marched to Canusium, where he arrived in safety. Two years afterwards (B. C. 214) Tuditanus was curule aedile, and in the next year (B. C. 213) praetor, with Ariminum as his province. He took the town of Aternum, and was continued in the same command for the two following years (B. C. 212, 211). He was censor in B. C. 209 with M. Cornelius Cethegus, although neither he nor his colleague had yet held the consulship. In B. C. 205 he was sent into Greece with the title of proconsul, and at the head of a military and naval force, for the purpose of opposing Philip, with whom however he concluded a preliminary treaty, which was readily ratified by the Romans, who were anxious to give their undivided attention to the war in Africa. Tuditanus had, during his absence, been elected consul for the year 204 together with M. Cornelius Cethegus, his colleague in the censorship. He received Bruttii as his province with the conduct of the war against Hannibal. In the neighbourhood of Croton Tuditanus experienced a repulse, with a loss of twelve hundred men; but he shortly afterwards gained a decisive victory over Hannibal, who was obliged in consequence to shut himself up within the walls of Croton. It was in this battle that he vowed a temple to Fortuna Primigenia, if he should succeed in routing the enemy. In B. C. 201 Tuditanus was one of the three ambassadors sent to Ptolemy, king of Egypt. (Liv. xxii. 50, 60; Appian, Annib. 26; Liv. xxiv. 43, 44, 47, xxv. 3, xxvi. 1, xxvii. 11, 38, xxix. 11, 12; Cic. Brut. 15, de Senect. 4; Liv. xxix. 13, 36, xxxi. 2.)

3. M. SEMPRONIUS TUDITANUS, one of the officers of Scipio at the capture of New Carthage in Spain. (Liv. xxvi. 48.)

4. C. SEMPRONIUS TUDITANUS, plebeian aedile B. C. 198 and praetor B. C. 197, when he obtained Nearer Spain as his province. He was defeated by the Spaniards with great loss, and died shortly afterwards in consequence of a wound which he had received in the battle. He was pontifex at the time of his death. (Liv. xxxii. 27, 28, xxxiii. 25, 42; Appian, Hisp. 39.)

5. M. SEMPRONIUS M. F. C. N. TUDITANUS, tribune of the plebs B. C. 193, proposed and carried a plebiscitum, which enacted that the law about money lent should be the same for the Socii and the Latini as for the Roman citizens. (Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Lex Sempronia de Fenore.) He was praetor B. C. 189, when he obtained Sicily as his province, and consul B. C. 185 with Ap. Claudius Pulcher. In his consulship he carried on war in Liguria, and defeated the Apuani, while his colleague was equally successful against the Ingauni. Tuditanus was an unsuccessful candidate for the consulship in B. C. 184, but was elected one of the pontifices in the following year. He was carried off by the great pestilence which devastated Rome in B. C. 174. (Liv. xxxv. 7, xxxvii. 47, 50, xxxix. 23, 32, 40, 46, xli. 21.)

6. C. SEMPRONIUS C. F. TUDITANUS, was one of the ten commissioners sent to L. Mummius in B. C. 146 in order to form Southern Greece into a Roman province. He has been confounded by Drumann (Geschichte Roms, vol. iii. p. 81) with the following [No. 7], as he had been by Cicero, whose mistake was corrected by Atticus. This Tuditanus was the proavus or great grandfather of the orator Hortensius. (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 6. § 4, xiii. 33. § 3.)

7. C. SEMPRONIUS C. F. C. N. TUDITANUS, the son of No. 6, was praetor B. C. 132, fourteen years after his father had been sent as one of the ten commissioners into Greece. (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 30. § 3, xiii. 32. § 3.) He was consul in B. C. 129, with M'. Aquilius. On the proposition of Scipio Africanus, the decision of the various disputes, which arose respecting the public land in carrying the agrarian law of Gracchus into effect, was transferred from the triumvirs who had been appointed under the law, to the consul Tuditanus; but the latter, perceiving the difficulty of the cases that were brought before him, avoided giving any decision by pleading that the Illyrian war compelled him to leave the city. In Illyricum he carried on war against the Iapydes, and at first unsuccessfully, but he afterwards gained a victory over them chiefly through the military skill of his legate, D. Junius Brutus, who had previously earned great glory by his conquests in Spain. [BRUTUS, No. 18.] On his return to Rome, Tuditanus was allowed to celebrate a triumph over the Iapydes. (Vell. Pat. ii. 4; Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 5; Appian, B. C. i. 19, Illyr. 10; Liv. Epit. 59; Fasti Capit.) Tuditanus was an orator and an historian, and in both obtained considerable distinction. Cicero says of him (Brut. 25): — "Cum omni vita atque victu excultus atque expolitus, tum ejus elegans est habitum etiam orationis genus." Dionysius (i. 11) classes him with Cato the Censor as among λογιωτάτους τῶν Ῥωμαίων συγγραφέων. His historical work is likewise quoted by some of the other ancient writers. (Ascon. in Cornel. p. 76, ed. Orelli; Gell. vi. 4, xiii. 15; Macrob. i. 16; Krause, Vitae et Frag. Histor. Rom. p. 178, foll.) This Tuditanus was the maternal grandfather of the orator Hortensius, since his daughter Sempronia married L. Hortensius, the father of the orator.

8. SEMPRONIUS TUDITANUS, was the maternal grandfather of Fulvia, the wife of Antonius the triumvir. He is described by Cicero as a madman, who was accustomed to scatter his money among the people from the Rostra. (Cic. Phil. iii. 6, Acad. ii. 28; Val. Max. vii. 8. § 1.)

CN. TUDI'CIUS, a senator, who supported Cluentius. (Cic. pro Cluent. 70.)

M. TU'GIO, mentioned by Cicero in his oration for Balbus (c. 20) as a person well versed in the law relating to aqueducts.

TU'LLIA, the name of the two daughters of Servius Tullius, the sixth king of Rome. [TULLIUS, SERVIUS.]

TU'LLIA, frequently called by the diminutive TULLIOLA, was the daughter of M. Cicero and Terentia. The year of her birth is not mentioned, but it was probably in B. C. 79 or 78. [TERENTIA, No. 1.] Her birthday was on the 5th of Sextilis or August. She was betrothed as early as B. C. 67 to C. Calpurnius Piso Frugi, whom she married in B. C. 63 during the consulship of her father. At the time of Cicero's exile (B. C. 58), Tullia displayed a warm interest in his fate. She and her husband threw themselves at the feet of the consul Piso to implore his pity on behalf of their father. During Cicero's banishment Tullia lost her first husband: he was alive at the end of B. C. 58, but she was a widow when she welcomed her father at Brundusium on his return from exile, in August of the following year. She was married again in B. C. 56 to Furius Crassipes, a young man of rank and large property; but she did not live with him long, though the time and the reason of her divorce are alike unknown. [CRASSIPES, No. 2.] In B. C. 50 she was married to her third husband, P. Cornelius Dolabella, one of the most profligate young men of a most profligate age. Cicero was well acquainted with the scandalous private life of his future son-in-law, for although the latter was still only twenty, he had been already twice defended by the orator in a court of justice when accused of the most abominable crimes. But the patrician birth, high connections, and personal beauty of Dolabella, covered a multitude of sins as well in Cicero's eyes as in those of his wife and daughter. Dolabella had been previously married and divorced his wife Fabia for the purpose of marrying Tullia. The marriage took place during Cicero's absence in Cilicia. The connection, as might have been anticipated, was not a happy one. On the breaking out of the civil war in B. C. 49, the husband and the father of Tullia espoused opposite sides. While Dolabella fought for Caesar, and Cicero took refuge in the camp of Pompey, Tullia remained in Italy. She was pregnant at the commencement of the war, and on the 19th of May, B. C. 49, was delivered of a seven months' child, which was very weak, and died soon afterwards. After the battle of Pharsalia, Dolabella returned to Rome, but brought no consolation to his wife. He carried on numerous intrigues with various Roman ladies; and the weight of his debts had become so intolerable that he caused himself to be adopted into a plebeian family, in order to obtain the tribuneship of the people, and thus be able to bring forward a measure for the abolition of debts. He was elected tribune at the end of B. C. 48, and forthwith commenced to carry his schemes into execution. But Antony took up arms, and Dolabella was defeated. In the midst of these tumults Tullia, who had been long suffering from ill health, set out to join her father at Brundusium, which place she reached in June, B. C. 47. Cicero, however, was unwilling that even his own daughter should be a witness of his degradation, and he therefore sent her back to her mother. Dolabella's conduct had been so scandalous, that a divorce would have been the proper course; but this Cicero would not adopt, as he feared the anger of the dictator, and was unwilling to lose a friend in Dolabella. He did not, however, require his intercession, for Caesar not only pardoned him but received him as his friend, when he landed in Italy in September (B. C. 47). Cicero returned to Rome, and Dolabella was likewise pardoned by Caesar. In December Dolabella went to Africa to fight against the Pompeian party, but he came back to Italy in the summer of the following year (B. C. 46). Tullia and her husband now lived together again for a short time, but before Dolabella left for Spain at the end of the year, a divorce had taken place by mutual consent. At the beginning of the following year (B. C. 45) Tullia was delivered of a son. As soon as she was sufficiently recovered to bear the fatigues of a journey, she accompanied her father to Tusculum, but she died there in February.* It appears from Cicero's correspondence that she had long been unwell, and the birth of her child hastened her death. Her loss was a severe blow to Cicero: he had recently divorced his wife Terentia, and married a young wife Publilia, without however adding to his domestic happiness; and thus he had clung to Tullia more than ever. His friends hastened to console him; and among the many consolatory letters which he received on the occasion is the well-known one from the celebrated jurist Serv. Sulpicius (ad Fam. iv. 5). To dissipate his grief, Cicero drew up a treatise on consolation, in which he chiefly imitated Crantor the Academician [CICERO, p. 733, b.]; and to show his love to the deceased, he resolved to build a splendid monument to her honour, which was to be consecrated as a temple, in which she might receive the worship both of himself and of others. This project he frequently mentions in his letters to Atticus, but the death of Caesar in the following year, and the active part which Cicero then took in public affairs, prevented him from carrying his design into effect. Tullia's child survived his mother. He is called Lentulus by Cicero (ad Att. xii. 28), a name which was also borne by his father by adoption; and as Dolabella was absent in Spain, and was moreover unable from his extravagance to make any provision for his child, Cicero took charge of him, and while he was in the country wrote to Atticus, to beg him to take care that the child was properly attended to. (Cic. ad Att. xii. 28.) The boy probably died in infancy, as no further mention is made of him. The numerous passages in Cicero's correspondence in which Tullia is spoken of, are collected in Orelli's Onomasticon Tullianum (vol. ii. pp. 596, 597), and her life is written at length by Drumann (Geschichte Roms, vol. vi. p. 696, foll.).

TU'LLIA GENS, patrician and plebeian. This gens was of great antiquity, for even leaving out of question Servius Tullius, the sixth king of Rome, whom Cicero claims as his gentilis (Tusc. i. 16), we are told that the Tullii were one of the Alban houses, which were transplanted to Rome in the reign of Tullus Hostilius. (Liv. i. 30.) According to this statement the Tullii belonged to the minores gentes. We find mention of a Tullius in the reign of the last king of Rome [TULLIUS, No. 1], and of a M'. Tullius Longus, who was consul in the tenth year of the republic, B. C. 500. [LONGUS.] The patrician branch of the gens appears to have become extinct at an early period; for after the early times of the republic no one of the name occurs for some centuries, and the Tullii of a later age are not only plebeians, but, with the exception of their bearing the same name, cannot be regarded as having any connection with the ancient gens. The first plebeian Tullius who rose to the honours of the state was M. Tullius Decula, consul B. C. 81, and the next was the celebrated orator M. Tullius Cicero. [DECULA; CICERO.] The other surnames of the Tullii under the republic belong chiefly to freedmen, and are given below. On coins we find no cognomen. The following coin, which bears on the obverse the head of Pallas and on the reverse Victory driving a quadriga, with the legend of M. TVLLI, is supposed by some writers to belong to M. Tullius Cicero, the orator, but the coin is probably of an earlier date. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 327.)

COIN OF THE TULLIA GENS.

TULLINUS, VOLCA'TIUS, accused in A. D. 65, as privy to the crimes of L. Torquatus Silanus, escaped punishment (Tac. Ann. xvi. 8), and is conjectured by Lipsius to be the same person as Volcatius Tertullinus, who is mentioned as tribune of the plebs in A. D. 69. (Tac. Hist. iv. 9.)

TU'LLIUS. 1. M. TULLIUS, or M. Atilius, as he is called by Dionysius, one of the decemviri who had the charge of the Sibylline books in the reign of Tarquinius Superbus, was bribed by Petronius Sabinus to allow him to take a copy of these books, and was in consequence punished by the king by being sewed up in a sack and thrown into the sea, a punishment subsequently inflicted upon parricides. (Val. Max. i. 1. § 13; Dionys. iv. 62.)

2. SEX. TULLIUS, served for the seventh time as centurio primi pili in B. C. 358 under the dictator C. Sulpicius Peticus, when he besought the dictator on behalf of his comrades to let them fight against the Gauls, and distinguished himself in the battle which ensued. He also fought with great bravery in the following year under the consul C. Marcius Rutilus against the Privernates. (Liv. vii. 13—16.)

3. L. TULLIUS, a Roman eques, was magister of the company which farmed the Scriptura (see Dict. of Antiq. s. v.) in Sicily. (Verr. iii. 71.)

4. M. TULLIUS, on whose behalf Cicero spoke in B. C. 71. It is quite uncertain who this M. Tullius was. He was not a freedman, as appears from Cicero's speech, but it is equally clear that he was a different person both from M. Tullius Decula, consul B. C. 81, and from M. Tullius Albinovanus. The fragments of Cicero's speech for Tullius were published for the first time from a palimpsest manuscript by Angelo Mai. An analysis of it is given by Drumann. (Geschichte Roms, vol. v. p. 258, foll.)

5. L. TULLIUS, a legate of Cicero in Cilicia, owed his appointment to the influence of Q. Titinius, and probably also of Atticus, whose friend he was. His conduct, however, did not give satisfaction to Cicero. (Cic. ad Att. v. 4, 11, 14, 21.) In one of Cicero's letters (ad Fam. xv. 14. § 8) we read of his legate L. Tulleius, which is probably a false reading for L. Tullius.

6. TIB. TULLIUS, fought on the side of the

* It is stated by Middleton (Life of Cicero, vol. ii. p. 365), on the authority of Plutarch (Cic. 41), that Tullia died at Dolabella's house at Rome; but Plutarch does not say so; and Drumann has shown clearly from passages in Cicero's letters, that she died at her father's Tusculan villa.

Pompeian party in Spain in B.C. 45. (Auctor, B. Hisp. 17, 18.)

TUL'LIUS ALBINOVA'NUS. [ALBINOVANUS.]

TU'LLIUS, A'TTIUS, the celebrated king of the Volscians, to whom Coriolanus fled, when he was banished from Rome, and who induced his people to make war upon the Romans, with Coriolanus as their general. For details and authorities, see CORIOLANUS. In the best MSS. of Livy the name is written Attius Tullius, and in Zonaras we also find Τούλλιος; but in Dionysius and Plutarch the form Τύλλος occurs. Tullius, and not Tullus is the correct form. (Alschefski, ad Liv. ii. 37; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. note 217.)

TU'LLIUS BASSUS. [BASSUS, p. 471.]

TU'LLIUS or TI'LLIUS CIMBER. [CIMBER.]

TU'LLIUS FLAVIA'NUS, a commander of a troop of cavalry under Petilius Cerialis, was taken prisoner by the Vitellian troops in the battle in the suburbs of Rome, A.D. 69. (Tac. Hist. iii. 79.)

TU'LLIUS GE'MINUS. [GEMINUS.]

TU'LLIUS LAU'REA (Τούλλιος Λαυρέας), the author of three epigrams in the Greek Anthology. Fabricius conjectured, and Reiske and Jacobs approve of the suggestion, that he is identical with Laurea Tullius, the freedman of Cicero, from whose Latin poems in elegiac verse Pliny (H. N. xxxi. 2) quotes some lines, which are printed also in Burmann's Anthologia Latina (vol. i. p. 340). This conjecture is strongly confirmed by the fact, that the epigrams of Tullius had a place in the Anthology of Philip, which consisted chiefly of the poets of the Augustan age. In the title of one of the three epigrams there is a slight confusion in the different copies of the Anthology, the Planudean giving Σατυλλίου, and the Palatine Τατυλλίου, both of which variations perhaps arise from the reading M. Τυλλίου. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 498; Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 102; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. ii. p. 90, vol. xiii. p. 907.) [P. S.]

L. TU'LLIUS MONTA'NUS, accompanied M. Cicero the younger to Athens in B.C. 45. He is also mentioned at a later time in Cicero's correspondence, and it is probably to him that the Tullianum caput refers. (Cic. ad Att. xii. 52, 53, xiv. 16, 17, xv. 26, 29.)

TU'LLIUS RUFUS, a man of quaestorian rank, belonged to the Pompeian army, and was slain at the battle of Thapsus, B.C. 46. (Hirt, B. Afr. 85.)

TU'LLIUS SENE'CIO. [SENECIO.]

TU'LLIUS, SE'RVIUS, the sixth king of Rome. The account of the early life and death of Servius Tullius is full of marvels, and cannot be regarded as possessing any title to a real historical narrative. According to the general tradition, he was of servile origin, and owed his elevation to the favour of the gods, and especially to the protection of the goddess Fortune, with whom he was always a favourite. During his life-time she used to visit him secretly in his chamber as his spouse; and after his death, his statue was placed in her temple, and remained unhurt when the temple itself was once destroyed by fire (Ov. Fast. vi. 573, foll., 625; Val. Max. i. 8. § 11). The future greatness of Servius was announced by a miracle before his birth. His mother Ocrisia, a female slave of the queen's, and one of the captives taken at Corniculum, was offering cakes to the Lar or the household genius, when she saw in the fire on the hearth an apparition of the deity. Tanaquil, who understood the portent, commanded her to dress herself as a bride, and to shut herself up in the chamber. There she became pregnant by the god, whom some Romans maintained to be the household genius, and others Vulcan; the former supporting their opinion by the festival which Servius established in honour of the Lares, the latter by the deliverance of his statue from fire (Ov. Fast. vi. 625, foll.; Dionys. iv. 2). There are two other legends respecting the birth of Servius, which have more of an historical air, and may therefore be regarded as of later origin. One related that his mother was a slave from Tarquinii, that his father was a client of the king, and that he himself was brought up in the palace with the other household slaves, and waited at the royal table (Cic. de Rep. ii. 21). The other legend, which gives Servius a nobler origin, and which is therefore preferred both by Dionysius and Livy, states that his father, likewise called Servius Tullius, was a noble of Corniculum, who was slain at the taking of the city, and that his mother, then in a state of pregnancy, was carried away captive to Rome where she gave birth to the future king in the royal palace. The prodigies which preceded the birth of Servius accompanied his youth. Once as he was sleeping at mid-day in the porch of the palace, his head was seen surrounded with flames. Tanaquil forbade their being extinguished, for her prophetic spirit recognised the future destiny of the boy: they played around him without harming him, and when he awoke, the fire vanished. From this time forward Servius was brought up as the king's child with the greatest hopes. Nor were these hopes disappointed. By his personal bravery he gained a battle which the Romans had nearly lost; and Tarquinius placed such confidence in him, that he gave him his daughter in marriage, and entrusted him with the exercise of the government. His rule was mild and beneficent; and so popular did he become, that the sons of Ancus Marcius, fearing lest they should be deprived of the throne which they claimed as their inheritance, procured the assassination of Tarquinius [TARQUINIUS]. They did not, however, reap the fruit of their crime, for Tanaquil, pretending that the king's wound was not mortal, told the people that Tarquinius would recover in a few days, and that he had commanded Servius meantime to discharge the duties of the kingly office. Servius forthwith began to act as king, greatly to the satisfaction of the people; and when the death of Tarquinius could no longer be concealed, he was already in firm possession of the royal power. Servius thus succeeded to the throne without being elected by the senate and the curiae; but the curiae afterwards, at his own request, invested him with the imperium. (Cic. de Rep. ii. 21; Dionys. iv. 12.)

The reign of Servius Tullius is almost as barren of military exploits as that of Numa. The only war which Livy mentions (i. 42) is one against Veii, which was brought to a speedy conclusion. This war is magnified by Dionysius (iv. 27) into victories over the whole Etruscan nation, which is said to have revolted after the death of Tarquinius Priscus; and these pretended triumphs have found their way into the Fasti, where they are recorded, with the year and date of their occurrence. But the great deeds of Servius were deeds of peace; and he was regarded by posterity as the author of all their civil rights and institutions, just as Numa was of their religious rites and ordinances. Three important events are assigned to Servius by universal tradition. First he established a constitution, in which the plebs took its place as the second part of the nation, and of which we shall speak more fully below. Secondly, he extended the pomoerium, or hallowed boundary of the city (Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Pomoerium), and completed the city by incorporating with it the Quirinal, Viminal and Esquiline hills. He surrounded the whole with a stone wall called after him the wall of Servius Tullius; and from the Porta Collina to the Esquiline Gate where the hills sloped gently to the plain, he constructed a gigantic mound, nearly a mile in length, and a moat, one hundred feet in breadth and thirty in depth, from which the earth of the mound was dug. Rome thus acquired a circumference of five miles, and this continued to be the legal extent of the city till the time of the emperors, although suburbs were added to it. Thirdly, Servius established an important alliance with the Latins, by which Rome and the cities of Latium became the members of one great league. As leagues of this kind were always connected among the ancients with the worship at some common temple, a temple of Diana or the Moon was built upon the Aventine, which was not included in the pomoerium, as the place of the religious meetings of the two nations. It appears that the Sabines likewise shared in the worship of this temple. There was a celebrated tradition, that a Sabine husbandman had a cow of extraordinary beauty and size, and that the soothsayers had predicted that whoever should sacrifice this cow to Diana on the Aventine, would raise his country to rule over the confederates. The Sabine, anxious to secure the supremacy of his own people, had driven the cow to Rome, and was on the point of sacrificing her before the altar, when the crafty Roman priest rebuked him for daring to offer it with unwashed hands. While the Sabine went and washed in the Tiber, the Roman sacrificed the cow. The gigantic horns of the animal were preserved down to very late times, nailed up in the vestibule (Liv. i. 45). From the fact that the Aventine was selected as the place of meeting, it has been inferred that the supremacy of Rome was acknowledged by the Latins; but since we find it expressly stated that this supremacy was not acquired till the reign of Tarquinius Superbus, this view is perhaps not strictly correct. (Comp. Niebuhr, Lectures on the History of Rome, p. 118, London, 1848.)

After Servius had established his new constitution, he did homage to the majesty of the centuries, by calling them together, and leaving them to decide whether he was to reign over them or not. The body which he had called into existence, naturally ratified his power, and declared him to be their king. The patricians, however, were far from acquiescing in the new order of things, and hated the man who had deprived them of their exclusive rule, and had conferred such important benefits upon the plebeians. In addition to his constitutional changes in favour of the second order in the state, tradition related, that out of his private wealth, he discharged the debts of those who were reduced to indigence; that he deprived the creditor of the power of seizing the body of his debtor, and restricted him to the seizure of the goods of the latter; and that he assigned to the plebeians allotments of lands out of the territories which they had won in war (Cic. de Rep. ii. 21; Dionys. iv. 9; Liv. i. 46). The king had good reasons for mistrusting the patricians. Accordingly, when he took up his residence on the Esquiline, he would not allow them to dwell there, but assigned to them the valley, which was called after them the Patricius Vicus, or Patrician Street (Festus s. v.). Meantime, the long and uninterrupted popularity of the king seemed to deprive L. Tarquinius more and more of the chance of regaining the throne of his father. The patricians, anxious to recover their supremacy, readily joined Tarquinius in a conspiracy to assassinate the king. The legend of his death is too celebrated to be omitted here, although it perhaps contains no further truth than that Servius fell a victim to a patrician conspiracy, the leader of which was the son or descendant of the former king. The legend ran as follows. Servius Tullius, soon after his succession, gave his two daughters in marriage to the two sons of Tarquinius Priscus. L. Tarquinius the elder was married to a quiet and gentle wife; Aruns, the younger, to an aspiring and ambitious woman. The character of the two brothers was the very opposite of the wives who had fallen to their lot; for Lucius was proud and haughty, but Aruns unambitious and quiet. The wife of Aruns, enraged at the long life of her father, and fearing that at his death her husband would tamely resign the sovereignty to his elder brother, resolved to destroy both her father and her husband. Her fiendish spirit put into the heart of Lucius thoughts of crime which he had never entertained before. Lucius murdered his wife, and the younger Tullia her husband; and the survivors, without even the show of mourning, were straightway joined in unhallowed wedlock. Tullia now incessantly urged her husband to murder her father, and thus obtain the kingdom which he so ardently coveted. It was said that their design was hastened by the belief that Servius, in order to complete his legislation, entertained the thought of laying down his kingly power, and establishing the consular form of government. The patricians were no less alarmed at this scheme, as it would have had the effect of confirming for ever the hated laws of Servius. Their mutual hatred and fears united them closely together; and when the conspiracy was ripe, Tarquinius entered the forum arrayed in the kingly robes, seated himself in the royal chair in the senate-house, and ordered the senators to be summoned to him as their king. At the first news of the commotion, Servius hastened to the senate-house, and standing at the door-way, ordered Tarquinius to come down from the throne. Tarquinius sprang forward, seized the old man, and flung him down the stone steps. Covered with blood, the king was hastening home; but, before he reached it, he was overtaken by the servants of Tarquinius, and murdered. Tullia drove to the senate-house, and greeted her husband as king; but her transports of joy struck even him with horror. He bade her go home; and as she was returning, her charioteer pulled up, and pointed out the corpse of her father lying in his blood across the road. She commanded him to drive on; the blood of her father spirted over the carriage and on her dress; and from that day forward the street bore the name of the Vicus Sceleratus, or Wicked Street. The body lay unburied, for Tarquinius said scoffingly, "Romulus too went without burial;" and this impious mockery is said to have given rise to his surname of Superbus (Liv. i. 46—48; Ov. Fast. vi. 581, foll.). Servius had reigned forty-four years. His memory was long cherished by the plebeians, and his birth-day was celebrated on the nones of every month, for it was remembered that he was born on the nones of some month, but the month itself had become a matter of uncertainty. At a later time, when the oppressions of the patricians became more and more intolerable, the senate found it necessary to forbid the markets to be holden on the nones, lest the people should attempt an insurrection to restore the laws of their martyred monarch. (Macrob. Sat. i. 13.)

The Roman traditions, as we have seen, were unanimous in making Servius Tullius of Latin origin. He is universally stated to have been the son of a native of Corniculum, which was a Latin town; and Niebuhr, in his Lectures, supposes that he may have been the offspring of a marriage between one of the Luceres and a woman of Corniculum, previously to the establishment of the connubium, and that this may be the foundation of the story of his descent. His name Tullius also indicates a Latin origin, since the Tullii are expressly mentioned as one of the Alban gentes which were received into the Latin state in the reign of Tullus Hostilius. (Liv. i. 30.) His institutions, likewise, bear all the traces of a Latin character. But the Etruscan tradition about this king was entirely different, and made him a native of Etruria. This Etruscan tradition was related by the emperor Claudius, in a speech which he made upon the admission of some Lugdunensian Gauls into the senate; and the fragments of which are still preserved on two tables discovered at Lyons in the sixteenth century, and since the time of Lipsius have been printed in most editions of Tacitus. In this speech Claudius says "that, according to the Tuscans, Servius was the faithful companion of Caeles Vibenna, and shared all his fortunes: that at last being overpowered by a variety of disasters, he quitted Etruria with the remains of the army which had served under Caeles, went to Rome, and occupied the Caelian Hill, calling it so after his former commander: that he exchanged his Tuscan name Mastarna for the Roman one of Servius Tullius, obtained the kingly power, and wielded it to the great good of the state." This Caeles Vibenna was well known to the Roman writers, according to whom he came himself to Rome, though the statements in whose reign he came differed greatly. All accounts, however, represent him as a leader of an army raised by himself, and not belonging to any state, and as coming to Rome by the invitation of the Roman kings, to assist them. [CAELES.] There can be no question that the emperor Claudius drew his account from Etruscan annals; and there is no reason for disbelieving that Caeles Vibenna and Mastarna are historical personages, for, as Niebuhr observes, Caeles is too frequently and too distinctly mentioned to be fabulous, and his Etruscan name cannot have been invented by the Romans. The value of the tradition about Mastarna would very much depend upon the date of the Etruscan authorities, from whom Claudius derived his account; but on this point we are entirely in the dark. Niebuhr, in the first edition of his history, inclined strongly to the opinion that Rome was of Etruscan origin, and in his lectures, delivered in the year 1826, he adopted the Etruscan tradition respecting the origin of Servius Tullius, on the ground "that Etruscan literature is so decidedly more ancient than that of the Romans, that he did not hesitate to give preference to the traditions of the former." (Lectures, p. 84.) In the second edition of his history, however, Niebuhr so completely abandoned his former idea of the Etruscan origin of Rome, that he would not even admit the Etruscan origin of the Luceres, a point in which most subsequent scholars dissent from him; and in his Lectures of the year 1828, he strongly maintains the Latin origin of Servius Tullius, and asserts his belief that "Etruscan literature is mostly assigned to too early a period, and that to the time from the Hannibalian war down to the time of Sulla, a period of somewhat more than a century, most of the literary productions of the Etruscans must be referred." (Lectures, p. 125.) But the fact is that whether we are to follow the Etruscan or the Roman tradition about Servius is one of those points on which no certainty can be by any possibility obtained. So much seems clear, that Servius usurped the throne: he seized the royalty upon the murder of the former king, without being elected by the senate and the comitia, and he introduced great constitutional changes, apparently to strengthen his power against a powerful faction in the state. It is equally clear that his reign came to a violent end: he was dethroned and murdered by the descendants of the previous king, in league with his enemies in the state, who sought to recover the power of which they had been dispossessed. Now if we are right in our supposition that Tarquinius Priscus and Tarquinius Superbus were both of Etruscan origin, and represent an Etruscan sovereignty at Rome [TARQUINIUS], it seems to follow that the reign of Servius Tullius represents a successful attempt of the Latins to recover their independence, or in any case the sovereignty of an Etruscan people different from the one to which the Tarquins belonged. Further than this we cannot go; and it seems to us impossible to determine which supposition has the greatest preponderance of evidence in its favour. K. O. Müller adopted the latter supposition. He believed that the Etruscan town of Tarquinii was at the head of the twelve cities of Etruria at this time, that it conquered Rome, and that the reign of Tarquinius Priscus represents the supremacy of the state of Tarquinii at Rome. He further supposed that the supremacy of Tarquinii may not have been universally acknowledged throughout Etruria, and that the army of Caeles and of his lieutenant Mastarna perhaps belonged to the town of Volsinii, which wished to maintain its independence against Tarquinii; that it was with the remains of this army that Mastarna eventually conquered Rome, and thus destroyed the dominion of Tarquinii in that city. (Müller, Etrusker, vol. i. p. 121.)

CONSTITUTION OF SERVIUS TULLIUS.

The most important event connected with the reign of Servius Tullius is the new constitution which he gave to the Roman state. The details of this constitution are stated in different articles in the Dictionary of Antiquities, and it is therefore only necessary to give here a general outline, which the reader can fill up by references to the work just mentioned. The two main objects of the constitution of Servius were to give the plebs political independence, and to assign to property that influence in the state which had previously belonged to birth exclusively; and it cannot be questioned that the military and financial objects, which he secured by the changes he introduced, were regarded by him as of secondary importance. In order to carry his purpose into effect Servius made a two-fold division of the Roman people, one territorial, and the other according to property. He first divided the whole Roman territory into Regiones, and the inhabitants into Tribus, the people of each region forming a tribe. The city was divided into four regions or tribes, and the country around into twenty-six regions or tribes, so that the entire number of Tribus Urbanae and Tribus Rusticae, as they were respectively called, amounted to thirty. (Liv. i. 43; Dionys. iv. 14, 15.) Livy does not mention the number of the country tribes in his account of the Servian constitution, and we are indebted to Fabius Pictor, the oldest of the Roman annalists (Dionys. l. c.), and to Varro (ap. Non. p. 43), for the number of twenty-six. Moreover Livy, when he speaks of the whole number of the tribes in B. C. 495, says that they were made twenty-one in that year. (Liv. ii. 21; comp. Dionys. vii. 64.) Hence the statements of Fabius Pictor and Varro might appear to be doubtful. But in the first place their account has the greatest internal probability, since the number thirty plays such an important part in the Roman constitution, and the thirty tribes would thus correspond to the thirty curiae; and in the second place Niebuhr has called attention to the fact that in the war with Porsena, Rome lost a considerable part of her territory, and thus the number of her tribes would naturally be reduced. When, however, Niebuhr proceeds to say that the tribes were reduced in the war with Porsena from thirty to twenty, because it was the ancient practice in Italy to deprive a conquered nation of a third part of its territory, he seems to have forgotten, as Becker has remarked, that the four city tribes could not have been taken into account in such a forfeiture, and that consequently a third part of the territory would not have been ten tribes. Into this question, however, it is unnecessary further to enter. The conquest of Porsena had undoubtedly broken up the whole Servian system; and thus it was all the easier to form a new tribe in B. C. 504, when the gens Claudia migrated to Rome. (Liv. ii. 16.) It would appear that an entirely new distribution of the tribes became necessary, and this was probably carried into effect in B. C. 495, soon after the battle of the lake of Regillus. In fact the words of Livy (ii. 21) already referred to state as much, for he does not say that before this year there were twenty tribes, or that the twenty-first was then added for the first time, but simply that twenty-one tribes were then formed (Romae tribus una et viginti factae). The subsequent increase in the number of the tribes, till they reached that of thirty-five, is related in the Dictionary of Antiquities (s. v. Tribus). But to return from this digression to the Servian constitution. Each tribe was an organised body, with a magistrate at its head, called Φυλάρχος by Dionysius (iv. 14), and Curator Tribus by Varro (L. L. vi. 86), whose principal duty appears to have consisted in keeping a register of the inhabitants in each regio, and of their property, for purposes of taxation, and for levying the troops for the armies. Further, each country tribe or regio was divided into a certain number of Pagi, a name which had been given to the divisions of the Roman territory as early as the reign of Numa (Dionys. ii. 76); and each Pagus also formed an organised body, with a Magister Pagi at its head, who kept a register of the names and of the property of all persons in the pagus, raised the taxes, and summoned the people, when necessary, to war. Each pagus had its own sacred rites and common sanctuary, connected with which was a yearly festival called Paganalia, at which all the Pagani took part. Dionysius says that the Pagi were fortified places, established by Servius Tullius, to which the country people might retreat in case of an hostile inroad; but this is scarcely correct, for even if Servius Tullius established such fortified places, it is evident that the word was used to indicate a local division, and must have been given to the country adjoining the fortified place as well as to the fortified place itself. (Dionys. iv. 15; Varr. L. L. vi. 24, 26; Macrob. Saturn. i. 16; Ov. Fast. i. 669; Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Pagi.) As the country tribes were divided into Pagi, so were the city tribes divided into Vici, with a Magister Vici at the head of each, who performed duties analogous to those of the Magister Pagi. The Vici in like manner had their own religious rites and sanctuaries, which were erected at spots where two or more ways met (in compitis); and consequently their festival, corresponding to the Paganalia, was called Compitalia. (Dionys. iv. 14; Dict. of Antiq. s. vv. Vicus and Compitalia.)

The main object which Servius had in view in the institution of the tribes was to give an organisation to the plebeians, of which they had been entirely destitute before; but whether the patricians were included in the tribes or not, is a subject of great difficulty, and has given rise to great difference of opinion among modern scholars, some regarding the division into tribes as a local division of the whole Roman people, and consequently of patricians and their clients as well as of plebeians, while others look upon it as simply an organisation of the second order. The undoubted object of Servius Tullius in the institution of the tribes led Niebuhr to maintain that the patricians could not possibly have belonged to the tribes originally; but as we find them in the tribes at a later period (Liv. iv. 24, v. 30, 32), he supposed that they were admitted into them by the legislation of the decemvirs. But probable as this might appear, all the evidence we possess goes the other way, and tends to show that the tribes were a local division of the whole Roman people. In the first place, if Servius had created thirty local tribes for the plebs alone, from which the patricians were excluded, it is not easy to see why the three ancient tribes of the Ramnes, Tities, and Luceres, should not have continued in existence. This we know was not the case; for it is certain, that the three ancient tribes disappear from the time of the Servian constitution, and that their names alone were retained by the Equites, and that henceforward we read only of the division of the patricians into thirty curiae: indeed it is expressly said that the φυλαὶ γενικαὶ were abolished by Servius, and that the φυλαὶ τοπικαὶ were established in their place. (Dionys. iv. 14.) Secondly, it is certain that all the tribes of the year B. C. 495, with the exception of the Crustumina, take their names from patrician gentes. Thirdly, the establishment of the Claudian tribe, consisting as it did mainly of the patrician Claudia gens, is almost of itself sufficient to prove that patricians were included in the Servian tribes. Niebuhr lays great stress upon the fact that in no instance do we find the patricians voting in the Comitia Tributa before the time of the decemvirs; but as Becker very justly remarks, this does not prove any thing, as we have no reason for supposing that the Comitia Tributa were established by Servius along with the tribes. Such an assembly would have had no meaning in the Servian constitution, and would have been opposed to its first principles. The Comitia Tributa were called into existence, when the plebs began to struggle after independence, and had tribunes of their own at their head; and it is certainly improbable that patricians should have been allowed to vote in assemblies summoned by plebeian magistrates to promote the interests of the plebs. The Comitia Tributa must not therefore be regarded as assemblies of the tribes, as Becker has justly remarked, but as assemblies of the plebeians, who voted according to tribes, as their natural divisions. Hence as the same writer observes, we see the full force of the expression in the Leges Valeria Horatia, Publilia and Hortensia: "quod tributim plebes jussisset."

The tribes therefore were an organisation of the whole Roman people, patricians as well as plebeians, according to their local divisions; but they were instituted, as we have already remarked, for the benefit of the plebeians, who had not, like the patricians, possessed previously any political organisation. At the same time, though the institution of the tribes gave the plebeians a political organisation, it conferred upon them no political power, no right to take any part in the management of public affairs or in the elections. These rights, however, were bestowed upon them by another institution of Servius Tullius, which was entirely distinct from and had no connection with the thirty tribes. He made a new division of the whole Roman people into Classes according to the amount of their property, and he so arranged these classes that the wealthiest persons, whether patricians or plebeians, should possess the chief power and influence. In order to ascertain the property of each citizen, he instituted the Census, which was a register of Roman citizens and their property, and enacted that it should be taken anew from time to time. Under the republic it was taken afresh, as is well known, every five years. Lists of the citizens were made out by the curator tribus or magistrate of each tribe, and each citizen had to state upon oath the amount and value of his property. According to the returns thus obtained a division of the citizens was made, which determined the tax (tributum), which each citizen was to pay, the kind of military service he was to perform, and the position he was to occupy in the popular assembly. The whole arrangement was of a military character. The people assembled in the Campus as an army (exercitus, or, according to the more ancient expression, classis), and was therefore divided into two parts, the cavalry (equites), and infantry (pedites). The infantry was divided into five Classes. The first class contained all those persons whose property amounted at least to 100,000 asses: the second class those who had at least 75,000 asses: the third those who had at least 50,000 asses: the fourth those who had at least 25,000 asses: and the fifth those who had at least 10,000 asses, according to Böckh's probable conjecture, for Dionysius makes the sum necessary for admission to this class 12,500 asses ($12\frac{1}{2}$ minae) and Livy 11,000 asses. It must be recollected, however, that these numbers are not the ancient ones, when the as was a pound weight of copper, but those of the sixth century of the city. The original numbers were probably 20,000, 15,000, 10,000, 5000, and 2000 asses respectively, which were increased fivefold, when the as was coined so much lighter. (Böckh, Metrologische Untersuchungen, c. xxix.) Further, for military purposes each of the five classes was divided into elder (Seniores) and younger (Juniores) men: the former consisting of men from the age of 46 to 60, the latter of men from the age of 17 to 45. It was from the Juniores that the armies of the state were levied: the Seniores were not obliged to serve in the field, and could only be called upon to defend the city. Moreover, all the soldiers had to find their own arms and armour; but it was so arranged that the expense of the equipment should be in proportion to the wealth of each class.

Servius however did not make this arrangement of the people for military purposes alone. He had another and more important object in view, namely, the creation of a new national assembly, which was to possess the powers formerly exercised by the Comitia curiata, and thus become the sovereign assembly in the state. For this purpose he divided each classis into a certain number of centuriae, each of which counted as one vote. But in accordance with the great principle of his constitution, which, as has been several times remarked, was to give the preponderance of power to wealth, a century was not made of a fixed number of men; but the first or richest class contained a far greater number of centuries than any of the other classes, although they must at the same time have contained a much smaller number of men. Thus the first class contained 80 centuries, the second 20, the third 20, the fourth 20, and the fifth 30, in all 170. One half of the centuries consisted of Seniores, and the other half of Juniores; by which an advantage was given to age and experience over youth and rashness, for the Seniores, though possessing an equal number of votes, must of course have been very inferior in number to the Juniores. Besides these 170 centuries of the classes, Servius formed five other centuries, admission into which did not depend upon the census. Of these the smiths and carpenters (fabri) formed two centuries, and the horn-blowers and trumpeters (cornicines and tubicines) two other centuries: these four centuries voted with the classes, but Livy and Dionysius give a different statement as to which of the classes they voted with. The other century not belonging to the classes, and erroneously called the sixth class by Dionysius, comprised all those persons whose property did not amount to that of the fifth class. This century, however, consisted of three subdivisions according to the amount of their property, called respectively the accensi velati, the proletarii and capite censi: the accensi velati were those whose property was at least 1500 asses, or originally 300 asses, and they served as supernumeraries in the army without arms, but ready to take the arms and places of such as might fall in battle: the proletarii were those who had at least 375 asses, or originally 75 asses, and they were sometimes armed in pressing danger at the public expense: while the capite censi were all those whose property was less than the sum last mentioned, and they were never called upon to serve till the time of Marius. Thus the infantry or Pedites contained in all 175 centuries.

The cavalry or Equites were divided by Servius Tullius into 18 centuries, which did not comprise Seniores or Juniores, but consisted only of men below the age of forty-six. The early history and arrangement of the Equites have given rise to much discussion among modern scholars, into which we cannot enter here. (See Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Equites.) It is sufficient for our present purpose to state that Tarquinius Priscus had divided each of the three ancient centuries of equites into two troops, called respectively the first (priores) and second (posteriores) Ramnes, Tities, and Luceres. These three double centuries Servius Tullius formed into six new centuries, usually called the sex suffragia: and as they were merely a new organisation of the old body, they must have consisted exclusively of patricians. Besides these six centuries, Servius formed twelve others, taken from the richest and most distinguished families in the state, plebeian as well as patrician. There can be little question that a certain amount of property was necessary for admission to all the equestrian centuries, as well in consequence of the timocratic principle of this part of the Servian constitution, as on account of the express statement of Dionysius (iv. 18) that the equites were chosen by Servius out of the richest and most illustrious families, and of Cicero (de Rep. ii. 22) that they were of the highest census (censu maximo). Neither of these writers nor Livy mentions the property which was necessary to entitle a person to a place among the equites; but as we know that the equestrian census in the later times of the republic was four times the amount of that of the first class, it is probable that the same census was established by Servius Tullius. Niebuhr indeed supposed that the sex suffragia comprised all the patricians, independent of the property they possessed; but this supposition is, independent of other considerations, disproved by the fact, that we have express mention of a patrician, L. Tarquitius, who was compelled on account of his poverty to serve on foot.

The 175 centuries of pedites and the 18 of equites thus made a total of 193 centuries. Of these, 97 formed a majority of votes in the assembly. Although all the Roman citizens had a vote in this assembly, which was called the Comitia Centuriata, from the voting by centuries, it will be seen at once that the poorer classes had not much influence in the assembly; for the 18 centuries of the equites and the 80 centuries of the first class, voted first; and if they could come to an agreement upon any measure, they possessed at once a majority, and there was no occasion to call upon the centuries of the other classes to vote at all. This was the great object of the institution, which was to give the power to wealth, and not either to birth or to numbers.

The preceding account of the centuries has been taken from Livy (i. 43) and Dionysius (iv. 16, foll.), who agree in all the main points. The account of Cicero (de Re Publ. ii. 22) cannot be reconciled with that of Livy and Dionysius, and owing to the corruptions of the text it is hopeless to make the attempt. The few discrepancies between Livy and Dionysius will be seen by the following table, taken from Becker, by which the reader will also perceive more clearly the census of each class, the number of centuries or votes which each contained, and the order in which they voted.

There can be little doubt that the number in Dionysius is the correct one. According to Livy's number cases might have arisen in which it was impossible to obtain a majority, as ninety-seven might have voted for a measure and ninety-seven against it. Moreover, Cicero (de Rep. ii. 22) describes ninety-six as the minority. The other discrepancies between Livy and Dionysius are of no great importance, and need not be discussed further in this place.

The Assembly of the Centuries, or Comitia Centuriata, was made by Servius, as we have already remarked, the sovereign assembly of the nation, and it accordingly stept into the place formerly occupied by the Comitia Curiata. Servius transferred to it from the latter assembly the right of electing kings and the higher magistrates, of enacting and repealing laws, and of deciding upon war, and jurisdiction in cases of appeal from the sentence of a judge. He did not, however, abolish the Comitia Curiata, but on the contrary he allowed them very great power and influence in the state. He not only permitted them to retain the exercise of such rights as affected their own corporations, but he enacted that no vote of the Comitia Centuriata should be valid till it had received the sanction of the Comitia Curiata. This sanction of the Curiae is often expressed by the words patrum auctoritas or patres auctores facti, in which phrase patres mean the patricii. In course of time the sanction of the Curiae was abolished, or at least became a mere matter of form; but the successive steps by which this was accomplished do not belong to the present inquiry, and are related elsewhere. (Dict. of Antiq. s. vv. Auctor, Comitia, p. 333, a, Plebs, 2d ed.)

Although Servius gave the plebeians political rights and recognised them as the second order of the Roman people, it must not be supposed that he placed them on a footing of equality with the patricians. From the time of Servius they were cives, they had the jus civitatis, but not in its full extent. The jus civitatis included both the jus publicum and the jus privatum; but of each of these rights they possessed only a portion. Of the jus publicum Servius gave to them only the jus suffragii, or right of voting in the comitia centuriata, but not the jus honorum, or eligibility to the public offices of the state. Of the jus privatum Servius conferred upon them only the commercium, by virtue of which they could become owners of land and could appear before the courts without the mediation of a patronus, but he did not grant to them the connubium, or right of marriage with the patricians. Moreover, they had no claim to the use of the public land, the possessio of which continued to be confined to the patricians, although the conquered lands were won by the blood of the second order as well as of the first; but, as some compensation for this injustice, Servius is said to have given to the poor plebeians small portions of the public land in full ownership. (Dionys. iv. 9, 10, 13; Liv. i. 46; Zonar. vii. 9.)

The laws of Servius Tullius are said to have been committed to writing, and were known under the name of the Commentarii Servii Tullii. Dionysius says (iv. 13) that he regulated the commercium between the two orders by about fifty laws; but the commentaries of Servius Tullius, which are cited by later writers, such as Verrius Flaccus, can only have contained the substance of the laws ascribed to him; since the original laws, if they were ever committed to writing, must long since have perished. (Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. i. p. 249.)

The principal modern writers who have treated of the Servian constitution are: Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. i. p. 398, foll.; Göttling, Geschichte der Römischen Staatsverfassung, p. 230, foll.; Gerlach, *Die Verfassung d. 2. P., consul suffectus in A. D. 110.

TULLUS, CLOE'LIUS or CLUI'LIUS. [CLOELIUS TULLUS.]

COIN OF M. MAECILIUS TULLUS.

TULLUS, VOLCA'TIUS. 1. L. VOLCATIUS TULLUS, consul B. C. 66 with M'. Aemilius Lepidus. He is mentioned by Cicero in his oration for Plancius (c. 21) as one of those distinguished men who had failed when a candidate for the aedileship, but who afterwards obtained the highest honours of the state. Volcatius did not take a prominent part in public affairs, and appears to have been a man of moderate opinions, and fond of quiet. He approved of Cicero's proceedings in his consulship, and spoke in the debate in the senate on the punishment of the Catilinarian conspirators. In the discussion in B. C. 56, respecting the restoration of Ptolemy Auletes to his kingdom, he was in favour of intrusting this important commission to Pompey, who had lately returned from the East. In B. C. 54 he was one of the consulars who supported M. Scaurus, when he was brought to trial in this year. On the breaking out of the civil war, in B. C. 49, he resolved to take no part in the struggle, but remained quietly in Italy all the time. He is spoken of by Cicero in B. C. 46 as an enemy of M. Marcellus, when the latter was pardoned by Caesar. (Cic. in Cat. i. 6, ad Att. xii. 21, Philipp. ii. 5, ad Fam. i. 1, 2, 4, ad Q. Fr. ii.

1; Ascon. in Scaur. p. 28, ed. Orelli; Cic. ad Att. vii. 3, 8, 9, viii. 15, ix. 10, 19, x. 3, ad Fam. iv. 4. § 4.)

2. C. Volcatius Tullus, probably a son of No. 1, since Cicero says that L. Tullus and Serv. Sulpicius had sent their sons to fight against Pompey. (Cic. ad Att. x. 3.) C. Tullus fought under Caesar in the Gallic war, and likewise distinguished himself at the siege of Dyrrhachium in B. C. 48. (Caes. B. G. vi. 29, B. C. iii. 52.)

3. L. Volcatius Tullus, son of No. 1, was praetor urbanus in B. C. 46, and consul with Octavian in B. C. 33. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 41; Dion Cass. xlix. 43; Appian, Illyr. 27.)

TURA'NIUS. [Turranius.]

TURBO, a gladiator of small stature but great courage. (Hor. Sat. ii. 3. 310, with the Schol.)

TU'RCIUS RUFUS APRONIA'NUS ASTE'RIUS. [Asterius.]

TURBO, MA'RCIUS LIVIA'NUS, a distinguished general under Trajan and Hadrian. He was sent by the former emperor in A. D. 115 to Egypt to suppress the insurrection of the Jews at Cyrene, which he effected without much difficulty. On the accession of Hadrian (A. D. 117), with whom he had lived on intimate terms during the life-time of Trajan, he was raised to offices of higher honour and trust. He was first sent into Mauritania to quiet the disturbances in that province which were supposed to have been excited by Q. Lusius Quietus [Quietus], and he was afterwards appointed to the government of Pannonia and Dacia with the title of Egyptian Praefect, that he might possess greater weight and influence. Subsequently he was summoned to Rome, and raised to the important dignity of Praefectus Praetorio in place of Attianus. In the discharge of the duties of this office, he was most assiduous; but nevertheless, like all the other friends of Hadrian, was at length treated with ingratitude by the emperor. Turbo was fifty years of age at the time of his death, as we learn from an inscription on his tomb. (Euseb. H. E. iv. 2; Spart. Hadr. 4—9, 15; Dion Cass. lxix. 18; Gruter, p. 437. 1.)

TURDUS, C. PAPI'RIUS, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 178. (Liv. xli. 6.) This is the only person of this family mentioned. Cicero speaks of the Turdi as a plebeian family of the Papiria gens (ad Fam. ix. 21. § 3).

TU'RIA, the wife of Q. Lucretius Vespillo, concealed her husband when he was proscribed by the triumvirs in B. C. 43. (Val. Max. vi. 7. § 2; Appian, B. C. iv. 44.) [Vespillo.]

TURI'BIUS, a Spanish bishop, a bitter enemy and persecutor of the Priscillianists. About the year A. D. 447, before he was elevated to the episcopal dignity, he published a letter still extant, entitled Epistola de non recipiendis in auctoritatem Fidei apocryphis Scripturis, et de secta Priscillianistarum, addressed to his friends Idacius and Ceponius. A letter to Pope Leo the Great, and various tracts connected with the controversy, have perished.

The Epistle to Idacius and Ceponius was first printed by Ambrosius de Morales, in his Historia Hispaniae, lib. xi. 26, and will be found in the editions of the works of Leo by Quesnell and by the brothers Ballerini, inserted immediately after the letter of Leo to Turibius, which is numbered xv. (Schoenemann, Biblioth. Patrum Latt. vol. ii. § 51; Baehr, Geschichte der Röm. Litterat. Suppl. Band. 2te Abtheil. § 167.) [W. R.]

TU'RIUS. 1. L. Turius, was accused by Cn. Gellius and defended by Cato the Censor. (Gell. xiv. 2.) As nothing is known respecting either this L. Turius or Cn. Gellius, a wide field is opened for learned trifling. The different conjectures started are given by Meyer. (Orator. Roman. Fragm. p. 140, foll., 2nd ed.)

2. L. Turius, characterized by Cicero as an orator of small talent but great diligence, failed in obtaining the consulship only by a few centuries. (Cic. Brut. 67.) This Turius can hardly be the same person as the preceding, as he is mentioned by Cicero with M. Piso, P. Murena, C. Censorinus, C. Macer, C. Piso, and L. Torquatus, all of whom were the contemporaries of Cicero.

3. Q. Turius, a negotiator or money-lender in the province of Africa, where he died. Cicero wrote to Q. Cornificius in B. C. 44, begging him to support the validity of the will of Turius against the attempts of his freedman Turius Eros. (Cic. ad Fam. xii. 26.)

4. Turius, a corrupt judge in the time of Horace. (Hor. Sat. ii. 1. 49.)

TURNUS (Τύρνος), a son of Daunus and Venilia, and king of the Rutulians at the time of the arrival of Aeneas in Italy. (Virg. Aen. x. 76, 616.) He was a brother of Juturna and related to Amata, the wife of king Latinus. (xii. 138.) Alecto, by the command of Hera, stirred him up to fight against Aeneas after his landing in Italy. (vii. 408, &c.) He appears in the Aeneid as a brave warrior, but in the end he fell by the hand of the victorious Aeneas (xii. 926, &c.). Livy (i. 2) and Dionysius also mention him as king of the Rutulians, who allied himself with the Etruscans against the Latins, consisting of Aborigenes and Trojans. The Rutulians according to their account indeed were defeated, but Aeneas fell. (Comp. Aeneas.) [L. S.]

TURNUS, a Roman satyric poet. According to the old scholiast upon Juvenal, who quotes two lines from one of his pieces, he was a native of Aurunca, of servile extraction (libertini generis), the brother of Scaeva Memor the tragedian, and rose to honour and power at court under the Flavian dynasty. He is mentioned in terms of high praise by Martial, by Rutilius, and by Sidonius Apollinaris. We possess thirty hexameters, forming a portion of, apparently, a long satyric poem, the subject being an enumeration of the crimes and abominations which characterised the reign of Nero. This fragment was first published from a MS. by J. L. G. de Balzac in his "Entretiens" (12mo. Amst. 1663), was copied by Burmann into his "Anthologia Latina" (vi. 94, or No. 190, ed. Meyer), and by Wernsdorf, into his Poetae Latini Minores (vol. iii. p. lvii. p. 77). The latter employs some arguments which, to a certain extent, bear out his conjecture that the piece ought to be ascribed to Turnus; but the evidence is of a very indirect and uncertain description. (Vet. Schol. in Juv. i. 20, 71; Martial, vii. 97, xi. 10; Rutil. Numat. i. 599; Sidon. Apollin. Carm. ix. 267; F. A. Wolf, Vorlesungen über Röm. Litt. p. 231; Zumpt, ad Rutil. Numat. l. c.) [W. R.]

TURNUS (Τοῦρνος), a statuary, known only by the single passage in which Tatian mentions his statue of the courtezan Laïs. (Orat. ad Graec. 55. p. 121, ed. Worth: Λαΐν ἐτόρνευσε, καὶ ὁ

TURNUS HERDO'NIUS. [HERDONIUS.]

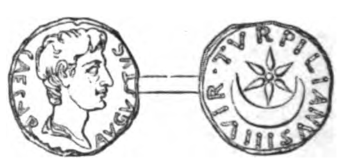
TURPILIA'NUS, PETRO'NIUS. 1. P. PETRONIUS TURPILIANUS, triumvir of the mint under Augustus, whose name occurs on a great variety of coins, seven of which are given below. The first has on the obverse the head of Augustus, and on the reverse the virgin Tarpeia overwhelmed by the shields cast upon her, which subject has a reference to the Sabine origin of the Petronia gens. The next three coins relate to the Eastern glories of Augustus and the restitution of the Roman standards by the Parthians in B. C. 20. The second coin has on the obverse the head of the goddess Feronia, which likewise has reference to the Sabine origin of the gens, and on the reverse a kneeling Parthian offering a standard. The third coin has the same obverse, and on the reverse a man in a chariot drawn by two elephants, holding an olive branch in his hand, which subject probably has reference to the Indian embassy sent to Augustus in A. D. 20. The fourth coin has on the obverse the head of Libera, or perhaps of Bacchus, habited as a female, and on the reverse a kneeling figure of Armenia. The reverses of the next three coins are probably intended to celebrate the love of Augustus or Petronius for poetry. The fifth coin has on the obverse the head of Augustus, and on the reverse one of the Sirens, holding a trumpet in each hand. The sixth has the same obverse, and on the reverse Pegasus. The seventh has likewise on the obverse the head of Augustus, but struck at a different period, and on the reverse the sun and moon. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 270, foll., vol. vi. p. 99.)



COINS OF P. PETRONIUS TURPILIANUS.

2. C. PETRONIUS TURPILIANUS, consul B. C. 61 with C. Caesonius Paetus, was sent by Nero towards the close of the year to succeed Suetonius Paulinus in the government of Britain. He did not undertake in this province any military enterprises, but covered, says Tacitus, idle inactivity with the honourable name of peace. Nevertheless he received the triumphal insignia in A. D. 65; but this honour and the friendship of Nero caused his ruin, for he was in consequence put to death by order of Galba at the commencement of his reign. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 29, 39, Agr. 16, Ann. xv. 72, Hist. i. 6, 37; Plut. Galb. 15.)

TURPI'LIUS LA'BEO, of Venice, a Roman knight, contemporary with Pliny, who mentions him as an exception to the low condition in life of the generality of Roman painters since Pacuvius. Another peculiarity was that he painted with his left hand. He was recently dead when Pliny wrote the passage in which he mentions him. There were some beautiful pictures by him at Verona. He may be placed about A. D. 60. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 4. s. 7.) [P. S.]

TURPI'LIUS, SEXTUS, a Roman dramatist whose productions belonged to the department of Comoedia Palliata. The titles of thirteen or fourteen (Acta, Boethuntes, Canephorus, Demetrius, Demiurgus, Epiclerus, Hetaera, Lemnii Leucadia, Lindia, Paraterusa, Philopator, Thrasyleon, Veliterna (?) have been preserved, together with a few fragments which will be found collected in the Poetarum Latii Scenicorum Fragmenta of Bothe, vol. ii. p. 76. 8vo. Lips. 1834. Of the above, the Thrasyleon appears to have been taken from Menander, the Demetrius and the Leucadia from Alexis. According to Hieronymus, in the Eusebian Chronicle, Turpilius died, when very old, at Sinuessa in B. C. 101. He stands seventh in the scale of Volcatius Sedigitus. [SEDIGITUS.] [W. R.]

TURPI'LIUS SILA'NUS. [SILANUS.]

TU'RPIO, L. AMBI'VIUS, a very celebrated actor in the time of Terence, in most of whose plays he acted. (Didascaliae Terentianae; Cic. de Sen. 14; Tac. Dial. de Orat. 14; Symmach. Ep. i. 25, x. 2.)

TU'RPIO, ANTI'STIUS, fought in single combat Q. Pompeius Niger in the Spanish war in B. C. 45. (Auctor, B. Hisp. 25.)

TU'RPIO, NAE'VIUS. [NAEVIUS, No. 7.]

TURRA'NIUS or TURA'NIUS. 1. D. TURRANIUS NIGER, a friend of Varro, to whom the latter dedicated the second book of his work De Re Rustica. He was also a friend of Q. Cicero, whom he accompanied to Cilicia, when Quintus went there as the legatus of his brother Marcus. (Varr. R. R. ii. Praef.; Cic. ad Att. i. 6, vi. 9, vii. 1; in one of these passages the name is written Turannius.) He is perhaps the same as the writer Turranius Gracilis, quoted by the elder Pliny. [GRACILIS.]

2. M'. TURRANIUS, praetor B. C. 44, refused a province which was offered him by Antony, and is therefore called by Cicero "homo summa integritate atque innocentia." (Cic. Phil. iii. 10.)

3. TURRANIUS, a tragic poet mentioned by Ovid (ex Pont. iv. 16. 29).

4. C. TURRANIUS, praefectus annonae at the death of Augustus, A. D. 14, was one of the first to swear allegiance to Tiberius upon his accession. He continued to hold this office till the reign of Claudius, for he is spoken of as praefectus rei frumentariae in A. D. 48. (Tac. Ann. i. 7, xi. 31.)

5. TURRANIUS RUFINUS. [RUFINUS, No. 1.]

TURRIA'NUS, a Volscian of Fregellae, was an eminent statuary in clay, in the early Etruscan period, and the maker of a statue of Jupiter, which was dedicated by Tarquinius Priscus, and which was painted with vermilion on great festivals. This is according to the common text of Pliny (H. N. xxxv. 12. s. 45); but the reading is so very doubtful, and the critical discussion of it so complicated, with so very little hope of a satisfactory result, that we must be content to refer the reader to the following works, in which the question is treated at length. (Sillig's Pliny, l. c., and Jan's Supplement; Sillig, Catal. Artif. Append. s. v.; Jan, in the Jen. Litt. Zeitung, 1838, p. 258; Kunstblatt, 1832, No. 49, 1833, No. 51; Müller, Etrusker, vol. ii. p. 246, and Archäol. d. Kunst, § 171, ed. Welcker.) [P. S.]

TURRI'NUS, CLO'DIUS, the name of two rhetoricians, father and son, spoken of with praise by the elder Seneca, who gives a short account of them. The elder by his eloquence obtained wealth and honour, and held an important public office in Spain. The son was an intimate friend of Seneca. (Senec. Controv. v. Praef. p. 333, ed. Bip., Suas. 2, Contr. 30—35.)

TURRI'NUS, MAMI'LIUS. 1. C. MAMILIUS Q. F. Q. N. TURRINUS, consul B. C. 239 with Q. Valerius Falto. (Fasti Capit.; Gell. xvii. 21, 43, where the reading is C. Manilius.)

2. Q. MAMILIUS TURRINUS, plebeian aedile B. C. 207 and praetor B. C. 206, obtained by lot the jurisdictio peregrina, but was sent by the senate into Gaul. (Liv. xxviii. 10.)

TURRUS or THURRUS, one of the most powerful of the Celtiberian chiefs conquered by Gracchus in B. C. 179, became a faithful ally of the Romans. (Liv. xl. 49.)

L. TURSE'LIUS, made M. Antonius his heir, disinheriting his own brother. (Cic. Phil. ii. 16.)

P. TURU'LIUS or TURU'LLIUS, one of Caesar's assassins, was quaestor of Cassius Longinus in B. C. 43, and received the command of the fleet which had been raised by Tillius Cimber in Bithynia. After the battle of Philippi, in B. C. 42, Turulius joined Cassius Parmensis, and subsequently took refuge with Antony, with whom he lived on intimate terms. In order to please Octavian, Turulius was surrendered to him by Antony after the battle of Actium, and was put to death by order of Octavian in the island of Cos that he might appear to offer satisfaction to Aesculapius, the trees of whose sacred grove he had previously cut down for the use of Antony's navy. (Cic. ad Fam. xii. 13; Appian, B. C. v. 2; Dion Cass. li. 8; Val. Max. i. 1. § 19.)

TURU'LLIUS CERIA'LIS, a primipilaris in A. D. 69. (Tac. Hist. ii. 22.)

TUSCE'NIUS, an obscure person, whom Q. Cicero compelled in B. C. 60 to disgorge some dishonest gains. (Cic. ad Q. Fr. i. 1. § 6, i. 2. § 2.)

TUSCIA'NUS (Τουσκιανός), of Lydia, a distinguished rhetorician in the fourth century of the Christian aera. (Eunap. Jul. p. 95, Proaer. p. 111; Suidas, s. v.)

TUSCI'LIUS NOMINA'TUS, an orator and a contemporary of the younger Pliny, who mentions him in his correspondence (Ep. v. 4, 14).

TUSCUS, C. AQUI'LLIUS, consul B. C. 487 with T. Sicinius Sabinus, carried on war against the Hernici, whom he defeated, and obtained in consequence an ovation or lesser triumph. (Fasti Capit.; Liv. ii. 40; Dionys. viii. 64, 65, 67.)

TUSCUS, CAECI'NA. [CAECINA, No. 8.]

TUSCUS, CLO'DIUS, to whom Asinius Capito wrote a letter, which is quoted by Gellius (v. 20).

TUSCUS, CORNE'LIUS, an historian, and described by Seneca as a man "quam improbi animi, tam infelicis ingenii," accused Mamercus Aemilius Scaurus of majestas in A. D. 34. (Senec. Suas. 2, sub fin.; Tac. Ann. vi. 29.)

TUSCUS, FABRI'CIUS, a Roman writer, of whom nothing is known except that he was used by Pliny in drawing up his Natural History (Index, lib. iii. foll.).

TUTELI'NA, an agricultural divinity among the Romans, or, perhaps, rather an attribute of Ops, by which she is described as the goddess protecting the fruits which have been brought in at the harvest time from the fields. Tutelina, Secia and Messia had three pillars with altars before them in the Circus. (August. De Civ. Dei, iv. 8; Macrob. Sat. i. 16; Plin. H. N. xviii. 2; Varro, De Ling. Lat. v. 74.) [L. S.]

TUTICA'NUS, a friend of Ovid, who addressed to him one of his extant epistles from Pontus (iv. 12). Tuticanus had made a free translation into

Latin verse of the Odyssey, or at least of a portion of it, to which Ovid refers in the lines: —

> "Dignam Maeoniis Phaeacida condere chartis > Cum te Pïerides perdocuere tuae."

Ovid likewise alludes to this poem in another passage ("Et qui Maeoniam Phaeacida vertit," ex Pont. iv. 16. 27), but without naming the author. (Wernsdorf, Poët. Lat. Min. vol. iv. pp. 584, 585.)

TU'TIA, mentioned in one of Cicero's letters (ad Att. xvi. 2), does not occur elsewhere, and is perhaps a false reading for Julia, and the same as the Julia spoken of ad Att. xv. 29.

TUTI'LIUS, a rhetorician, whose daughter Quintilian married. (Plin. Ep. vi. 32; Quintil. iii. 1. § 21, where Tutilius should be read instead of Rutilius.) [QUINTILIANUS, p. 635, a.]

L. TU'TIUS CEREA'LIS, consul under Trajan A. D. 106 with L. Ceionius Commodus Verus (Fasti). Pliny speaks of Tutius Cerealis a consularis in one of his letters (Ep. ii. 11); but as the letter was written in A. D. 99, it must refer to some other person of the same name, unless we suppose that the consul of the year 106 had held the same dignity previously.

TUTOR, JU'LIUS, a Treviran, who had been placed by Vitellius in a command on the left bank of the Rhine (A. D. 69), took part in the rebellion of CLASSICUS. After the murder of Vocula, he gained over the Roman soldiers at Colonia Agrippinensis and on the banks of the Upper Rhine to the oath to the empire of Gaul. He neglected to guard the Upper Rhine and the passes of the Alps against Cerealis; and, on the appearance of the Roman army he was deserted by a large body of his troops. He retired to Bingium, and was there defeated. After assisting Valentinus in his attempt to renew the war [VALENTINUS], he joined Civilis and Classicus, with whom he fled across the Rhine. [CIVILIS.] (Tac. Hist. iv. 55, 59, 70, v. 19—22). [P. S.]

TYCHE (Τύχη). 1. The personification of chance or luck, the Fortuna of the Romans, is called by Pindar (Ol. xii. init.) a daughter of Zeus the Liberator. She was represented with different attributes. With a rudder, she was conceived as the divinity guiding and conducting the affairs of the world, and in this respect she is called one of the Moerae (Paus. vii. 26. § 3; Pind. Fragm. 75, ed. Heyne); with a ball she represents the varying unsteadiness of fortune; with Plutos or the horn of Amalthea, she was the symbol of the plentiful gifts of fortune. (Artemid. ii. 37; comp. Müller, Anc. Art and its Rem. § 398.) Tyche was worshipped at Pharae in Messenia (Paus. iv. 30. § 2); at Smyrna, where her statue, the work of Bupalus, held with one hand a globe on her head, and in the other carried the horn of Amalthea (iv. 30. § 4); in the arx of Sicyon (ii. 7. § 5); at Aegeira in Achaia, where she was represented with the horn of Amalthea and a winged Eros by her side (vii. 26. § 3; comp. Plut. De Fort. Rom. 4; Arnob. adv. Gent. vi. 25); in Elis (Paus. vi. 25. § 4); at Thebes (ix. 16. § 1); at Lebadeia, together with ἀγαθὸς δαίμων (ix. 39. § 4); at Olympia (v. 15. § 4), and Athens. (Aelian, V. H. ix. 39; comp. FORTUNA.)

2. A nymph, one of the playmates of Persephone. (Hom. Hymn. in Cer. 421.)

3. One of the daughters of Oceanus. (Hes. Theog. 360.) [L. S.]

TY'CHICUS, Q. HATE'RIUS, an architect, who is mentioned in two extant inscriptions, from which it appears that he held the office of redemptor operum under the emperor Claudius, and that he constructed and adorned with marbles, at his own expense, a small temple of Hercules. (For the inscriptions themselves, see R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 420, 421, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

TY'CHIUS (Τυχίος). 1. Of Hyle, a mythical artificer, mentioned by Homer (who calls him σκυτοτόμων ὄχ' ἄριστος), as the maker of Ajax's shield of seven ox-hides, covered with a plate of brass. (Il. 219—223; Nonn. Dionys. xiii. 671.)

2. A maker of fictile vases, whose name is inscribed on the margin of one of the large vases found at Corneto, in the following form: ΤV+ΙΟϚ ΕΓΟΕϚΕΝ. (Gerhard, Rapport Volcent. pp. 178, 701.) His name is also found on some vases recently discovered at Vulci, of which there is one in the Museum at Berlin. (Gerhard, Neuerworbene antik. Denkmäler, No. 1664; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 62, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

TYCHON (Τύχων). 1. A god of chance or accident, was, according to Strabo (ix. p. 408), worshipped at Athens. (Comp. Anthol. Palat. ix. 334.)

2. An obscene daemon, is mentioned as a companion of Aphrodite and Priapus, and seems to signify "the producer," or "the fructifier." (Etym. Magn. and Hesych. s. v.; comp. Jacobs, ad Anthol. tom. viii. p. 12; Lobeck, Aglaoph. p. 1235.) [L. S.]

TYCHO'NIUS, also written TICHONIUS, was an African, well versed in sacred and not ignorant of profane literature, who flourished under Theodosius and his sons, being contemporary with Rufinus and Augustine. Attached to the Donatists he nevertheless assailed them in his writings, and although triumphant in confuting their doctrines, refused to quit their communion. This perversity of temper calls forth the indignation of the bishop of Hippo, who while he inveighs against the author, at the same time praises his genius and eloquence, and earnestly recommends his works. Of these one only has reached us, entitled Septem Regulae or De Septem Regulis, being a code of Seven Rules for explaining Holy Scripture. It is analysed by Augustine at the conclusion of his third book De Doctrina Christiana, but will be found to contain little that is important, interesting, or even intelligible.

Tychonius composed also a treatise in three books De Bello intestino, on the decrees of the ancient Synods which might be quoted in defence of his party; Commentarium in Apocalypsin, in which he expounded the vision in a sense purely spiritual; and Expositio diversarum causarum in illustration of some arguments employed in defence of his sect; but the whole of these are now lost.

The Septem Regulae were first printed in the Monumenta Patrum Orthodoxographa of J. J. Grynaeus, fol. Basil. 1569, vol. v. p. 1352. An edition corrected from MSS. was published by Andreas Schottus, in the Auctuarium to the Magna Bibliotheca Patrum, fol. Colon. 1622, p. 152, reprinted in the Bibliotheca Patrum Max. fol. Lugd. 1677, vol. vi., and the piece will be found under its best form in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. viii. (fol. Venet. 1772) p. 107. (Augustin. de Doctrina Christian. iii. 30. § 42; Gennad. de Viris Illustr. 18; Galland, Proleg. ad Vol. VIII. c. ii. p. v.; Schoenemann, Bibliotheca Patrum Latt. vol. i. cap.

iv. § 26; Bähr, Geschichte der Röm. Literat. Suppl. B. § 100.) [W. R.]

TYCUS. [QUARTINUS.]

TYDEUS (Τυδεύς), a son of Oeneus and Periboea (Gorge or Althaea), was the husband of Deïpyle, by whom he became the father of Diomedes; he was king of Calydon, and one of the princes who joined Polyneices in the expedition against Thebes. (Apollod. i. 8. § 5; Hom. Il. ii. 406, xiv. 115, &c.)

Tydeus was obliged to flee from his country in consequence of some murder which he had committed, but which is differently described by the different authors, some saying that he killed his father's brother, Melas, Lycopeus, or Alcathous; others that he slew Thoas or Aphareus, his mother's brother; others that he slew his brother Olenias, and others again that he killed the sons of Melas, who had revolted against Oeneus (Schol. ad Stat. Theb. i. 280, 402). He fled to Adrastus at Argos, who purified him from the murder, and gave him his daughter Deïpyle in marriage. With Adrastus he then went against Thebes, where he was wounded by Melanippus, who, however, was slain by him. (Apollod. l. c.; Eustath. ad Hom. pp. 288, 971.) When Tydeus lay on the ground wounded, Athena appeared to him with a remedy which she had received from Zeus, and which was to make him immortal. This, however, was prevented by a stratagem of Amphiaraus, who hated Tydeus, for he cut off the head of Melanippus and brought it to Tydeus, who cut it in two and ate the brain, or devoured some of the flesh. (Schol. ad Pind. Nem. x. 12; comp. Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1273.) Athena seeing this, shuddered, and did not apply the remedy which she had brought. (Apollod. iii. 6. § 8.) Tydeus then died, and was buried by Macon. (Paus. ix. 18. § 2; comp. ADRASTUS; AMPHIARAUS.) [L. S.]

TY'DEUS (Τυδεύς). 1. A Chian, son of Ion, appears to have been a leader of the democratic party in his native island, and was one of those who were put to death in B. C. 412, by Pedaritus the Lacedaemonian, for attachment to the Athenian cause. It is possible that his father was no other than Ion, the tragic poet. (Thuc. viii. 38.) [ION, No. 1; PEDARITUS.]

2. An Athenian, was one of the three additional generals who were appointed in B. C. 405 to share the command of the fleet with Conon, Philocles, and Adeimantus. Tydeus and Menander, one of his colleagues, are particularly mentioned by Xenophon as contemptuously rejecting the advice of Alcibiades before the battle of Aegos-potami in the same year; and we find in Pausanias that he and Adeimantus were suspected by their countrymen of having been bribed by Lysander. He was put to death by the Spartans, as we may conclude, after the battle, together with the other Athenian prisoners. (Xen. Hell. ii. 1. §§ 16, 26; Paus. x. 9.) [ADEIMANTUS.] [E. E.]

TYMNES (Τύμνης), an epigrammatic poet, whose epigrams were included in the Garland of Meleager, but respecting whose exact date we have no further evidence; for the grounds on which Reiske supposes that he was a Cretan, and that he was contemporary with Meleager, are very slight. There are seven of his epigrams in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck, Anal. vol. i. p. 505; Jacobs, Anthol. Graec. vol. i. p. 256, vol. xiii. p. 963; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. pp. 498, 499.) Tymnes occurs, as a Carian name, in Herodotus (v. 37, vii. 98). [P. S.]

TYNDAREUS (Τυνδάρεως), the son of Perieres and Gorgophone, and a brother of Aphareus, Leucippus, Icarius, and Arete (Apollod. i. 9. § 5) or according to others (Apollod. iii. 10. § 4), a son of Oebalus, by the nymph Bateia or by Gorgophone. (Paus. iii. 1. § 4.) Tyndareus, with Icarion, being expelled by his step-brother Hippocoon and his sons, he fled to Thestius in Aetolia, and assisted him in his wars against his neighbours. Others (Paus. l. c.) state that Icarion assisted Hippocoon, and, according to a Laconian tradition, Tyndareus went to Pellana in Laconia, and according to a Messenian tradition, he went to Aphareus in Messenia. (Paus. iii. 1. § 4, 21. § 2.) In Aetolia he married Leda, the daughter of Thestius (Apollod. iii. 10. § 5; Eurip. Iph. Aul. 49), and afterwards he was restored to his kingdom of Sparta by Heracles. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 3, iii. 10. § 5; Paus. ii. 18. § 6; Diod. iv. 33.) By Leda, Tyndareus became the father of Timandra, Clytaemnestra and Philonoë. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 6; Hom. Od. xxiv. 199.) One night Leda was embraced both by Zeus and Tyndareus, and the result of this was the birth of Polydeuces and Helena, the children of Zeus, and of Castor and Clytaemnestra, the children of Tyndareus. (Hygin. Fab. 77; comp. DIOSCURI; HELENA; CLYTAEMNESTRA.) When Tyndareus saw that his beautiful daughter Helena was beleaguered by suitors, he began to be afraid, lest if one should be successful, the others should create disturbances, and, on the advice of Odysseus, he put them all to their oath, to protect the suitor that should be preferred by Helena, against any wrong that might be done to him. (Paus. iii. 20. § 9.) To reward Odysseus for this good advice, Tyndareus himself begged Icarius to give to Odysseus his daughter Penelope. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 9.) Tyndareus was believed to have built the temple of Athena Chalcioecus at Sparta. (Paus. iii. 17. § 3.) When Castor and Polydeuces had been received among the immortals, Tyndareus invited Menelaus to come to Sparta, and surrendered his kingdom to him. (Apollod. iii. 11. § 2.) His tomb was shown at Sparta as late as the time of Pausanias (iii. 17. § 4). [L. S.]

TYNDA'RION (Τυνδαρίων), a tyrant of Tauromenium in Sicily, who invited Pyrrhus over from Italy in B. C. 278. Pyrrhus directed his course first to Tauromenium, and received reinforcements from Tyndarion. (Diod. Ecl. viii. p. 495; comp. Plut. Pyrrh. 23; Droysen, Geschichte des Hellenismus, vol. ii. p. 150.) [E. E.]

TYPHON or TYPHOEUS (Τυφάων, Τυφωεύς, Τυφώς), a monster of the primitive world, is described sometimes as a destructive hurricane, and sometimes as a fire-breathing giant. According to Homer (Il. ii. 782; comp. Strab. xiii. p. 929) he was concealed in the country of the Arimi * in the earth, which was lashed by Zeus with flashes of lightning.

In Hesiod Typhaon and Typhoeus are two distinct beings. Typhaon there is a son of Typhoeus

* Εἰν Ἀρίμοις, of which the Latin poets have made Inarime (Virg. Aen. ix. 716; Ov. Met. xiv. 89).

(Theog. 869), and a fearful hurricane, who by Echidna became the father of the dog Orthus, Cerberus, the Lernaean hydra, Chimaera, and the Sphynx. (Theog. 306; comp. Apollod. ii. 3. § 1, iii. 5. § 8.) Notwithstanding the confusion of the two beings in later writers, the original meaning of Typhaon was preserved in ordinary life. (Aristoph. Ran. 845; Plin. H. N. ii. 48.) Typhoeus, on the other hand, is described as the youngest son of Tartarus and Gaea, or of Hera alone, because she was indignant at Zeus having given birth to Athena. Typhoeus is described as a monster with a hundred heads, fearful eyes, and terrible voices (Pind. Pyth. i. 31, viii. 21, Ol. iv. 12); he wanted to acquire the sovereignty of gods and men, but was subdued, after a fearful struggle, by Zeus, with a thunderbolt. (Hes. Theog. 821, &c.) He begot the winds, whence he is also called the father of the Harpies (Val. Flacc. iv. 428), but the beneficent winds Notus, Boreas, Argestes, and Zephyrus, were not his sons. (Hes. Theog. 869, &c.) Aeschylus and Pindar describe him as living in a Cilician cave. (Pind. Pyth. viii. 21; comp. the different ideas in Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1210, &c., and Herod. iii. 5.) He is further said to have at one time been engaged in a struggle with all the immortals, and to have been killed by Zeus with a flash of lightning; he was buried in Tartarus under Mount Aetna, the workshop of Hephaestus. (Ov. Her. xv. 11, Fast. iv. 491; Aeschyl. Prom. 351, &c.; Pind. Pyth. i. 29, &c.) The later poets frequently connect Typhoeus with Egypt, and the gods, it is said, when unable to hold out against him, fled to Egypt, where, from fear, they metamorphosed themselves into animals, with the exception of Zeus and Athena. (Anton. Lib. 28; Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 28; Ov. Met. v. 321, &c.; comp. Apollod. i. 6. § 3; Ov. Fast. ii. 461; Horat. Carm. iii. 4. 53.) [L. S.]

TYRA'NNION (Τυραννίων). 1. A Greek grammarian, a native of Amisus in Pontus, the son of Epicratides, or, according to some accounts, of Corymbus. He was a pupil of Hestiaeus of Amisus, and was originally called Theophrastus, but received from his instructor the name of Tyrannion on account of his domineering behaviour to his fellow disciples. He afterwards studied under Dionysius the Thracian at Rhodes. In B. C. 72 he was taken captive by Lucullus, who carried him to Rome. At the request of Murena Tyrannion was handed over to him, upon which he emancipated him, an act with which Plutarch (Lucullus, 19) finds fault, as the emancipation involved a recognition of his having been a slave, which does not seem to have been the light in which Lucullus regarded him. At Rome Tyrannion occupied himself in teaching. He was also employed in arranging the library of Apellicon, which Sulla brought to Rome. (Plut. Sulla, 26.) Cicero employed him in a similar manner, and speaks in the highest terms of the learning and ability which Tyrannion exhibited in these labours. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 4, b. 1. 8, a. 2). Cicero also availed himself of his services in the instruction of his nephew Quintus (ad Quint. Fratr. ii. 4. § 2; comp. ad Att. ii. 6. § 1, xii. 6. § 1, 2. § 2, 7. § 2, ad Quint. Fr. iii. 4. § 5). Strabo (xii. p. 548) speaks of having received instruction from Tyrannion. The geographical knowledge of Tyrannion seems to have been considerable; at any rate Cicero thought highly of it. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 6.) Tyrannion amassed considerable wealth, and according to the scarcely credible statement of Suidas (s. v.) collected himself a library of 30,000 volumes. Cicero alludes to a small work of his (ad Att. xii. 6), but we do not learn the subject of it. Tyrannion died at a very advanced age of a paralytic stroke.

2. A native of Phoenicia, the son of Artemidorus, and a disciple of the preceding. His original name was Diocles. He was taken captive in the war between Antonius and Octavianus, and was purchased by Dymas, a freedman of the emperor. By him he was presented to Terentia, the wife of Cicero, who manumitted him. He taught at Rome, and according to Suidas, wrote 68 works. The following are mentioned:—1. Περὶ τῆς Ὁμηρικῆς προσῳδίας. 2. Περὶ τῶν μερῶν τοῦ λόγου. 3. Περὶ τῆς Ῥωμαϊκῆς διαλέκτου, showing that the Latin language is derived from the Greek. 4. Τοῦ Ἀντιγένους ἡ Ῥωμαϊκὴ διάλεκτος. 5. Ὅτι διαφωνοῦσιν οἱ νεώτεροι ποιηταὶ πρὸς Ὅμηρον. 6. Ἐξήγησις τοῦ Τυραννίωνος μερισμοῦ. 7. Διόρθωσις Ὁμηρική. 8. Ὀρθογραφία. Tyrannion is mentioned in the scholia on Homer (Schol. Marc. ad Il. β. 92, 155, 169).

3. Suidas mentions a third writer of the name of Tyrannion, a Messenian, who wrote a work on augury (οἰωνοσκοπικά) in three books, and some other works.

A work Περὶ τοῦ σκολιοῦ μέτρου is ascribed by Suidas (s. v. σκολιόν) to a writer named Tyrannion, and stated to have been written at the suggestion of Caius Caesar. If this notice is correct, and the Tyrannion meant is the second of that name, he must have reached a very advanced age when he commenced this treatise, even supposing him to have been young when he was brought to Rome. [C. P. M.]

TYRIA'SPES (Τυριάσπης), a Persian, who in B. C. 327 was appointed by Alexander the Great to the satrapy of the Paropamisadae, west of the river Cophen. In the following year Alexander commissioned him and Philippus to reduce the Assacenians, who had revolted (Arr. Anab. iv. 22, v. 20.) [E. E.]

TYRO (Τυρώ), a daughter of Salmoneus and Alcidice, was the wife of Cretheus, and the beloved of the river-god Enipeus in Thessaly, in the form of whom Poseidon appeared to her, and became by her the father of Pelias and Neleus. By Cretheus she was the mother of Aeson, Pheres, and Amythaon. (Hom. Od. xi. 235, &c.; Apollod. i. 9. § 8.) [L. S.]

TYRO SABI'NUS. [SABINUS.]

TYRRHE'NUS (Τυῤῥηνός or Τυρσηνός), a son of the Lydian king Atys and Callithea, and a brother of Lydus, is said to have led a Pelasgian colony from Lydia into Italy, into the country of the Umbrians, and to have given to the colonists his name, Tyrrhenians. (Herod. iv. 94; Dionys. Hal. i. 27.) Others call Tyrrhenus a son of Heracles by Omphale (Dionys. i. 28), or of Telephus and Hiera, and a brother of Tarchon. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 1242, 1249.) The name Tarchon seems to be only another form for Tyrrhenus, and the two names represent a Pelasgian hero founding settlements in the north of Italy. (Comp. Müller, Die Etrusker, vol. i. p. 72, &c.) [L. S.]

TYRRHEUS, a shepherd of king Latinus. Ascanius once, while hunting, killed a tame stag belonging to Tyrrheus, whereupon the country people took up arms, which was the first conflict in Italy between the natives and the Trojan settlers. (Virg. Aen. vii. 483, &c., ix. 28.) [L. S.]

TYRTAEUS (Τυρταῖος, or Τύρταιος), son of Archembrotus, the celebrated poet, who assisted the Spartans in the Second Messenian War, was the second in order of time of the Greek elegiac poets, Callinus being the first. At the time when his name first appears in history, he is represented, according to the prevalent account, as living at Aphidnae in Attica; but the whole tradition, of which this statement forms a part, has the same mythical complexion by which all the accounts of the early Greek poets are more or less pervaded. In attempting to trace the tradition to its source, we find in Plato the brief statement, that Tyrtaeus was by birth an Athenian, but became a citizen of Lacedaemon (De Legg. i. p. 629). The orator Lycurgus tells the story more fully; that, when the Spartans were at war with the Messenians, they were commanded by an oracle to take a leader from among the Athenians, and thus to conquer their enemies; and that the leader they so chose from Athens was Tyrtaeus. (Lycurg. c. Leocr. p. 211, ed. Reiske.) We learn also from Strabo (viii. p. 362) and Athenaeus (xiv. p. 630, f.) that Philochorus and Callisthenes and many other historians gave a similar account, and made Tyrtaeus an Athenian of Aphidnae (εἰποῦσιν ἐξ Ἀθηνῶν καὶ Ἀφιδνῶν ἀφικέσθαι). The tradition appears in a still more enlarged form in Pausanias (iv. 15. § 3), Diodorus (xv. 66), the Scholia to Plato (p. 448, ed. Bekker), Themistius (xv. p. 242, s. 197, 198), Justin (iii. 5), the scholiast on Horace (Art. Poet. 402), and other writers (see Clinton, F. H. vol. i. s. a. 683). Of these writers, however, only Pausanias, Justin, the Scholiast on Horace, and Suidas, give us the well-known embellishment of the story which represents Tyrtaeus as a lame schoolmaster, of low family and reputation, whom the Athenians, when applied to by the Lacedaemonians in accordance with the oracle, purposely sent as the most inefficient leader they could select, being unwilling to assist the Lacedaemonians in extending their dominion in the Peloponnesus, but little thinking that the poetry of Tyrtaeus would achieve that victory, which his physical constitution seemed to forbid his aspiring to. Now to accept the details of this tradition as historical facts would be to reject all the principles of criticism, and to fall back on the literal interpretation of mythical accounts; but, on the other hand, we are equally forbidden by sound criticism to reject altogether that element of the tradition, which represents Tyrtaeus as, in some way or other, connected with the Attic town of Aphidnae. Perhaps the explanation may be found in the comparison of the tradition with the facts, that Tyrtaeus was an elegiac poet, and that the elegy had its origin in Ionia, and also with another tradition, preserved by Suidas (s. v.), which made the poet a native of Miletus; from which results the probability that either Tyrtaeus himself, or his immediate ancestors, migrated from Ionia to Sparta, either directly, or by way of Attica, carrying with them a knowledge of the principles of the elegy. Aphidnae, the town of Attica to which the tradition assigns him, was connected with Laconia, from a very early period, by the legends about the Dioscuri; but it is hard to say whether this circumstance renders the story more probable or more suspicious; for, on the supposition that the story is an invention, we have in the connection of Aphidnae with Laconia a reason why that town, above all others in Attica, should have been fixed upon as the abode of Tyrtaeus. On the same supposition the motive for the fabrication of the tradition is to be found in the desire which Athenian writers so often displayed, and which is the leading idea in the passage of Lycurgus referred to above, to claim for Athens the greatest possible share of all the greatness and goodness which illustrated the Hellenic race: —

> "Sunt quibus unum opus est, intactae Palladis urbem > Carmine perpetuo celebrare, et > Undique discerptam fronti praeponere olivam."

On the other hand, Strabo (l. c.) rejects the tradition altogether, and makes Tyrtaeus a native of Lacedaemon, on the authority of certain passages in his poems. He tells us that Tyrtaeus stated that the first conquest of Messenia was made in the time of the grandfathers of the men of his own generation (κατὰ τοὺς τῶν πατέρων πατέρας), and that in the second he himself was leader of the Lacedaemonians; and then Strabo adds, — directly after the words τοῖς Λακεδαιμονίοις,—καὶ γὰρ εἶναι φησὶν ἐκεῖθεν ἐν τῇ ποιήσει ἐλεγείᾳ, ἣν ἐπιγράφουσιν Εὐνομίαν·

> Αὐτὸς γὰρ Κρονίων καλλιστεφάνου πόσις Ἥρης
> Ζεὺς Ἡρακλείδαις τηνδὲ δέδωκε πόλιν.
> Οἷσιν ἅμα προλιπόντες Ἐρινεὸν ἠνεμόεντα,
> Εὐρεῖαν Πέλοπος νῆσον ἀφικόμεθα.

From which Strabo draws the conclusion, that either the elegies containing these verses are spurious, or else that the statement of Philochorus, &c. (as already quoted) must be rejected. The commentators, however, are not content with Strabo's own negative inference from the verses quoted, but will have it that he understood them as declaring that Tyrtaeus himself came from Erineos to join the Spartans in their war against the Messenians; and, to give a colour to this interpretation, Casaubon assumes as self-evident that after τοῖς Λακεδαιμονίοις some such words as ἐλθὼν ἐξ Ἐρινέου have been lost. But, if the passage says that Tyrtaeus came from Erineos at all, it says as plainly that he came thence to Peloponnesus together with the Heracleidae; and it is therefore clear that the verses refer, not to any removal of Tyrtaeus himself, but to the great migration of the Dorian ancestors of those Lacedaemonians for whom he spoke, and among whom he, in some sense, included himself; and the argument of Strabo, as the passage stands, is that Tyrtaeus was a Lacedaemonian (ἐκεῖθεν referring, of course, to Λακεδαιμονίοις), because of the intimate way in which he associates himself with the descendants of the Dorians who migrated from Erineos (one of the four Dorian states of Thessaly) to the Peloponnesus. The true question that remains is this, whether his manner of identifying himself with the Lacedaemonians in this passage, and in the phrase about their fathers' fathers, implies that he himself was really a descendant of those Dorians who invaded the Peloponnesus, and of those Lacedaemonians who fought in the first Messenian war, or whether this mode of expression is sufficiently explained by the close association into which he had been thrown with the Spartans, whom he not only aided in war, but by whom he had been made a citizen. This last fact is expressly stated by Plato (l. c.), and its probability is confirmed by the statement of Aristotle (Pol. ii. 6. § 12) that, in the times of the early kings, the Spartans sometimes conferred the citizenship upon foreigners. Plutarch ascribes a saying to Pausanias, the son of Cleombrotus, that, when asked why they had made Tyrtaeus a citizen, he replied, "that a foreigner might never appear to be our leader" (Apophth. Lacon. p. 230, d.). Of course, a mere floating apophthegm like this can have little weight; it may be a genuine tradition, or it may be the invention of some writer who wished to reconcile the common story about Tyrtaeus with the well-known repugnance of the Lacedaemonians to confer their franchise upon foreigners. The statement of Suidas, that Tyrtaeus was a Lacedaemonian, according to some, furnishes no additional evidence, but must be interpreted according to the conclusion which may be arrived at respecting the whole question. It should not be forgotten, in estimating the value of Strabo's opinion, that he may have found other passages in the writings of Tyrtaeus, which seemed to imply that he was a Lacedaemonian, besides those which he quotes; but of course this possibility cannot be adduced as a positive argument, unless it were confirmed by the actual occurrence of such passages in the extant fragments of Tyrtaeus.

In the opinion of those modern critics, who reject the account of the Attic origin of Tyrtaeus, the extant fragments do actually furnish evidence of his being a Lacedaemonian. The spirit displayed in them is said to be thoroughly Dorian; and the patriotic energy, with which the poet praises those who face danger for their native land, is certainly extraordinary for a foreigner, especially when it is remembered that Tyrtaeus is not only said to have shown his influence over the Spartans by leading them in war, but also by appeasing their civil discords at home; and all this becomes the more extraordinary, if we reflect that this patriotic ardour was excited, and this influence was exerted, by an Ionian over and on behalf of Dorians. Neither does it seem probable that, whatever aid the Lacedaemonians might be willing to accept from a foreigner, they would entrust to him the command of their armies.

On the other hand, it is urged by Müller with some force, that "If Tyrtaeus came from Attica, it is easy to understand how the elegiac metre, which had its origin in Ionia, should have been used by him, and that in the very style of Callinus. Athens was so closely connected with her Ionic colonies, that this new kind of poetry must have been soon known in the mother city. This circumstance would be far more inexplicable if Tyrtaeus had been a Lacedaemonian by birth, as was stated vaguely * by some ancient authors. For although Sparta was not at this period a stranger to the efforts of the other Greeks in poetry and music, yet the Spartans, with their peculiar modes of thinking, would not have been very ready to appropriate the new invention of the Ionians." † (Hist. of Lit. of Greece, vol. i. p. 111.)

Discussions of this sort are extremely unsatisfactory, in respect of the establishment of any positive conclusions; but for that very reason they are extremely important, in order to mark the limits of our knowledge of the early history of Greek lyric poetry, and to show the danger of accepting the positive statements of writers who lived long after the period with reference to which their evidence is brought forward, as if their being positive statements were alone sufficient to authenticate them. In the present case, the question of the country of Tyrtaeus appears to us still undecided, and likely to remain so.

The other points of the popular story, namely, that Tyrtaeus was a lame schoolmaster, are rejected by all modern writers. It would lead us too far to discuss their probable origin: we will only observe that the statement of his being a schoolmaster may simply mean that he was, like the other early musicians and poets, a teacher of his own art; and his alleged lameness may possibly be connected with some misunderstanding of expressions used by the earlier writers to describe his metres. These suggestions, however, are by no means put forward as altogether satisfactory explanations of the tradition.

Turning now to the more certain facts of the poet's history, we find him presented to us in the double light of a statesman and a military leader, composing the dissensions of the Spartans at home, and animating their courage in the field. And this representation is quite consistent with the position occupied by a poet in those early times, as the teacher and prime mover both in knowledge and in virtue; a position attested by abundant evidence, and recognised by the very phrase which is several times used to describe those early poets, ὁ σοφὸς ποιήτης. It is remarkable that the power of the poet to teach political wisdom, and to appease civil discords, is not only recognised in the traditions about the early history of Greece, from the legends respecting Orpheus downwards, but also that, in the semi-historical period now under consideration, and with specific reference to the Lacedaemonian state, we are told of civil tumults being appeased, not only by Tyrtaeus, but also by Terpander and Thaletas, who, according to the received chronology, were his contemporaries [TERPANDER; THALES]. The nature of these dissensions it is the province of the political historian to investigate: the form which the tradition assumes in the case of Tyrtaeus is the following. Among the calamities, which the revolt of the Messenians brought upon the Spartan state, and which, according to the common story, Tyrtaeus was the divinely appointed minister to remedy, not the least was the discontent of those citizens, who, having possessed lands in Messenia, or on the borders, had either been expelled from their estates, or had been forced to leave them uncultivated for fear of the enemy, and, being thus deprived of their means of subsistence, demanded compensation by a new division of landed property. To convince these sufferers of their error in disturbing public order, Tyrtaeus composed his elegy entitled "Legal Order" (Εὐνομία), which Suidas calls also Πολιτεία. (Aristot. Polit. v. 7. § 1; Paus. iv. 18. § 2.) Of this work Müller gives the following excellent description:—"It is not difficult, on considering attentively the character of the early Greek elegy, to form an idea of the manner in which Tyrtaeus probably handled this subject. He

* This mode of disposing of positive evidence is worth notice.

† How was it, then (one may ask), that they were so "very ready to appropriate" Tyrtaeus and the invention together?

doubtless began with remarking the anarchical movement among the Spartan citizens, and by expressing the concern with which he viewed it. But, as in general the elegy seeks to pass from an excited state of the mind through sentiments and images of a miscellaneous description to a state of calmness and tranquillity, it may be conjectured that the poet in the Eunomia made this transition by drawing a picture of the well-regulated constitution of Sparta, and the legal existence of its citizens, which, founded with the divine assistance, ought not to be destroyed by the threatened innovations; and that at the same time he reminded the Spartans, who had been deprived of their lands by the Messenian war, that on their courage would depend the recovery of their possessions, and the restoration of the former prosperity of the state. This view is entirely confirmed by the fragments of Tyrtaeus, some of which are distinctly stated to belong to the Eunomia. In these the constitution of Sparta is extolled, as being founded by the power of the gods; Zeus himself having given the country to the Heracleids, and the power having been distributed in the justest manner, according to the oracles of the Pythian Apollo, among the kings, the gerons in the council, and the men of the commonalty in the popular assembly." (Hist. of the Lit. of Anc. Greece, vol. i. p. 111.)

But Tyrtaeus is still more celebrated for the compositions by which he animated the courage of the Spartans in their conflict with the Messenians,

"Tyrtaeusque mares animos in Martia bella Versibus exacuit." (Horat. Ars Poët. 402.)

The poems were of two kinds; namely, elegies, containing exhortations to constancy and courage, and descriptions of the glory of fighting bravely for one's native land; and more spirited compositions, in the anapaestic measure, which were intended as marching songs, to be performed with the music of the flute. The former are called ὑποθῆκαι, or ὑποθῆκαι δι' ἐλεγείας, or ἐλεγεῖα simply; the latter ἔπη ἀνάπαιστα, μέλη πολεμιστήρια, ἐμβατήρια, ἐνόπλια, or προτρεπτικά. Both classes of compositions, we are told, he used to recite or sing to the rulers of the state in private, and to bodies of the citizens, just as he might happen to collect them around him, in order to stimulate them to the prosecution of the war (Paus. iv. 15); and with the same songs he animated their spirits on the march and on the battle field. He lived to see the success of his efforts in the entire conquest of the Messenians, and their reduction to the condition of Helots. (Paus. iv. 14. § 3.)

It thus appears that the period when Tyrtaeus flourished was precisely coincident with the time of the second Messenian War; for the history of which, indeed, his poems appear to have been the only trustworthy authority that the ancients possessed, although it is very doubtful how far the later writers on the subject, such as Myron and Rhianus, adhered to the information they obtained from that source. (See Grote, Hist. of Greece, Pt. ii. c. 7, vol. ii. pp. 556, foll.) The time of the war, according to Pausanias (iv. 15. § 1) was B. C. 685—668; but Mr. Clinton and Mr. Grote agree in the opinion that this date is too high. (Clinton, F. H. s. a. 685; Grote, l. c. p. 558). Suidas places Tyrtaeus at the 35th Olympiad, and also indicates his time by saying that he was contemporary with the so-called Seven Wise Men, and also older. At all events, he lived during the period of that great development of music and poetry, which took place at Sparta during the seventh century, B. C., although we have no distinct account of his relation to the other musicians and poets whose efforts contributed to that development. The absence of any statement of a connection between him and Terpander or Thaletas is easily explained by the fact that he was not, properly speaking, a lyric poet. Besides his anapaestic war-songs, his compositions, so far as we are informed, were all elegiac, and his music was that of the flute. He is expressly called by Suidas ἐλεγειοποιὸς καὶ αὐλητής.

The estimation in which Tyrtaeus was held at Sparta, as long as the state preserved her independence, was of the highest order. Even in his own time, his poems were used in the instruction of the young, as we learn from the orator Lycurgus (l. c.), who goes on to say that the Lacedaemonians, though they made no account of the other poets, set such value upon this one, that, when they were engaged in a military expedition, it was their practice to summon all the soldiers to the king's tent, that they might hear the poems of Tyrtaeus. Athenaeus also (xiv. p. 630, f.) tells us that, in time of war, the Lacedaemonians regulated their evolutions by performing the poems of Tyrtaeus (τὰ Τυρταίου ποιήματα ἀπομνημονεύοντες ἔῤῥυθμον κίνησιν ποιοῦνται), and that they had the custom in their camps, that, when they had supped and sung the paean, they sang, each in his turn, the poems of Tyrtaeus. Pollux (iv. 107) ascribes to Tyrtaeus the establishment of the triple choruses, of boys, men, and old men. The influence of his poetry on the minds of the Spartan youth is also indicated by the saying ascribed to Leonidas, who, being asked what sort of a poet Tyrtaeus appeared to him, replied, "A good one to tickle the minds of the young." (Plut. Cleom. 2.)

The extant fragments of Tyrtaeus are contained in most of the older and more recent collections of the Greek poets, and, among the rest, in Gaisford's Poetae Minores Graeci, Schneidewin's Delectus Poëseos Graecorum, and Bergk's Poetae Lyrici Graeci. The best separate editions are those of Klotz, Bremae, 1764, 8vo., reprinted, with a German translation by Weiss, Altenb. 1767, 8vo.; of Franke, in his edition of Callinus, 1816, 8vo.; of Stock, with a German translation and historical introduction, Leipz. 1819, 8vo.; of Didot, with an elegant French translation, a Dissertation on the poet's life, and a modern Greek version by Clonaras, Paris, 1826, 8vo.; and of N. Bach, with the remains of the elegiac poets, Callinus and Asius, Lips. 1831. There are numerous translations of the fragments into the European languages, a list of which, and of the other editions, will be found in Hoffmann's Lexicon Bibliographicum Scriptorum Graecorum. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 17, foll.; Müller, Dorier, passim, see Index, Hist. of Lit. of Greece, vol. i. pp. 110—112; Ulrici; Bode; Bernhardy, *Grundriss d. Griech. TZETZES. 1. JOANNES (Ἰωάννης Τζέτζης), a Greek grammarian of Constantinople. The period when he flourished may be gathered from his own statement, that he wrote one hundred years after Michael Psellus (Chil. xi. 719), and from the fact that he dedicated his Homeric Allegories to

Irene Augusta, the wife of Manuel Comnenus, who died A. D. 1158. The father of Joannes Tzetzes was Michael Tzetzes. His mother's name was Eudocia (Chil. v. 611). He was himself named after his paternal grandfather, a native of Byzantium, a man of some wealth, who, though not a learned man, showed great respect for scholars (ib. 615). His maternal grandmother was of a Basque or Iberian family. The earlier part of his life he spent with his brother Isaac at home, where they received various wholesome precepts from their father, urging them to prefer learning to riches, power, or precedence. (Chil. iii. 157, iv. 566, &c.) At the age of fifteen he was placed under the instruction of tutors, who not only carried him through the usual routine of study, but taught him Hebrew and Syriac (comp. Chil. vi. 282). His writings bear evident traces of the extent of his acquirements in literature, science, and philosophy, and not less of the inordinate self-conceit with which they had filled him. He boasts of having the best memory of any living man. (Chil. i. 275, 545.) He styles himself a second Cato or Palamedes (iii. 160); and says that he knows whole books off by heart (x. 681, comp. vi. 407, 475, viii. 182, ix. 752, x. 340, 364, xii. 13, 118, καὶ ὅσα ἄλλα ἕτερα ἐθέλοι τις μανθάνειν, εἰ ἀπὸ στήθους οἴδαμεν λέγειν πειράσθω). Another subject on which he glorifies himself is the rapidity with which he could write, comparing it to the speed of lightning (xii. 119, viii. 269, 526, καὶ νόει τὸ ὀξύτατον τῆς Τζέτζου διανοίας). He talks of Τζετζικὰς ἐρεύνας, as models of investigation, ἐν αἷσπερ ἡ ἀλήθεια ἐκ χάους ἀνατρέχει (xii. 75, 126). It is not much to be wondered at that others had not so exalted an opinion of him as he had of himself (xii. 97). The neglect of his fellow-countrymen even excites in him the fear that Constantinople would be given up to the barbarians, and become itself barbarous (xii. 993, &c.). He complains with bitterness that the princes and great men of his age did not appreciate his merits, but left him to get a livelihood by transcribing and selling his writings, of which they nevertheless expected copies to be sent them gratis (v. 941, comp. ix. 369). He speaks of Irene Augusta as the only person of high station from whom he had received any thing (xi. 48), and even in this instance he complains that the sums promised him for his Homeric Allegories were kept back by those who should have paid him (ix. 282, &c.). Further biographical particulars have not come down to us.

A large part of the voluminous writings of Tzetzes is still extant. The following have been published. 1. Ἰλιακά. This consists properly of three poems, collected in one under the titles Τὰ πρὸ Ὁμήρου, τὰ Ὁμήρου, καὶ τὰ μεθ' Ὅμηρον. The first contains the whole Iliac cyclus, from the birth of Paris to the tenth year of the siege, when the Iliad begins. The second consists of an abridgment of the Iliad. The third, like the work of Quintus Smyrnaeus, is devoted to the occurrences which took place between the death of Hector and the return of the Greeks. The whole amounts to 1676 lines, and is written in hexameter metre. It is a very dull composition, all the merits that are to be found in which should be ascribed to the earlier poets from whom Tzetzes derived his materials. Our knowledge of this composition is of comparatively recent date. A fragment of one hundred and forty-eight lines, from the Antehomerica, was published by F. Morel, under the title Iliacum carmen Poetae Graeci cujus nomen ignoratur. A fragment of twenty lines from the Posthomerica was published by Dodwell in his Dissertationes de veteribus Graecis et Romanis Cyclis, p. 802. In 1770 G. B. von Schirach published from a manuscript formerly at Augsburg, now at Munich, the whole of the Antehomerica, with the exception of about one hundred and seventy lines, a portion of the Homerica, and the fragment of the Posthomerica which had been published by Dodwell. The missing portion of the Antehomerica, together with the whole of the Posthomerica, was found in a manuscript at Vienna by T. C. Tychsen, who sent a copy of it to F. Jacobs. A copy of a manuscript of the Homerica was obtained from England, and a complete edition of the three poems was published by Jacobs in 1793, with a commentary. A more correct edition is that of Immanuel Bekker (Berlin, 1816). 2. Another extensive work of Tzetzes is that known by the name of Chiliades, consisting in its present form of 12,661 lines. The name Chiliades was given to it by the first editor, Nic. Gerbelius, who divided it, without reference to the contents, into thirteen divisions of 1000 lines, the last being incomplete. Tzetzes himself called it βίβλος ἱστορική, and divided it into three πίνακες, as he termed them; the first of which contains one hundred and forty-one narrations, and ends at Chil. iv. l. 466. Hereupon follows an epistle to one Joannes Lachanes, in which the contents of the first table are repeated and accompanied with moral observations. The second πίναξ extends from Chil. iv. l. 781 to Chil. v. 192, and contains twenty-three narratives. The third contains four hundred and ninety-six stories. It consists of six hundred and sixty chapters or divisions, separated into three masses. Its subject-matter is of the most miscellaneous kind, but embraces chiefly mythological and historical narratives, arranged under separate titles, and without any further connection. The following are a few of them, as they occur: Croesus, Midas, Gyges, Codrus, Alcmaeon, the sons of Boreas, Euphorbus, Narcissus, Nireus, Hyacinthus, Orpheus, Amphion, the Sirens, Marsyas, Terpander, Arion, the golden lamb of Atreus, the bull of Minos, the dog of Cephalus, Megacles, Cimon, Aristopatira, the victories of Simonides, Stesichorus, Tyrtaeus, Hannibal, Bucephalus, the clothes of the Sybarite Antisthenes, Xerxes, Cleopatra, the Pharos at Alexandria, Trajanus and his bridge over the Danube, Archimedes, Hercules, &c.

It is an uncritical gossiping book, written in bad Greek in that abominable make-believe of a metre, called political verse (ἡμαξευμένοι στίχοι, Chil. ix. 283), of which the following is a sample: —

οἶδας δὲ πάντως ἀκριβῶς πῶς πᾶσαν οἶδα βίβλον ἐκ στήθους τε καὶ στόματος οὕτως ἑτοίμως λέγειν, οὐδὲ γὰρ μνημονέστερον τοῦ Τζέτζου θεὸς ἄλλον ἄνδρα τῶν πρίν τε καὶ τῶν νῦν ἐξέφηνεν ἐν βίῳ.
(Chil. i. 275.)

It is followed by an appendix, in iambics, and some prose epistles. It contains, however, a great deal of curious and valuable information, though, as Heyne has shown, the bulk of it was obtained by Tzetzes at second hand. Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. xi. p. 243, &c.) has a list of above 400 writers quoted by Tzetzes in this work. The author appears to have contemplated a series of such productions, of which this was only the Ἄλφα. Various appendices or scholia to it, and a collection of 107 prose epistles are yet unpublished. The first edition of this work was published by Gerbelius in 1546. The best edition is that of Kiessling (Lips. 1826), though much still requires correction and supplementation (see Struve, Ueber den politischen Vers der Mittelgriechen, 1828, and in the Krit. Biblioth. 1827, 3. p. 241, &c.; comp. Dübner, in the Rhein. Mus. iv. 1). Some insignificant scholia on the Chiliades by Tzetzes are published in Cramer's Anecdota. Oxon. (iii. 350, &c.). 3. An iambic poem on the education of children is printed in the editions of the Chiliades. 4. A series of mythical and epic narratives, in 777 political lines, entitled Θεογονία, was discovered by Immanuel Bekker, and published in the Abhandlungen der Preussischen Akademie, 1840. 5. A versified treatise περὶ μέτρων, and another περὶ διαφορᾶς ποιητῶν (Cramer, Anecd. Oxon. iv. 302, &c.; Welcker, Rhein. Mus. iv. 393, &c.; Meineke, Com. Gr. ii. p. 1245—1254, v. p. 3). 6. An equally worthless poem or collection of verses, περὶ Πινδαρικῶν μέτρων (Cramer, Anecd. Paris. i. 59—162). 7. Some versified scholia on Hermogenes (Cramer, Anecd. Oxon. iv. p. 1—148). 8. Lines περὶ ῥημάτων αὐθυποτάκτων (Bekker, Anecd. vol. iii. p. 1088—1090). 9. An ἐξήγησις on the Iliad of Homer; published by G. Hermann, together with the work of Draco of Stratonicea, on metres (Leipzig, 1812). 10. Scholia on Hesiod, printed in the editions of Hesiod by Trincavelli (Venice, 1537), and Heinsius (Leyden, 1603).

Of the unpublished works of Joannes Tzetzes, the most considerable is: 1. The Homeric Allegories (ὑπόθεσις τοῦ Ὁμήρου ἀλληγορηθεῖσα, or μετάφρασις Ὁμήρου), consisting of some 6000 political lines. Tzetzes mentions this work in the Chiliades (v. 7, 776, ix. 282, &c.). Besides this there are, 2. Scholia on the Halieutica of Oppian. 3. Expositio Isagoges, seu Libri de V. Vocibus Porphyrii, in political verses. 4. An epitome of the rhetoric of Hermogenes, in political verses. 5. Λογισμῶν βίβλος (comp. Chil. xi. 361). 6. A collection of 107 letters (see above). 7. A treatise on the Canon of Ptolemy. 8. Various short pieces, epigrams, &c. For an account of the manuscripts in which these are found the reader is referred to Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. vol. xi. p. 215, &c., comp. i. 403, &c. vi. 352. (Schöll, Geschichte der Griech. Litteratur, vol. iii. p. 84, &c.; Bernhardy, Grundriss der Griechischen Litteratur, vol. ii. p. 1070.)

2. ISAAC (Ἰσαάκιος Τζέτζης), brother of the preceding, is named in the manuscripts as the author of the commentary on the Cassandra of Lycophron. It appears however from passages in his works, that Joannes Tzetzes claimed it as his production (Chil. ix. hist. 298; comp. Schol. ad Lycophr. 83). The same claim is made in a letter of Joannes Tzetzes to the Protonotarius Basilius Achridenus, printed in Fabricius, vol. iii. p. 753, and in Küster's Suidas, s. v. Λυκόφρων. In Chil. viii. hist. 204, Joannes says that some other grammarian attempted to set up a claim to be the author of the commentary, but was speedily detected. The last editor, J. C. Müller, is of opinion that Isaac Tzetzes first published a commentary on Lycophron, and that Joannes Tzetzes subsequently published an enlarged and improved edition of it. Of this he finds traces in the manuscripts, some of which contain apparently the older edition of Isaac, others the improved edition of Joannes, the additions exhibiting not only the learning, but the arrogant self-complacency of Joannes. The latter moreover does tell us that his brother Isaac wrote a commentary on Lycophron (Schol. ad Hesiod. Proleg. καὶ τῷ ἐμῷ δὲ ἀδελφῷ ἐκπεπόνηται λίαν κάλλιστα καὶ φιλοτιμότατα περὶ τούτου ἐν τῇ τοῦ Λυκόφρονος ἐξηγήσει; comp. Chil. viii. 486). The commentary is printed in several of the editions of Lycophron, as in that printed at Basel, 1546; n those of Canter (Basel, 1566), Stephanus (1601), Potter (Oxon. 1697), Owen (Oxon. 1702), Sebastiani (Rome, 1803). The best edition of the commentary, without the text of Lycophron, is that by Müller (Leipsig, 1811). [C. P. M.]

VABALATHUS. Vopiscus, in his life of Aurelian (c. 38), asserts that Zenobia assumed the purple as regent for her son Balbatus (al. leg. Babalatus), and not in the name of Herennianus and Timolaus, which is the statement of Trebellius Pollio (Trig. Tyrann. xxix.). It is certain that we find no trace of either Herennianus or Timolaus on medals, while a few are extant, both Greek and Roman, which exhibit IMP. C. VABALATHUS AUG. or ΑΥΤ.ΟΥΑΒΑΛΛΑΘΟϹ.ϹΕΒ. with the effigy and titles of Aurelian on the reverse. But several of these bear words or characters, in addition to those given above, which have proved a source of much embarrassment. Thus, on one we find VABALATHUS. VCRIMDR., abbreviations to which no archaeologist has been able to supply a satisfactory interpretation; on others, in which ΑΘΗΝΟΥ, &c., is supposed to stand for Ἀθηνοδώρου υἱος, while Sroias or Srias may be a sort of praenomen. Finally, there is a rare coin displaying on the obverse two laurelled heads, one of a bearded man, the other of a smooth-faced boy, with the legend ΑΥΡΗΛΙΑΝΟϹ.ΑΘΗΝΟΔΩΡΟϹ. It would be tedious and unprofitable to enumerate the various theories proposed to solve the problems suggested by these pieces. The only conclusion we can safely form is, that Sroias, Vabalathus, and Athenodorus were princes of Palmyra, connected with Odenathus and Zenobia, but in what relation they stood to them and to each other, has never been determined. VACCA, FLAMI'NIUS, a Roman sculptor, of whom all that is known is contained in the following inscription: D. O. M. FLAMINIO VACCAE SCULPTORI ROMANO QUI IN OPERIBUS QUAE FECIT NUNQUAM SIBI SATISFECIT. (Montfaucon, Diar. Ital. p. 105; Welcker, Rhein. Mus. 1848, vol. vi. p. 383.) [P. S.]

ΑΥΤ.ϹΡΩΙΑϹ.ΟΥΑΒΑΛΛΑΘΟϹ.ΑΘΗΝΟΥ. or,
Α.ϹΡΙΑϹ.ΟΥΑΒΑΛΛΑΘΟϹ.ΑΘΗΝΥ. or,

VACCUS, M. VITRU'VIUS, a citizen of Fundi, was the leader of the revolt of the Fundani and Privernates against Rome in B. C. 330. He was a man of considerable reputation both in his own state and also at Rome, where he had a house on the Palatine. The consul L. Plautius Venno was sent to quell the revolt, which he effected without difficulty. On the capture of Privernum, Vaccus fell into the consul's hands, and was put to death after his triumph. His property was confiscated to the state, his house on the Palatine destroyed, and the site on which it stood was ever after called the Vacci Prata. (Liv. viii. 19, 20; Cic. pro Dom. 38.)

VACU'NA, a Sabine divinity identical with Victoria. She had an ancient sanctuary near Horace's villa at Tibur, and another at Rome. The Romans however derived the name from Vacuus, and said that she was a divinity to whom the country people offered sacrifices when the labours of the field were over, that is, when they were at leisure, vacui. (Schol. ad Horat. Epist. i. 10. 49; Ov. Fast vi. 307; Plin. H. N. iii. 17.) From the Scholiast on Horace, we also learn that some identified her with Diana, Ceres, Venus, or Minerva. [L. S.]

VALA, NUMO'NIUS. 1. C. NUMONIUS VALA, known only from coins, from which it appears that he had obtained renown by storming a vallum, and had hence obtained the surname of Vala, which, according to the usual custom, became hereditary in his family. The coins were struck by one of his descendants in commemoration of the exploit. The one annexed has on the obverse the head of Numonius, with C. NVMONIVS VAALA, and on the reverse a man storming the vallum of a camp, which is defended by two others, with VAALA. Vaala is an ancient form of Vala, just as on the coins of Sulla we find Feelix instead of Felix. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 263.)

COIN OF C. NUMONIUS VALA.

2. NUMONIUS VALA, to whom Horace addresses one of his Epistles (i. 15), appears to have had estates in the neighbourhood of Velia and Salernum, since the poet makes inquiries of Vala about the climate of those places, as he intended to pass the winter in one of them. As this poem was probably written about B. C. 22, the friend of Horace was most likely the father of No. 3, if not the same person.

3. NUMONIUS VALA, legate of Quintilius Varus in A. D. 9, left the infantry when they were attacked by the enemy in the fatal battle of that year, and fled with the cavalry to the Rhine, but was overtaken in his flight and slain. (Vell. Pat. ii. 119.)

VALENS, one of the thirty tyrants enumerated by Trebellius Pollio [see AUREOLUS], was nominated proconsul of Achaia by Gallienus in consequence of his high character as a soldier, and a statesman. The usurper Macrianus [MACRIANUS] fearing him as a rival, and hating him as a private foe, despatched an emissary [PISO, No. 33], to put him to death. Valens, upon receiving intelligence of this design, conceived that he might best avoid the threatened danger by assuming the purple. Accordingly he was proclaimed emperor, and was soon after murdered by his soldiers. (Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyrann. xviii.) [W. R.]

VALENS, the maternal granduncle or uncle of the preceding, rebelled in Illyria during the reign of Gallienus, and perished after having held sway for a few days. He also, as well as his nephew, is pressed into the list of the thirty tyrants by Pollio. (Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyrann. xix.) [W. R.]

VALENS, emperor of the East A. D. 364—378, the brother of Valentinian [VALENTINIANUS I.], was born about A. D. 328. The name of his wife was Albia Dominica, by whom he had a son and two daughters. Under Julian he was one of the Domestici. He was made emperor of the East by his brother on the 28th of March A. D. 364, as is told in the article VALENTINIANUS.

Valens had in his service the Prefect Sallustius, and the generals Lupicinus, Victor, and Arinthaeus. By a constitution of the 16th of December of this year, he forbade the practice of giving presents to those who carried to the provinces important news, such as the accession of an emperor or his assumption of the consulship: he allowed the carriers of such news to receive the presents which persons of property or condition might choose to give, but not to exact anything from those who were not in easy circumstances. The Goths are spoken of as having made their appearance in Thrace in this year, but they were induced to retire, probably by money. Valens left Constantinople in the spring of A. D. 365, for Asia Minor, and he was at Caesarea in Cappadocia in the month of July, when the great earthquake happened, which shook all the country round the Mediterranean. The revolt of Procopius for a time rendered the throne of Valens insecure. Procopius assumed the imperial title at Constantinople, on the 28th of September, A. D. 365, and Valens received the intelligence as he was going to leave Caesarea. [PROCOPIUS]. After the death of Procopius, A. D. 366, Valens treated the partisans of the rebel with great clemency according to Themistius; but Ammianus and Zosimus say that he punished many innocent persons. The fact of some persons being punished is certain: the nature and degree of their participation in the revolt may be doubtful. The emperor had sworn to demolish the walls of Chalcedon for the share which it had taken in the insurrection, but at the prayer of the people of Nicaea, Nicomedia, and Constantinople, he satisfied his superstition by pulling down some small portion of the walls and rebuilding it. Probably about this time he did Constantinople the service of improving the supply of water by building an aqueduct.

The year A. D. 367 is memorable in the reign of Valens for an extraordinary event, the diminution of the taxes by one fourth, a measure which rarely happens in the history of a nation, the general rule being progressive taxation till people can pay no more. The diminution was the less expected as a war with the Goths was imminent. These barbarians had for some time hung on the northern frontier, and occasionally pillaged the Roman lands. Three thousand Goths, who had been sent by Athanaric to aid Procopius, were compelled to surrender after the death of the rebel, and were distributed in the towns along the Danube and kept under surveillance. The Gothic king, Ermenric, demanded these Goths back, but Valens refused them, and resolved on war, as he had nothing else to do.

Before undertaking the war, for which he made great preparation, Valens received the rite of baptism from Eudoxus, the chief of the Arians who was then seated in the chair of Constantinople. Thus, says Tillemont, "he began by an act which involved him in a thousand mishaps, and finally precipitated his body and his soul to death." The emperor posted his troops on the Danube, and fixed his camp at Marcianopolis, the capital of Lower Maesia. He was ably assisted by Auxonius, who was made Praefectus Praetorio in place of Sallustius, who was relieved of his office on account of his age. Valens crossed the Danube, and finding no resistance, ravaged the country of the enemy. He was again at Marcianopolis in January A. D. 368, where he appears to have passed the winter. An incursion of the Isaurians, who extended their ravages to Cilicia and Pamphylia, and cut to pieces Musonius, the Vicarius of Asia, and his troops, may perhaps be referred to this year.

The military events of the year A. D. 368 were unimportant. Valens was unable to cross the Danube, and he passed the winter again at Marcianopolis. On the 10th of October, the city of Nicaea was destroyed by an earthquake. On the 3d of May, A. D. 369, Valens left Marcianopolis for Noviodunum, where he crossed the Danube and entered the country of the Goths. The Goths sustained considerable loss; and Valens also defeated Athanaric, who opposed him with a numerous army. He returned to Marcianopolis, intending to pass another winter there, but the Goths sued for peace, which was granted on the condition that they should not cross the Danube, and should only be allowed to trade at two towns on the river. The treaty between Valens and Athanaric was concluded on vessels in the Danube, for Athanaric refused to set his foot on the Roman territory. At the end of this year, Valens was at Constantinople.

The year A. D. 370 is memorable for the cruel punishment of eighty ecclesiastics. The Arians were persecuted by the Catholics at Constantinople, and the Catholics sent a deputation of eighty ecclesiastics to Valens, who was then at Nicomedia. It is said that Valens ordered them to be put to death, and that his order was executed by Modestus, Praefectus Praetorio, by placing them in a vessel on the sea, and setting fire to it. "This inhumanity," observes Tillemont, "was punished by a famine which desolated Phrygia and the neighbouring country;" but the pious historian does not explain how the sufferings of the innocent are to be considered as a punishment on the guilty.

Valens spent the early part of A. D. 371 at Constantinople, whence he moved to Caesarea in Cappadocia, where he probably spent the winter. About this time he lost his only son. When the youth was taken ill, the emperor who had entertained a design of banishing Basilius, bishop of Caesarea, applied to him for his help, and the bishop promised that the boy should recover, if the emperor would allow him to be baptized by Catholic priests: "but Valens caused him to be baptized by Arians, and the child immediately died." It was about this time also that Valens divided Cappadocia into two provinces, and made Tyana the capital of the second.

In A. D. 372 Modestus, the Praefect, and Arinthaeus were consuls. Arinthaeus, who was a man of extraordinary stature, and of perfect form, of great courage and superior military skill, had been employed both by Julian and Jovian, and he had served Valens well in the war against Procopius. On the 13th of April, Valens was at Antioch in Syria, whither he had gone to conduct the war against Sapor king of Persia. Sapor had made a treaty with Jovian, in which it seems that Armenia was comprehended. However this may be, Sapor had set his mind on getting possession of Armenia, and about A. D. 369, having prevailed on Arsaces, the Armenian king, to come to an entertainment, he made him prisoner, put out his eyes, and finally ordered him to be executed. He gave the government of Armenia to Cylax and Artabanus, two natives, and creatures of his. Olympias, the wife of Arsaces, escaped with her son Para and her treasures to a strong place, which Cylax and Artabanus with some Persian troops made an unsuccessful attempt to take: it is said that Cylax and Artabanus were treacherous to their Persian allies.

Para implored the assistance of Valens, who supported him at New Caesarea in Pontus, in a manner suitable to his rank, and he sent Comes Terentius to put him in possession of Armenia, but without conferring on him the insignia of royalty, which, it was supposed, might be taken as an infraction of the treaty with the Persians. On hearing of this Sapor sent troops into Armenia, who drove Para into the mountains. Sapor, not being able to seize Para, made a show of reconciliation and Para of submission, one of the tokens of which was the heads of Cylax and Artabanus, for which Sapor had asked, on the ground that they were rather the masters than the servants of Para. Valens upon this sent Arinthaeus into Armenia, who checked the approach of the Persian troops. Sapor complained, but Valens paid no attention to his complaints. The Persian king threatened an attack, but nothing was done this year, though Valens appears to have advanced into Mesopotamia.

In the following year A. D. 373, the Roman and the Persian armies met; the Romans, commanded by Comes Trajanus and Vadomarus, formerly a king of the Allemanni. (Amm. Marc. xxix. 1.) Mesopotamia was apparently the seat of the war. Sapor was defeated, and retired to Ctesiphon after a truce was agreed on. Valens spent the winter at Antioch.

During this winter there was a conspiracy to assassinate Valens, to which some persons, said to be pagans, were encouraged by believing that some person whose name began with Theod, was destined to succeed Valens. This was learned by the application of certain magical arts, and the person pointed out as the successor of the emperor was Theodorus, one of the notarii or secretaries of the emperor. This affair is told at length by Ammianus (xxix. 1). Theodorus and many other persons were put to death, some innocent and others guilty, for the existence of a plot appears probable enough. Sozomen says that all persons of rank who bore a name beginning with Theod were put to death, which is not credible. He also assigns this as the cause of the death of Theodosiolus or Theodosius, a grandee of Spain, and it seems that he must mean Theodosius, the father of the emperor Theodosius, who was executed at Carthage, A. D. 376. However, many persons were executed who had dealt in magic; Maximus, once the teacher of the emperor Julian, Simonides, Hilarius and others. Books of magic were diligently sought after, and all that could be found were burnt. Chrysostom, then a young man, who by chance found a book of magic, expected and feared to share the fate of those who had dealt in this wicked art.

The same year in which Gabinius in the West fell a victim to Roman treachery (A. D. 374), Para perished by the same shameful means. Para, it appears, was established on the throne of Armenia, but Valens was for some reason dissatisfied with him, and sent for him to Tarsus under some pretext, leaving him to wait there, until Para, suspecting that it was intended to keep him prisoner, made his escape to Armenia. Valens commissioned Comes Trajanus, the commander of the Roman forces in Armenia, to put him to death, and Trajanus executed the order by inviting Para to a banquet and assassinating him.

Negotiations for peace were still going on with Sapor (A. D. 375), but they resulted in nothing. The emperor spent this year at Antioch, taking little care of the administration, and allowing his ministers to enrich themselves by unjust means. Ammianus (xxx. 4) has a chapter on these matters. The pretext for these odious inquisitions was the vague charge of treason against the emperor.

The events of A. D. 376 were unimportant. Valens was consul for the fifth time with Valentinianus, junior, who with his elder brother Gratianus had succeeded their father Valentinianus I., who died at the close of A. D. 375. Valens was preparing for war against the Persians, and he assembled a great force, but there is no record of what was the result of all this preparation. Sapor made conquests in Iberia and Armenia, which Valens could not prevent. Valens sent Victor to Persia to come to terms with the Persian king, and peace was made on terms, as it appears, not advantageous to the Romans.

At this time the Romans became acquainted with the name of the Huns. The Huns, after attacking various tribes and the Alans, who inhabited the banks of the Tanais, fell upon the Goths called Greuthingi or Eastern Goths, and so alarmed them that Ermenric, their king, killed himself. Vithimis, his successor, fell in battle against the Huns, and Alatheus and Saphrax, the guardians of his son Vitheric, retreated before this formidable enemy, to the country between the Borysthenes and the Danube. Athanaric and his Goths attempted a useless resistance to the Huns on the banks of the Dniester. The Goths, and among them were some of the people of Athanaric, to the number of about 200,000, appeared on the banks of the Danube and asked for permission to enter the Roman territories. Valens was then at Antioch, and the Goths sent a deputation to him at the head of which was their bishop Ulphilas. Valens granted the request of the Goths, but ordered that their children should be carried over to Asia as hostages, and that the Goths should not bring their arms with them; but the last part of the order was imperfectly executed. Accordingly the Goths were received into Thrace and spread over the country on the borders of the Danube. Their chiefs were Alavif and Fritigern.

Valens was still at Antioch (A. D. 377). It was the policy of the Romans to draw away the Goths from the immediate banks of the Danube, who had not moved off, because they were not supplied with provisions, as the emperor had ordered. Lupicinus, Comes of Thrace and Maximus, who held the rank of Dux, are accused of irritating the barbarians by their treatment, and of driving them to arms. Lupicinus attempted to make the Goths leave the Danube, and employed for that purpose the soldiers who were stationed on the river; but as soon as the Greuthingi, under Saphrax and Alatheus, saw the banks unprotected, they crossed over, having previously been refused permission. The Greuthingi joined Fritigern and his Goths at Marcianopolis. Lupicinus invited Alavif and Fritigern to a feast, but instead of a reconciliation, this brought about a quarrel, and a battle, in which Lupicinus was defeated. Some Goths, who were already encamped near Hadrianople, were ordered to cross the Hellespont, but they asked for two days' delay and supplies for the journey. The chief magistrate of the city, being irritated at some damage done by the Goths to a country-house of his, attacked them, and had the worst in the combat. These Goths soon joined Fritigern, who had advanced as far as Hadrianople, and they besieged the city. They could not take Hadrianople, but they were masters of all the country, which they pillaged.
